The Critical and Expository
BIBLE CYCLOPÆDIA.

IMPORTANT TO ALL BIBLE STUDENTS.

The Newberry Bible.

Formerly known as "THE ENGLISHMAN'S BIBLE," edited by THOMAS NEWBERRY.

Comprising: The English-Hebrew Bible and The English-Greek Testament, designed to give, as far as practicable, the Accuracy, Precision, and Certainty of the Original Hebrew and Greek Scriptures on the Page of the Authorised Version. Adapted both for the Biblical Student and for the Ordinary English Reader.

Large-Type Handy Reference Edition.

This Edition of "The Englishman's Bible" contains numerous additional references; the number of Hebrew and Greek words, also, with their English equivalents, having been greatly increased. Formerly issued in six vols., at 45s., it is now printed on a fine thin opaque India paper, specially made, and published at such a price as to place it within the reach of Bible Students.

Issued in four bindings, round corners, gilt edges:—

Persian leather, bevelled boards	21s.
Persian yapp, leather lined	25s.
Levanted morocco, yapp, leather lined, silk sewn	35s.
A very superior edition, in best Levant yapp, kid lined, silk sewn	60s.

The Very Rev. R. PAYNE SMITH, D.D., the DEAN OF CANTERBURY says:—

"It will, I think, enable the English reader thoroughly to understand the original, and place him in a position as near as possible to that of a Hebrew scholar. I find it executed with the utmost accuracy."

The Late Dr. HORATIUS BONAR says:—

"It is beyond all price. Its minuteness of detail, its accuracy, its perspicuity, its scholar-like finish, are such as to make one of the most trustworthy and precious volumes in connection with critical study that have ever issued from the press."

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HUGH M^C CALMONT, EARL CAIRNS,

THIS WORK,
Designed to Elucidate the Holy Scriptures of Truth,

IS (WITH HIS LORDSHIP'S PERMISSION)

RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED BY

THE AUTHOR.

PREFACE.

MY aim in this work is to put within the reach of all Bible Students, learned and unlearned alike, the fruits of modern criticism and research, and at the same time to set forth briefly and suggestively those doctrinal and experimental truths which the Written Word itself contains.

The labours of the agents of the Palestine Exploration Fund have thrown fresh light on many obscure questions of sacred topography and history, and verified in the minutest details the accuracy of Holy Writ. Besides, in an age prone to scepticism, God has given remarkable confirmations of the truth of His own Word in raising men who have been enabled to decipher the hieroglyphics of Egypt, the cuneiform inscriptions of Babylon and Assyria, and the archaic characters of the Moabite stone. Ephesus with its Temple to the great Diana, Midian and its mines, Rome and its catacombs, have all contributed their quota of witness to the truth. The discoveries thus made, in so far as they elucidate the sacred volume, have been embodied in this Cyclopædia. At the same time the commentators, ancient and modern, English and German, have been carefully consulted, and the results of reverent criticism given, in respect to difficult passages.

Many subjects which most of the Bible Dictionaries omit, and which are of deep interest, are handled; as, for instance, Antichrist, The Thousand Years or Millennium, Inspiration, Predestination, Justification, Number, Divination (in its bearing on Spiritualism), etc. Yet the whole, whilst containing the substance of most that is valuable in other Dictionaries, and several new features, is comprised within much smaller compass, and is offered at considerably less cost.

It is a storehouse of Scriptural information in a most compact and accessible form; its alphabetical arrangement fitting it for easy reference by Teachers and Students who have not the leisure or opportunity for more extended research.

The Student will find at the end an Index of all the books and almost all the chapters in the whole Bible, in consecutive order, with references to the articles which illustrate them; thus, by consulting the Index on any passage of Scripture, he will immediately find the article which will afford him the information that he desires.

Unity of tone and aim is better secured by unity of authorship than if the articles had been composed by different writers. If some errors have been fallen into inadvertently, the reader will remember the vastness of the undertaking by one author, and

"Cum mea compenset vitis bona, pluribus hisce, Si modo plura mihi bona sunt, inclinet."

All pains have been conscientiously taken to ensure accuracy, and to put the earnest student in possession of the most trustworthy information on debated points.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPÆDIA.

AARON

Aaron (according to Jerome meaning mountain of strength), the eldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi; brother of Moses and Miriam (Num. xxvi. 59, Exod. vi. 20); 1574 B.C. Jochebed, mother of Moses and A., bare them three centuries after the death of Levi (Exod. ii. 1); "daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi," means "a daughter of a Levite whom her mother bare to a Levite." The point of Num. xxvi. 59 is, Moses and A. were Levites both on the father's and mother's side, Hebrews of Hebrews. He was three years older than Moses (Exod. vii. 7); born, doubtless, before Pharaoh's edict for the destruction of the Hebrew male infants (Exod. i. 22). Miriam was the eldest of the three, as appears from her being old enough, when Moses was but three months old and A. three years, to offer to go and call a Hebrew nurse for Pharaoh's daughter, to tend his infant brother. The first mention of A. is in Exod. iv. 14; where, in answer to Moses' objection that he had not the eloquence needed for such a mission as that to Pharaoh, Jehovah answers: "Is not A., the Levite, thy brother? I know that he can speak well; and thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth; and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do; and he shall be thy spokesman unto the people; and he shall be instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God." His being described as "the Levite" implies that he already took a lead in his tribe; and, as the firstborn son, he would be priest of the household. The Lord directed him to "go into the wilderness to meet Moses" (Exod. iv. 27). In obedience to that intimation, after the forty years' separation, he met Moses in the "mount of God," where the vision of the flaming bush had been vouchsafed to the latter, and conducted him back to Goshen. There A., evidently a man of influence already among the Israelites, introduced Moses to their assembled elders; and, as his mouthpiece, declared to them the Divine commission of Moses with such persuasive power, under the Spirit, that the people "believed, bowed their heads, and worshipped" (Exod. iv. 29-31). During Moses' forty years' absence in Midian A. had married Elisheba or Elizabeth, daughter of Amminadab, and sister of Naashon, a prince of the children of Judah (Exod. vi. 23, 1 Chron. ii. 10). By her he had four sons: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar (father of Phinehas), and Ithamar. From his first interview with Pharaoh to the end of his course he always appears in connection with his more illustrious brother, co-operating with and assisting him. On the way to Sinai, in the battle with Amalek, A., in company with Hur, stayed up Moses' weary hands, which uplifted the miracle working rod of God (Exod. xvii. 9-13); and so Israel prevailed. His high dignity as interpreter of Moses, and worker of the appointed "signs in the sight of the people," and his investiture with the hereditary high-priesthood, a dignity which Moses did not share, account naturally for his having once harboured envy, and joined with Miriam in her jealousy of Moses' Ethiopian wife, when they said: "Hath the Lord spoken only by Moses? Hath He not spoken also by us?" comp. Num. xii. 1, 2, with Exod. xv. 20. But Moses is always made the principal, and A. subordinate. Whereas Moses ascended Sinai, and there received the tables of the law direct from God, as the mediator (Gal. iii. 19), A. has only the privilege of a more distant approach with Nadab and Abihu and the seventy elders, near enough indeed to see Jehovah's glory, but not to have access to His immediate presence. His character, as contrasted with Moses, comes out in what followed during Moses' forty days' absence on the mount. Left alone to guide the people, he betrayed his instability of character in his weak and guilty concession to the people's demand for visible gods to go before them in the absence of Moses, their recognised leader under Jehovah; and instead of the pillar of cloud and fire wherein the Lord heretofore had gone before them (Exod. xiii. 21; xxxii.). Perhaps A. had hoped that their love of their personal finery and jewellery, which is the idol of so many in our own days, would prove stronger than their appetite for open idolatry; but men will for superstition part with that which they will not part with for a pure worship. So, casting the responsibility on them, easy and too ready to yield to pressure from without, and forgetting the precept, "thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil" (Exod. xxiii. 2), he melted or suffered their gold to be melted in a furnace, and "fashioned it with a graving tool into a calf." This form was probably designed as a compromise to combine the seemingly common elements of the worship of Jehovah associated with the calf-formed cherubim, and of the Egyptian idol ox, Mnevis or Apis. Like Jeroboam's calves long subsequently, the sin was a violation of the second rather than of the first commandment, the worship of the true God by an image (as the church of Rome teaches), rather than the adding or substituting of another god. It was an accommodation to the usages which both Israel and Jeroboam respectively had learnt in Egypt. Like all compromises of truth, its inevitable result was still further apostasy from the truth. A.'s words, "These are thy gods [elohim: a title of the true God], O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt," as also his proclamation, "To-morrow is a feast to Jehovah," show that he did not mean an open apostasy from the Lord, but rather a concession to the people's sensuous tastes, in order to avert a total alienation from Jehovah. But the so called "feast of the Lord" sank into gross heathenishness; "the people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play," "dancing" before the calf, "naked unto their shame among their enemies"; they roused Moses' righteous anger when he descended from the mount, so that he brake in pieces the tables out of his hand, as a symbol of their violation of the covenant. Then he burnt the calf in the fire, ground it to powder (a process which required a considerable acquaintance with chemistry), strewed it upon the water, and made the Israelites drink of it. Comp.

Prov. i. 31. A. alleged in excuse the people's being "set on mischief," and seemingly that he had but cast their gold into the fire, and that by mere chance "there came out this calf."

A.'s humiliation and repentance must have been very deep; for two months after this great sin God's foreappointed plan (Exod. xxix.) was carried into effect in the consecration of A. to the high priesthood (Lev. viii.). That it was a delegated priesthood, not inherent, like Messiah's, of the order of Melchizedek, appears from the fact that Moses, though not the legal priest but God's representative, officiated on the occasion, to inaugurate him into it. Compare, for the spiritual significance of this, Heb. vii. A.'s very fall would upon his recovery make him the fitter as a priest, to have compassion on the ignorant and on them that are out of the way, for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity (Heb. v. 2); comp. the case of Peter, Luke xxii. 31, 32. The consecration comprised a sin offering for reconciliation, a burnt offering to express whole hearted self consecration to God, and a meat offering (minchah), unbloody, of flour, salt, oil, and frankincense, to thank God for the blessings of nature (these marking the blessings and duties of man); then also the special tokens of the priestly office, the raim of consecration, whose blood was sprinkled on A. and his sons to sanctify them, the sacred robes "for glory and for beauty," breastplate, ephod, robe, brood-red coat, mitre, and girdle, and linen breeches (Exod. xxviii.); and the anointing with the holy oil, which it was death for any one else to compound or use (Exod. xxx. 22-38), symbolising God's grace, the exclusive source of spiritual union. A. immediately offered sacrifice and blessed the people, and the Divine acceptance was marked by fire from the Lord consuming upon the altar the burnt offering and the fat, so that the people at the sight shouted and fell on their faces.

HIGH PRIEST.

Nabal and Abiah, probably (see Lev. x. 8, 9) under the effects of wine taken when about to be consecrated, instead of taking the sacred fire from the heaven altar, burnt the incense on the golden altar with common fire; or, as Knobel and Speaker's Comm. think, they offered the incense in accompaniment of the people's shouts, not at the due time of morning or evening sacrifice, but in their own self-willed manner and at their own time. (See PIER.) God visited them with retribution in kind, consuming them with fire from the Lord; and to prevent the like evil recurring, forbade henceforth the use of wine to the priests when about to officiate in the tabernacle; the prohibition coming so directly after the sin, if the cause was indeed intemperance, is an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness: comp. Luke i. 15 and 1 Tim. iii. 3 for the present application. The true source of exhilaration, to a spiritual priest unto God, is not wine, but the Spirit: Eph. v. 18, 19; comp. Acts ii. 15-18. Nothing could more clearly mark how grace had raised A. above his natural impulsiveness than the touching picture, so eloquent in its brevity, of A.'s submissiveness under the crushing stroke, "and A. held his peace." Moses, in chronicling the disgrace and destruction of his brother's children, evinces his own candour and veracity as an impartial historian. The only token of anguish A. manifested was his forbearing to eat that day the flesh of the people's sin offering: Lev. x. 12-20. All other manifestations of mourning on the part of the priests were forbidden; comp. as to our spiritual priesthood, Luke ix. 60.

Miriam, in a fit of feminine jealousy, some time subsequently acted on A. so as to induce him to join in murmuring against Moses; the former relying on her prophetic inspiration (Exod. xv. 20), the latter on his priesthood, as though equal with Moses in the rank of their commission. Their pretext against Moses was his Ethiopian wife, a marriage abhorrent to Hebrew feelings. That Miriam was the instigator appears from her name preceding that of A. (Num. xii.), and from the leprosy being inflicted on her alone. A., with characteristic impressibleness, repented of his sin almost immediately after he had been seduced into it, upon Jehovah's sudden address to Moses, A., and Miriam, declaring His admission of Moses to speak with him "mouth to mouth, apparently," so that he should "behold the similitude of the Lord," a favour far above all "visions" vouchsafed to prophets. At A.'s penitent intercession with Moses, and Moses' consequent prayer, Miriam was healed.

Twenty years later (1471 B.C.), in the wilderness of Paran, the rebellion took place of Korah and the Levites against A.'s monopoly of the priesthood, and of Dathan, Abiram, and the Reubenites against Moses' authority as civil leader. It is a striking instance of God's chastising even His own people's sin in kind. As A. jealously murmured against Moses, so Korah against him. Fire from the Lord avenged his cause on Korah and the 250 with him burning incense; and the earth swallowed up the Reubenites with Dathan and Abiram. Possibly Reuben's descendants sought to recover the primogeniture forfeited by his incest (Gen. xlix. 3, 4; 1 Chron. v. 1). The punishment corresponded to the sin; pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall. His numbers were so reduced that Moses prays for his deliverance from extinction: "Let Reuben live, and not die, and let not his men be few." A plague from the Lord had threatened to destroy utterly the people for murmuring against Moses and A. as the murderers of Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and their accomplices, when A. proved the efficacy of his priesthood by risking his own life for his ungrateful people, and "making atonement for the people" with incense in a censer, and "standing between the living and the dead," so that the plague was stayed (Num. xvi.). To prevent future rivalry for the priesthood, God made A.'s rod, alone of the twelve rods of Israel, suddenly to blossom and bear almonds, and caused it to be kept perpetually "before the testimony for a token against the rebels" (Num. xvii., Heb. ix. 4).

Inclined to lean on his superior brother, A. naturally fell into Moses' sin at Meribah, and shared its penalty in forfeiting entrance into the promised land (Num. xx. 1-13). As Moses' self reliance was thereby corrected, so was A.'s tendency to be led unduly by stronger natures than his own. To mark also the insufficiency of the Aaronic priesthood to bring men into the heavenly inheritance, A. must die a year before Joshua (the type of Jesus) leads the people into their godly possession. Whilst Israel in going down the wady Arabah, to double the mountainous land of Edom, was encamped at Mosera, he ascended mount Hor at God's command.

MOUNT HOR.

There Moses stripped him of his pontifical robes, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and A. died, 123 years old, and was buried on the mount (Num. xx. 28, xxxiii. 38; Deut. x. 6, xxxii. 50). The mount is now surmounted by the circular dome of the tomb of A., a white spot on the dark red surface. For thirty days all Israel mourned for him; and on the 1st of the 5th month, Ab, our July or August, the Jews still commemorate him by a fast. Eleazar's descendants held the priesthood till the time of Eli, who, although sprung from Ithamar, received it. With Eli's family it continued till the time of Solomon, who took it from Abiathar, and restored it to Zadok, of the line of Eleazar; thus accomplishing the prophecy denounced against Eli (1 Sam. ii. 30). For the Jews' opinion of A., see the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus xiv. His not taking the priestly honour to himself, but being called of God (Heb. v. 4, 5), his unction with incommunicable ointment (comp. Ps. xlv. 7 and exxxiii. 2), his intercession for his guilty people, his bearing the names of his people on his shoulders and breast (Exod. xxviii. 12, 29, 30), his being the only high-priest, so that death visited any other who usurped the priesthood, his rod of office (comp. Ps. ex. 2, Num. xxiv. 17), his alone presenting the blood before the mercy seat on the day of atonement, the HOLINESS TO THE LORD on his forehead in his intercession within the veil (comp. 1 Cor. i. 30, 1 Heb. ix. 24), the Urim and Thummim (Light and Perfection), all point to the true High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ. A's descendants, to the number of 3700 fighting men, with Jehoiada, father of Benaiah, their head, joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xii. 27, xxvii. 17); subsequently Zadok was their chief, "a young man mighty of valour."

Abaddon. The Heb. in Job xxiii. 12 and Prov. xxvii. 20, "destruction," or the place of destruction, sheol (Heb.), hades (Gr.). The rabbins use Abaddon, from Ps. lxxxviii. 12 ("Shall Thy lovingkindness be declared in destruction?") (abaddon) as the second of the seven names for the region of the dead. In Rev. ix. 11 personified as the destroyer, Gr. Apollyon, "the angel of the bottomless pit," Satan is meant; for he is described in ver. 1 as "a star fallen from heaven unto earth, to whom was given the key of the bottomless pit"; and chap. xii. 8, 9, 12: "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, for the devil is come down." Also Isa. xiv. 12, Luke x. 18. As king of the locusts, that had power to torment not kill (Rev. ix. 3-11), Satan is permitted to afflict but not to touch life; so in the case of Job (chaps. i., ii.). He walketh about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour: 1 Pet. v. 8. A murderer from the beginning (John viii. 44), who abode not in the truth. Elliott identifies the locusts with the Mahometans; their turbans being the "crowns" (but how are these "like gold"?); they come from the Euphrates; their cavalry were countless; their "breast-plates of fire" being their rich, coloured attire; the fire and smoke out of the horses' mouths being the Turkish artillery; their standard, "horse tails"; the period, an hour, day, month, and year, 396 years 118 days between Thogrul Beg going forth Jan. 18, A.D. 1057, and the fall of Constantinople May 29, 1453; or else 391 years and 1 month, as others say, from A.D. 1281, the date of the 'Turks' first conquest of Christians, and 1072, their last conquest. The serpent-like stinging tails answer to Mahometanism supplanting Christianity in large parts of Asia, Africa, and even Europe. But the hosts meant seem infernal rather than human, though constrained to work out God's will (ver. 1, 2). The Gr. article once only before all the periods requires rather the translation "for (i.e. against) THE hour and day and month and year," viz. appointed by God. Not only the year, but also the month, day, and hour, are all definitively foreordained. The article "the" would have been omitted, had a total of periods been meant. The giving of both the Hebrew and the Greek name implies that he is the destroyer of both Hebrew and Gentile alike. Just as, in beautiful contrast, the Spirit of adoption enables both Jew and Gentile believers to call God, in both their respective tongues, Abba (Heb. in marked alliteration with Abaddon) Father (Gr. pater). Jesus who unites both in Himself (Gal. iii. 28, Eph. ii. 14) sets us the example: Mark xiv. 36, Gal. iv. 6. Jesus unites Hebrew and Gentile in a common salvation; Satan combines both in a common "destruction." [See ABBA.]

Abagthia. One of the seven eunuchs in Ahasuerus' court; akin to the name Bigthan (Esth. i. 10, ii. 21). Sanscrit Bagadāta, "given by fortune," baga, or the sun. Sun worship early prevailed in Persia.

Abana. The chief river of Damascus, the modern Barada, called by the Greeks "the golden stream," flowing through the heart of the city and supplying it with water. The Pharpar mentioned with it in 2 Kings v. 12 is farther from Damascus, and answers to the Awaj. The Barada rises in the Antilibanus mountain range, 23 miles from the city, and has the large spring Am Fijah as a tributary. It passes the site of Abila and the Assyrian ruin Tell es Salahiyyeh, and empties itself in the marsh Bahret el Kiblah or Bahr el Merj, "lake of the meadow." Porter calculates that 14 villages and 150,000 souls depend on it for their water supply. Hence we see the significance of Naaman's boast, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" These rivers render the environs of Damascus though bordering on a desert one of the loveliest spots on earth; whereas the Israelite streams, excepting Jordan, are dry for a large part of the year, and running in deep channels but little fertilise the land through which they flow. Amana, meaning perennial, is the reading of the Hebrew margin (the Keri); b and m often are interchanged in eastern languages. Soon after issuing from Antilebanon, it parts into three smaller streams, the central flowing through Damascus and the other two one on each side of the city, diffusing beauty and fertility where otherwise there would be the same barrenness as characterizes the vast contiguous plains. Spiritually, men through proud self-sufficiency refuse the waters of Shiloah that go softly (Isa. viii. 6), the gospel "fountain opened for uncleanness," preferring earthly "waters" (Jer. ii. 13, Zech. xiii. 1).

RIVER ABANA

Abarim. Connected with Nebo and Pisgah in Dent. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1. Abarim was probably the mountain chain, Nebo one mountain of it, and Pisgah the highest peak of Nebo. Peor also belonged to the range. The chain east of the Dead Sea and lower Jordan commands most extensive views of the country west of the river. It was from Pisgah Moses took his view of the promised land just before he died. Some identify mount Attarous, the loftiest hill in this region, ten miles north of the river Arnon, with Nebo. Its top is marked by a pistachio tree overshadowing a heap of stones. The Heb. means "the mountains of the regions beyond," viz. the Jordan, or else "the mountains of the passages." They were in the land of Moab, opposite Jericho. Comp. Num. xxvii. 12, xxxiii. 47, 48; Deut. iii. 27. Dr. Tristram verified the observation of the landscape from Nebo, as seen by Moses according to the Scripture record. There is one isolated cone commanding a view of the valley where Israel's battle was fought with Amalek, which may be the Pisgah of holy writ.

Abba. The Chaldaic-Hebrew form, as ab is the Heb. form, for the Gr. pater, "father." Instead of the definite article which the Heb. uses before the word, the Chaldaic or Aramaic adds a syllable to the end, producing thus the emphatic or definitive form. It is used to express a vocative case, and therefore is found in all the passages in which it occurs in the N. T. (being in all an invocation): Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15, Gal. iv. 6. The use of the Heb. and of the Gr. appellation addressed to the one Father beautifully suggests that the Spirit of adoption from Jesus, who first used the double invocation, inspires in both Jew and Gentile alike the experimental knowledge of God as our Father, because He is Father of Jesus with whom faith makes us one, and as our God because He is Jesus' God. Comp. John xx. 17, "ascend unto My Father and [therefore] your Father, and to My God and [therefore] your God"; Gal. iii. 28, "there is neither Jew nor Greek, for ye are all one in Jesus Christ"; Eph. ii. 18, "through Him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father." [Especially see ABADDON above.] "Abba" was a title not to be used by slaves to a master, nor Imma to a mistress, only by children: see Isa. viii. 4, "Before the child shall have knowledge to cry Abi, hani."

Abda. 1. 1 Kings iv. 6. 2. Neh. xi. 17: the Obadiah of 1 Chron. ix. 16, "the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer." Meaning "a servant."

Abdeel. Jer. xxxvi. 26; meaning "servant of El," or God.

Abdi. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 44. 2. 2 Chron. xxix. 12. 3. Ezra x. 26. Meaning "my servant."

Abdon. 1. The tenth judge of Israel (Jud. xii. 13, 15), probably the same as Bedan, 1 Sam. xii. 11; for the Phoenicians often omitted the a [2]. Son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim. He succeeded Elon, and judged Israel eight years. His rule was a peaceful one, as no oppression of Israel during his time is mentioned. The record that he had 40 sons and 30 nephews (or rather grandsons) who rode on young asses, implies their high dignity and consequence: comp. Jud. v. 9. He died 1112 B.C. Of him Josephus (Ant. v. 7, 15) writes: "He alone is recorded to have been happy in his children; for the public affairs were so peaceable and secure that he had no occasion to perform glorious actions." A prophetic type of Israel's and the world's coming millennial blessedness (Isa. i. 26, 27). Pirathon, the city to which he belonged, is identified by Robinson with the modern Ferata, six miles W. of Shechem or Nablous (Bibl. Res., iii.). 2. 1 Chron. viii. 30, akin to Saul's forefathers, ix. 35, 36. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 23. 4. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20; called Achior 2 Kings xxii. 12. Abdon. A city of Asher given to the Levites of Gershon's family: Josh. xvi. 30, 1 Chron. vi. 74. Hebron is substituted for it in Josh. xix. 28. Many MSS. read there Abdon; the Hebrew letters ר [r] and ד [d] are much alike, and therefore often interchanged.

Abdenebo. The Chaldee name ("servant of Negro," i.e. Nebo or Mercury, the interpreter of the gods) for Azariah, one of Daniel's three companions, miraculously delivered from the furnace into which they were cast for not worshipping Nebuchadnezzar's golden image (Dan. iii.). A tyrant may change the name, but he cannot change the nature, of him whose God is Jehovah. "The Son of God" with the three rendered the fire powerless to hurt even a hair of their heads (Isa. xliii. 2, Matt. x. 30). The salvation He wrought is herein typified: the Son of God walking in the furnace of God's wrath kindled by our sins; connected with the church, yet bringing us forth without so much as "the smell of fire" passing on us.

Abel. Heb. Hebel. Second of Adam and Eve's sons, Gen. iv.: meaning vanity or weakness, vapour or transitoriness. Cain means possession: for Eve said at his birth, "I have gotten as a possession a man from Jehovah," or as the Heb. (el) may mean, "with the help of Jehovah"; she inferring the commencement of the fulfilment of the promise of the Redeemer (Gen. iii. 15) herein. On the contrary, Abel's weakness of body suggested his name: moreover prophetic inspiration guided her to choose one indicative of his untimely death. But God's way is here from the first shown, "My strength is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. xii. 9, Heb. xi. 34). The cause of Cain's hatred was "because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous" (1 John iii. 12). Envy of the golly was "the way of Cain" (Jude 11). "Faith" was present in Abel, absent from Cain (Heb. xi. 4); consequently the kind of sacrifice (the mode of showing faith) Abel offered was "much more a sacrifice" (Wickham; so the Gr.) than Cain's. "By faith Abel offered unto God a much more sacrifice than Cain," i.e. one which had more of the true virtue of sacrifice; for it was an animal sacrifice of the firstlings of the flock, a token of the forfeiture of man's life by sin, and a type of the Redeemer to be bruised in heel that He might bruise the serpent's head. God's having made for man coats of skin presupposes the slaying of animals; and doubtless implies that Abel's sacrifice of an animal life was an act of faith which rested on God's command (though not expressly recorded) that such were the sacrifices He required. If it had not been God's command, it would have been presumptuous will worship (Col. ii. 23), and taking of a life which man had no right over before the flood (Gen. ix. 2-4). Cain in self-righteous unbelief, refusing to confess his guilt and need of atonement (typified by sacrifice), presented a mere thanksgiving of the first fruits; not, like Abel, feeling his need of the propitiatory offering for sin. So "God had respect unto Abel (first) and (then) to his offering." "God testified of his gifts" by consuming them with fire from the shekinah or cherubie symbol E. of Eden ("the presence of the Lord": Gen. iv. 16, iii. 24), where the first sacrifices were offered. Thus "he obtained witness that he was righteous," viz., with the righteousness which is by faith to the sincere penitent. Christ calls him "righteous": Matt. xxiii. 35. Abel represents the regenerate, Cain the unregenerate natural man. Abel offered the best, Cain that most readily procured. The words "in process of time" (Gen. iv. 3 marg.), "at the end of days," probably mark the definite time appointed for public worship already in paradise, the seventh day sabbath. The firstling and the fat point to the Divine dignity and infinite fulness of the Spirit in the coming Messiah. "By faith he being dead yet speaketh" to us; his "blood crying from the ground to God" (Gen. iv. 10) shows how precious in God's sight is the death of His saints (Ps. cxvi. 15, Rev. vi. 10). The shedding of Abel's blood is the first, as that of Jesus is the last and crowning guilt which brought the accumulated vengeance on the Jews (Luke xi. 51; Matt. xxiii. 34, 35-38). There is a farther avenging of still more accumulated guilt of innocent blood yet coming on "them that dwell on the earth": Rev. xi. In Heb. xii. 24 it is written "Christ's blood of sprinkling speaketh better things than that of Abel," viz. than the blood of Abel's animal sacrifice. For Abel's is but the type, Christ's the antitype and one only true propitiatory sacrifice. To deny the propitiation would make Cain's offering to be as much a sacrifice as Abel's. Tradition makes the place of his murder and grave to be near Damascus. [See ABIL.]

Abel-beth-Maacha (Abel the house of Maacha) or Abel-Maim (Abel on the waters). A city in the extreme N. of Palestine, "a mother in Israel" (2 Sam. xx. 19), i.e., a city of consequence having many daughters, i.e. inhabitants. That the different names represent the same city appears from comparing 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, 18, 1 Kings xv. 20,

2 Chron. xvi. 4. Its northern border position made it an early prey to Syria under Benhadad, and 200 years later to Assyria: 2 Kings xv. 29. Tiglath Pileser sent away its inhabitants captive to Assyria. The Maachiz in the name implies that it adjoined the region so called E. of Jordan under Lebanon. Shela, son of Bichri, the rebel against David, 80 years before the Syrian invasion under Benhadad, Asa's ally, was here besieged by Joab; and the city was saved by the proverbial shrewdness of its inhabitants, who hearkened to their fellow townsman's wise advice to sacrifice the one man Shela to the safety of the whole inhabitants. Probably Abel lay in the Ard el Huleh, the marshy land which the sea of Merom drains; perhaps at Abil (Robinson, iii. 372), a village on the top of a little conical hill (Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan). The Derdara from Ijon falls from the western slope of the mound, and from the neighbouring mountain rushes the powerful stream of Rualhny. Such fountains would make it a paradise of fruits and flowers, and entitle it to be called "Abel on the waters," "a mother in Israel" (Thomson, The Land and the Book).

Abel-Carnaim (plain of the vineyards): Jud. xi. 33 marg. An Ammonite village, six miles from Rabbath Ammon, or Philadelphia; the limit of Jephthah's pursuit of the Ammonites. Ruins named Abila still are found in this region. De Sauley met with a Beit el Kerm, "house of the vine," N. of Kerak, possibly identical with Abel-Carnaim.

Abel-Meholah (i.e., the plain of the dance). The birthplace of Elisha, where he was found at his plough by Elijah returning up the Jordan valley from Horeb (1 Kings xix. 16). N. of the Jordan valley, S. of Bethshean (Scythopolis) (1 Kings iv. 12). To its neighbourhood fled the Midianites routed by Gideon (Jud. vii. 22). It pertained to the half tribe of Manasseh.

Abel-Mizraim (the mourning of the Egyptians, or the funeral from Egypt). The threshingfloor of Atad; so called by the Canaanites, because it was the chief scene of the funeral lamentations of Joseph and his Egyptian retinue for Jacob (Gen. l. 4-11). E. of Jordan. Moses, taking Canaan as the central standpoint of the whole history, uses the phrase "beyond Jordan" for east of it. The same route by which Joseph was led captive was, in the striking providence of God, that which they took to do honour to his deceased father, being the longer and more public way from Egypt to Canaan. God's eternal principle is, "them that honour Me I will honour." Jerome, however, places it at Beth-Hogla, now Abi Hagla, on the W. of Jordan, which would make Moses' standpoint in saying "beyond" the E. of Jordan; but ver. 13 plainly shows it was not till after the mourning at Abel-Mizraim that "Jacob's sons carried him into the land of Canaan." The phrase, "Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh" implies that Pharaoh and his estates in council decreed a state funeral for Jacob, in which the princes, nobles, and chief men of Egypt, with their pomp of chariots and equipages, took part. The funeral celebration lasted for seven days. The usual Egyptian rites on such occasions consisted in banquets and games, as Egyptian monuments show. These having been completed at Atad, Jacob's sons proceeded alone to the cave of Machpelah, the final burying place of his embalmed body.

Abel-Shittim (the meadow or moist place of acacias). In the plains of Moab, the "Arboth Moab by Jordan Jericho," on the level of the Jordan, in contrast to "the fields" on the higher land. That is to say, it was in the Arabah or Jordan valley opposite Jericho, at that part which belonged to Moab, where the streams from the eastern mountains nourished many acacias. The last resting place of Israel before crossing Jordan (Num. xxxiii. 49, xlii. 1, xvi. 3, xxxi. 12, xlv. 1; Josh. ii. 1, iii. 1; Mic. vi. 5). Josephus names it: "Abila, 60 stadia from Jordan, embosomed amidst palms, among which Moses delivered Deuteronomy." The acacias still fringe with green the upper terraces of the Jordan. Near mount Peor, at Shittim, in the shade of the acacia groves, Israel was seduced to Baal Peor's licentious rites; and here also Israel's judges, by Moses' direction under God, slew all the men seduced by Midian and Moab under Balaam's Satanic counsel (24,000) into whoredom and the worship of Baal Peor (Num. xxv. 1, xxxi. 16).

Abel the Great. 1 Sam. vi. 18. Keil supposes the reading ought to be Eben, "the stone," for Abel. The LXX. and the Chaldee versions read so; but Abel probably is right, and refers to the mourning caused by the destruction of so many Bethshemites for looking into the ark. The field in which Abel the great stone was, on which the ark was placed on its return from the Philistines, belonged to Joshua, a Bethshemite.

Abez. A town in Issachar (Josh. xix. 20). From a Chaldee term meaning "tin"; or else a contraction for Thebez, near Shuam.

Abi. Called also Abijah, 2 Kings xviii. 2, 2 Chron. xxix. 1. Daughter of Zechariah; the witness perhaps taken by Isaiah (viii. 2).

Abia, or Abijah (Father Jehovah, i.e. a man of God). 1. Son of Samuel, whose maladministration as judge furnished one plea for Israel's demand for a king (1 Sam. viii. 1-5). 2. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 24.

Abiasaph, or Ebiasaph (whose father God took away, viz. Korah: Num. xvi. Or else, the father of gathering, the gatherer). Head of a family of Korhites (a house of the Kohathites): Exod. vi. 24, 1 Chron. vi. 37. Possibly Abiasaph may be a distinct person from Ebiasaph; in genealogies generations are often passed over between two persons of the same name. The descendants of Abiasaph, of whom Snallum was chief, were "keepers of the gates of the tabernacle" (1 Chron. ix. 19, 31), and "had the set office over the things made in the pans," in David's time. Comp. Neh. xii. 25.

Abiathar (father of abundance). The only son of Ahimelech, the highpriest, who escaped the slaughter committed by Saul at Nob, on Doeg's information that Ahimelech had inquired of the Lord for David, and given him the shewbread and the sword of Goliath (1 Sam. xxii.). Eighty-five persons wearing the priestly linen ephod were killed. A., with an ephod (the highpriest's mystic scarf) in his hand, escaped to David. It is an instance of God's retributive justice that Saul's murder of the priests deprived him thenceforth of their services in inquiring of the Lord (1 Chron. xiii. 3); step by step he sank, until, bereft of legitimate means of obtaining Divine counsel, he resorted to the illicit course of consulting the witch of Endor, and so filled the measure of his iniquity and brought on himself destruction (1 Chron. x. 13). David, on the contrary, by sheltering A. was enabled to inquire of the Lord in the ordained way (1 Sam. xxi. 6-9, xxx. 7; 2 Sam. ii. 1, v. 19, xxi. 1, an undesigned coincidence with Ps. xvi. 7, and so a proof of genuineness).

A. adhered to David during all his wanderings, and was afflicted in all wherein David was afflicted; also when he assumed the throne in Hebron, the Aaronite priestly city of refuge. He bore the ark before David when it was brought up from Obed-Edom's house to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 11, 12, 1 Kings ii. 26). He was loyal in Absalom's rebellion; and, subordinate to Abithophel, was the king's counsellor (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). But in Adonijah's attempt to be David's successor, instead of Solomon, A., from jealousy of Zadok probably, who was on Solomon's side, took Adonijah's part. David had evidently for some time previous given the first place in his confidence to Zadok, a preference the more galling as A. was the highpriest and Zadok only his vicar, or sagan; thus it was to Zadok he gave the command to take the ark back in Absalom's rebellion. A. is mentioned subordinately 1 Sam. xv. 25, 29, 35. Perhaps Zadok was appointed highpriest by Saul after the slaughter of Ahimelech. David on succeeding, to conciliate his subjects, allowed him conjointly to hold office with A. Zadok had joined David in Hebron after Saul's death, with 22 captains of his father's house (1 Chron. xii. 28). A. had the first place, with the ephod, Urim and Thummim, and the ark, in the tent pitched by David at Jerusalem. Zadok officiated before the tabernacle and brazen altar made by Moses and Bezaleel in the wilderness, which were now in Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 1-7, 37, 39, 40, xxv. 33, 34; 2 Chron. i. 3-5). Moreover Zadok and A. represented rival houses: Zadok that of Eleazar, the eldest son of Aaron; A. that of Ithamar, the youngest (1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 4, vi. 8). Eli, of whose family it had been foretold 150 years before that the priesthood should pass from it, was A.'s progenitor fourth backwards, and A. would naturally fear the coming realization of the curse. All these undesigned proprieties mark the truth of the history. His own act brought the prophecy to its consummation (1 Sam. ii. 31-35). Solomon banished him to Anathoth, and put Zadok as highpriest in his room (1 Kings ii. 35). But in 1 Kings iv. 4 A. is still called the "priest" second to Zadok. The LXX., "the king made Zadok the first priest in the room of A.," solves the difficulty. A. had been first priest, but henceforth he was made subordinate to Zadok.

Ahimelech, or Abimelech, son of A., is substituted for A., son of Ahimelech: 2 Sam. viii. 17, 1 Chron. xviii. 16, xxiv. 3, 6, 31. The Lord Jesus (Mark ii. 26) names A. as the highpriest in whose time David ate the shewbread. Probably the sense is: "in the days of A., who was afterwards highpriest," and under whom the record of the fact would be made. Perhaps too the loaves being his perquisite (Lev. xxiv. 9) were actually handed by A. to David. Both father and son, moreover, it seems from the quotations above, bore both names, and were indifferently called by either.

Abib. The month Nisan. Meaning ears of corn, viz. barley (Exod. xiii. 4). [See MONTHS.] On the 15th day the Jews began harvest by gathering a sheaf of barley firstfruits, and on the 16th offered it (Lev. xxiii. 4-14). On the 10th day the passover lamb was taken, on the 14th slain and eaten.

Abida. Gen. xxv. 4, 1 Chron. i. 33.

Abidan. Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24.

Abiel (father of strength). 1. Father of Kish and of Ner; grandfather of Saul and of Abner, according to 1 Sam. ix. 1, xiv. 51. But A. seems to have had "Ner" as his second name (1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 35, 39, where A. is also called Jehiel and Saul is represented as his great grandson). Probably in 1 Sam. a link in the genealogy is omitted, as often elsewhere, 2. 1 Chron. xi. 32; named Abi-Albon (of the same meaning) 2 Sam. xxiii. 31.

Abiezer (father of help). 1. Eldest son of Gilead, descendant of Manasseh; head of a leading family, of which were Joash and Gideon (Jud. vi. 11, 24, 34; viii. 2). Gideon soothed the wounded vanity of Ephraim when upbraiding him for not having called in their aid against Midian, saying "Is not the grape of Ephraim better than the vintage of A.?" (Josh. xvii. 2.) The form is Jezer in Num. xxvi. 30, but see JEZER. Originally A.'s family must have been E. of Jordan. In 1 Chron. vii. 18 A. is made son of Gilead's sister. The family must have afterwards passed to the W. of Jordan; for Joash the Abiezrite lived in Ophrah, which seems to have been on a hill, facing from the S. the Esdraelon plain, the scene of so many contests. 2. 2 Sam. xviii. 27.

Abigail (father of joy). 1. The churl Nabal's beautiful wife, of Carmel. Taking on herself the blame of Nabal's insult to David's messengers, she promptly, and with a discreet woman's tact, averted David's just anger by liberally supplying the wants of his forces, and by deprecating in person at his feet the shedding of blood in vengeance. He hearkened to her prayer and accepted her person; and rejoiced at being "kept back" by her counsel from taking into his own hand God's prerogative of vengeance (1 Sam. xxv. 26, 34, 39; compare Rom. xii. 19). God did "plead His cause" against Nabal; compare the undesigned coincidence of phrase between the history and the independent psalm, a proof of genuineness: Ps. xxv. 1, vii. 16, xvii. 4, xiv. 1 with 1 Sam. xxv. 25, 36-38 with Luke xii. 19-21, 1 Sam. xxv. 29; the image of a "sling, slinging out the souls of the enemy" with 1 Sam. xvii. 49. At Nabal's death by God's visitation David made her his wife, and by her had a son Chideah (2 Sam. iii. 3), or Daniel (1 Chron. iii. 1), i.e. God is my judge, a name which apparently alludes to the Divine judgment on Nabal. 2. A sister of David, daughter of Nahash; wife of Jether or Ithra, an Ishmaelite, rather seduced by him [see ITHRA]; mother of Amasai (1 Chron. ii. 15-17). David was probably her and Zeruiah's half brother, born of the same mother, but he having Jesse, she and Zeruiah Nahash, for their father. This accounts for the phrase "A., daughter of Nahash, and sister of Zeruiah," not of David. Zeruiah and she were only his step-sisters.

Abihail (father of splendour). 1. Wife of Rehobam, king of Judah, daughter, i.e. descendant, of Eliab, David's eldest brother. But Keil argues that 2 Chron. xi. 19, 20 shows that in ver. 18 only one wife is named; therefore the sense is "Mahalath the daughter of Jerimoth [son of David] and of A." (the daughter of Eliab, etc.). 2. Num. iii. 35. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 29. 4. 1 Chron. v. 11. 5. Father of Queen Esther, and uncle of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 15).

Abihu. Second son of Aaron by Elisheba (Exod. vi. 23, Num. iii. 21). With Aaron, Nabal, and the 70 elders, he accompanied Moses up Sinai to a limited distance (Exod. xiv. 1). On his death by fire from heaven, in punishment for offering strange fire, see AARON above. A standing example of that Divine wrath which shall consume all who offer God devotion killed at any other save the one Altar and Offering of Calvary, whereby "He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

Abijah (father of Jehovah, i.e. one whose will is that of God), or ANANIAS 1 Kings xv. 1, 2 Chron. xiii. 1 (called Abijah in Chronicles, not in Kings, because in the former his character is not represented as contrary to Jah's will, as it is in the latter; Abia in Matt. i. 7). 1. Son and successor of Rehobam, king of Judah (Clinton, 959 B.C.; Hales, 973); in the 18th year of Jeroboam 1. of Israel (1 Kings xiv. 31, 2 Chron. xii. 16). He endeavoured to recover the ten tribes to Judah, and made war on Jeroboam. His speech on mount Zemaraim in mount Ephraim, before the battle, urged on Jeroboam the justice of his cause, that God had given the kingdom to David and his sons for ever "by a covenant of salt," and that Judah had the regular temple service and priesthood, whereas Israel had made golden calves their idols, and had cast out the priests; therefore "fight not ye against the Lord God of your fathers, for ye shall not prosper." (2 Chron. xiii.) Judah's appeal to God, in a crisis of the battle, when the enemy by an ambushment was both before and behind them, brought victory to their side; they took also Bethel, Jeshamah, and Ephraim. 400,000 men are assigned to A.'s army, 800,000 to Jeroboam's, of whom 500,000 fell. Kennicott thinks the numbers an error of transcribers for 40,000, 80,000, 50,000; and so Abubabel. Elated by success, he multiplied his wives, like Solomon, and by his 14 wives had 22 sons and 16 daughters. Prosperity tempted him into the wickedness which is attributed to him in Kings; men may boast of temple privileges, yet love carnal practices (Jer. vii. 4, 5). His reign lasted three years. His mother was Maachah (1 Kings xv. 2), or Michaiah (2 Chron. xiii. 2), doubtless named from her grandfather, Absalom's mother (2 Sam. iii. 3). She was daughter of Uriel, of Gibeah, and grand daughter of Abishalom, or Absalom (1 Chron. xi. 20). "Daughter" in Scripture often means granddaughter, a generation being skipped. A. thus was descended from David on both father's and mother's side. Uriel had married Tamar, Absalom's beautiful daughter (2 Sam. xiv. 27). 2. Son of Jeroboam 1., "in whom alone of Jeroboam's house some good thing was found toward the Lord God of Israel" (1 Kings xiv. 13); he therefore alone was suffered to go down to the grave in peace. Jeroboam had sent his wife in disguise with a present to the prophet AHIAHA [see]. Blind with age, he yet knew her and announced the tidings, said to her but honouring to her son. So A. died, and "all Israel mourned for him." 3. 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. Only four returned of the 24 courses of the priesthood, of which A.'s course was not one (Ezra ii. 36-39; Neh. vii. 39-42, xii. 1). But the four were divided into the original 24, with the original names. Hence Zacharias, father of John the Baptist, is described as "of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5). 4. Wife of Ahaz, and mother of good Hezekiah; perhaps a descendant of the Zechariah slain between the temple and the altar (2 Chron. xxiv. 21, xxvi. 5, xxix. 1); certainly daughter of Zechariah, probably the one through whom Uziah sought God.

Abila. Capital of ABILENE, the te-trarchy of Lysanias (Luke iii. 1), on the eastern slope of Lebanon, in a region fertilized by the river Barada (Abana). Abel (Heb.) means a grassy spot. The tradition of Abel's murder having taken place here (marked by his tomb 30 feet in length, Nebi Habil, on a hill) arose from confounding his name (properly Hebel) with abel, a frequent name of rich meadowy places. The lively and refreshing green of the spot is noticed by Burckhardt. Abilene had originally been a tetrarchy under Lysanias, Ptolemy's son (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 13, § 3, xviii. 6, 10), put to death 33 B.C., through Cleopatra's intrigues, who then took the province. Next it fell to Augustus, who reuted it to Zenodorus, but as he did not clear it of robbers it was given to Herod the Great. At his death the southern part was added to Trachonitis and Iturea, as a tetrarchy for his son Philip. The rest, the larger part, including A., was then bestowed on the Lysanias of Luke iii. 1, probably descended from the former Lysanias. Ten years afterwards the emperor Caligula gave it to Agrippa 1. as "the tetrarchy of Lysanias." The division of Abilene between Lysanias and Philip accounts for the seeming difference between Luke who assigns it to Lysanias, and Josephus who assigns it to Philip. A. stood in the Suk (meaning a market) wady Barada, a gorge where the river breaks down through the mountain Antilebanon towards the plain, with a semicircular background of cliffs three or four hundred feet high, between Heliopolis (Baalbec), 32 miles off, and Damascus, 18. Latin inscriptions found here respecting the repairs of the road by the Abilene, and concerning the 16th legion, identify the place.

Abimael. Descendant of Joktan (Gen. x. 28, 1 Chron. i. 22). The name is preserved in Mali in Arabia Aromatifera (Theophrastus).

Abimelech (father of a king, or father king). A common title of many Philistine kings, as Pharaoh of the Egyptians, and Caesar and Augustus of the Roman; Padishah (father king) is similarly a title of the Persian king. 1. Hence we find Achish called Abimelech in the title of Ps. xxxiv., which explains the seeming discrepancy of name in 1 Sam. xxi. 11. 2. Gen. xx. 1, 1898 B.C.; Hales, 2054 B.C.: the king of Genar. A.'s taking Sarah into his harem shows that in those times kings claimed the odious despotic right of taking unmarried females, whether subjects or sojourners; compare Gen. xii. 15, Esth. ii. 3. A Divine warning that death would be the penalty of keeping her, but that Abraham's intercession as a prophet would follow the restoring of her, led him to give her back with a present of a thousand pieces of silver (£131). With delicate sarcasm (in the English A. V.) he reproved Abraham's deception. Rather, as Keil and Delitzsch, instead of "he," translate "this is to thee a covering of the eyes [i.e. an expiatory gift] with regard to all that are with thee" (because in a mistress the whole family is disgraced), "so thou art justified." The closing of the wombs of A.'s house then ceased. A. some years after repaired, with Phichol his chief captain, to Abraham to form a treaty of friendship. He restored the well dug by Abraham, but seized by A.'s herdsmen. It was thence named Beersheba, the well of the oath, and consecrated to Jehovah (Gen. xxi. 22-34). 3. A son of the former, with whom a similar transaction took place in the case of Isaac's wife Rebekah. The wells dug by Abraham, being supposed to give a proprietary right in the soil, were stopped by the Philistines, and opened again by Isaac, and the virgin soil yielded to his culture one hundred fold. Jealousy made A. beg him "go from us, for thou art much mightier than we." In the true spirit of "the meek" who "shall inherit the earth," he successively abandoned his wells, Esek (contention) and Sitnah (hatred), before the opposition of the Gerarite herdsmen, and found peace at last at the well Rehoboth (room), where the Lord made room for him. So by loving concession shall we find peace and room at last (Rom. xii. 18-21; John xiv. 2; Ps. cxi. 8, cxviii. 5). At Beersheba A. with Ahizzah his friend, and Phichol his captain, renewed the treaty of friendship with Isaac, originally made by his father with Abraham, and for the same reason (notwithstanding his past bad treatment of Isaac in sending him away), viz., he saw the Lord was with Isaac. Comp. Gen. xxvi. 23 with xxi. 22, 23. Plainly the Philistines had then a more organized government than the Canaanite nations, one of which had been supplanted by these foreign settlers. 4. Son of Gideon by his Shechemite concubine (Jud. viii. 31). At Gideon's death he murdered his seventy brethren, excepting the youngest, Jotham, who hid himself, and by his mother's brethren influenced the Shechemites to make him king. Then Jotham addressed to the Shechemites the fable of the trees and the bramble (Jud. ix.), presaging a feud between A. and Shechem which would mutually consume both. So it came to pass; for God makes in righteous retribution the instruments of men's sin the instrument also of their punishment at last. After three years Shechem rebelled, under Gaal. At Zebul's information A. came rapidly on the rebels and slew all, and beat down their city, and sowed it with salt; he burned to death a thousand more men and women who fled for sanctuary to the hold of the idol Baalberith. Thence he marched to Thebez, nine miles eastward, and took the town; but when trying to burn the tower was struck on the head by a piece of a millstone cast down by a woman. Feeling his wound mortal, he was slain by his armourbearer, at his own request, lest it should be said a woman slew him. For the spiritual lesson read Jer. ii. 19; Prov. v. 22, i. 31; Job xx. 5; Matt. xxvi. 52. The friendship that is based on sin is hollow; comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 3-5, 32, 33.

Abinadab (father of willingness). 1. A Levite of Kirjath-jearim, (but see LEVITES for doubts as to A. being a Levite,) in whose house the ark remained twenty years (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; 1 Chron. xiii. 7); Eleazar his son was sanctified to keep it. 2. Jesse's second son (1 Sam. xvi. 8, xvii. 13). 3. Saul's son, slain at Gilboa (2 Sam. xxi. 2). 4. 1 Kings iv. 7, 11.

Abinoam. Jud. iv. 6, 12; v. 1, 12.

Abiram (father of height). 1. A Reubenite, son of Eliab; conspired with Dathan and On, Reubenites, and Korah, a Levite, against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi.). [See AARON, KORAH.] 2. Eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite (1 Kings xvi. 34); perished at his father's laying the foundations of Jericho's fortified walls, as Joshua's curse predicted (vi. 26).

Abishag (father of error). The beautiful young woman of Shunem in Issachar, who cherished David in his old age. Adonijah persuaded Bathsheba to entreat Solomon to give her to him in marriage. This Solomon construed into virtual treason, as regal rights followed the possession in marriage of a deceased king's wife, and caused him to be killed (1 Kings i. 1-4, ii. 13-25).

Abishai (father of gifts). Nephew of David by his sister Zeruah; brother of Joab and Asahel. Joab was more of the experienced general, A. the devoted champion for David. Thus when David proposed to Ahimelech the Hittite and A. the perilous visit to Saul's camp, A. instantly volunteered, reckless of personal danger. His impulsive nature needed occasional checking, in his zeal for David. We find the consistency of character maintained throughout the history; the same spirit prompting the request at Hachilah, "Let me smite Saul" (1 Sam. xvi. 8), as subsequently at Bahurim, when Shimei cursed David, prompted his exclamation "Why should this dead dog curse my Lord the king? let me take off his head" (2 Sam. xvi. 9). He commanded one third of David's army at the battle with Absalom (2 Sam. xviii.), and rescued David when waxing faint and in imminent peril from the giant Ishbi-benob (2 Sam. xxi. 15-17). In the same war probably he, as chief of the three "mighties," chivalrously broke through the Philistine host to procure water for David from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. xxi. 14-17). Once he withstood 300 and slew them with his spear. In 2 Sam. viii. 13 the victory over the 18,000 Edomites or Syrians in the Valley of Salt is ascribed to David; in 1 Chron. xviii. 12 to A. Probably the commander in chief was David, but the victory actually gained by A.

Abishalom. [See ABIAH.]

Abishua (father of safety). 1. Son of Phinehas, fourth highpriest (1 Chron. vi. 50). The Chronicler of Alexandria shows that his pontificate included the period of Ehud's judgeship, and probably of Eglon's oppression. Father of Bukki (1 Chron. vi. 4, 5, 50, 51; Ezra vii. 4, 5). Josephus (Ant. viii. 1, § 3) says he succeeded in the priesthood by Eli; his descendants, Gil Zadek, falling to the rank of private persons. 2. Son of Bela of Benjamin: 1 Chron. viii. 4.

Abishur. 1 Chron. ii. 28.

Abital. 2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chron. iii. 3.

Abitub. 1 Chron. viii. 11.

Abner (father of light). Son of Ner, who was the brother of Kish, the father of Saul (1 Chron. ix. 36). Made commander in chief by his cousin Saul. Introduced David to Saul, after Goliath's death (1 Sam. xiv. 51; xvii. 55, 57). With Saul at Hachilah (xxvi. 3-11). At Saul's death he upheld the dynasty in Ishbosheth's person, mainly owing to the paramount influence of the tribe Ephraim, which was jealous of Judah. Whilst David reigned over Judah as God's anointed, at Hebron, Ishbosheth professedly, but A. really, reigned in Mahanaim beyond Jordan. In 2 Sam. ii. 10 Ishbosheth is said to have reigned for two years, but David for seven. Probably for the first five years after the fatal battle of Gilboa David alone reigned in the old capital of Judah, Hebron; but the rest of the country was in the Philistines' hands. During these five years Israel gradually regained their country, and at length A. proclaimed Ishbosheth at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, for security against the Philistines: 2 Sam. ii. 5-7 confirms this. David's thanks to the men of Jabesh Gilead for the burial of Saul and his sons imply that no prince of Saul's line as yet had claimed the throne. His exhortation, "Be valiant," refers to the struggle with the Philistines, who alone stood in the way of his reign over all Israel. Ishbosheth's known weakness, which accounts for his absence from the battle of Gilboa, suited well A.'s ambition. At Gibeon A.'s army was beaten by Joab's; and in fleeing A., having tried to deter Asahel, Joab's brother, from following him (since A. shrank from a blood feud with Joab), but in vain, was at last constrained in self defence to slay him (2 Sam. ii.). A., presuming on his position as the only remaining stay of Ishbosheth, was tempted to take the late king Saul's concubine wife, Rizpah. This act, involving in oriental idea the suspicion of usurping the succession to the throne (so in the case of Absalom: 2 Sam. xvi. 21, xx. 3; 1 Kings ii. 13-25. See ABIAHAR, ADONIAH, and ABISHAG), called forth a rebuke from even so feeble a person as the nominal king, Ishbosheth. Henceforth, in consequence of the rebuke, A. set about bringing the northern ten tribes to David's sway. Received favourably and feasted by David, after his wife Michal was taken from Phaltiel and restored to him, A. went forth from Hebron in peace. But Joab, by a message, brought him back from the well of Sirah, and, taking him aside to speak peaceably, murdered him, Abishai also being an accomplice, for the blood of Asahel (Num. xxv. 19; 2 Sam. iii. 30, 39), and on Joab's part also, as appears likely from Amasa's case, from fear of A.'s becoming a rival in the chief command (2 Sam. xv. 4-10). David felt the sons of Zeruiah too strong for him to punish their crime; but, leaving their punishment to the Lord, he showed every honour to A.'s memory by following the bier, and composing this dirge:

"Ought Abner to die as a villain dies?"

Thy hands not bound,

Thy feet not brought into fetters,

As one falls before the sons of wickedness, so fullest thou!"

The second and third lines are connected with the last, describing the state in which he was when slain. In form, the subject in such propositions comes first, the verb generally becoming a participle. Indignation preponderates over sorrow; the point of the dirge is the mode of A.'s death. If A. had been really slain in revenge for blood, as Joab asserted, he ought to have been delivered up "bound hand and foot." But Joab, instead of waiting for his being delivered up with the legal formalities to the authorized penalty (if he were really guilty, which he was not), as an assassin, stabbed him as a worthless fellow (1 Kings ii. 5). David added that he felt himself, though a king, weakened by his loss, and that "a prince and great man had fallen."

Abomination. An object of disgust (Lev. xviii. 22); a detestable act (Ezek. xii. 11); a ceremonial pollution (Gen. xliii. 32); especially an idol (1 Kings xi. 5-7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13); food offered to idols (Zech. ix. 7). The Egyptians regarded it an abomination, i.e. ceremonially polluting, to eat with the Hebrews as foreigners (Gen. xliii. 32), because, as Herodotus says (ii. 41), the cow was eaten and sacrificed by foreign nations. So when Pharaoh told Israel to offer sacrifice to Jehovah in Egypt without going to the wilderness, Moses objected: "we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes" (the cow, the only animal which all the Egyptians held sacred), "and will they not stone us?" (Exod. viii. 26) comp. the Jews' own practice in later times (Acts x. 28). The Hebrews, not only as foreigners, accounted by the intolerant mythology of Egypt as unfit for intercourse except that of war or commerce, but also as nomad shepherds, were as "abomination" to the Egyptians (Gen. xli. 34). Therefore Joseph tells his brethren to inform Pharaoh, "Our trade hath been about cattle, both we and also our fathers," i.e. hereditarily; for Pharaoh would be sure then to plant them, not in the heart of the country, but in Goshen, the border land. The Egyptians themselves reared cattle, as Pharaoh's offer to make Joseph's brethren "overscers of his cattle" proves (Gen. xlvii. 6), and as their sculptures and paintings show; but they abominated the nomad shepherds, or Bedouins, because the Egyptians, as being long civilized, shrink, and to the present day shrink, from the lawless predatory habits of the wandering shepherd tribes in their vicinity.

Abomination of Desolation.

"The idol [see ABOMINATION] of the desolator," or "the idol that causeth desolation." Abomination refers especially to such idolatry only as is perpetrated by apostates from Jehovah (2 Kings xxi. 2-7, xxiii. 13). Josephus (B. J., iv. 6, § 3) refers to the Jews' tradition that the temple would be destroyed "if domestic hands should first pollute it." The Lord quotes Dan. ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11, in Matt. xxiv. 15 "the abomination of desolation," as the sign of Jerusalem's coming destruction. Daniel makes the ceasing of the sacrifice and oblation the preliminary to it. Jewish rabbins considered the prophecy fulfilled when the Jews erected an idol altar, described as "the abomination of desolation" in 1 Macc. i. 54, vi. 7. This was necessarily followed by the profanation of the temple under the O. T. antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes. He built an idolatrous altar on the altar of burnt offering to Jupiter Olympius, and dedicated the temple to him, and offered swine's flesh. The Divine law is that where the church corrupts herself, the world, the instrument of her sin, is made also the instrument of her punishment (Matt. xxiv. 28; Rev. xvii. 3, 16). The bringing of the idolatrous, Roman, image crowned standards into the temple, where they were set over the E. gate, and sacrificed to, upon the destruction of Jerusalem under the Roman Titus, 37 years after Jesus' prophecy (A.D. 70), is not enough to meet the requirements of the term "abomination," unless it were shown that the Jews shared in the idolatry. Perhaps the Zealots perpetrated some abomination which was to be the sign of the nation's ruin. They had taken possession of the temple, and having made a profane country fellow, Phannias, their highpriest, they made a mock of the sacred rites of the law. Some such desecration within the city, "in the holy place," coinciding with Cestius Gallus' encampment without, "in a holy place," was the sign foretold by Jesus; noting it, the Christians fled from the city to Pella, and all escaped. The final fulfilment is probably future. The last antichrist, many think, is about to set up an idol on a wing of the restored temple (comp. Matt. iv. 5, John v. 43) in the latter half of the last, or 70th, of Daniel's prophetic weeks; for the former three and a half days (years) of the prophetic week he keeps his covenant with the Jews; in the latter three and a half breaks it (Zech. xi. 16, 17; xii. xiii, xiv.; Dan. ix., xi.). The Roman emperor Hadrian erected a temple to Jupiter upon the site of the Jewish temple; but probably "the consummation to be poured upon the desolate" is yet future.

Abraham (father of a multitude).

Up to Gen. xvii. 4, 5, his being sealed with circumcision, the sign of the covenant, ABRAHAM (father of elevation). Son of Terah, brother of Nabor and Haran. Progenitor of the Hebrews, Arabs, Edomites, and kindred tribes; the ninth in descent from Shem, through Heber. Haran died before Terah, leaving Lot and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah. Nabor married his niece Milcah: A. Iscah, i.e. Sarai, daughter, i.e. granddaughter, of his father, not of his mother (Gen. xx. 12). Ur, his home, is the modern Muqher, the primeval capital of Chaldaea; its inscriptions are probably of the 22nd century B.C. The alphabetical Hebrew system is Phœnician, and was probably brought by A. to Canaan, where it became modified. A., at God's call, went forth from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 31-xii.). In Haran Terah died. The statement in Gen. xi. 26, that Terah was 70 when he begat Abram, Nabor, and Haran, must apply only to the oldest, Haran. His being oldest appears from the fact that his brothers married his daughters, and that Sarai was only ten years younger than A. (Gen. xvii. 17); the two younger were born subsequently, Abram, the youngest, when Terah was 130, as appears from comparing xi. 31 with Gen. xii. 4, Acts vii. 3, 4: "before he dwelt in Charran [Haran], while he was in Mesopotamia," in his 60th year, at Ur he received his first call: "Depart from thy land, to a land which I will show thee" (as yet the exact land was not defined). In Haran he received a second call: "Depart from thy father's house unto the land [Heb., Gen. xii. 1] which I will show thee;" and with it a promise, temporal (that God would bless him, and make him founder of a great nation) and spiritual (that in him all families of the earth should be blessed).

The deluge, the revelation to Noah, and the Babel dispersion had failed to counteract the universal tendency to idolatrous apostasy, obliterating every trace of primitive piety. God therefore provided an antidote in separating one family and nation to be the repository of His truth against the fulness of time when it should be revealed to the whole world. From Josh. xxiv. 2, 14, 15, it appears Terah and his family served other gods beyond the Euphrates. Silly traditions as to Terah being a maker of idols, and A. having been cast into a fiery furnace by Nimrod for disbelief in idols, were drawn from this Scripture, and from Ur meaning fire. The second call additionally required that, now when his father was dead and filial duty had been discharged, after the stay of 15 years in Haran, he should leave his father's house, i.e. his brother Nabor's family, in Haran. The call was personally to himself. He was to be isolated not only from his nation but from his family. Lot, his nephew, accompanied him, being regarded probably as his heir, as the promise of seed and the specification of his exact destination were only by degrees unfolded to him (Heb. xi. 8). Nicolaus of Damascus ascribed to him the conquest of Damascus on his way to Canaan. Scripture records nothing further than that his chief servant was Eliezer of Damascus; he pursued Chedorlaomer to Hobab, on the left of Damascus, subsequently (Gen. xiv. 15). A. entered Canaan along the valley of the Jabbok, and encamped first in the rich Moreh valley, near Sichem, between mountains Ebal and Gerizim. There he received a confirmation of the promise, specifying "this land" as that which the original more general promise pointed to. Here therefore he built his first altar to God. The unfriendly attitude of the Canaanites induced him next to move to the mountain country between Bethel and Ai, where also he built an altar to Jehovah, whose worship was fast passing into oblivion in the world. Famine led him to Egypt, the granary of the world, next. The record of his unbelief and cowardice there, and virtual lie as to Sarai (see ABIMELECH) is a striking proof of the candour of Scripture. Its heroes' faults are not glossed over; each saint not only falls at times, but is represented as failing in the very grace (e.g. A. in faith) for which he was most noted. Probably the Hyksos (akin to the Hebrews), or shepherds' dynasty, reigned then at Memphis, which would make A.'s visit specially acceptable there. On his return his first visit was to the altar which he had erected to Jehovah before his fall (comp. Gen. xiii. 4 with Hos. ii. 7, Rev. ii. 5). The greatness of his and Lot's substance prevented their continuing together. The promise of a direct heir too may have influenced Lot, as, no longer being heir, to seek a more fixed home, in the region of Sodom, than he had with A., "dwelling in tents." Contrast the children of the world with the children of God (Heb. xi. 9, 10, 13-16). His third resting place was Mamre, near Hebron (meaning association, viz. that of A., Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner; next called Kirjath Arba; then it resumed its old name, Hebron, the future capital of Judah). This position, communicating with Egypt, and opening on the pastures of Beersheba, marks the greater power of his retinue now, as compared with what it was when he encamped in the mountain fastness of Ai.

Fourteen years previously Chedorlaomer, king of Elam (the region S. of Assyria, E. of Persia, Susiana), the chief sovereign, with Amraphel of Shinar (Babylon), Arioch of Ellasar (the Chaldean Larissa, or Larsa, half way between Ur, or Mugheir, and Erech, or Warka, in Lower Babylonia), and Tidal, king of nations, attacked Bera of Sodom, Birsha of Gomorrah, Shinar of Admah, and Shemeber of Zeboim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, because after twelve years of subordination they "rebelled" (Gen. xiv.). Babylon was originally the predominant power; but a recently deciphered Assyrian record states that an Elamite king, Kudur Nakhunta, conquered Babylon 2296 B.C. Kudur Mabuk is called in the inscriptions the "ravager of Syria," so that the Scripture account of Chedorlaomer (from Logamar, a goddess, in Semitic; answering to Mabuk in Hamitic) exactly tallies with the monumental inscriptions which call him Apda martu, "ravager," not conqueror, "of the West." A., with 318 followers, and aided by the Amorite chiefs, Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner, overtook the victorious invaders near Jordan's springs, and attacked them by night from different quarters and routed them, and recovered Lot with all the men and the goods carried off. His disinterestedness was evinced in refusing any of the goods which Arabian war usages entitled him to, lest the king of worldly Sodom should say, "I have made A. rich" (comp. Esth. ix. 15, 16; 2 Kings v. 16; contrast Lot, Gen. xiii. 10, 11). Melchizedek, one of the only native princes who still served Jehovah, and was at once king and priest, blessed A. in the name of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth, and blessed God in A.'s name, by a beautiful reciprocation of blessing, and ministered to him bread and wine; and A. "gave him tithes of all." Immediately after A. had refused worldly rewards Jehovah in vision said, "I am . . . thy exceeding great reward." The promise now was made more specific: Eliezer shall not be thine heir, but "he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels. . . Tell if thou be able to number the stars; so shall thy seed be." His faith herein was called forth to accept what was above nature on the bare word of God; so "it [his faith] was counted to him for righteousness" (Gen. xv.). Hence he passes into direct covenant relation with God, confirmed by the sign of the burning lamp (comp. Isa. lxii. 1) passing between the divided pieces of a heifer, she goat, and ram, and accompanied by the revelation that his posterity are to be afflicted in a foreign land 400 years, then to come forth and conquer Canaan when the iniquity of the Amorites shall be full. The earthly inheritance was to include the whole region "from the river of Egypt unto the . . . river Euphrates," a promise only in part fulfilled under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Kings iv. 21; 2 Chron. ix. 26). Tyre and Sidon were never conquered; therefore the complete fulfilment remains for the millennial state, when "the meek shall inherit the land," and the 72nd Psalm shall be realized (8-10); comp. Luke xx. 37. The taking of Hagar the Egyptian, Sarai's maid, at the suggestion of Sarai, now 75 years old, was a carnal policy to realize the promise in Ishmael. Family quarrelling was the inevitable result, and Hagar fled from Sarai, who dealt hardly with her maid when that maid despised her mistress. A. in his 99th year was recalled to the standing of faith by Jehovah's charge, "Walk before Me and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii.). God then gave circumcision as seal of the covenant of righteousness by faith, which he had whilst yet uncircumcised (Rom. iv.). His name was changed at circumcision from Abram to Abraham (father of many nations), to mark that the covenant was not to include merely his seed after the flesh, the Israelites, but the numerous Gentile nations also, who in his Seed, Christ, should be children of his faith (Gal. iii.). Sarai (my princess, or "nobility," Gesenius) became Sarah (princess): no longer queen of one family, but spiritually of all nations (ver. 16). The promise now advances a stage further in explicitness, being definitely assigned to a son to be born of Sarah. Its temporal blessings Ishmael shall share, but the spiritual and everlasting with the temporal are only to be through Sarah's son. Sarah laughed, more from joy though not without unbelief, as her subsequent laugh and God's rebuke imply (Gen. xviii. 12-15). Now first, Jehovah, with two ministering angels, reveals Himself and His judicial purposes (Gen. xviii.) in familiar intercourse with A. as "the friend of God" (John xv. 15, Ps. xxv. 14, 2 Chron. xx. 7, Jas. ii. 23, Amos iii. 7), and accepts his intercession to a very great extent for the doomed cities of the plain. The passionate intercession was probably prompted by feeling for his kinsman Lot, who was in Sodom, for he intercedes only for Sodom, not also for Gomorrah, an undesigned propriety, a mark of genuineness. This epiphany of God contrasts in familiarity with the more distant and solemn manifestations of earlier and later times. Loving confidence takes the place of instinctive fear, as in man's intercourse with God in Eden; Moses similarly (Exod. xxxiii. 11, Num. xii. 8); Peter, James, and John on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii.). A mile from Hebron stands a massive oak, called "A.'s oak." His abode was "the oaks of Mamre" (as Gen. xviii. 1 ought to be translated, not "plains"). A terebinth tree was supposed in Josephus' time to mark the spot. It stood within the enclosure, "A.'s house." Isaac's birth, beyond nature, the type of Him whose name is Wonderful (Luke i. 25-37, and contrast Mary's joy with Sarah's half incredulous laugh and Zacharias' unbelief, Luke i. 58, 45-47, 20), was the first grand earnest of the promise. Ishmael's expulsion, though painful to the father who clung to him (Gen. xvii. 18), was needed to teach A. that all ties must give way to the one great end. The full spiritual meaning of it, but faintly revealed to A., appears in Gal. iv. 22-31.

When Isaac was 25 years old the crowning trial whereby A.'s faith was perfected took place (Jas. ii. 21-23). Still it was his faith, not his work, which was "imputed to him for righteousness"; but the faith that justified him was evinced, by his offering at God's command his son, to be not a dead but a living "faith that works by love." St. Paul's doctrine is identical with St. James's (1 Cor. xiii. 2, Gal. v. 6). The natural feelings of the father, the Divine promise specially attached to Isaac, born out of due time and beyond nature, a promise which seemed impossible to be fulfilled if Isaac were slain, the Divine command against human bloodshedding (Gen. ix. 5, 6),—all might well perplex him. But it was enough for him that God had commanded; his faith obeyed, leaving confidently the solution of the perplexities to God, "accounting that God was able to raise Isaac even from the dead" (Heb. xi. 19), "from whence he received him in a figure." The "figure" was: Isaac's death (in Abraham's intention) and rescue from it (2 Cor. i. 9, 10) vividly represented Christ's death and resurrection on the "third" day (Gen. xxii. 4). The ram's substitution represented Christ's vicarious death; it was then that A. saw Christ's day and was glad (John vii. 56). The scene was Moriah (i.e. chosen by Jehovah); others suppose Moreh, three days' journey from Beersheba. His faith was rewarded by the original promises being now confirmed by Jehovah's oath by Himself (Heb. vi. 13, 17); and his believing reply to his son, "God will provide Himself a lamb," received its lasting commemoration in the name of that place, Jehovah Jireh, "the Lord will provide." His giving up his only and well beloved son (by Sarah) typifies the Father's not sparing the Only Begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, in order that He might spare us. Sarah died at Kirjath Arba, whither A. had returned from Beersheba. The only possession he got, and that by purchase from the Hittites, was a burying place for Sarah, the cave of Machpelah, said to be under the mosque of Hebron. His care that he and his should be utterly separated from idolatry appears in his strict charge to Eliezer as to the choice of Isaac's wife, not to take a Canaanite woman nor yet to bring his son back to A.'s original home. A. being left alone at Isaac's marriage, and having his youthful vigour renewed at Isaac's generation, married Keturah. The children by her, Midian and others, he sent away, lest they should dispute the inheritance with Isaac after his death. He died at 175 years, Isaac and Ishmael joining to bury him beside Sarah. Through his descendants, the Arabs, Ismaelites, and descendants of Midian, "children of the East," A.'s name is still widely known in Asia. As "father of the faithful," who left home and all at the call of God, to be a sojourner in tents, he typifies Him who at the Father's call left His own heaven to be a homeless stranger on earth, and to sacrifice Himself, the unspeakably precious Lamb, for us: "the Word tabernacled [Gr. John i. 14] among us."

Abraham's Bosom. In Roman times, their custom of reclining on couches at meals prevailed among the Jews. Each leaned on his left arm, and so lay, as it were, in the bosom of the next below him. This position in the bosom of the master of the house was the place of honour (John i. 18, xiii. 23). To lie in A.'s bosom was thus a phrase for blessed repose in closest nearness to the father of the faithful in the feast of paradise (Matt. viii. 11, Luke xvi. 23).

Abreeh (Gen. xli. 43). Translated "how the knee" in English Bible. Others translate "a pontifical," or "pure prince," a common title in ancient Egyptian tombs; Origen and Jerome, "a native Egyptian." Thus A. will be a proclamation of Joseph's naturalization, a requisite for his executing successfully his great undertaking among a people most jealous of foreigners. Canon Cook (Speaker's Comm.) makes it imperative, from the Egyptian, "Rejoice thou;" but Harkev "Ap-Rach, Chief of the Reck, or men of learning."

Abronah, Ebronah (Num. xxxiii. 34, 35). Israel's halting place in the desert, just before Ezion Geber. A name perhaps meaning a ford (from 'abar, to cross) over the Elanitic gulf.

Absalom (father of peace). Third son of David, by Maachah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, a Syrian region N.E. of Palestine, near lake Merom. Polygamy bore its fatal fruits in engendering jealousies among the families by different wives, each with a separate establishment (2 Sam. xiii. 8, xiv. 24), and in fostering David's own lust, which broke forth in the sad adultery with Bathsheba. A., the fruit of David's polygamy, was made the Divine instrument of David's punishment. Amnon, the half brother, violated Tamar, A.'s whole sister. David, though very wroth, would not punish Amnon, because he was his firstborn by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. As Sincon and Levi avenged on Hamor their sister Dinah's violation, so A. after two years' dark, silent hatred, took vengeance on Amnon at a sheephearing feast at Baal Hazor to which he invited all the king's sons (2 Sam. xiii.). Then he fled to his father-in-law at Geshur for three years. Joab perceiving how the king took to heart A.'s exile snubbed a woman of Tekoa, by an imaginary case, to extort from the king (whose justice would not allow his love for A. to let him escape some penalty for Amnon's murder) the admission of the general principle that, in special cases where the life taken could not be recalled, means for restoring the loved and living banished one should be devised; just as God, considering the brevity of man's life, weak and irrecoverable when gone, "as water spilt on the ground, does not take a sinner's soul away" [so the Heb. 2 Sam. xiv. 14 for "neither doth God respect any person"], but deviseth means that His banished be not (for ever) expelled from Him." David yielded, but would not see A., though living at Jerusalem, for two more years. Impatience of delay in his ambitious schemes, he sent for Joab, and, not being heeded, he burnt Joab's corn (as Samson did to the Philistines, Jud. xv. 4), which drove Joab to intercede with David for A.'s admission to his presence. Possibly he feared the succession of Bathsheba's son to the throne, to which he had the title, being alone of royal descent by his mother's side, also the eldest surviving son (Amnon being slain, and Chileab or Daniel dead, as his name does not occur after 2 Sam. iii. 3). Nathan's mission from Jehovah to David, announcing that the Lord loved the child, and that his name therefore was to be Jedidiah, "beloved of the Lord," implied Jehovah's choice of Solomon as successor to David (2 Sam. xii. 24, 25). This excited A.'s fears. At all events, directly after receiving the king's kiss of reconciliation, he began popularity hunting, to the disparagement of his father, whose moral hold on the people had been weakened by his sin with Bathsheba, and who probably as years advanced attended personally to judicial ministrations less than is the usual policy of oriental kings. A. intercepted suitors, lamenting that there was no judge appointed to help them to their rights such as he would be. His heauty too, as in Saul's case (1 Sam. ix. 2), and his princely retinue, attracted many (2 Sam. xiv. 25, 26, where probably some error of number has crept in: though doubtless 200 shekels after the king's weight is much less weight of hair than ordinary shekels would be; xv. 1-6). Judah, from jealousy of Israel, with whom they had been merged by David, seems to have been too ready to be seduced from loyalty. Accordingly, A. chose Hebron, Judah's old capital, as the head quarters of the revolt. He repaired thither after four (so we ought to read instead of "forty," xv. 7) years, under the hypocritical pretence of a vow like that of pious Jacob (comp. xv. 8 with Gen. xxviii. 20, 21); David alludes to the hypocrisy of the rebels in Ps. iv. 5. Amasa, son of Abigail, David's sister, and Jether, an Ishmaelite, owing to David's neglect of him, and preference of his other sister Zeruiah's sons (probably because of his Ishmaelite fatherhood), was tempted to join the rebellion, and Abithophel of Giloh also, because of his granddaughter Bathsheba's wrong (2 Sam. xi. 3, xiii. 34). Both were of Judah; Amasa became A.'s general, Abithophel his counsellor. This David felt most keenly (Ps. lxxix. 12; lv. 12-14, 20; xli. 9). By Abithophel's abominable counsel, A. lay with his father's concubines, at once committing his party to an irreconcilable war, and him to the claim to the throne (according to oriental ideas:

so Adonijah, 1 Kings ii. 13, etc.), and fulfilling God's threatened retribution of David's adultery in kind (2 Sam. xii. 11, 12). Hushai, David's friend, defeated treachery by treachery. Ahithophel, like his anti-type Judas, baffled, went and hanged himself. A., though well pleased at the counsel of "smiting the king only" and at once, was easily drawn aside by fear of his father's bravery, and by indecision and vanity; all which Hushai acted on in his counsel to summon all Israel, and that A. should command in person. He waited to have himself anointed king first (2 Sam. xix. 10). He lost the opportunity of attacking his father that night, whilst weak handed. The battle in Gilead in the wood of Ephraim (called from Ephraim's defeat, Jud. xii. 4) resulted in the defeat of his cumbersome undisciplined host. His locks, on which he prided himself (xiv. 25, 26), were the means of his destruction, for they kept him suspended from a terebinth tree till Joab pierced him; and David, whom the unnatural son would have gladly smitten, but who charged Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, his three generals, to spare the youth for his sake, mourned pathetically for his death: "O A., my son, would God I had died for thee: my son, my son!" His grave was a pit, over which the insulting conquerors heaped stones, as over Achai and the king of Ai (Josh. vii. 26, viii. 29). After losing his three sons (2 Sam. xiv. 27; comp. Ps. xxi. 10), he had erected in the king's dale (Gen. xiv. 17) a pillar to commemorate his name; a sad contrast to this was his dishonoured grave. The so called tomb of A., in the valley of Jehoshaphat outside Jerusalem, betrays its modern origin by Ionic columns; and besides could not have outlasted the various sieges and conquests to which the city has been exposed. David seems to have been a fond but weak father; and A.'s and Amnon's course showed the evil effects of such indulgence (1 Kings i. 6). A.'s fair daughter Tamar married Uriel, by whom she had Michaiah or Maachah, wife of Rehoboam and mother of ABIAH [see].

Abstinence. Enjoined by God, from blood (Gen. ix. 4); and by the Jerusalem council, from blood and idol meats (Acts xv. 29), not to offend Jewish brethren in things indifferent (1 Cor. ix. 20-22). The blood was considered as the seat of the life, and as typifying the one Blood that cleanseth from all sin; therefore it was treated as a sacred thing. "The children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day, because the angel touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank" (Gen. xxxii. 32); modern Jews, therefore, abstain from the whole hind quarter. The law defined whole classes of animals, by the not eating of which the Israelites were distinguished from other nations (Lev. xi.); to mark the separation of the church from the world. Also certain parts of lawful animals, to teach typically that even in lawful things moderation and self control are needed (1 Cor. vi. 12, 13; Lev. iii. 9-11). So the priests, from wine, during their ministration [see AARON] (Lev. x. 1-9); also the Nazarites during their separation (Num. vi. 3, 4); also the Rechabites, constantly, by voluntary vow (Jer. xxxv.). All idol meats were forbidden, viz. such as after the first portion had been consecrated to the idol were then eaten as food among the Gentiles (Exod. xxxiv. 15; Ps. cvi. 28; 1 Cor. viii. 4-10; Rom. xiv. 3). St. Paul lays down the principle that Christians should act each according to his conscience in the matter, but not, even in the exercise of Christian liberty, so as to cast a stumbling-block before weaker brethren. This was the principle of the decree, Acts xv. 29. In 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4, he foretells the rise of Gnostic heretics, the forerunners of the ascetics of the apostate Gr. and Latin churches who should forbid marriage, and command to abstain from meats which God created to be received with thanksgiving. Holy Scripture does not enjoin, nor yet forbid, vows of abstinence from intoxicants. The sacrifice of one's lawful right for our neighbour's good accords with the law of love: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." (Rom. xiv. 21, Jer. xxxv.) [See RECHABITES.]

Accad. One of the cities in the land of Shinar, with Babel, Erech, and Calneh, the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x. 10). Jerome (Onomasticon) testifies that the Jews then believed Nisibis was Accad, a city on the river Khabour, in the N.E. of Mesopotamia, midway between Orfa and Nineveh. So the Targum of Jerusalem. Nisibis' ancient name was Acar, which the Syriac Peschito version has here. Akkad was the name of the "great primitive Hamite race who inhabited Babylonia from the earliest time, and who originated the arts and sciences. In the inscriptions of Sargon the name is applied to the Armenian mountains instead of the vernacular Ararat" (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i. 319, note). The form Kinzi Akkad is found in the inscriptions. Agadi was the great city of the earlier Sargon (G. Smith). Borchart fixes on a site nearer the other three cities in the ancient Sittacene: Akker-koof, or Akker-i-Nimroud, a curious pile of ancient buildings. The Babylonian Talmud mentions the site under the name Aggada. A tract N. of Babylon was called Accete (Knebel).

Acccho. Ptolemais in the N. T., St. Jean d'Acre (named from the knights of St. John of Jerusalem); called "the key of Palestine." Its sands were employed by the Sidonians in making glass. The name is akin to the Arab Achh, a sandy shore heated by the sun. The chief seaport in Syria, 30 miles S. of Tyre; on the N. of the only inlet on the Palestine coast, with Carmel on the S. side. The distance across is eight miles. The river Belus flows into the sea close under the town walls. A. was Asher's portion, but never was wrested from the original dwellers (Jud. i. 31). St. Paul landed here from Tyre, and stayed one day with Christian brethren, before sailing on to Casarea (Acts xxi. 7).

Accuser. In a forensic sense. [See SATAN.] Luke xviii. 3, 1 Pet. v. 8, Job i. 6, Rev. xii. 10, Zech. iii. 1.

Aceldama: "the field of blood." So called because bought with the price of blood, according to Matt. xxvii. 6-8; and because it was the scene of retribution in kind, the blood which Judas caused to be shed being avenged by his own blood, according to Acts i. 19, Rev. xvi. 6. The purchase of the field was begun by Judas, and was completed after Judas' death by the priests, who would not take the price of blood from Judas but used the pieces of silver to pay for the field. He did not pay the money (Matt. xxvii. 5), but had agreed to pay it, with a view of securing "a habitation" to himself and his wife and children (Ps. cix. 9, lxx. 25). Stung with remorse he brought again the 30 pieces of silver, went to the field, hanged himself, and the cord breaking, his bowels gushed out. Thus there is no discrepancy between Matt. xxvii. 8 and Acts i. 19. Substantial unity amidst circumstantial variety is the strongest mark of truth; for it proves the absence of collusion in the writers. (Bengel.) Or probably Peter's words (Acts i. 18) are in irony. All he purchased with the reward of iniquity was the bloody field of his burial. What was bought with his money Peter speaks of as bought by him. The field originally belonged to a potter, and had become useless to him when its clay was exhausted. Jerome says it was still shown S. of mount Zion, where even now there is a bed of white clay. St. Matthew (xxvii. 9) quotes Jeremiah's prophecy as herein fulfilled. Zech. xi. 12, 13 is the nearest approach to the quotation, but not verbatim. Probably Jer. xviii. 1, 2 and xxxii. 6-12 are the ultimate basis on which Zechariah's more detailed prophecy rests, and Jeremiah is therefore referred to by St. Matthew. The field of blood is now shown on the steep S. face of the ravine of Hinnom, on a narrow level terrace, half way up, near its E. end; now Hak-ed-damm. The chalk favours decomposition; and much of it for this reason, and for its celebrity, was taken away by the empress Helena and others, for sarcophagic cemeteries. A large square edifice, half excavated in the rock, and half massive masonry, stands on the steep bank facing the pool of

TOMB OF ABSALOM.

Siloam, as a charnel house 20 feet deep, the bottom covered with moldering bones. "The potter" represents God's absolute power over the clay framed by His own hand: so appropriate in the case of Judas, "the son of perdition," of whom Jesus says, "It had been good for that man if he had not been born"; given over to a reprobate mind and its awful doom. This is the point of Jer. xviii. 6, which is therefore referred to by Matthew (Lsa. xxx. 14, xlv. 9; Rom. ix. 20, 21).

Achaia. In N. T. a Roman province, including the whole Peloponnese, and most of Hellas proper, with the islands. This province, with Macedonia, comprehended all Greece (Acts xviii. 12, xiv. 21). The name was given by the Romans, when they took Corinth and destroyed the Achaian League (146 B.C.), which, beginning with the narrow northern region of the Peloponnese called A., afterwards included several Grecian states. In Acts xviii. 12 Gallio, with the minute propriety that marks historical truth, is called "deputy" (proconsul). A. had only just been restored under Claudius to the senate, whose representatives in the provinces were proconsuls, from having been an imperial province under Tiberius, whose representatives were procurators.

Achaicus. A Christian of Achaia, who with Stephanas and Fortunatus was the bearer of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, and recommended in it to their regard, as one of those who supplied his yearning for Christian fellowship and "refreshed his spirit" (1 Cor. xvi. 17, 18).

Achian (troubler): Achar (1 Chron. ii. 7). Son of Carmi, son of Zaphi, of the tribe of Judah. When Jericho was cursed, with all that was in it, A. alone, in defiance of the curse, "saw" (comp. Job xxi. 7, Gen. iii. 6, Jas. i. 14, 15), coveted, took, and hid (see Gen. iii. 8; following the first sin in the same awful successive steps downward) "a Babylonish garment" (comp. Rev. xviii. 4, 5), "two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold, fifty shekels" (Josh. vii. 21). His guilty presence alone brought from Jehovah defeat upon Israel at Ai (Eccles. ix. 18). Joshua, by Jehovah's direction, through lots detected the culprit, and having elicited his confession said, "Why hast thou troubled us?" (alluding to the meaning of Achar = Achun) "the Lord shall trouble thee this day." So all Israel stoned him, and burned with fire, after stoning with stones, his sons, daughters, cattle, and the stolen and personal effects. The God who made his the power to destroy a whole family or nation for the guilt of one (2 Kings xiii. 25, 27); for the individual members are not isolated atoms, but form one organic whole, and the good or the evil of one affects the whole and is laid to the charge of the whole, as constituting one morality, divinely constituted, not a mere civil institution, just as the whole body suffers by the sin or suffering of a single member. A. fell under the ban by seizing what was banned, and incurred the same penalty as a town lapsing into idolatry (Deut. xiii. 16, 17). The whole family was involved in the guilt; indeed, the sons and daughters of an age of reason must have been privy to his hiding the spoil in the earth in his tent. Though the law (Deut. xxiv. 16) forbade the slaying of children for their fathers' sins, this did not apply to cases where, as here, Jehovah Himself commands execution. A.'s children were not taken to the valley (as some explain) as mere spectators, to take warning from their father's doom; for why then should A.'s cattle have been taken out along with him? On the other hand, Calmet argues: (1) Had his family been stoned, would not the heap of stones have included THEM ALSO? Whereas it is raised over HIM. (2) His sons and daughters who, in some degree at least, acted under his authority, were certainly not punished more rigorously (by burning AND stoning) than the principal criminal. (3) Was not the burning applied to such things as might suffer by burning, tents, garments, etc., and the stoning to what fire would little affect, etc.? But to what effect could A.'s family be first burned, and then stoned? "They raised over him a great heap of stones," as cairns are still in the East heaped over infamous persons. Every passer by shows his detestation of the crime by adding a stone to the cairn (Josh. viii. 29, 2 Sam. xviii. 17). The valley of Achor (see Isa. lxx. 10) is identified by some with that of the brook Cherith, before Jordan, now wady el Kelt (1 Kings xvii. 1-7). The Heb. of ver. 24, "they brought them up unto the valley of trouble," implies this was higher ground than Gilgal and Jericho. Thomson (The Land and the Book) on Hos. ii. 15: "That valley runs up from Gilgal toward Bethel. By A.'s stoning the anger of the Lord was turned away from Israel, and the door of entrance to the promised inheritance thrown open. Thus the 'valley of Achor' (trouble), 'a door of hope,' is not a bad motto for those who through much tribulation must enter the promised land." A salutary warning to all Israel of the fatal effect of robbing God of His due through covetousness. [See ANANIAS.] Israel entered Canaan to take possession of land desecrated by its previous tenants, not as a mere selfish spoil, but for God's glory. The spoil of Jericho was the firstfruits of Canaan, sacred to Jehovah; A.'s sacrilegious covetousness in appropriating it needed to be checked at the outset, lest the sin spreading should mar the end for which Canaan was given to Israel.

Achbor. 1. Gen. xxxvi. 38, 1 Chron. i. 49. 2. Father of king Jehoakim's ready tool Aziel, Elnathan (Jer. xxvi. 22, 23); A. was, on the contrary, an instrument of good Josiah, to inquire the Lord's will from the prophetess Huldah. Called Abdon, the son of Micah, in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20, 21. Goodness is not always hereditary.

Achim. In Jesus' genealogy (Mat. i. 14) = Jachin (i.e. he will establish), contracted from Jehoachin. The name may express the parents' faith that God would in His own time establish Messiah's throne, as Isa. ix. 7 foretold.

Achish. King of Gath, son of Maach; called Abimelech, i.e., not merely a king, but also son of a king, in the title to Ps. xxiv. See ABIMELECH for the seeming discrepancy with 1 Sam. xxi. 10-13, xxvii. 2. Twice David fled to him. On the first occasion, being recognised as the conqueror of the Philistines, he in fear feigned madness (as the Roman L. Junius Brutus did: Livy, i. 56), and so was let escape to the cave of Adullam. On the second he stayed at Gath, with 600 men, a year and four months, having had Ziklag assigned to him. The unbelieving propensity to calculate probabilities, instead of trusting implicitly to God, misleads even believers into self sought positions of great spiritual danger. "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul, there is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines," said David. This false step on his part necessitated gross lying to the trustful Philistine king (1 Sam. xxvii. 1, 8-12). He finally escaped, only by God's undeserved providential interposition, from having to march with A. against his own countrymen (1 Sam. xxviii., xxix.). A., or his son, is again mentioned (1 Kings ii. 40) as the receiver of Shimei when he left Jerusalem contrary to Solomon's command.

Achmetha. Ezra vi. 2 = Ecabata. A title applied to cities with a fortress for protecting the royal treasures (Rawlinson, in Kitto's Cyclop.). [See ECBATANA.]

Achor. On the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 7). [See ACHAN.]

Achsa. Daughter of Caleb, son of Jephunneh, the Kenezite; given by him in marriage to his younger brother, Othniel, for having taken Debir, or Kirjath Sepher (i.e. the city of the book), or Kirjath Sama. Like her large hearted father, she looked for great things through faith in God's promise of the land; and lighting from her ass, and humbly asking for springs, as needed by the south land, she received "the upper and the nether springs" (Josh. xv. 15-19, 49; Jud. i. 11-15; 1 Chron. ii. 49). Her husband, Israel's judge and saviour from Chushan Rishathaim, had through the Spirit of Jehovah the noble faith of the race: Jud. iii. 8-11. Typically hereby we are taught as children to ask humbly and expect confidently great blessings (Luke xi. 13, 1 John iii. 22), both the upper or heavenly and the nether or earthly, from our Father (Ps. lxxxi. 10, lxxiv. 11; Isa. xxxiii. 16; John iv. 13, 14, vii. 37-39, xv. 7; Eph. iii. 20).

Achshaph. A Canaanite royal city, whose king was smitten by Joshua (Josh. xi. 1, xii. 20, xix. 25). Within Asher; perhaps the modern Chafa, in the LXX. Ceph. Conder (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., April, 1876) identifies with Fasif. The hieratic papyrus (Brit.

Mss., 1842, pl. 35-61), mentioning Ak-sapou (identified by M. Chabas with A.), is the account of an Egyptian officer's travels in a chariot from near Aleppo to the vicinity of the sea of Galilee, and thence to Egypt via Joppa. He is called a Mohar; his record is at least 3000 years old. ("Voyage d'un Egypt. en Syrie, en Phénicie, en Palest.," F. Chabas, Paris, 1866.)

Achzib. 1. In Judah, in the shephelah or plain country of Judah on the western borderland toward the Philistines and the sea; the Chezib of Gen. xxviii. 5, Josh. xv. 41, Mic. i. 14, where the meaning of the name (a lie) is alluded to. 2. In Asher, but, like Ache and Sidon, never wrested from the aboriginal Phœnicians (Jud. i. 31). Ten miles N. of Acre, on the Mediterranean; considered on the return from Babylon the northernmost boundary of the Holy Land. Now Es-zib.

Acts of the Apostles. The second treatise, in continuation of the Gospel as recorded by Luke. The style confirms the identity of authorship; also the address to the same person, Theophilus, probably a man of rank, judging from the title "most excellent." The Gospel was the life of Jesus in the flesh, the Acts record His life in the Spirit; Chrysostom calls it "The Gospel of the Holy Spirit." Hence Luke says: "The former treatise I made of all that Jesus began to do and teach;" therefore the Acts give a summary of what Jesus continued to do and teach by His Spirit in His disciples after He was taken up. The book breaks off at the close of St. Paul's imprisonment, A.D. 63, without recording his release; hence it is likely Luke completed it at this date, just before tidings of the apostle's release reached him. There is a progressive development and unity of plan throughout. The key is chap. i. 8: "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me in (1) Jerusalem, and (2) in all Judea, and (3) in Samaria, and (4) unto the uttermost part of the earth." It begins with Jerusalem, the metropolis of the Jewish dispensation, and ends with Rome, the metropolis of the whole Gentile world. It is divisible into three portions: I. From the ascension to the close of chap. xi., which describes the rise of the first purely Gentile church, at Antioch, where the disciples consequently were first called CHRISTIANS [see]; II. Thence down to the special vision at Troas (chap. xvi.), which carried the gospel, through Paul, to Europe; III. Thence onward, till it reached Rome. In each of the three periods the church has a distinct aspect: in the first, Jewish; in the second, Gentile with a strong Jewish admixture; in the third, after the council at Jerusalem (chap. xv.), Gentile in a preponderating degree. At first the gospel was preached to the Jews only; then to the Samaritans (viii. 1-5); then to the Ethiopian eunuch, a proselyte of righteousness (viii. 27); then, after a special revelation as Peter's warrant, to Cornelius, a proselyte of the gate; then to Gentile Greeks (not Grecians, i.e. Greek speaking Jews, but heathen Greeks, on the whole the best supported reading, xi. 20); then Peter, who, as "the apostle of the circumcision," had been in the first period the foremost preacher, gives place from chap. xiii. to Paul, "the apostle of the uncircumcision," who successively proclaimed the word in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, and Rome. Luke joined Paul at Troas (about A.D. 53), as appears from the "we" taking the place of "they" at that point in his history (xvi. 8-10). The repetition of the account of the ascension in chap. i. shows that an interval of some time had elapsed since writing the more summary account of it at the end of Luke xxiv.; for repetition would have been superfluous unless some time had intervened.

ANTIOCH.

St. Matthew's Gospel, as adapted to Jewish readers, answers to the first period ending about A.D. 40, and was written probably in and for Jerusalem and Judea; St. Mark answers to the second or Judæo-Gentile period, A.D. 40-50, as his Gospel abounds in Latinisms, and is suited to Gentile converts, such as were the Roman soldiers concentrated at Cæsarea, their head quarters in Palestine, the second great centre of gospel preaching, the scene of Cornelius' conversion by Mark's father in the faith, Peter. St. Luke's Gospel has a Greek tinge, and answers to the third period, A.D. 50-63, being suited to Greeks unfamiliar with Palestinian geography; written perhaps at Antioch, the third great centre of gospel diffusion. Antioch is assigned by tradition as his residence (A.D. 52) before joining Paul when entering Europe. Beginning it there, he probably completed it under Paul's guidance, and circulated it from Philippi, where he was left behind, among the Greek churches. Probably St. Paul (A.D. 57) alludes to his Gospel in 2 Cor. vii. 18: "the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches." Certainly he quotes his Gospel as Scripture, and by inspiration stamps it as such in 1 Tim. v. 18. His having been chosen by the Macedonian churches joint trustee with Paul of their contributions to Jerusalem implies a long residence, during which he completed and circulated his work. As Acts was the fruit of his second connection with Paul, whose labours down to his imprisonment in Rome form the chief part of the book, so he wrote the Gospel through the help he got in his first connection with him, from Troas down to Philippi. (See Birks' Home Evang., 192, etc., for the probability that Theophilus lived at Antioch.) Jerome says Luke published his Gospel "in the parts of Achaia and Bœotia."

The Book of Acts links itself with the Gospels, by describing the foundation and extension of the church, which Christ in the Gospels promised; and with the Pauline epistles by undesignated, because not obvious, coincidences. It forms with the Gospels a historical Pentateuch, on which the Epistles are the inspired commentary, as the Psalms and Prophets are on the O. T. historical books. Tertullian De Bapt., 17, and Jerome, Vir. Illustr., Luc., 7, mention that John pronounced spurious the Acts of Paul and Thecla, published at Ephesus. As Luke's Acts of the Apostles was then current, John's condemnation of the spurious Acts is a virtual sanction of ours as genuine; especially as Rev. iii. 2 assigns this office of testing the true and the false to John's own church of Ephesus. The epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to those of Asia and Phrygia (A.D. 177) quotes it. Irenæus, Adv. Hær., i. 31, Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom., v., and Origen, in Euseb. H. E., vi. 23, attest the book. Eusebius, H. E., iii. 23, ranks it among "the universally recognised Scriptures." Its rejection by the Manicheans on purely doctrinal grounds implies its acceptance by the early church catholic. Luke never names himself. But the identity of the writer with the writer of the Gospel (Luke i. 3) is plain, and that the first person plural (Acts xvi. 10, 17; xxi. 1, 18; xxvii. 1; xxviii. 16) includes the writer in the first person singular (chap. i. 1). Paul's other companions are distinguished from the writer (chap. xx. 4, 5, 6, 15). The sacred writers keep themselves in the background, so as to put forward their grand subject. The first person gives place to the third at chap. xvii. 1, as Paul and Silas left Luke behind at Philippi. The non-mention of Luke in Paul's epistles is due to his not having been with him at Corinth (chap. xviii.), whence the two epistles to the Thessalonians were written; nor at Ephesus (chap. xix.), whence he wrote to the Romans; nor at Corinth again, whence he wrote to the Galatians. The first person is not resumed till chap. xx. 5, 6, at Philippi, the very place where the first person implies he was with Paul two years before (chap. xvi.); in this interval Luke probably made Philippi his head quarters. Thenceforward to the close, which leaves Paul at Rome, the first person shows Luke was his companion. Col. iv. 14, Philem. 24, written there and then, declare his presence with Paul in Rome. The undesignated coincidence remarkably confirms the truth of his authorship and of the history. Just in those epistles written from places where in Acts the first person is dropped, Luke is not mentioned, but Silas and Timothy are; 1 and 2 Thess. i. 1, 2 Cor. i. 19 compared with Acts xviii. 5. But in the epistles written where we know, from Acts xxviii., the writer was with Paul we find Luke mentioned. Alford conjectures that as, just before Luke's joining Paul at Troas (xvi. 10), Paul had passed through Galatia, where he was detained by sickness (Gal. iv. 13, Gr. "Ye know that because of an infirmity of my flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first"), and Phrygia, and as the epistle to Colosse in Phrygia terms Luke "the beloved physician." Luke became Paul's companion owing to the weak state of the apostle's health, and left him at Philippi when he was recovered, which would account for the warm epithet "beloved."

In chap. xvi. 10 Agabus is introduced as if he had never been mentioned before, which he was in chap. xi. 28. Probably Luke used different written sources of information, guided in the selection by the Holy Spirit. This view accounts for the Hebraistic style of the earlier parts (drawn from Hebrew sources), and the Grecian style of the latter (from Luke himself). The speeches remarkably and undesignedly accord with all that is known of the speakers from other sources. Comp. Peter's speeches, Acts ii. 23, iv. 11, x. 34, with 1 Pet. i. 17, 19, ii. 7; Paul's, Acts xiv. 15-17, xvii. 21-31, with Rom. i. 19-25, ii. 5, iii. 25 (Gr. "the pretermission," or passing over of sins, "winking" at them), Col. i. 17, 2 Thess. ii. 4 (marg. of chap. xvii. 23 "gods worshipped," the same Gr.); chap. xx. 19, 31 with Phil. iii. 18; chap. xx. 32 with Eph. ii. 20; chap. xx. 24 with 2 Tim. iv. 7; "seed according to the promise," chap. xiii. 23, with Rom. iv. 13, Gal. iii. 16. The Hebraisms mostly found in the speeches, and not in the narrative, prove that the speakers' very words are essentially though summarily given. Providence so ordered it that during Paul's two years' imprisonment in Jerusalem and Caesarea, Luke his companion had the best opportunities for ascertaining the facts of the early part of his work from the brethren on the spot. At Caesarea dwelt Philip the evangelist, one of the Seven (xvi. 8), the best authority for chaps. vi., vii., viii.; also Cornelius the centurion, or at least some witnesses of the events (chap. x.) which initiated the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles. Probably the portion chap. xvii. 15-xviii. 5 was inserted by Paul himself, for he was then alone, and none but he could have supplied the facts. Moreover, in ver. 16 to 21 of chap. xvii. eleven expressions foreign to Luke's style occur, and in the speech 20 besides, some of which are found nowhere else but in Paul's epistles.

Peter, to whom the keys of the kingdom of heaven were given (Matt. xvi. 19), opens it as the central figure of the first part, both to the Jews (chap. iii.) and to the Gentiles (chap. x.). Another instrument was needed for evangelizing the world, combining the learning of both Hebrew and Greek, which the twelve had not, with the citizenship of Rome, the political mistress of the Gentile world; Paul possessed all these qualifications. A Jew by birth; educated in Hebrew Divine truth at the feet of Gamaliel in Jerusalem; in Greek literature at Tarsus, one of its most eminent scholars (whence he derived his acquaintance with the

and Epimenides, Tit. i. 12, and Menander, 1 Cor. xv. 33); and a Roman citizen, a privilege which would gain him influence and protect him from lawless and fanatical violence everywhere. Hence Paul by his catholicity of qualifications and spirit (when his old pharisaism was completely eradicated by the revulsion of feeling attendant on his miraculous conversion) occupies the central place in the latter part of Acts, which records the extension of the gospel to the metropolis of the world. Baumgarten remarks: "the twelve did not enter so fully into the catholic spirit of the new dispensation; a new intervention of the Lord was needed to create a new apostolate, not resting on the Israelite organization." Three civilizations meet in the introduction of the gospel to the world: the polity of Rome, binding all nations together, securing peace, and facilitating the circulation of the gospel of peace; the intellectual and aesthetic culture of Greece, revealing man's impotence by his own reasonings to find out God's law, and yet preparing him for it when divinely revealed in the gospel; and the Judaic law, divinely perfect, but impotent to justify through man's inability to keep it.

Alford rightly reasons that the date of composition must have been before the fulfilment of the prophecy, chap. xxvii. 24, "thou must be brought before Caesar"; else Luke would have recorded it, as he does Paul's trials before Felix and Festus. The most certain date from the N. T., Josephus, and Tacitus, is that of Porcius Festus arriving in Palestine in Felix' room, A.D. 60. Paul therefore went to Rome A.D. 61, when Burrhus, a humane man, was captain of the guard. His successor, the cruel Tigellinus, would not have been likely to have left him "in free custody." Herod Agrippa's death was A.D. 41. Therefore Paul's second visit to Jerusalem with the contributions was about A.D. 42 (chap. xi. 30). 2 Cor. xii. 2 (written about A.D. 55-57) refers to this visit. "Fourteen years before" will bring us to about A.D. 41-42. The visit to Antioch, and Agabus' prophecy fulfilled in Claudius' reign (A.D. 41) preceded chap. xi. 28, viz. A.D. 40. The silence as to Paul, chap. xii. 1-19, shows he was not at Jerusalem then, A.D. 43-44, but just before it, A.D. 41-42. The stoning of Stephen was probably A.D. 33, Saul's conversion A.D. 37, his first visit to Jerusalem A.D. 40, his third visit (chap. xv.) fourteen years subsequently to his conversion, A.D. 51 (Gal. ii. 1). After his conversion he went to Arabia, then back to Damascus, whence he escaped under Aretas (2 Cor. xi. 32); then to Jerusalem, after three years. His first visit was then A.D. 40 or 41, being succeeded by a cessation of persecution, owing to Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the temple. Next he was brought to Tarsus, to escape from Grecian conspirators in Jerusalem (chap. ix. 30, Gal. i. 21). Thus only the period from A.D. 30 to A.D. 32-33 elapses between Christ's ascension and the stoning of Stephen. All the hints in the first six chaps. imply a miraculously rapid growth of Christianity, and an immediate antagonism on the part of the Jews. The only other cardinal point of time specified is in chap. xviii. 2, the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius Caesar, A.D. 52. No book of the N. T. has suffered more from variations of text. Probably these are due to attempts at clearing supposed difficulties, harmonizing Paul's different accounts of his conversion, and bringing the text into exact likeness to the Gospels and Epistles. The book of Acts was so little read in the churches publicly that there was less opportunity to expunge interpolations by comparing different copies. The principal interpolations alleged are chaps. viii. 37, ix. 5, 6, xiv. 6-8, xxviii. 29.

Adadah. A city in S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 22).

Adah (adornment, beauty). 1. One of LAMECH's [see, and ZILLAH] wives (Gen. iv. 19). 2. Daughter of Elon the Hittite; one of Esau's three wives; mother of his firstborn, Eliphaz; ancestress of six of the Edomite tribes (Gen. xxxvi. 2-4, 15, 16); called Bashemath (Gen. xxvi. 34), meaning the fragrant. Esau's third wife, daughter of Ishmael, also is called Bashemath, but Mahalath in chap. xxviii. 9. Moses drew the genealogy from documents of Esau's tribe, without altering them. Eastern and especially Arabian custom gives surnames (founded on some memorable event in one's life), which gradually supersede the other name; for instance, Edom, chap. xxv. 30. Women received new names when married; so both might be called Bashemath.

Adahai. 1. 2 Kings xxii. 1. 2. 1 Chron. vi. 41. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 21. 4. 1 Chron. ix. 12, Neh. xi. 12. 5. Ezra x. 29. 6. Ezra x. 39, Neh. xi. 5.

Adalia. Esth. ix. 8.

Adam (red earth). The name given by God to the first man, to remind him of his earthly nature; whereas Ish was the name whereby he designates himself, a man of earth (as opposed to Enosh "a man of low degree" Ps. lxxii. 9) (Gen. ii. 23). The Heb. Adam never assumes any change to mark the dual or plural numbers, men. Probably the Syro-Arabian is the primitive tongue, whence sprang the Heb. and other so called Semitic tongues. The names in Genesis are therefore essentially the same as were actually spoken. Adam's naming of the animals in Eden implies that God endowed Adam with that power of generalization, based on knowledge of their characteristics, whereby he classified those of the same kinds under distinctive appellations, which is the fundamental notion of human language. Its origin is at once human and Divine. Divine, in that "God brought" the animals "to Adam to see what he would call them," and enabled him to know intuitively their characteristics, and so not at random or with arbitrary appellations, but with such as marked the connection (as all the oldest names did, when truth logical and moral coincided) between the word and the thing, to name them; human, in that Adam, not God, was the namer. "He did not begin with names, but with the power of naming; for man is not a mere speaking machine; God did not teach him words, as a parrot, from without, but gave him a capacity, and then evoked the capacity which He gave." (Abp. Trench.)

As the crown of creation, he was formed at the close of the sixth day. A. came into the world a full grown man, with the elements of skill and knowledge sufficient to maintain his lordship over nature. The Second A. came as an infant by humiliation to regain for man his lost lordship. Original records are perhaps traceable as employed in the inspired record of Moses. Gen. i. 1—ii. 3 is one concerning creation and man in a general summary. A second is Gen. ii. 4—iv. 26, treating in a more detailed way what was summarily given as to man (chap. i.), his innocence, first sin, and immediate posterity. A third is chap. v. 1 to the end of ix., "the book of the generations of A.," and especially of Noah. But the theory of an Elohist author for chap. i., and a Jehovist author for chap. ii., distinct from Moses, on the ground that ELOHIM is the Divine name in chap. i., but JEHOVAH ELOHIM in chap. ii., is untenable. Nay, the names are used in their respective places with singular propriety; for ELOHIM expresses the mighty God of creation, and is fitting in His relation to the whole world. (chap. i.) But JEHOVAH, the unchanging I AM (Exod. vi. 3), in covenant with His people, always faithful to His promises to them, is just the name that the Spirit of God would suggest in describing His relation to man, once innocent, then fallen, then the object of an everlasting covenant of love. It is just one of the undesigned proprieties which confirm Scripture's Divine origination, that the JEHOVAH of the covenant with the church is the ELOHIM of the world, and vice versa.

The Elohim in man's creation use anthropomorphic language, implying collective counsel: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." Abp. Trench remarks: "The whole history of man, not only in his original creation, but also in his after restoration and reconstitution in the Son, is significantly wrapped up in this double statement; which is double for this very cause, that the Divine mind did not stop at the contemplation of his first creation, but looked on to him as renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him (Col. iii. 10); because it knew that only as partaker of this double benefit would he attain the true end for which he was made." In 1 Cor. xi. 7 man is called "the image and glory of God." This ideal is realized fully in the Son of man (Ps. viii. 4, 5). Man is both the "image" (Gr. eicon, Heb. tschem), and made in the "likeness" (Gr. homoiosis, Heb. dennuth) of God (Jas. iii. 9). "Image" (eicon) alone is applied to the Son of God (Col. i. 15); comp. Heb. i. 3, "the express image of His person" (Gr. charakter, the impress). Eicon, "image," presupposes a prototype, as the monarch is the prototype and his head on the coin the image. But "likeness" implies mere resemblance. Thus the "image" of God remains in some degree after the fall (Gen. ix. 6; Jas. iii. 9; 1 Cor. xi. 7). The likeness of God is what we are to be striving towards. The archetype is in God; man in his ideal is moulded after the model realized in the Son of man, "the image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature," the incarnate God, already existing in the Divine point of view (Col. i. 15), with body and animal life akin to the animal world, yet the noble temple of an immortal spirit, with reason, imagination, freewill finding its true exercise in conformity to God's will, and a spiritual nature resembling God's, reflecting God's truth, righteousness, and love; capable of reasoning in the abstract which the lower animals cannot, as they have no general signs for universal ideas. Some indeed, as the parrot, can frame articulate sounds, but they have not the power to abstract ideas from the particular outward objects, so as to generalize; as their want of a general language proves. Man is the interpreter of nature's inarticulate praises to nature's God. The uniformity of type in the animal kingdom, including man in his bodily nature, and the affinity of structure in the homologous bones, are due not to development from a common parentage, but to the common archetype in the Divine mind, of which the cherubim was probably an ideal representation. When man fell, he still is called "in the image of God," with a view to his future restoration in the God-man. It is a "palace" in God's design, for a while spoiled by the "strong man" Satan, but to be reinstated by the "stronger" Man with God's archetypal image and likeness more vividly than ever standing forth (Luke xi. 21).

A. is the generic term for man, including woman (Gen. i. 26, 27). Christ came to reveal not only God, but MAN to us; He alone is therefore called "THE Son of man"; the common property of mankind; who alone realizes the original ideal of man: body, soul, and spirit, in the image and likeness of God, the body subordinate to the animal and intellectual soul, and the soul to the spirit (1 Thess. v. 23), combining at once the man and woman (Gal. iii. 28); and in whom believers shall realize it by vital union with Him; having the masculine graces, majesty, power, wisdom, strength, courage, with all woman's purity, intuitive tact, meekness, gentleness, sympathetic tenderness and love, such as Roman Catholics have pictured in the Virgin Mary. So the first A., the type, combined both (Gen. i. 27). The creation of woman from man (marked by the very names tshe, ish) subsequently implies the same truth. The Second A. combined in Himself, as Representative Head of redeemed men and women, both man's and woman's characteristic excellencies, as the first A. contained both before that Eve was taken out of his side. Her perfect suitability for him is marked by Jehovah's words, "I will make for him a help suitable as before him," according to his front presence; a helping being in whom, as soon as he sees her, he may recognise himself (Delitzsch). The complement of man. So the bride, the church, is formed out of the pierced side of Christ the Bridegroom, whilst in the death sleep; and, by faith vitally uniting her to Him in His death and His resurrection, is "bone of His bone, and flesh of His flesh" (Eph. v. 25-32.) The dominion which A. was given as God's vicegerent over the lower world, but lost by sin, is more than regained for man in the person of Christ. Even in His humiliation He exercised unlimited sway over man's bodily diseases and even death itself, over vegetable nature (the fig tree), the dumb animal kingdom (the ass's colt), the inorganic world, the restless sea, and the invisible world of demons; comp. Ps. viii. In His manifested glory, His full dominion, and that of His redeemed with Him, shall be exercised over the regenerated earth: Isa. xi. ii. 4, lxx. 25, xxxv. 9, 10; Ps. lxxii. Ezek. xxxiv. 25; Hos. ii. 18; Rev. xi. 15-17, xx. xxi. xxii. The first man A. was made a "living soul," endowed with an animal soul, the vital principle of his body; but "the last A. a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 45). As the animal souled body (ver. 44) is the fruit of our union with A., an animal souled man, so the spiritual body is the fruit of our union with Christ, the life-giving Spirit.

EDEX [but see] is by Sir H. Rawlinson identified with Babylonia; the Babylonian documents giving an exact geographical account of the garden of Eden, and the rivers bearing the same names: the Hiddekel is certainly the Tigris, and the Phrath the Euphrates; the other two seen tributary branches, though some make Gihon the Nile and Pison the Indus (?). Any fruit tree (some have supposed, from Egyptian representations still extant, the pomegranate) would suffice as a test of obedience or disobedience, by the eating of which the knowledge of evil as well as of good would result. To know evil without being tainted by it is the prerogative of God. Man might have attained this knowledge by making his will one with God's, in not eating it; he then would have attained to a Godlike knowledge of good and evil, and would have exercised true liberty in conformity with his likeness to God. But man aspired to it by his own way, and fell. Only in Christ shall he know it and triumph over it. To distinguish good and evil is the gift of a king (1 Kings iii. 9) and the wisdom of angels (2 Sam. xiv. 17). The tree of knowledge suggested to man the possibility of evil, which in the absence of lust might not occur. If he was to be tried at all, it could only be by a positive precept; and the smaller the subject of the command was, the more it tested the spirit of obedience. Satan's antithesis, the lust of the flesh ("the woman saw that the tree was good for food"), the lust of the eye ("and that it was pleasant to the eyes"), and the pride of life (and a "tree to be desired to make one wise") seduced man: 1 John ii. 16; comp. ACHAN, Josh. vii. 21. As this tree was the sacramental pledge of God's requirement, so the tree of life was the pledge of God's promised blessing.

Abp. Whately thought the tree of life acted medicinally, and that A. and Eve ate of it; and that hence arose his longevity and that of the patriarchs, so that it was long before human life sank to its present average. Chap. ii. 16 seems to imply his free access to it; but perhaps iii. 22 that he had not actually touched it. Indeed it is only sacramentally, and in inseparable connection with faith and obedience, when tested first as to the tree of knowledge, that the tree of life could give man true immortal life. In the day that he ate he died (Gen. ii. 17, comp. Hos. xiii. 1), because separation from God, sin's necessary and immediate consequence, is death; the physical death of A. was deferred till he was 930. Sin's immediate effects on A. and Eve, after she in her turn became a seducer, having first been seduced herself (Gen. iii. 6 end), were shame (ver. 7), concealment and folly (ver. 8, 9; comp. Ps. cxxxix.), fear (ver. 10), selfishness on A.'s part towards Eve, and presumption in virtually laying the blame on God (ver. 12), the curse, including sorrow, agony, sweat of the brow in tilling the thorny ground, death. All these are counter-worked by Christ. He bore our shame and fear (Hb. xii. 2, v. 7), denied self wholly (Matt. xx. 28), resisted Satan's temptation to presumption (Matt. iv. 6), bore the curse (Gal. iii. 13), was "the man of sorrows" (Isa. liii.), endured the agony and bloody sweat of Gethsemane, the crown of thorns, and the dust of death (Ps. xxii. 15, comp. Gen. iii. 19). The temporary exclusion from the tree of life was a merciful provision for fallen man, (for immortality in a lost state is a curse), until that, through Christ, he should have it restored (Rev. xxii. 2, 14; ii. 7).

The cherubim were not outside the garden, blocking up access to it (as chap. iii. 24 is often explained), but "keeping the way to the tree of life," doing what man had failed to do (chap. ii. 15). So the cherubim's position implies, not at the threshold, or even before the mercy seat, but in immediate connection with it, the throne of God (Exod. xxv. 18). So in Ezek. and Rev. they are the living ones, combining the highest forms of creaturely life, suggesting to man his interest still in life and in paradise, and even in a share of God's throne through Divine grace. As the flaming sword represents justice excluding man's access by his own righteousness, so the cherubim represents man reunited to God upon the ground of the mercy seat, which is Christ our propitiatory.

The unity of the human race is plainly asserted in Acts xvii. 26 [see CREATION]. The co-extensiveness of sin's curse upon all men as A.'s offspring, and of Christ's redemption for all men (Rom. v. 12-21, 1 Cor. xv. 22-47) implies the same. "That the races of men are not species of one genus, but varieties of one species, is confirmed by the agreement in the physiological and pathological phenomena in them all, by the similarity in the anatomical structure, in the fundamental powers and traits of the mind, in the limits to the duration of life, in the normal temperature of the body, and the average rate of pulsation, in the duration of pregnancy, and in the unrestricted fruitfulness of marriages between the various races." (Dolitzsch.) The brain of the lowest savage is larger than his needs require, usually five sixths of the size of a civilized man's brain. This implies the latent power of intellectual development, which proves he is essentially one with his more favoured brethren.

Adam. A city beside Zarthan (Josh. iii. 16), on the Jordan. Near the present ford Damieh, which possibly is derived from the ancient name Adam; the northern extremity of Israel's passage (xxii. 11). Probably Reuben's altar of En, or witness, was near, on the Kurn Surtabel. Near Damieh the remains of a Roman bridge are still found. Kurn Surtabel was more than 15 miles from Jericho, which tallies with the words "very far from the city Adam." Knobel thinks the name Surtabel preserves the name Zarthan, a long rocky ridge S. W. of Damieh ford. [See EN.]

Adamah. A fenced city of Naphtali, N. W. of the sea of Galilee (Josh. xix. 36).

Adamant (the English=unconquerable). Unusually hard stones, as the diamond, which is a corruption of the word adamant; Heb. shamir; Gr. smiris. Probably the emery stone or the uncrystallized corundum (Ezek. iii. 9). Image for firmness in resisting the adversaries of the truth of God (Zech. vii. 12). Image of hard heartedness against the truth (Jer. xvii. 1). The stylus pointed with it engraves deeper than the common iron; with such a pen is Jerusalem's sin marked. Its absence from the highpriest's breastplate was because it could not be engraved upon; or perhaps it had not been introduced at that early time. [See DIAMOND.]

Adami. A place on the border of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33); afterwards Damin.

Adar, Heb. ADDAR. Southern boundary of Judah and the Holy Land, called also HAZARADDAR; Josh. xv. 3.

Adar. The 6th month of the civil, and the 12th of the ecclesiastical, year. [See MONTHS.]

Adbeel (Arabic=miracle of God) one of Ishmael's 12 sons, and founder of an Arab tribe (Gen. xxv. 13, 1 Chron. i. 29).

Addan. A place from which some of the Jewish captives returned with Zerubbabel to Judaea: these "could not show their father's house, nor their seed (pedigree) whether they were of Israel" (Ezra ii. 59). ADDON, or AALAE.

Addar. Called ARD (Gen. xli. 21, Num. xxvi. 40); 1 Chron. viii. 3.

Adder. Five times in the O. T.

A. V. and thrice in margin for
"cockatrice"

(Isa. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lxx. 5).

Four Heb. terms stand for it. (1) Akshab, (2) Pethen, (3) Ti-phon, and (4) Shephiphon.

(1) Meaning one that lies in ambush, swells its skin, and rears its head back for a strike. Ps. xli. 3 quoted in Rom. iii. 13, "the poison of asps." (2) Ps. lviii. 4, xci. 13, "adder" (comp. marg.), but elsewhere translated asp; from a Heb. root "to expand the neck." The deadly haje maja, or cobra of Egypt, fond of concealing itself in walls and holes. Serpents are without tympanic cavity and external openings to the ear. The deaf adder is not some particular species; but whereas a serpent's comparative deafness made it more amenable to those sounds it could hear, in some instances it was deaf because it would not hear (Jer. viii. 17, Eccles. x. 11). So David's unrighteous adversaries, though having some little moral sense yet left to which he appeals, yet stifled it, and were unwilling to hearken to the voice of God. (3) Translated adder only in Prov. xxiii. 32; "at the last wine biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." In Jer. viii. 17 "cockatrices," from a root "to dart forward and hiss." The Gr. basilik, fierce, deadly; distinct from the "serpent" (nachash). Isa. xiv. 29; oviparous (lix. 5); subterranean in habits (xi. 8). (4) From a root "to creep"; Jacob's image of Dan (Gen. xlix. 17), lurking on the road, and biting at the horses' heels; the Culuber cerastes, a small and very venomous snake of Egypt. The charmers, by a particular pressure on the neck, can inflate the animal so that the serpent becomes rigid, and can be held out horizontally as a rod. The Egyptian magicians perhaps thus used the haje species as their rod, and restored life to it by throwing it down; at least, so the serpent charmers do at the present day. Shrill sounds, as the flute, are what serpents can best discern, for their hearing is imperfect. Music charms the naja (cobra di capello, hooded snake) and the cerastes (horned viper). Moses' really transformed rod swallowed their pretended rod, or serpent, so conquering the symbol of Egypt's protecting deity. That the naja haje was the "fiery serpent," or serpent inflicting a burning bite, appears from the name Ras-om-Haye (Cape of the haje serpents) in the locality where the Israelites were bitten (Num. xxi. 6).

Addi (Luke iii. 28). In Jesu's genealogy. A shortened form of Adiel, or Adaiah, from adi, "ornament."

Adar. 1 Chron. viii. 15.

Adiel. 1. 1 Chron. iv. 36. 2. 1 Chron. ix. 12. 3. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25.

Adin. 1. Ezra ii. 15, viii. 6. 2. Neh. x. 16.

Adina. 1 Chron. xi. 42.

Adino (= his pleasure in the spear). The Ezrite, the Tachmonite; who slew with his spear 800 at once (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). [See JASHOBEAM.] But Luther reads, to accord with 1 Chron. xi. 11, arer for Adino; and, for ha ezri, eth hanitho, i.e., not a proper name but "Jashobeam swung his spear"; comp. ver. 18. Gesenius reads ne'ano ha'ezro, "he shook it, even his spear."

Adithaim. A town in Judah, on a height overlooking the shephelah or low hill country (Josh. xv. 36). Probably the same as that called later Hadid and Adida. Vespasian used the latter as one of his outposts in besieging Jerusalem.

Adjuration. The judge, king, or highpriest with official authority putting one on his solemn oath; entailing the obligation of witnessing (Lev. v. 1). So Saul adjured the people not to eat till evening (1 Sam. xix. 24-28). And Ahab adjured Micajah to tell the truth, which elicited from him the real result of the approaching battle, after a previous ironical reply. Comp. S. of Sol. ii. 7 marg.; Mark v. 7; Acts xix. 13; 1 Thess. v. 27 marg. Paul "adjuring" the Thessalonians "by the Lord that the epistle might be read to all the holy brethren." Jesus, who, as the meek "Lamb dumb before His shearers," would not reply to false charges, when "adjured [exorkizo se] by the living God," by the highpriest, to tell the truth whether He be the Christ the Son of God, witnessed the truth concerning His Messiahship and His future advent in glory as the Son of man, which immediately brought on Him sentence of death. We Christians can so far join with the highpriest's reply, "What further need have we of witnesses?" (Matt. xxvi. 63-65.) Christ's own witness alone is enough to assure us of His Godhead, the truth which He sealed with His blood.

Adiai. Near Secob: a hill side burrowed with caves (1 Chron. xxvii.

29); now Aid el Mieh (Ganneau). [See ADULLAM.]

Admah. One of the cities of the plain, having its own king, linked with Zebaim (Gen. x. 19; xiv. 2, 8; Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8). Destroyed along with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix. 24).

Admatha. Esth. i. 14.

Adna. One of the sons of Pabath-Moab, who, on Ezra's (x. 30) monition (after that God had by great rains intimated His displeasure), put his strange wife away.

Adnah. 1. 1 Chron. xii. 20. 2. Chief over 300,000, under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 14).

Adoni-Bezek. (Lord of Bezek, a city of Canaan.) Leading the confederated Canaanites and Perizzites, he was conquered by Judah and Simeon, who cut off his thumbs and great toes. Conscience struck, he confessed that 70 kings (petty princes) had gleaned (marg.) their meat under his table, deprived of thumbs and great toes: "As I have done, so God hath requited me" (Jud. i. 4-7). Brought a prisoner to Jerusalem, he died there. God pays sinners in their own coin (1 Sam. xv. 33). Judah was not giving vent to his own cruelty, but executing God's lex talionis (Lev. xxiv. 19, Rev. xvi. 6, Prov. i. 31). The barbarity of Canaanite war usages appears in his conduct. The history shows that Canaan was then parcelled out among a number of petty chiefs.

Adonijah [see ABIATHAR and ABSALOM]. = My Lord is Jehorah, or, Jah my Father. 1. Fourth son of David, by Hagith, born at Hebron. Very goodly in looks, like Absalom. Foolishly indulged by his father, who "had not displeased him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so?" Never crossed when young, he naturally expected to have his own way when old; and took it, to his father's grief in his old age, and to his own destruction. Comp. Prov. xiii. 24, xii. 6: "Train up a child in the way he should go;" not in the way he would go: 1 Kings i. 6. When David was seemingly too old to offer energetic resistance, A. as now the eldest son, about 35 years old (comp. 2 Sam. iii. 2-4 with v. 5), Amnon, Chileab, and Absalom being dead, claimed the throne, in defiance of God's expressed will, and David's oath to Bathsheba that Solomon should inherit the throne (1 Chron. xii. 9, 10). Like Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 1) he assumed regal state, with chariots, horsemen, and 50 men to run before him (2 Kings i. ii.). Nathan the prophet, Zadok (Eleazar's descendant, and so of the older line of priesthood), Benaiah son of Jehoiada, captain of the king's guard, Shimei and Rei (= Shimma, Raddai), David's own brothers, supported Solomon. A. was supported by Abiathar, Eli's descendant of Ithamar's (Aarou's fourth son's) line, the junior line, and Joab who perhaps had a misgiving as to the possibility of Solomon's punishing his murder of Abner and Amasa, and a grudge towards David for having appointed the latter commander in chief in his stead (2 Sam. xix. 13). A. had also invited to a feast by the stone Zobeiah at En-rogel all the king's sons except Solomon, and the captains of the host, the king's servants, of Judah. A meeting for a religious purpose, such as that of consecrating a king, was usually held near a fountain, which En-rogel was. Nathan and Bathsheba foiled his plot by inducing David to have Solomon conducted in procession on the king's mule to Gihon, a spring W. of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxii. 30). On his being anointed and proclaimed by Zadok, all the people hailed him, God save the king! A.'s party, surprised suddenly amidst their feasting, typify sinners' carnal security, from which the Lord's coming suddenly shall startle them to their destruction (Matt. xxiv. 48, Luke xii. 45, 1 Thess. v. 2, 3; comp. 1 Kings i. 49). A., at the tidings announced by Jonathan, Abiathar's son, fled for sanctuary to the horns of the altar. Solomon would have spared him had he shown himself "a worthy man." But on David's death he, through the queen mother Bathsheba, now exalted to special dignity, sought Abishag, David's virgin widow, to be given him, a contemplated incest only second to that perpetrated by Absalom, whom he so much resembled, and also a connection which was regarded in the East as tantamount to a covert claim to the deceased monarch's throne. [See ABNER and ABSALOM.] Benaiah, by Solomon's command, despatched him. 2. A Levite in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chron. xvii. 8), sent with the princes to teach the book of the law throughout Judah. 3. Neh. x. 16, called Adonikam in Ezra ii. 13, whose children were 666 (comp. Rev. xiii. 18, the numerical mark of the beast), viii. 13, Neh. vii. 18, x. 16, but 667 in vii. 18.

Adonikam. [See ADONIJAH.]

Adoniram. Son of Abda; over the tribute for about 47 years under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam; also over Solomon's levy of 30,000 sent by ten thousands monthly to cut timber in Lebanon (1 Kings iv. 6). Contracted into ADORAM (2 Sam. xx. 24) and HADORAM. Stoned by the people of Israel when sent by Rehoboam to collect the tribute which had been their chief ground of complaint against the king (1 Kings xii. 18, 2 Chron. x. 18).

Adoni-zedek (lord of righteousness). An Amorite king of Jerusalem, answering to the ancient king of it, Melchizedek (king of righteousness); one of many proofs that the Canaanite idolatry was an apostasy from the primitive truth of God which they once had. He headed the confederacy against Joshua, which the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglat also joined. Attacking Gibeon for having made peace with Israel, they in turn were attacked by Joshua, who came by forced march from Gilgal to the relief of his ally. Routed they fled to Bethhoron, thence to Azekah and Makkedah, amidst the fearful hailstorm from God, followed by the sun's standing still at Joshua's command. Brought forth from their hiding place, a cave at Makkedah to the mouth of which Joshua had caused great stones to be rolled, they had their necks trodden down by his captains, and then were slain and hung on trees till sunset (Deut. xxi. 22), and their bodies were buried in the cave.

Adoption. The taking of one as a son who is not so by birth. (1.) Natural. As Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses; Mordecai Esther; Abraham Eliezer (as a slave is often in the East adopted as son) (Gen. xv. 2, 3); Sarai the son to be born by Hagar, whom she gave to her husband; Leah and Rachel the children to be born of Zilpah and Billah, their handmaids respectively, whom they gave to Jacob their husband. The handmaid at the birth brought forth the child on the knees of the adoptive mother (Gen. xxx. 3); an act representative of the complete appropriation of the sons as equal in rights to those by the legitimate wife. Jacob adopted as his own Joseph's two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, on the same footing as Reuben and Simeon, his two elder sons (Gen. xlviii. 5). Thereby he was able to give Joseph his favourite son more than his single share, with his brothers, of the paternal heritage. The tribes thus were 13, only that Levi had no land division; or Ephraim and Manasseh were regarded as two halves making up one whole tribe. In 1 Chron. ii. Machir gives his daughter to Hezron of Judah; she bare Segub, father of Jair. Jair inherited 23 cities of Gilead in right of his grandmother. Though of Judah by his grandfather, he is (Num. xxxii. 41) counted as of Manasseh on account of his inheritance through his grandmother. So Mary, being daughter of Heli, and Joseph her husband being adopted by him on marrying his daughter, an heiress (as appears from her going to Bethlehem to be registered in her pregnancy), Joseph is called in Luke's genealogy son of Heli.

By the Roman law of adoption, which required a due legal form, the adopted child was entitled to the father's name, possessions, and family sacred rights, as his heir at law. The father also was entitled to his son's property, and was his absolute owner. Gratuitous love was the ground of the selection generally. Often a slave was adopted as a son. Even when not so, the son adopted was bought from the natural father. A son and heir often adopted brothers, admitting them to share his own privileges; this explains beautifully John viii. 36, comp. Heb. ii. 11; or else the usage alluded to is that of the son, on coming into the inheritance, setting free the slaves born in the house. The Jews, though not having exactly the same customs, were familiar with the Roman usages. (11.) Natural: as God adopted Israel (Rom. ix. 4; Deut. vii. 6; Exod. iv. 22, 23; Hos. xi. 1); comp. Jer. xii. 19. "How shall I put thee among the children (Gr. huiothesia). . . thou shalt call Me, my Father." The word expressed is, how shall one so long estranged from God as Israel has been restored to the privileges of adoption? The answer is, by God's pouring out on them hereafter the Spirit of adoption crying to God, "Father" (Isa. lxiii. 16, lxiv. 8; Hos. iii. 4, 5; Zech. xii. 10). (11.) Spiritual and individual. An act of God's sovereign grace, originating in God's eternal counsel of love (Eph. i. 4, 5; Jer. xxxi. 3); actually imparted by God's uniting His people by faith to Christ (John i. 12, 13; Rom. viii. 14-16; Gal. iii. 26, iv. 4, 5). The slave once forbidden to say father to the master, being adopted, can use that endearing appellation as a free man. God is their Father, because Christ's Father (John xx. 17). Sealed by the Holy Spirit, the earnest of the future inheritance (Eph. i. 13). Producing the filial cry of prayer in all, Jew and Gentile alike [see ABBA] (Gal. iv. 6); and the fruit of the Spirit, conformity to Christ (Rom. viii. 29), and renewal in the image of our Father (Col. iii. 10). Its privileges are God's special love and favour (1 John iii. 1, Eph. v. 1); union with God, so perfect hereafter that it shall correspond to the ineffable mutual union of the Father and Son (John xvii. 23, 26); access to God with filial boldness (Matt. vi. 8, 9; Rom. viii. 15, 26, 27), not slavish fear such as the law generated (Gal. iv. 1-7; John iv. 17, 18, v. 14); fatherly correction (Heb. xii. 5-8); provision and protection (Matt. vi. 31-33, x. 29, 30); heavenly inheritance (1 Pet. i. 3, 4; Rev. xxi. 7).

The "adoption" is used for its full manifestation in the resurrection of the believer with a body like Christ's glorious body (Rom. viii. 23). Christ was Son even in His humiliation; but He was only "declared [definitively, Gr.] the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. i. 4), "the first begotten from the dead" (Rev. i. 5). Hence Paul refers, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee" (Ps. ii. 7) to the day of His resurrection. Not that He then first became Son, but His sonship was then openly vindicated by the Father's raising Him from the dead (Acts xiii. 33). So our "adoption" is still waited for, in the sense of its open manifestation (Rom. viii. 11, 19; 1 John iii. 2). It is now a reality, but as yet a hidden reality. Our regeneration is now true (Tit. iii. 5), but its full glories await Christ's coming to raise His saints. The first resurrection shall be the saints' manifested regeneration (Matt. xix. 28). They have three birthdays: the natural, the spiritual, the glorified. Sonship and the first resurrection are similarly connected (Luke xx. 36, 1 Pet. i. 3). By creation Adam (Luke iii. 38) and all men (Acts xvii. 28, 29) are sons of God; by adoption only believers (1 Cor. xii. 3). The tests are in 1 John iii. 9; iv. 4, 6; v. 1, 4, 18-21.

Adoraim. A fortress built by Rehoboam in Judah (2 Chron. xi. 9). Probably now Dura, a large village on a rising ground W. of Hebron.

Adore. "To kiss the hand with the mouth" in homage (Job xxxi. 26, 27: "If I beheld the sun when it shineth, or the moon, . . . and my mouth hath kissed my hand"). The earliest idolatry, that of the sun, moon, and heavenly hosts (Heb. tsaba), Sabaeism. Laying the hand on the mouth expresses deep reverence and submission (Job xl. 4). So "kiss the Son," i.e. adore (1's. ii. 12). Pourtrayed in the sculptures of Persepolis and Thebes. Falling down and worshipping prostrate was the worship subsequently paid to Babylonian idols (Dan. iii. 5, 6). In the sense of Divine worship, it is due to God only, and was rejected by angels and saints when offered to them (Luke iv. 8; Acts x. 25, 26; Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9).

Adrammelech. 1. The idol of the Sapharvite colonists of Samaria planted by Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 31) = burning splendour of the king (comp. Molech). The male power of the sun; as ANAMMELECH is the female, sister deity. Astrology characterized the Assyrian idolatry. Adrammelech was represented as a peacock or a male; Anammelech as a pheasant or a horse. Children were burnt in his honour. 2. Son and murderer of Sennacherib in Nineveh's temple at Nineveh. He and Sharezer his brother escaped to Armenia (2 Kings xix. 36, 2 Chron. xxxii. 21). Named so from the idol.

Adramyttium. A seaport in Mysia (Acts xxvii. 2). Its gulf is opposite the isle Lesbos, on the Roman route between Troas and the Hellespont, and Pergamos, Ephesus and Miletus. The centurion escorting Paul took an Adramyttian ship, as a vessel going the whole way from Palestine to Italy was hard to find, and as it would bring them so far on their journey towards Rome, and in that coast they would be likely to find another ship to take them the rest of the way. At Myra in Lycia accordingly they found an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy.

Adria. The gulf bounded on the E. by Dalmatia and Albania, and on the W. by Italy. It was often however understood in a wider sense, as by Paul's almost contemporary geographer, Ptolemy, viz., the Mare Superum, including the Ionian sea, between Sicily on the W., and Greece and Crete on the E., and Africa on the S., the "Syrtic basin" (Acts xxvii. 17). So that the Melita of Acts xxvii. need not be looked for in the present Adriatic gulf, but may be identified with Malta. Adria, a town near the Po, gave its name. Malta marks the division between the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian (Mare Inferum) sea; the Corinthian isthmus divides the Aegean from the Adriatic.

Adriel. Son of Barzillai the Meholathite, to whom Saul gave Merab his daughter in marriage, previously promised to David (1 Sam. xviii. 19). Five sons from this union were of the seven slain as a blood satisfaction to the Gibeonites whose blood Saul had, in violation of Israel's covenant (Josh. ix. 15), shed. 2 Sam. xxi. 8: "Michal brought up for Adriel;" viz., Merab the mother died young, and her sister brought up her five nephews, as if she were their own mother. The Jewish targums favour this view. But as the Heb. yabad means to bring forth or bear children, and Michal seems to have had no children (2 Sam. vi. 23), perhaps Michal is a transcriber's error for Merab. Still the term "bare" (marg.) may mark how completely Michal, evidently a woman of strong affections (1 Sam. xix. 11, 12; 2 Sam. iii. 16), acted as a true mother to them.

Adullam. A city in the shephelah, or low country between the hill country of Judah and the sea; very ancient (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20); the seat of one of the 31 petty kings smitten by Joshua (xii. 15). Fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7). Called for its beauty "the glory of Israel" (Mic. i. 15). Reoccupied on the return from Babylon (Neb. xi. 30). The limestone cliffs of the shephelah are pierced with caves, one of which was that of Adullam, David's resort (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xiii. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 15).

CAVE OF ADULLAM.

Tradition fixes on Khureitun as the site, S. of the wady Urtas, between Bethlehem and the Dead Sea. This cave on the borders of the Dead Sea six miles S.E. of Bethlehem (his parents' residence) would be more likely as the place whence David took his parents to Moab close by, than the region of the city Adullam in the far W. Names of western places are sometimes repeated in the East. David's usual haunts were in this eastern region. The cave's mouth can only be approached on foot across the cliff's edge; it runs in by a long winding narrow passage, with cavities on either side; a large chamber within, with very high arches, has numerous passages to all directions, joined by others at right angles, and forming a perplexing labyrinth. The air within is dry and pure. David's familiarity with it, as a Bethlehemite, would naturally lead him to it. Lieut. Conder (Palest. Explor.) at first fixed on the cave Mogharet Umm el Tumaymich, five miles N. of Ayd el Mich; agreeing with the position assigned by Eusebius 10 miles E. of Eleutheropolis; but the cave with its damp hot atmosphere is unfit for human habitation. In a later report Conder, after surveying the ground, fixes on Ayd el Mich (feast of the hundred) as the site of the cave and city of A., eight miles N.E. of Beit Jibrin (Libnah), 10 miles S.W. of Tell es Safiyeh (Gath), and half way between Socoh and Kollah: 500 feet above wady Sumt (valley of Elah); barring the Philistines' progress up this valley to Judah's corn lands. Tombs, wells, terraces, and rock fortifications are to be traced. It is connected by roads with adjoining places, Maresha (El Marashi), Jarmuth (Yarmuk), and Socoh (Suweikh), and has a system of caves close to its wells still inhabited, or used as stables, and large enough for all David's band. On the top of the city hill are two or three caves which together could accommodate 250 men. The darkness, scorpions, bats, and flies are against Khureitun and Deir Dubban caverns as a residence. From Gibeah (Jeba) David fled to Nob, thence down the valley to Gath (Tell es Safiyeh); from Gath he returned to Judah. On the edge of the country between Philistia and Judah, he collected his band into Adullam (Ayd el Mich); thence, by the prophet's direction, to the hills, a four miles' march to Hareth, still within reach of his own Bethlehem. To the present day the cave dwelling peasantry avoid large caves such as Khureitun and Umm el Taweinan, and prefer the drier, smaller caves, lighted by the sun, such as Ayd el Mich, meaning in Arabic "feast of the hundred." The expedition of David's three mighty men from Ayd el Mich to Bethlehem would be then 12 leagues, not too far for what is described as an exploit (2 Sam. xxiii. 13-17, 1 Chron. xi. 15-19).

Adultery. A married woman cohabiting with a man not her husband. The prevalent polygamy in patriarchal times rendered it impossible to stigmatize as adultery the cohabitation of a married man with another besides his wife. But as Jesus saith, "from the beginning it was not so," for "He which made male and female said, They two in shall be one flesh." So the Samaritan Pentateuch reads Gen. ii. 24, as it is quoted in Matt. xix. 5. A fallen world undergoing a gradual course of remedial measures needs anomalies to be premitted for a time (Rom. iii. 25 marg., Acts xvii. 30), until it becomes fit for a higher stage, in its progress towards its finally perfect state. God sanctions nothing but perfection; but optimism is out of place in governing a fallen world not yet ripe for it. The junction of the two into one flesh when sexual intercourse takes place with a third is dissolved in its original idea. So also the union of the believer with Christ is utterly incompatible with fornication (1 Cor. vi. 13-18, vii. 1-13; 1 Tim. iii. 12). The sanctity of marriage in patriarchal times appears from Abraham's fear, not that his wife will be seduced from him, but that he may be killed for her sake. The conduct of Pharaoh and Abimelech (Gen. xii., xx.), implies the same reverence for the sacredness of marriage. Death by fire was the penalty of unchastity (Gen. xxxviii. 24). Under the Mosaic law both the guilty parties (including those only betrothed, unless the woman were a slave) were stoned (Deut. xxii. 22-24, Lev. xix. 20-22). The law of inheritance, which would have been set aside by doubtful off-spring, tended to keep up this law as to adultery. But when the territorial system of Moses fell into desuetude, and Gentile example corrupted the Jews, whilst the law nominally remained it practically became a dead letter. The Pharisees' object in bringing the adulterous woman (John viii.) before Christ was to put Him in a dilemma between declaring for reviving an obsolete penalty, or else sanctioning an infraction of the law. In Matt. v. 32 He condemns their usage of divorce except in the case of fornication. In Matt. i. 19, Joseph "not willing to make [the Virgin] a public example [paradeigmatistai]" was minded to put her away privily"; i.e., he did not intend to bring her before the local Sanhedrim, but privately to repudiate her. The trial by the waters of jealousy described in Num. v. 11-29 was meant to restrain oriental impulses of jealousy within reasonable bounds. The trial by "red water" in Africa is very different, amidst seeming resemblances. The Israelite ingredients were harmless; the African, poisonous. The visitation, if the woman was guilty, was from God direct; the innocent escaped; whereas many an innocent African perishes by the poison. No instance is recorded in Scripture; so that the terror of it seems to have operated either to restrain from guilt, or to lead the guilty to confess it without recourse to the ordeal.

The union of God and His one church, in His everlasting purpose, is the archetype and foundation on which rests the union of man and wife (Eph. v. 22-33). [See ADAM.] As he (ish) gave Eve (isha) his name, signifying her formation from him, so Christ gives a new name to the church (Rev. ii. 17, iii. 12). As He is the true Solomon (Prince of peace), so she the Shulamite (S. of Sol. vi. 13). Hence idolatry, covetousness, and apostasy are adultery spiritually (Jer. iii. 6, 8, 9; Ezek. xvi. 32; Hos. i., ii., iii.; Rev. ii. 22). An apostate church, the daughter of Jerusalem becoming the daughter of Babylon, is an adulteress (Isa. i. 21; Ezek. xliii. 4, 7, 37). So Jesus calls the Jews "an adulterous generation" (Matt. xii. 39). The woman in Rev. xii., represented as clothed with the Sun (of righteousness), and crowned with the 12 stars (i.e. the 12 patriarchs of the O. T. and the 12 apostles of N. T.), and persecuted by the dragon, in Rev. xvii., excites the wonder of John, because of her transformation into a scarlet arrayed "mother of harlots," with a cup full of abominations, riding upon a "scarlet coloured beast"; but the ten horned beast finally turns upon her, "makes her naked, eats her flesh, and burns her with fire." The once faithful church has ceased to be persecuted by conforming to the godless world and resting upon it. But the Divine principle is, when the church apostatizes from God to intrigue with the world, the world, the instrument of her sin, shall at last be the instrument of her punishment. Comp. as to Israel (Aholah), and Judah (Aholibah), Ezek. xxiii. The principle is being illustrated in the church of Rome before our eyes. Let all professing churches beware of spiritual adultery, as they would escape its penalty.

Adummim (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17) = the red pass, or "pass of the red men," the aboriginal inhabitants; on the border between Benjamin and Judah, on a rising ground; whence the phrase is, "the going up of A." S. of the torrent, and looking toward Gilgal. The road still passes the same way, leading up from Jericho (four miles off) and the Jordan valley to Jerusalem, eight miles distant, S. of the gorge of the wady Kelt. It was believed to be the place where the traveller fell among robbers in the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x.). The order of Knights Templar arose out of an association for guarding this road, which has always been infested by robbers; Jerome indeed derives A. from the Heb. "bloodshed."

Adversary. The meaning of Satan (1 Pet. v. 8); also Divine justice (Luke xii. 38, 39).

Advocate (paraclete); one who pleads another's cause, exhorts, comforts, prays for another. The Holy Spirit (John xiv. 16, xv. 26, xvi. 7); though our A. V. always translates it "Comforter" when applied to Him, and "A." when to Christ (1 John ii. 1). But all the ideas included in the word apply both to the Holy Ghost and to Christ. For if Christ intercedes with God for us above, the Holy Spirit does so in us below; comp. Rom. viii. 26, 34 with Heb. vii. 25. The Holy Spirit, testifying of Christ within us, answers, as our A. before our consciences, the law's demands; He, as the Spirit of prayer and adoption, inspires in us prayers which words cannot fully utter. If the Holy Spirit be named "another Comforter" by Jesus, yet He implies that Himself also is so, as indeed the Holy Spirit is His Spirit; absent in body, He is still present by His Spirit (John xiv. 16, 18). Tertullus (Acts xxiv.) is a sample of the advocates usually employed by clients in the Roman provinces.

Aeneas. A paralytic, healed at Lydda by Peter (Acts ix. 33, 34).

Enon. Near Salim, where John baptized (John iii. 22, 23, 26; comp. i. 28), W. of Jordan. The name (=springs) implies "there was much water there." Robinson found a Salim E. of Nabulus, or Shechem, with two copious springs; comp. Gen. xxxiii. 18. This would require A. to be far W. of Jordan; it agrees with this that, had it been near Jordan, John would scarcely have remarked that "much water" was there; but if far from the river, it explains how the plentiful water at A. was convenient for baptisms. There is an Ainun still near Shechem or Nabloos, with many beautiful streams and brooks. Ainun is as distant N. of the springs

PLAIN OF SHECHEM.

(three or four miles) as Salim is S. of them. The valley is called the wady Farth. [See SALIM.] The Ainun site is on the main line from Jerusalem to Nazareth. Here most probably, at the upper source of the wady Farth stream, between Salim and Ainun, was John's A. The Palestine explorer, Lieut. Conder, confirms this; moreover, this would explain John iv. 4, "Jesus must needs go through Samaria; . . . one soweth and another reapeth," etc. (ver. 37, 38.) John Baptist, the forerunner, prepared the way in Samaria; Jesus and His disciples must needs follow up by preaching the gospel there.

Agabus (from Heb. 'agab, "he loved"). A Christian prophet (Acts ix. 28, xxi. 10). He came from Judaea to Antioch while Paul and Barnabas were there, and foretold the famine which occurred the next year in Palestine (for a Jew would mean the Jewish world, by "throughout all the world"). Josephus records that Helena, queen of Adiabene, a proselyte then at Jerusalem, imported provisions from Egypt and Cyprus, wherewith she saved many from starvation. The famine was in the procuratorship of Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander, A.D. 44, and lasted four years. In the wider sense of "the world," as the prophecy fixes on no year, but "in the days of Claudius Caesar," it may include other famines elsewhere in his reign, one in Greece, two in Rome.

Agag (fiery one; Arabic = burn). A common title of the Amalekite kings; as Pharaoh of the Egyptian. Num. xxiv. 7 implies their greatness at that time. Saul's sparing the A. of his time (1 Sam. xv. 32) contrary to God's command, both then and from the first (Exod. xvii. 14, Dent. xxv. 17-19), because of Amalek's having intercepted Israel in the desert, so as to defeat the purpose of God Himself concerning His people, entailed on Saul loss of his throne and life. A. came to Samuel "delicately" (rather contentedly, pleasantly), confident of his life being spared. But Samuel executed retributive justice (as in the case of Adonibezek, Jud. i.), hewing him to pieces, and so making his mother childless, as he had made other women childless by hewing their sons to pieces (in consonance with his fiery character, as A. means). This retribution in kind explains the unusual mode of execution. Hamaan the Agagite (Esth. iii. 1-10, viii. 3-5) was thought by the Jews his descendant, whence sprung his hatred to their race.

Agate. Heb. kadkod, from kadal, to sparkle. The "windows" being of this gem (Isa. liv. 12) implies transparency. Gesenius thinks the ruby or carbuncle is meant. It was imported from Syria to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 16). Heb. Sheba (from Shela whence it came to Tyre), Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12, is rightly translated "agate," a semi-transparent uncrystallized quartz, mainly silica, with concentric layers of various tints; the second stone of the third row on the highpriest's breastplate. The English term is drawn from that of the Greeks, who found agate in the river Achates, in Sicily, and hence named it.

Age. A period of time characterized by a certain stage of development of God's grand scheme of redemption (aión) (Eph. ii. 7, iii. 5). The people living in the age. There is the patriarchal age; the Mosaic age or dispensation, the Christian age, in which "the kingdom of God cometh without observation" (and evil predominates outwardly); and the future manifested millennial kingdom: the two latter together forming "the world (Gr. age) to come," in contrast to "this present evil world" (age) (Eph. i. 21, Gal. i. 4). The Gr. for the physical "world" is kosmos, distinct from aión, the ethical world or "age" (Heb. vi. 5). If the 1260 prophetic days of the papal antichrist be years, and begin at A.D. 754, when his temporal power began by Pepin's grant of Ravenna, the Lombard kingdom, and Rome to Stephen II., the beginning of the millennial age would be A.D. 2014. But figures have in Scripture a mystical meaning as well as a literal; faith must wait till the Father reveals fully "the times and seasons which He hath put in His own power" (Acts i. 7). Messiah is the Lord by whom and for whom all these ages, or vast cycles of time, have existed and do exist (Heb. i. 2), "through whom He made the ages" (Gr.) (Isa. xxvi. 4), "the Rock of ages" (1 Ps. cxlv. 13). "This age" (Gr. for "world") is under the prince of darkness, the god of this world (Gr. "age") so far as most men are concerned (Eph. ii. 2, Luke xvi. 8, Matt. xiii. 22, 2 Cor. iv. 4). "The world" when representing the Gr. "age" (aión) means not the material "world" (Gr. kosmos), but the age in its relation to God or to Satan. Continuance is the prominent thought; so "the ages of ages," expressing continuous succession of vast cycles, stands for eternity; e.g., Messiah's kingdom (Rev. xi. 15), the torment of the lost (xiv. 11).

Age (Old). The reward of filial obedience, according to the fifth commandment; remarkably illustrated in the great permanence of the Chinese empire; wherein regard for parents and ancestors is so great that it has degenerated into superstition. Patriarchal times and patriarchal governments have most maintained respect for the old. The Egyptians followed the primeval law, which Moses embodies in Lev. xii. 32: "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God." Their experience made them to be regarded as depositories of knowledge (Job xv. 10); they gave their opinion first (xxxii. 4). A full age was the reward of piety (v. 26; Gen. xv. 15); premature death was a temporal judgment for sin (1 Sam. ii. 32); (spiritually, and as a talking out from the evil to come, it was sometimes a blessing; as in the case of Abijah, Jeroboam's son, 1 Kings xiv., Isa. lvii. 1). In the millennial, when there shall be a world-wide theocracy, with Israel for its centre, the temporal sanction of exceeding long life (as in patriarchal times) shall be the reward for piety, and shortened years the penalty of any exceptional sin (Isa. lxx. 20, Zech. viii. 4). The rulers under Moses required age as a qualification; hence they and those of the N. T. church are called elders (presbyters), till the word became a term of office, and not necessarily of age. Disobedience to parents and disrespect to seniors and "dignities" (Jude 8, 2 Pet. ii. 10) are foretold characteristics of the last apostate age (2 Tim. iii. 2-4, Rom. i. 30).

Agee. 2 Sam. xxiii. 11.

Agony. (Gr. conflict in wrestling; figuratively, a struggle with intense trials.) Used only in Luke xxii. 44. Jesus' agony in Gethsemane, "so that His sweat was as it were great clotted drops of blood" (thromboi), viz., blood mixing with the ordinary watery perspiration, medically termed diapedesis, resulting from agitation of the nervous system, turning the blood out of its natural course, and forcing the red particles into the skin excretories. The death of Charles IX. of France was attended with it. Many similar cases are recorded, as the bloody sweat of a Florentine youth, condemned to death unjustly by Sixtus V. (De Thon lxxxii. 4: 44). Comp. Heb. v. 7, 8; Matt. xxvi. 36-46; Mark xiv. 32-42. Each complements the other, so that the full account is to be had only from all compared together. Luke alone records the bloody sweat and the appearance of an angel from heaven strengthening Him, Matthew and Mark the change in His countenance and manner, and His complaint of overwhelming soul sorrows even unto death, and His repetition of the same prayer. The powers of darkness then returning with double force, after Satan's defeat in the temptation (Luke iv. 13, "for a season," Gr. "until the season," viz. in Gethsemane, Luke xxii. 53), the prospect of the darkness on Calvary, when He was to experience a horror never known before, the hiding of the Father's countenance, the climax of His vicarious sufferings for our sins, which wrang from Him the "Eli Eli lama sabacthani," apparently caused His agonizing, holy, instinctive shrinking from such a cup. Sin which He hated was to be girt fast to Him, though there was none in Him; and this, without the consolation which martyrs have, the Father's and the Saviour's presence. He must tread the winepress of God's wrath against us alone. Hence the greater shrinking from His cup than that of martyrs from their cup (John xii. 27; Luke xii. 49, 50). The cup was not the then pressing agony; for in John xviii. 11 He speaks of it as still future. There is a beautiful progression in the subjecting of His will to the Father's: "O My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me, nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt" (Matt. xxvi. 39): "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee," (lest His previous if should harbour a doubt of the Father's power) "take away this cup from Me, nevertheless not what I will but what Thou wilt" (Mark xiv. 36): "Father, if Thou be willing" (marking His realizing the Father's will as defining the true limits of possibility). "remove this cup from Me, nevertheless not My will, but Thine be done" (Luke xxii. 42): "Oh My Father, if [rather since] this cup may [can] not pass away from Me except I drink it, [now recognising that it is not the Father's will to take the cup away], Thy will be done" (Matt. xxvi. 42): lastly, the language of final triumph of faith over the sinless infirmity of His flesh, "The cup which My Father hath given Me shall I not drink it?" (John xviii. 11.) A faultless pattern for us (Isa. i. 5-10).

Agriculture. Whilst the patriarchs were in Canaan, they led a pastoral life, and little attended to tillage; Isaac and Jacob indeed tilled at times (Gen. xxvi. 12, xxxvii. 7), but the herdsmen strove with Isaac for his wells not for his crops. The wealth of Gerar and Shechem was chiefly pastoral (chap. xx. 14, xxxiv. 28). The recurrence of famines and intercourse with Egypt taught the Canaanites subsequently to attend more to tillage, so that by the time of the spies who brought samples of the land's produce from Esheol much progress had been made (Deut. viii. 8, Num. xiii. 23). Providence happily arranged it so that Israel, whilst yet a family, was kept by the pastoral life from blending with and settling among idolaters around. In Egypt the native prejudice against shepherds kept them separate in Goshen (Gen. xlvii. 4-6, xlvii. 34). But there they unlearned the exclusively pastoral life and learned husbandry (Deut. xi. 10), whilst the deserts beyond supplied pasture for their cattle (1 Chron. vii. 21). On the other hand, when they became a nation, occupying Canaan, their agriculture learned in Egypt made them a self subsisting nation, independent of external supplies, and so less open to external corrupting influences. Agriculture was the basis of the Mosiac commonwealth; it checked the tendency to the roving habits of nomad tribes, gave each man a stake in the soil by the law of inalienable inheritances, and made a numerous offspring profitable as to the culture of the land. God claimed the lordship of the soil (Lev. xxv. 23), so that each held by a Divine tenure; subject to the tithe, a quit rent to the theocratic head landlord, also subject to the sabbatical year. Accumulation of debt was obviated by prohibiting interest on principal lent to fellow citizens (Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-37). Every seventh, sabbatic year, or the year of jubilee, every 50th year, lands alienated for a time reverted to the original owner. Comp. Isaiah's "woe" to them who "add field to field," clearing away families (1 Kings xxi.) to absorb all, as Ahab did to Naboth. Houses in towns, if not redeemed in a year, were alienated for ever; thus land property had an advantage over city property, an inducement to cultivate and reside on one's own land. The husband of an heiress passed by adoption into the family into which he married, so as not to alienate the land. The condition of military service was attached to the land, but with merciful qualifications (Deut. xx.); thus a national yeomanry of infantry, officered by its own hereditary chiefs, was secured. Horses were forbidden to be multiplied (Deut. xvii. 16). Purificatory rites for a day after warfare were required (Num. xix. 16, xxxi. 19). These regulations, and that of attendance thrice a year at Jerusalem for the great feasts, discouraged the appetite for war.

The soil is fertile still, wherever industry is secure. The Hauran (Peræa) is highly reputed for productiveness. The soil of Gaza is dark and rich, though light, and retains rain; olives abound in it. The Israelites cleared away most of the wood which they found in Canaan (Josh. xvii. 18), and seem to have had a scanty supply, as they imported but little; comp. such extreme expedients for getting wood for sacrifice as in 1 Sam. vi. 14, 2 Sam. xxiv. 22, 1 Kings xix. 21; dung and hay fuel heated their ovens (Ezek. iv. 12, 13; Matt. vi. 30). The water supply was from rain, and rills from the hills, and the river Jordan, whereas Egypt depended solely on the Nile overflow. Irrigation was effected by ducts from cisterns in the rocky sub-surface. The country had thus expansive resources for an enlarging population. When the people were few, as they are now, the valleys sufficed to till for food; when many, the more difficult culture of the hills was resorted to and yielded abundance. The rich red loam of the valleys placed on the sides of the hills would form fertile terraces sufficient for a large population, if only there were good government. The lightness of husbandry work in the plains set them free for watering the soil, and terracing the hills by low stone walls across their face, one above another, arresting the soil washed down by the rains, and affording a series of levels for the husbandman. The rain is chiefly in the autumn and winter, November and December, rare after March, almost never as late as May. It often is partial. A drought earlier or later is not so bad, but just three months before harvest is fatal (Amos iv. 7, 8). The crop depended for its amount on timely rain. The "early" rain (Prov. xvi. 15, Jas. v. 7) fell from about the September equinox to sowing time in November or December, to revive the parched soil that the seed might germinate. The "latter rain" in February and March ripened the crop for harvest. A typical pledge that, as there has been the early outpouring of the Spirit at pentecost, so there shall be a latter outpouring previous to the great harvest of Israel and the Gen-

the nations (Zech. xii. 10; Joel ii. 23, 28-32). Wheat, barley, and rye (and millet rarely) were their cereals. The barley harvest was earlier than the wheat. With the undesigned propriety that marks truth, Exod. ix. 31, 32 records that by the plague of hail "the flax and the barley were smitten, for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was balled [i.e. in blossom], but the wheat and the rye were not smitten, for they were not grown up." Accordingly, at the passover (just after the time of the hail) the barley was just fit for the sickle, and the wave sheaf was offered; and not till pentecost feast, 50 days after, the wheat was ripe for cutting, and the firstfruit loaves were offered. The vine, olive, and fig abounded; and traces everywhere remain of former wine and olive presses. Commem (including the black "fitches," Isa. xxviii. 27), peas, beans, lentiles, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, melon, cucumber, and cabbage also were cultivated. The passover in the month Nisan answered to the green stage of produce; the feast of weeks in Sivan to the ripe; and the feast of tabernacles in Tisri to the harvest home or ingathering. A month (Vender) was often intercalated before Nisan, to obviate the inaccuracy of their non-astronomical reckoning. Thus the six months from Tisri to Nisan was occupied with cultivation, the six months from Nisan to Tisri with gathering fruits. The season of rains from Tisri equinox to Nisan is pretty continuous, but is more decidedly marked at the beginning (the early rain) and the end (the latter rain). Rain in harvest was unknown (Prov. xxvi. 1). The plough was light, and drawn by one yoke. Fallows were cleared of stones and thorns early in the year (Jer. iv. 3, Hos. x. 12, Isa. v. 2). To sow among thorns was deemed bad husbandry (Job v. 5; Prov. xxiv. 30, 31). Seed was scattered broadcast, as in the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii. 3-8), and ploughed in afterwards, the stubble of the previous crop becoming manure by decay. The seed was trodden in by cattle in irrigated lands (Deut. xi. 10, Isa. xxxii. 20). Hoeing and weeding were seldom needed in their fine tilth. Seventy days sufficed between sowing barley and the wave-sheaf offering from the ripe grain at passover. Oxen were urged on with a spearlike goad (Jud. iii. 31). Barz slept on the threshing-floor, a circular high spot, of hard ground, 80 or 100 feet in diameter, exposed to the wind for winnowing, (2 Sam. xiv. 16-18) to watch a gainst depredations (Ruth iii. 4-7). Sowing divers seed in a field was forbidden (Deut. xxi. 9), to mark God is not the author of confusion, there is no transmutation of species, such as modern sceptical naturalists imagine. Oxen unyoked (Deut. xxv. 4) five abreast trod out the corn on the floor, to separate the grain from chaff and straw; flails were used for small quantities and lighter grain (Isa. xxviii. 27). A threshing sled (more), Isa. xlii. 15) was also employed, probably like the Egyptian still in use, a stage with three rollers ridged with iron, which cut the straw for fodder, whilst crushing out the grain. The shovel and fan winnowed the corn afterwards by help of the evening breeze (Ruth iii. 2, Isa. xxx. 24); lastly, it was shaken in a sieve. Amos ix. 9, Ps. lxxxiii. 10, and 2 Kings ix. 37 prove the use of animal manure. The poor man's claim was remembered, the self sown produce of the seventh year being his perquisite (Lev. xxv. 1-7); hereby the Israelites' faith was tested; national apostasy produced gradual neglect of this compassionate law, and was punished by retribution in kind (Lev. xxvi. 34, 35); after the captivity it was revived. The gleanings, the corners of the field, and the forgotten sheaf and remaining grapes and olives, were also the poor man's right; and perhaps a second tithe every third year (Lev. xix. 9, 10; Deut. xiv. 28, xxvi. 12; Amos iv. 4). The fruit of newly planted trees was not to be eaten for the first three years, in the fourth it was holy as firstfruits, and on the fifth eaten commonly.

Agrippa. [See HEROD.]

Agur. From agur, "to collect." "The collector," a symbolical name, like Ecclesiastes, "the preacher" or "assembler." Son of Jakoh (obedience); author of inspired counsels to Ithiel and Ucal (Prov. xxx.). Called "the prophecy;" rather "the weighty utterance" (Heb. massa), "burden." Hitzig imaginatively makes him son of the queen of Massa, and brother of Lemuel. An unknown Hebrew collector of the wise sayings in Prov. xxx., and possibly as Ewald thinks in xxxi. 1-9; the three sections of this portion are mutually similar in style. Lemuel = "devoted to God" is probably an ideal name. The rabbins, according to Rashi and Jerome, interpreted the name as symbolising Solomon the Kohleth. [See ECCLESIASTES.]

Ahab. 1. Son of Omri; seventh king of the northern kingdom of Israel, second of his dynasty; reigned 23 years, from 919 to 897 B.C. Having occasional good impulses (1 Kings xxi. 27), but weak and misled by his bad wife Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Zidon, i.e. Phœnicia in general. The Tyrian historians, Diodorus and Menander, mention Ethbaal as priest of Ashtoreth. Having murdered Phœbus, he became king of Tyre. Menander mentions a drought in Phœnicia; comp. 1 Kings xvii. He makes him sixth king after Hiram of Tyre, the interval being 50 years, and Ethbaal's reign 32; thus he would be exactly contemporary with A. (Josephus c. Apion, i. 18.) A., under Jezebel's influence, introduced the impure worship of the sun-god

Baal, adding other gods besides Jehovah, a violation of the first commandment, an awful addition to Jeroboam's sin of the golden calves, which at Dan and Bethel (like Aaron's calves) were designed (for state policy) as images of the one true God, in violation of the second commandment; comp. 2 Kings xvii. 9; "the children of Israel did secretly things [Heb. covered words] that were not right [Heb. so] against the Lord," i.e., veiled their real idolatry with flimsy pretences, as the church of Rome does in its image veneration. The close relation of the northern kingdom with Tyre in David's and Solomon's time, and the temporal advantage of commercial intercourse with that great mart of the nations, led to an intimacy which, as too often happens in amalgamation between the church and the world, ended in Phœnicia seducing Israel to Baal and Ashtaroth, instead of Israel drawing Phœnicia to Jehovah; comp. 2 Cor. vi. 14-18. A. built an altar and temple to Baal in Samaria, and "made a grove," i.e. a sacred symbolical tree (ashterah), the symbol of Ashtoreth (the idol to whom his wife's father was priest), the moon-goddess, female of Baal; else Venns, the Assyrian Ishtar (our "star"). Jehovah worship was scarcely tolerated; but the public mind seems to have been in a halting state of indecision between the two, Jehovah and Baal, excepting 7000 alone who resolutely rejected the idol; or they thought to form a compromise by uniting the worship of Baal with that of Jehovah. Comp. Hos. ii. 16, Amos v. 25-27, 1 Kings xviii., xix. Jezebel cut off Jehovah's prophets, except 100 saved by Obadiah. So prevalent was idolatry that Baal had 450 prophets, and Ashterah ("the groves") had 400, whom Jezebel entertained at her own table. God chastised Israel with drought and famine, in answer to Elijah's prayer which he offered in jealousy for the honour of God, and in desire for the repentance of his people (1 Kings xvii.; Jas. v. 17, 18). When softened by the visitation, the people were ripe for the issue to which Elijah put the conflicting claims of Jehovah and Baal at Carmel, and on the fire from heaven consuming the prophet's sacrifice, fell on their faces and exclaimed with one voice, "Jehovah, He is the God; Jehovah, He is the God." Baal's prophets were slain at the brook Kishon, and the national judgment, through Elijah's prayers, was withdrawn, upon the nation's repentance. A. reported all to Jezebel, and she threatened immediate death to Elijah. A. was pre-eminent for luxurious tastes; his elaborately ornamented ivory palace (1 Kings xxii. 39, Amos iii. 15), the many cities he built or restored, as Jericho (then belonging to Israel, not Judah) in defiance of Joshua's curse (1 Kings xvi. 34), his palace and park at Jezreel (now Zerin), in the plain of Esdraelon, his beautiful residence whilst Samaria was the capital, all show his magnificence. But much would have more, and his coveting Naboth's vineyard to add to his gardens led to an awful display of Jezebel's unscrupulous wickedness and his selfish weakness. "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel? . . . I will give thee the vineyard." By false witness suborned at her direction, Naboth and his sons (after he had refused to sell his inheritance to A., Lev. xxv. 23) were stoned; and A. at Jezebel's bidding went down to take possession (1 Kings xxi., 2 Kings ix. 26). This was the turning point whereat his doom was sealed. Elijah with awful majesty denounces his sentence, "in the place where dogs licked Naboth's blood, shall dogs lick thine" (fulfilled to the letter on Joram his offspring, 2 Kings ix., primarily also on Ahab himself, but not "in the place" where Naboth's blood was shed); whilst the king abjectly cowers before him with the cry, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" All his male posterity were to be cut off, as Jeroboam's and Baasha's, the two previous dynasties, successively had been [see ELIJAH]. Execution was stayed owing to A.'s partial and temporary repentance; for he seems to have been capable of serious impressions at times (1 Kings xv. 43); so exceedingly gracious is God at the first dawning of sorrow for sin.

A. fought three campaigns against Benhadad II., king of Damascus. The arrogance of the Syrian king, who besieged Samaria, not content with the claim to A.'s silver, gold, wives, and children being conceded, but also threatening to send his servants to search the Israelite houses for every pleasant thing, brought on him God's wrath. A prophet told A. that Jehovah should deliver to him by the young men of the princes of the provinces (comp. 1 Cor. i. 27-29) the Syrian multitude of which Benhadad vaunted, "The gods do so to me and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me" (1 Kings xx.). "Drinking himself drunk" with his 32 vassal princes, he and his force were utterly routed. Comp. for the spiritual application 1 Thess. v. 2-8. Again Benhadad, according to the prevalent idea of local gods, thinking Jehovah a god of the hills (His temple being on mount Zion and Samaria being on a hill) and not of the plains, ventured a battle on the plains at Aphek, E. of Jordan, with an army equal to his previous one. He was defeated and taken prisoner, but released, on condition of restoring to A. all the cities of Israel which he held, and making streets for A. in Damascus, as his father had made in Samaria (i.e. of assigning an Israelite's quarter in Damascus, where their judges should have paramount authority, for the benefit of Israelites resident there for commerce and political objects). A prophet invested with the Divine commission ("in the word of the Lord": Hag. i. 13) requested his neighbour to smite him; refusing, he was slain by a lion. Another, at his request, smote and wounded him. By this symbolic act, and by a parable of his having suffered an enemy committed to him to escape, the prophet intimated that A.'s life should pay the forfeit of his having suffered to escape with life one appointed by God to destruction. This disobedience, like Saul's in the case of Annalek, owing to his preferring his own will to God's, coupled with his treacherous and covetous murder of Naboth, brought on him his doom in his third campaign against Benhadad three years subsequently. With Jehoshaphat, in spite of the prophet Micaiah's warning, and urged on by an evil spirit in the false prophets, he tried to recover Ramoth Gilead (1 Kings xxii.). Benhadad's chief aim was to slay A., probably from personal hostility owing to the gratuitousness of the attack. Conscience made A. a coward, and selfishness made him reckless of his professed friendship to Jehoshaphat. Comp. 2 Chron. xviii. 2: feasting and a display of hospitality often seduce the godly. So he disguised himself, and urged his friend to wear the royal robes. The same Benhadad whom duty to God ought to have led him to execute as a blasphemer, drunkard, and murderer, was in retribution made the instrument of his own destruction (1 Kings xx. 10, 16, 42). That false friendship which the godly king of Judah ought never to have formed (2 Chron. xix. 2, 1 Cor. xv. 33) would have cost him his life but for God's interposition (2 Chron. xviii. 31) "moving them to depart from him." A.'s treachery did not secure his escape, an arrow "at a venture" humanly speaking, but guided by God really, wounded him fatally; and the dogs licked up his blood, according to the Lord's word of which Joram's case in 2 Kings ix. 25 was a literal fulfilment (1 Kings xxi. 19), on the very spot, whilst his chariot and armour were being washed (1 Kings xxii. 38). The Assyrian Black Obelisk mentions "A. of Jezreel," his ordinary residence, and that he furnished the confederacy, including Benhadad, against Assyria 10,000 footmen and 2000 chariots, and that they were defeated. At first sight this seemingly contradicts Scripture, which makes Benhadad A.'s enemy. But an interval of peace of three years occurred between A.'s two Syrian wars (1 Kings xxii. 1). In it A. doubtless allied himself to Benhadad against the Assyrians. Fear of them was probably among his reasons for granting Benhadad easy terms when in his power (xx. 31). When the Assyrians came in the interval that followed, A. was confederate with Benhadad. Hence arose his exasperation at the terms granted to Benhadad, whereby he gained life and liberty, being violated in disregard of honour and gratitude (xxii. 3). The Mebete stone mentions Omri's son; "He also said, I will oppress Moab," confirming Scripture that it was not till after Ahab's death that Moab rebelled (2 Kings i. 1; iii. 4, 5). [See DIBON.]

2. A false prophet who deceived with flattering prophecies of an immediate return the Jews in Babylon, and was burnt to death by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxix. 21, 22). The names of him and Zedekiah, his fellow deceiver, were doomed to be a byword for a curse.

Aharah. 1 Chron. viii. 1.

Aharhel. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

Ahasai. (1 Chron. ix. 12 JANZERAH. Neh. xi. 13).

Ahasbai. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

Ahasuerus. 1. The Græecised form is Cyaxares; king of Media, conqueror of Nineveh; began to reign 634 B.C. Father of Darius the Mede = Astyages, last king of Media, 594 B.C. Tradition says Astyages' grandson was Cyrus, son of his daughter Mandane and a Persian noble, Cambyses, first king of Persia, 559 B.C. Cyrus having taken Babylon set over it, as viceroy with royal state, his grandfather Astyages, or (as chronology requires) Astyages' successor, i.e. Darius the Mede. 2. Cambyses, Cyrus' son, is the second A., 529 B.C. (Ezra iv. 6.) A Magian usurper, personating Smerdis, Cyrus' younger son, succeeded; = Artaxerxes (Ezra iv. 4-7). The Jews' enemies, in the third year of Cyrus (Dan. x. 12, 13; Ezra iv. 5), sought by "hired counsellors" to frustrate the building of the temple, and wrote against them to A. (Cambyses) and Artaxerxes (Pseudo-Smerdis) successively. A. reigned seven and a half years. Then the Magian Pseudo-Smerdis, Artaxerxes, usurped the throne for eight months. The Magi being overthrown, Darius Hystaspis succeeded, 521 B.C. (Ezra iv. 24.) 3. Darius Hystaspis' son was A., the third = Xerxes [see ESTHER], father of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezra vii. 1). The gap between chaps. vi. and vii. of Ezra is filled up with the book of Esther. The character of A. III. much resembles that of Xerxes.

CAPITAL FROM PALACE, AS DESCRIBED BY OF DARIUS, PERSÉPOLIS.

Greek historians. Proud, self-willed, impulsive, amorous, reckless of violating Persian proprieties, ready to sacrifice human life, though not wantonly cruel. As Xerxes scourged the sea and slew the engineers because his bridge over the Hellespont was swept away by the sea, so A. repudiated his queen Vashti because she did not violate female decorum and expose herself to the gaze of drunken revelers; and decreed the massacre of the whole Jewish people to please his favourite, Haman; and, to prevent the evil, allowed them in self defence to slay thousands of his other subjects. In the third year was held A.'s feast in Shushan (Esth. i. 3); so Xerxes in his third year held an assembly to prepare for invading Greece. In his seventh year A. replaced Vashti by marrying Esther (ii. 16), after gathering all the fair young virgins to Shushan; so Xerxes in his seventh year, on his defeat and return from Greece, consoled himself with the pleasures of the harem, and offered a reward for the inventor of a new pleasure (Herodotus ix. 108). The "tribute" which he "laid upon the land and upon the Isles of the sea" (Esth. x. 1) was probably to replenish his treasury, exhausted by the Grecian expedition. The name in the Persepolitan arrow-headed inscriptions is Ashershe. Xerxes is explained by Herodotus as meaning marital; the modern title shah comes from ksahya, "a king," which forms the latter part of the name; the former part is akin to shir, a lion. The Semitic Ahashverosh = Persian Khashayarshah, a common title of many Medo-Persian kings. Darius Hystaspis was the first Persian king who reigned "from India (which he first subdued) to Ethiopia" (Esth. i. 1); also the first who imposed a stated tribute on the provinces, voluntary presents having been customary before; also the first who admitted the seven princes to see the king's face; the seven conspirators who slew Pseudo-Smerdis having stipulated, before it was decided which of them was to have the crown, for special privileges, and this one in particular.

Ahava. A place (Ezra viii. 15); a river (ver. 21) where Ezra assembled the second band of returning captives, for prayer to God as he says "to seek of Him a right way for us, for our little ones, and for all our substance." The modern Hir, on the Euphrates, E. of Damascus; Ihi-dakira, "the spring of bitumen," was its name subsequently to Ezra's times. Perhaps the Joah of 2 Kings xvii. 21.

Ahaz (possessor). Son of Jotham; ascended the throne of Judah in his 20th year (2 Kings xvi. 2), a transcriber's error for 25th year; as read in the LXX., Syriac, and Arabic (2 Chron. xxviii. 1); for otherwise Hezekiah his son would be born when A. was 11 years old. Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah of Israel leagued against Judah, to put on the throne the son of Tabeal, probably a Syrian (Isa. vii. 6). Isaiah and Shear-jashub his son (whose name = the remnant shall return) was a pledge that, notwithstanding heavy calamity, the whole nation should not perish; together met A. by Jehovah's direction at the end of the conduit of the upper pool, and assured him that Rezin's and Pekah's evil counsel should not come to pass; nay, that within 65 years Ephraim (Israel) should cease to be a people.

It is an undesigned propriety in Isa. vii., and therefore a mark of truth, that the place of meeting was the pool; for there it was we know, from the independent history in Chronicles, that Hezekiah his son, subsequently in Sennacherib's invasion, with much people stopped the waters without the city to cut off the enemy's supply (2 Chron. xxxii. 3-5). The place was appropriate to Isaiah's message from God that their labours were unnecessary, for God would save the city; it was also suitable for addressing the king and the multitude gathered for the stopping of the waters there. Isaiah told A. to "ask a sign," i.e. a miraculous token from God that He would keep His promise of saving Jerusalem. A. hypocritically refused to "tempt the Lord" by asking one. What mock humility in one who scrupled not to use God's brazen altar to divine with, and had substituted for God's altar in God's worship the pattern, which pleased his aesthetic tastes, of the idol altar at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 11-15); perhaps the adoption of this pattern, an Assyrian one, was meant as a token of vassalage to Assyria, by adopting some of their religious usages and idolatries; indeed Tiglath Pileser expressly records in the Assyrian monuments that he held his court at Damascus, and there received submission and tribute of both Pekah of Samaria and A. of Judah. To ask a miraculous sign without warrant would be to tempt (i.e. put to the proof) God; but not to ask, when God offered a sign, was at once tempting and distrusting Him. A.'s true reason for declining was his resolve not to do God's will, but to negotiate with Assyria and persevere in idolatry (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8, 3, 4, 10). Thereupon God Himself gave the sign: "a virgin should bring forth Immanuel." [For the primary fulfilment in the birth of a child in Isaiah's time, see IMMANUEL.] The promise of His coming of the line of David guaranteed the perpetuity of David's seed, and the impossibility of the two invaders setting aside David's line of succession. A. is named Jeho-Ahaz (or Yahu-Khazi) in the Assyrian inscriptions.

Pekah slew 120,000 valiant men of Judah in one day, "because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers"; Zichri of Ephraim slew the king's son Maaseiah, and Azrikam the governor of his house, and Elkanah next to the king. Israel carried captive 200,000, and much spoil, to Samaria. But Oded the prophet constrained them to restore the captives fed, arrayed, and shod, and the feeble mounted upon asses, to their brethren at Jericho. Pekah took Elath, which Uzziah or Ahaziah had restored to Judah, a flourishing port on the Red Sea; "the Syrians" according to A. V. "came and dwelt in it": or, reading (2 Kings xvi. 6) Adomim for Aromim, "the Edomites"; who also came and smote Judah on the E., and carried away captives (2 Chron. xxviii. 17, 18), whilst the Philistines were invading the S. and W., the cities of the low hill country (shephelah), Bethshemesh, Ajalon, Gederoth, Shochu, Timnah, Gimzo. The feeble A., retributively "brought low," even as he had "made naked" (stripped of the true defence, Jehovah, Exod. xxxii. 25, by sin) Judah, sought deliverance by becoming Tiglath Pileser's vassal (1 Kings xvi. 7-10). The Assyrian king "distressed him, but strengthened him not." For A. had to present his master treasures out of the temple, his palace, and the houses of the princes. It is true the Assyrian slew Rezin, and carried captive the Syrians of Damascus to Kir; but their ruin did not prove A.'s safety, "the king of Assyria helped him not." Isaiah (vii. 17; viii. 1, 2) had warned him against this alliance by writing in a roll Maher-shalal-hashbaz, i.e., hasting to the spoil he hasteth to the prey. To impress this on A. as the coming result of Assyrian interference, he took with him two witnesses, Uriah the priest and Zechariah. Who Uriah was we learn from the independent history (2 Kings xvi. 15, 16), the ready tool of A.'s unlawful innovations in worship. Zechariah, the same history tells us (2 Kings xviii. 2), was father of Abi, A.'s wife, mother of Hezekiah. The coincidence between Isaiah's book and that of Kings in these names is little obvious and so undesigned that it forms a delicate mark of truth. Isaiah chose these two, as the king's bosom friends, to urge on A.'s attention the solemn communication he had to make. Distress, instead of turning A. to Him who smote them, the Lord of hosts (Isa. ix. 12, 13), only made him "trespass yet more," sacrificing to the gods of Damascus which had smitten him, that they might help him as he thought they had helped the Syrians; "but they were the ruin of him and of all Israel." A. cut in pieces God's vessels, and shut up the doors of the temple, and made altars in every corner of Jerusalem, and burnt incense on high places in every several city of Judah. He also "cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them, and took down the sea from off the brazen oxen and put it upon a pavement of stones," putting God off with inferior things and taking all the best for his own purposes, whether of idolatry or selfish luxury. The brazen oxen were preserved whole, not melted (comp. Jer. lii. 17-20). "The covert for the sabbath," i.e., a covered walk like a portico or standing place, to screen the royal worshippers in the temple, and the king's private entry, he removed into the temple, to please the king of Assyria, that none might go from the palace into the temple without the trouble of going round. A. seems to have practised necromancy (Isa. viii. 19) as well as making his son pass through the fire to Moloch (2 Kings xvi., xxiii. 11, 12; 2 Chron. xxviii.), and setting up altars on his roof to adore the heavenly hosts. He adopted the Babylonian sun dial (which he probably erected in the temple, perhaps in "the middle court," where Isaiah saw it and gave its shadow as a sign to Hezekiah), becoming acquainted with it through the Assyrians (2 Kings xx. 11, 4, 9). After reigning 16 years (740-724 B.C.) he died and was buried in the city of David, but was, because of his wickedness, "not brought into the sepulchres of the kings."

Ahaziah (whom Jehovah holds). 1. Son of Ahab and Jezebel; king of Israel; a worshipper of Jeroboam's calves, and of his mother's idols, Baal and Ashtoreth. After the Israelite defeat at Ramoth Gilead, Syria was master of the region E. of Jordan; so Moab (2 Kings i. iii. 5), heretofore tributary to Israel, refused the yearly tribute of 100,000 rams with their wool, and 100,000 lambs (2 Sam. viii. 2, 1sa. xvi. 1, 2 Kings iii. 4). A. was prevented by a fall through a lattice in his palace at Samaria from enforcing it; but Jehoram his brother subsequently attempted it. A. sent to Baalzebub (lord of flies), god of Ekron, to inquire, should he recover? Elijah, by direction of the angel of the Lord, met the messengers, and reproving their having repaired to the idol of Ekron as if there were no God in Israel, announced that A. should die. The king sent a captain of 50 and his men to take Elijah. At Elijah's word they were consumed by fire. The same death consumed a second captain and his 50. The third was spared on his supplicating Elijah. Elijah then in person announced to the king what he had already declared to his messenger. So accordingly A. died. He was in alliance with Jehoshaphat in building ships at Ezion Geber to go to Tarshish; but the ships were wrecked, the Lord, as He intimated by Eliezer son of Dodavah of Mareshah, thereby manifesting disapproval of the alliance of the godly with A. "who did very wickedly." Jehoshaphat therefore, when he built a new fleet of merchant ships (as the phrase "ships of Tarshish" means; the other reading is "had ten ships"), in which undertaking A. wanted to share, declined further alliance; bitter experience taught him the danger of evil communications (1 Cor. xv. 33). Let parents and young people beware of affinity with the ungodly, however rich and great (2 Cor. vi. 14, etc.). 2. Nephew of the former. At first viceroy during his father's sickness, then king of Judah, son of Jehoram of Judah and Athaliah, Ahab's cruel daughter (2 Kings ix. 29, comp. viii. 25). Called Jehoahaz (2 Chron. xxi. 17-19). Azariah (meaning "whom Jehovah helps," substantially equivalent to A. = Jehoahaz by transposition, a name sadly at variance with his character), in 2 Chron. xxii. 6, may be a transcriber's error for A. In 2 Chron. xxii. 2, for 42 there should be, as in 2 Kings viii. 26, "twenty and two years old was A. when he began to reign," for his father Jehoram was only 40 when he died (2 Chron. xxi. 20). A. walked in all the idolatries of Ahab his maternal grandfather, his mother being his counsellor to do wickedly. He allied himself with Jehoram of Israel, brother of the former Abaziah (in spite of the warning God gave him in the fatal issue of the alliance of godly Jehoshaphat, his paternal grandfather, with wicked Ahab), against Hazael of Syria at Ramoth Gilead. Jehoram was wounded, and A. went to see him at Jezreel. There his destruction from God ensued by Jehu, who conspired against Joram. Akin to Ahab in character, as in blood, he might have overspread Judah with the same idolatry as Israel, but for God's intervention. Fleeing by the garden house, he was smitten in his chariot at the going up to Gur by Ibleam, and he fled to Megiddo and died there. God's people must separate from the world, lest they share the world's judgments (Rev. xviii. 4). In 2 Chron. xxii. 9 we read A. was hid in Samaria, brought to Jehu, and slain. The two accounts harmonize thus. A. fled first to the garden house (Bethgan), and escaped to Samaria where were his brethren; thence brought forth from his hiding place to Jehu, he was mortally wounded in his chariot at the hill Gur beside Ibleam, and reaching Megiddo died there. Jehu allowed A.'s attendants to bury him honourably in his sepulchre with his fathers in the city of David, "because, said they, he is the son [grandson] of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart." Otherwise "in Samaria" may mean "in the kingdom of Samaria," or 2 Chron. xxii. 9 may mean merely, he attempted to hide in Samaria, but did not reach it. The recurrence of the same names Joram and A. in both the dynasties of Israel and Judah is a delicate mark of truth, it being the natural result of the intermarriages.

Ahban. 1 Chron. ii. 29.

Aher. 1 Chron. vii. 12.

Ahi. 1. 1 Chron. v. 15. 2. 1 Chron. vii.

34. From Heb. ach, "a brother"; or contracted from AHIAH, or AHIAH.

Ahiam (or Saac, 1 Chron. xi. 35). 2 Sam. xxiii. 33.

Ahian. 1 Chron. vii. 17.

Ahiezer. 1. Hereditary prince captain of Dan under Moses (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66). 2. 1 Chron. xii. 3.

Ahihud. 1. Prince of Asher; assisted Joshua and Eleazar in dividing Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 27). 2. 1 Chron. viii. 7.

Ahijah. 1. Son of Ahitub, Iebadob's brother, son of Phinehas, Eli's son, the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18). The ark of God was in his charge, and with it and the ephod he used to consult Jehovah. In Saul's later years, probably after the slaughter of the priests at Nob, the ark was neglected as a means of consulting Jehovah. It lay in the house of Abinadab in Gibeah of Benjamin (2 Sam. vi. 3), probably the Benjaminite quarter of Kirjath-jearim, or Baale, on the borders of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 14, 28). Saul's irreverent haste of spirit appears in his breaking off in the midst of consulting God through A. with the ark and ephod, because he was impatient to encounter the Philistines whose approach he discerned by the tumult. Contrast David's implicit submission to Jehovah's guidance in encountering the same Philistines (2 Sam. v. 19-25, comp. 1sa. xxviii. 16 end). His rash adjuration binding the people not to eat all day, until he was avenged on the Philistines, involved the people in the sin of ravenously eating the cattle taken, with the blood, and Jonathan in that of unwittingly sinning by tasting honey, and so incurring the penalty of death. Saul ought to have had the conscientiousness which would have led him never to take such an oath, rather than the scrupulosity which condemned the people and Jonathan instead of himself. His projected night pursuit was consequently prevented; for the priest met his proposal, which was well received by the people, by suggesting that Jehovah should be consulted. No answer having been given, owing to Jonathan's sin of ignorance for which Saul was to blame, Saul's wish was defeated. As Ahijah is evidently = Ahimelech the son of Ahitub (unless he was his brother), this will account for a coldness springing up on Saul's part towards A. and his family, which culminated in the cruel slaughter of them at Nob on the ground of treasonous concert with David (1 Sam. xxi.). 2. 1 Chron. viii. 7. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 25. 4. 1 Chron. xi. 36. 5. 1 Chron. xxvi. 20. 6. A prophet of Shiloh. He met outside of Jerusalem in the way, and foretold to, Jeroboam, the transfer of ten tribes to him from Solomon, for Solomon's idolatries, by the symbolic action of rending the garment on him into twelve pieces, of which he gave ten to Jeroboam. Further he assured him from God of "a sure house, such as He had built for David," if only Jeroboam would "walk in God's ways," as David did. Jeroboam fled from Solomon to Shishak, king of Egypt, where he stayed till Solomon died. The other prophecy of his (1 Kings xiv. 6-16) was given to Jeroboam's wife, who in disguise consulted him as to her son Ahijah's recovery. Though blind with age he detected her, and announced that as Jeroboam had utterly failed in the one condition of continuance in the kingdom rent from David's house, which his former prophecy had laid down, viz., to keep God's commandments heartily as David did, Jeroboam's house should be taken away "as dung"; but that in reward for the good there was found in Ahijah towards God, he alone should have an honourable burial (comp. 1sa. lvi. 1, 2), but that "Jehovah would smite Israel as a reed shaken in the water, and root up and scatter Israel beyond the river," Euphrates. Reference to his prophecy as one of the records of Solomon's reign is made in 2 Chron. ix. 29. Probably it was he through whom the Lord encouraged Solomon in building the temple (1 Kings vi. 11).

Ahikam. Son of Shaphan the scribe, sent by Josiah to Huldah the prophetess (2 Kings xxii. 12). In Jehoia-kim's subsequent reign A. successfully pleaded for Jeremiah before the princes and elders, that he should not be given to the people to be put to death for his fearless warnings (Jer. xxvi. 16-24). God rewarded A. by the honour put upon Gedaliah, his son, by Nebuchadnezzar's making him governor over the cities of Judah, and committing Jeremiah to him, when the Babylonians took Jerusalem (Jer. xl. 5, xxxix. 14).

Ahilud. 2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 3; 1 Chron. xxviii. 15.

Ahimaaaz = brother of anger, i.e. choleric. 1. 1 Sam. xiv. 50. 2. Zadok the priest's son; the messenger in Absalom's rebellion, with Jonathan, Abiathar's son, to carry tidings from Hushai, David's friend and spy. Zadok and Abiathar, who took back the ark to the city at David's request, were to tell them whilst staying outside the city at Enrogel whatever Hushai directed. They told David the counsel of Ahithophel for an immediate attack, which David should battle by crossing Jordan at once. They narrowly escaped Absalom's servants at Bahurim, the woman of the house hiding them in a well's mouth, over which she spread a covering with ground corn on it, and telling the servants what was true in word, though misleading them: "they be gone over the brook of water." Bahurim, the scene of Shimei's cursing of David, was thus made the scene of David's preservation by God, who heard his prayer (1 Sam. xvi. 12, Ps. cix. 25). David's estimate of A. appears in his remark on his approach after the battle (2 Sam. xviii. 27): "he is a good man, and cometh with good tidings." Though Cushai was later in arriving he announced the fate of Absalom, which A. with courtierlike equivocation evaded announcing, lest he should alloy his good news with what would be so distressing to David. Joab, knowing David's fondness for Absalom, had not wished A. to go at all on that day, but youths will hardly believe their elders wiser than themselves. Good running was a quality much valued in those days, and A. was famous for it. The battle was fought on the mount of Ephraim W. of Jordan, and A. ran by the plain of the Jordan to David at Mahanaim. Comp. as to Asahel 2 Sam. ii. 18; Eljah, 1 Kings xvi. 46. Comp. as to runners before kings 2 Sam. xv. 1, 1 Kings i. 5; as to courier posts, 2 Chron. xxx. 6, 10, EASTON POST.

Esth. iii. 13, 15, viii. 14. Comparing 1 Kings iv. 2 with 1 Chron. vi. 10, some infer that A. died before he attained the priesthood, and before his father Zadok, who was succeeded by A.'s son, Azariah. [See ABATHAR.] 3. 1 Kings v. 7, 15.

Ahiman = my brother, who? i.e. who is my equal? 1. He, Sheshai, and Tamai were the three giant Anakim brothers seen by Caleb and the spies in mount Hebron (Num. xiii. 22, 33). The three were slain by the tribe of Judah, and the whole race was cut off by Joshua (xi. 21; Jud. i. 10). 2. 1 Chr. ix. 17.

Ahimelech. 1. [See ABATHAR, ABIAH.] 2. The Hittite who, with Abishai, was asked by David: "Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp?" He lost a precious opportunity of serving the king (1 Sam. xvi. 6).

Ahimoth. 1 Chron. vi. 25. For A. stands Mahath in ver. 35, as in Luke iii. 26.

Ahinadab. 1 Kings iv. 14.

Ahinoam = brother of grace, i.e. graceful. O: Jezreel. David's wife; along with Abigail, accompanied him to Achish's court (1 Sam. xxv. 43, xxvii. 3). Taken by the Amalekites at Ziklag, but rescued by David (1 Sam. xxx.). With him when king in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2). Mother of Amnon. Beauty was David's snare; the children consequently had more of outward than inward grace.

Ahio. 1. Son of Abinadab. Whilst Uzzah walked at the side of the ark, A. went before it, guiding the oxen which drew the cart, after having brought it from his father's house at Gibeah (the Benjamite quarter of Kirjath-jearim) (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; 1 Chron. xiii. 7). 2. 1 Chron. viii. 14. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 31, ix. 37.

Ahira. Prince captain of Naphtali the year after the exodus: Num. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27.

Ahiram. Num. xxvii. 38. Called Ehi Gen. xvi. 21.

Ahisamach. Exod. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 34.

Ahisahar. 1 Chron. vii. 10.

Ahishar. 1 Kings iv. 6.

Ahithophel. [See ABSALOM.] Of Gilead, in the hill country of Judah. David's counsellor, to whose treachery he touchingly alludes Ps. xli. 9, iv. 12-14, 20, 21. His name means brother of foolishness, but his oracular wisdom was proverbial. David's prayer "turned his counsel" indeed into what his name indicated, "foolishness" (2 Sam. xv. 31; Job v. 12, 13; 1 Cor. i. 20). A. was the main-spring of the rebellion. Absalom calculated on his adhesion from the first (2 Sam. xv. 12); the history does not directly say why, but incidentally it comes out: he was father of Eliam (or by transposition Ammiel, 1 Chron. iii. 5), the father of Bathsheba (2 Sam. xi. 3, xxiii. 34, 39). Uriah the Hittite and Eliam, being both of the king's guard (consisting of 37 officers), were intimate, and Uriah married the daughter of his brother officer. How natural A.'s sense of wrong towards David, the murderer of his grandson by marriage and the corrupter of his granddaughter! The evident undesignedness of this coincidence confirms the veracity of the history. The people's loyalty too was naturally shaken towards one whose moral character they had ceased to respect. A.'s proposal himself to pursue David that night with 12,000 men, and smite the king only, indicates the same personal hostility to David, deep sagacity and boldness. He failed from no want of shrewdness on his part, but from the folly of Absalom. His awful end shows that worldly wisdom apart from faith in God turns into suicidal madness (Isa. xxix. 14). He was the type of Judas in his treachery and in his end. [See JUDAS.]

Ahitub. 1. [See AHIMELECH or ABIAH, whose father he was.] 2. Amariah's son, and Zadok the high-priest's father, or rather grandfather (1 Chron. vi. 7, 8; 2 Sam. viii. 17).

Called "ruler of the house of God," i.e. highpriest, 1 Chron. ix. 11. In Neh. xi. 11 A. appears as grandfather of Zadok and father of Meraioth, of the house of Eleazar. Thus there would seem to have been in the same age A. of the house of Eli, sprung from Ithamar, and also A. of the house of Eleazar. 3. The mention of a third A., son of another Amariah, and father of another Zadok (1 Chron. vi. 11, 12), may be a copyist's error.

Ahlab. A city of Asher, whence the Canaanites were not driven out (Jud. i. 31). More recently Gush Chaleb, or Giscala, whence came John, son of Levi, leader in the siege of Jerusalem; said to be the birth-place of Paul's parents. Now El-jish, near Safed, in the hills N.W. of the lake of Tiberias.

Ahlai. 1. 1 Chron. xi. 41. 2. Shebsan's daughter given to the Egyptian servant Jarha in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 31-35).

Ahoah (1 Chron. viii. 4). Hence the patronymic "the Ah-hite" (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 28; 1 Chron. xi. 12, 29, xxvii. 4).

Aholah = her own tent; i.e., she (Samaria, or the northern kingdom of Israel) has a tabernacle of her own; viz., Jeroboam's golden calves of Dan and Bethel; "will worship" (Col. ii. 23). See Ezek. xxiii. Aholibah (Aholah's sister). "My (Jehovah's) tent is in her," Judah: so far superior to Aholah that her worship was not self devised but God appointed. Comp. Ps. lxxviii. 67-69; 1 Kings xii. 25-33; 1 Chron. xi. 13-16. But both were false to Jehovah their true husband (Isa. liv. 5). Aholah (Samaria) gave her heart to the Assyrians, trusting in their power, and imitating their splendid luxury, and following their idols. Now God's just principle is, when the church corrupts herself with the world, the instrument of her sin is the instrument of her punishment. The Assyrians on whom she had leaned carried her away captive to Assyria, whence she has never returned (2 Kings xv. 18-20, xvii.). Aholibah (Judah) was worse, in that her privileges were greater, and she ought to have been warned by the awful fate of Samaria. But she gave herself up to be corrupted by the Babylonians; and again the instrument of her sin was also the instrument of her punishment (Jer. ii. 19; Prov. i. 31).

Aholiab. Of Dan; with Bezaleel, inspired with artistic skill to construct the tabernacle (Exod. xxxv. 34).

Aholibamah. One of Esau's three wives. Daughter of ANAH, or BEERI [see both], a descendant of Seir the Horite. Through her Esau's descendants the Edomites became occupants of mount Seir. Each of her three sons, Jeshu, Jadam, Korah, became head of a tribe. Her personal name was Judith (Gen. xxvi. 34). A. was her married name, taken from the district in the heights of Edom, near mount Her and Petra; A. is therefore the name given her in the genealogical table of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 18, 25, 41, 43; the names here are of places, not persons; 1 Chron. i. 52). Each of Esau's wives has a name in the genealogy different from that in the history.

Ahumai. 1 Chron. iv. 2.

Ahuzzath. "Friend" (oriental kings have usually such favoured) of the Philistine king Abimelech in his interview with Isaac (Gen. xvi. 26). Jerome and the Chaldee Targum explain "a company of friends." The ending -ath appears in other Philistine names, Gath, Goliath, Timnath.

Ai = heap of ruins. 1. Hai, i.e. the ai (Gen. xii. 8); a royal city (Josh. vii. 2; viii. 9, 23, 29; x. 1, 2; xii. 9); E. of Bethel, "beside Bethaven." The second Canaanite city taken by Israel and "utterly destroyed." The name AIATH still belonged to the locality when Sennacherib marched against Jerusalem (Isa. x. 28). "Men of Bethel and Ai," (223 according to Ezra ii. 28, but 123 according to Neh. vii. 32.) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Ezra's list was made in Babylon; Nehemiah's in Judea long after. Death and change of purpose would make many in Ezra's list of intending returners not appear in Nehemiah's list of those actually arriving. Aija is mentioned among the towns re-occupied by the Benjamites (Neh. xi. 31). Perhaps the site is at the head of Wady Harith. [See BETHEL.] There is a hilltop E. of the church remains on the hill adjoining and E. of Bethel (Beitin); its Arab name, et Tel, means "the heap," and it doubtless is the site of A., or Hai (on the east of Abraham's encampment and altar, Gen. xii. 8). In the valley behind Joshua placed his ambush. Across the intervening valley is the spot where Joshua stood when giving the preconcerted signal. The plain or ridge can be seen down which the men of A. rushed after the retreating Israelites, so that the men in ambush rose and captured the city behind the pursuers, and made it "a heap" or tel for ever. 2. A city of Ammon, near Heshbon (Jer. xlix. 3).

Aiah, AJAH. 1. Gen. xxxvi. 24. 2. 2 Sam. iii. 7.

Aijalon, or AJALON, a place of gazelles (Josh. xix. 42, xxi. 24). 1. Originally of Dan: which tribe, however, could not dispossess the Amorites (Jud. i. 35). Assigned to the Levite Kohathites, among the 48 Levitical cities (1 Chron. vi. 69). Fortified by Rehoboam of Judah, in his war with Israel, the northern kingdom, though sometimes, as being a border city, mentioned as in Ephraim (2 Chron. xi. 10, xxviii. 18). Taken by the Philistines from the weak Ahaz (1 Chron. vi. 66, 69). Now Yalo, N. of the Jaffa road, 14 miles from Jerusalem, on the hill side, bounding on the S. the valley Maj-jon-Oueir. Alluded to in the memorable apostrophe of Joshua, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Aijalon" (Josh. x. 12). 2. The burial place of the judge (Jud. xii. 12) Elon in Zebulun.

Ajeleth Shahar. Heb. ayyeleth hasshachar, "the hind of the morning dawn" (title of Ps. xxii.). Aben Ezra explains as the name of the melody to which the psalm was to be sung, equivalent to the rising sun, some well known tune. Rather, allegorical allusion to the subject. The hind symbolises a lovely and innocent one hounded to death, as the bulls, lions, dogs in the psalm are the persecutors. The unusual Heb., ver. 19, ajulathi, "my strength," alludes to ajeleth, "the hind," weak in itself but having Jehovah for its strength. The morning dawn represents joy bursting forth after affliction; Messiah is alluded to, His deep sorrow (ver. 1-21) passes to triumphant joy (ver. 21-31).

Ain = eye. 1. Fountain, spring, which flashes in the landscape like a gleaming eye.

Distinguished from beer, a dug well (Exod. xv. 27), "wells," rather springs. Generally in compositions En-gadi, "fountain of kids," En-dor, "fountain of the house," etc. Plural in John iii. 23, Enon; like the Yorkshire Fountains Abbey. Riblah, E. of A. (Heb. the spring), marks the eastern boundary of Palestine (Num. xxxiv. 11). Riblah is identified as on the N.E. side of the Hermon mountains; and A. answers to Ain el' Azy (nine miles from Riblah, on the N.E. side), the source of the Orontes. 2. A southern city of Judah, afterwards of Simeon, then assigned to the priests (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7, xxi. 16).

Akan, or JAKAN. Gen. xxxvi. 27, 1 Chron. i. 42.

Akkub. 1. 1 Chron. iii. 24. 2. 1 Chron. ix. 17. 3. Ezra ii. 45. 4. Neh. viii. 7.

Akrabbim; also, the going up to, or ascent of, A. MAALEH-AKRABIM = the scorpion pass, between the S. of the Dead Sea and Zan: Judah's and Palestine's boundary on the S. (Num. xxiv. 4, Josh. xv. 3). The boundary of the Amorites (Jud. i. 36). The scene of Judas Maccabeus' victory over Edom. Perhaps now the pass Es-Sufah, the last step from the desert to the level of Palestine. Wilton makes it Sufah.

Alabaster. Not our gypsum, but the oriental alabaster, translucent, with red, yellow, and grey streaks due to admixture of oxides of iron with a fibrous carbonate of lime. A calcareous marble like spar, wrought into boxes or vessels, to keep precious ointments from spoiling (Pliny H. N., xiii. 3). Mark xiv. 3: "brake the box," i.e., brake the seal on the mouth of it, put there to prevent evaporation of the odour (Luke vii. 37).

Alameth. 1. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 36. Son of Jehoadah, who is called Jarah in 1 Chron. ix. 42.

Alammelech = king's oak; a place in Asher's territory (Josh. xix. 26).

Alamoth (Ps. xli.) Title, 1 Chron. xv. 20; i.e., after the virgin manner; a soprano key in music, like the voice of virgins. Others interpret it an instrument played on by virgins, like our old English virginal.

Alemeth, or Almon. A priests' city in Benjamin (1 Chron. vi. 60, Josh. xxi. 18). Now Almit, a mile N.E. of Anata, the ancient Anathoth.

Alexander. 1. THE GREAT. Born at Pella, 356 B.C., son of Philip, king of Macedon; not named, but described prophetically: "an he-goat [symbol of agility, the Græco-Macedonian empire] coming from the W. on the face of the whole earth and not touching the ground [implying the incredible swiftness of his conquests]; and the goat had a NOTABLE HORN [A.] between his eyes, and he came to the ram that had two horns [Media and Persia, the second great world kingdom, the successor of Babylon; under both Daniel prophesied long before the rise of the Macedon-Greek kingdom] standing before the river [at the river Granicus A. gained his first victory over Darius Codomannus, 334 B.C.] and ran unto him in the fury of his power, moved with choler against him [on account of the Persian invasions of Greece and cruelties to the Greeks], and smote the ram and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him; but he cast him down to the ground and stamped upon him, and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand: therefore the he-goat waxed very great, and when he was strong the great horn was broken, and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven" (Dan. viii. 5-8). The "he-goat" answers to the "leopard" (vii. 6) whose "wings" similarly marked the winged rapidity of the Greek conquest of Persia. In 331 B.C. A. finally defeated Darius, and in 330 burned Persepolis, the Persian capital. None, not even the millions composing the Persian hosts, could deliver the ram, Persia, out of his hand. But "when he was strong, the great horn [A.] was broken." The Græco-Macedonian empire was in full strength at A.'s death by fever, the result of drunken excesses, at Babylon. At the time it seemed least likely to fall it was "broken." A.'s natural brother, Philip Arrideus, and his two sons Alexander Aegus and Hercules, in 15 months were murdered; "and for it [the he-goat] came up four notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven": Seleucus in the E. obtained Syria, Babylonia, Medo-Persia; Cassander in the W. Macedon, Thessaly, Greece; Ptolemy in the S. Egypt, Cyprus, etc.; Lysimachus in the N. Thrace, Cappadocia, and the northern regions of Asia Minor. The "leopard" is smaller than the "lion" (Dan. vii. 4, 6); swift (Hab. i. 8), cruel (Isa. xi.

ALABASTER VASES.

6), springing suddenly on its prey (Hos. xiii. 7). So A., king of a small kingdom, overcame Darius at the head of an empire extending from the Ægean sea to the Indies, and in 12 years attained the rule from the Adriatic to the Ganges. Hence the leopard has four wings, whereas the lion (Babylon) had but two. The "spots" imply the variety of nations incorporated, perhaps also the variability of A.'s own character, by turns mild and cruel, temperate and drunken and licentious. "Dominion was given to it" by God, not by A.'s own might; for how unlikely it was that 30,000 men should overthrow hundreds of thousands. Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, § 5) says that A., meeting the highpriest Jaddua (Neh. xii. 11, 22) said that at Dion in Macedonia he had a Divine vision so habited, inviting him to Asia and promising him success. Jaddua met him at Gupha (Mizpeh) at the head of a procession of priests and citizens in white. A., at the sight of the linen arrayed priests, and the highpriest in blue and gold with the mitre and gold plate on his head bearing Jehovah's name, adored it, and embraced him; and having been shown Daniel's prophecies concerning him, he sacrificed to God in the court of the temple, and granted the Jews liberty to live according to their own laws, and freedom from tribute in the sabbatical years. The story is doubted, from its not being alluded to in secular histories: Arrian, Plutarch, Diodorus, Curtius. But their silence may be accounted for, as they notoriously despised the Jews. The main fact is strongly probable. It accords with A.'s character of believing himself divinely chosen for the great mission of Greece to the civilized world, to join the east and west in a union of equality, with Babylon as the capital. "Many kings of the East met him wearing (linen) fillets" (Justin). Jews were in his army. Jews were a strong element in the population of that city which he founded and which still bears his name, Alexandria. The remission of tribute every sabbatical year existed in later times, and the story best explains the privilege. When Aristotle urged him to treat the Greeks as freemen and the orientals as slaves, he declared that "his mission from God was to be the fitter together and reconciler of the whole world in its several parts." Arrian says: "A. was like no other man, and could not have been given to the world without the special interposition of God." He was the providential instrument of breaking down the barrier wall between kingdom and kingdom, of bringing the contemplative east and the energetic west into mutually beneficial contact. The Greek language, that most perfect medium of human thought, became widely diffused, so that a Greek version of the O. T. was needed and made (the Septuagint) for the Greek speaking Jews at Alexandria and elsewhere in a succeeding generation; and the fittest lingual vehicle for imparting the N. T. to mankind soon came to be the language generally known by the cultivated of every land. Commerce followed the breaking down of national exclusiveness, and everywhere the Jews had their synagogues for prayer and reading of the O. T. in the leading cities, preparing the way and the place for the proclamation of the gospel, which rests on the O. T., to the Jews first, and then to the Gentiles.

2. Son of Simon of Cyrene (Mark xv. 21). He and his brother Rufus are spoken of as well known in the Christian church. 3. A kinsman of Annas the highpriest (Acts iv. 6); supposed the same as A. the alabarch (governor of the Jews) at Alexandria, brother of Philo-Judeus, an ancient friend of the emperor Claudius. 4. A Jew whom the Jews put forward during Demetrius' riot at Ephesus to plead their cause before the mob who suspected that the Jews were joined with the Christians in seeking to overthrow Diana's worship (Acts xix. 33). Calvin thought him a convert to Christianity from Judaism, whom the Jews would have sacrificed as a victim to the fury of the rabble. 5. The copper-smith at Ephesus who did Paul much evil. Paul had previously "delivered him to Satan" (the lord of all outside the church) (1 Cor. v. 5, 2 Cor. xii. 7), i.e. excommunicated, because he withstood the apostle, and made shipwreck of faith and of good conscience, and even blasphemed, with Hymeneus. The excommunication often brought with it temporal judgment, as sickness, to bring the excommunicated to repentance (1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. iv. 14, 15).

Alexandria. Founded by Alexander the Great, 332 B.C., successively the Greek, Roman, and Christian capital of Lower Egypt. Its harbours, formed by the island Pharos and the headland Lochias, were suitable alike for commerce and war. It was a chief corn port of Rome, and the corn vessels were large and handsome; usually sailing direct to Puteoli, but from severity of weather at times, as the vessel that carried Paul, sailing under the coast of Asia Minor (Acts xxvii.). At Myra in Lycia (ver. 5) the centurion found this Alexandrian ship bound for Italy; in ver. 10 Paul speaks of the "lading," without stating what it was; but in ver. 38 it comes out casually. The tackling had been thrown out long before, but the cargo was kept till it could be kept no longer, and then first we learn it was wheat, the very freight which an lation of A. had three prominent elements, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians. The Jews enjoyed equal privileges with the Macedonians, so that they became fixed there, and whilst regarding Jerusalem as "the holy city," the metropolis of the Jews throughout the world, and having a synagogue there (Acts vi. 9), they had their own Gr. version of the O. T., the Septuagint, and their own temple at Leontopolis. At A. the Hebrew Divine O. T. revelation was brought into contact with Grecian philosophy. Philo's doctrine of the word prepared men for receiving the teaching of John i. as to the Word, the Son of God, distinct in one sense yet one with God; and his allegorising prepared the way for appreciating similar teachings in the inspired writings (e.g. Gal. iv. 22-31, Heb. vii.). Hence Apollo, born at A., eloquent and mighty in the Scriptures, being instructed in the way of the Lord and fervent in the spirit, taught diligently (Gr. accurately) the things of the Lord, though he knew only the baptism of John (Acts xviii. 25); i.e., his Alexandrine education would familiarise him with Philo's idea of the word as the mediating instrument of creation and providence; and John the Baptist's inspired announcement of the personal Messiah would enable him to "teach accurately the things of the Lord" up to that point, when Aquila's and Priscilla's teaching more perfectly informed him of the whole accomplished Christian way of salvation. Mark is said to have been the first who preached and founded a Christian church in A. Various forms of Gnostic and Arian error subsequently arose there. [See ALLEGORY.]

Algum (2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10, 11) (ALMUG 1 Kings x. 11). From the Arabic article al and mica, "red sandalwood," or Sanskrit raghu, in the Deccan raghum, "sandalwood." Brought from Ophir, and from Lebanon. Used for pillars and stairs in the Lord's house and the king's house, and for harps and psalteries. The cedars and firs came from Lebanon, but the albug trees from Ophir, an Arabian mart on the Red Sea, for eastern produce intended for Tyre and the W. The albugums would come with the firs and cedars cut from Lebanon, and so all would be described collectively as "from Lebanon." The red sandalwood of China and India still used for making costly utensils. Else, the common sandalwood (Santalum album of Malabar const.), outside white and without odour, but within and near the root fragrant, fine grained, and employed still for fancy boxes and cabinets, and used as incense by the Chinese.

Allegory. Once in Scripture (Gal. iv. 24): "which things [the history of Hagar and Sarah, Ishmael and Isaac] are an allegory;" (are, when allegorised, etc.) not that the history is unreal as to the literal meaning, (such as is the Song of Solomon, a continued allegory); but, besides the literal historical fact, these events have another and a spiritual significance, the historical truths are

CORN SHIP OF ALEXANDRIA.

Alexandrian vessel usually (as we know from secular authors) carried to Rome: an undesigned propriety, and so a mark of truth. The popu-types of the antitypical truths; the child of the promise, Isaac, is type of the gospel child of God who is free to love and serve his Father in Christ; the child of the bondwoman, Ishmael, is type of those legalists who, seeking justification by the law, are ever in the spirit of bondage. Origen at Alexandria introduced a faulty system of interpreting Scripture by allegorising, for which this passage gives no warrant. In an allegory there is (1) an immediate sense, which the words contain; and (2) the main and ulterior sense, which respects the things shadowed forth. In pure allegory the chief object aimed at is never directly expressed.

Alleluia = Praise ye Jehovah. Never found in the psalms of David and his singers, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun; but in later psalms, viz. those of the captivity and the return, the Fifth Book. So "Selah" is restricted to his and their psalms. Used in the temple liturgy; at the beginning, close, or both, of Ps. cvi., cxi., cxiii., cxvii., cxxxv. So in the heavenly perfect liturgy (Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6), the triumphant shout of the great multitude, the 24 elders, and four living creatures at the judgment on the whore. The Hebrew form may imply the special interest of the Jews in the destruction of antichrist (Ps. cxlix. 8, 9). Psalms cxiii.-cxviii. were called by the Jews the Hallel: sung on the first of the month, at the Feast of Dedication, that of Tabernacles, that of Weeks, and that of Passover. They sang cxiii. and cxiv. before the supper (according to Hillel's school, or only cxiii. according to Shammai's school), the rest after the last cup. This was the hymn sung by Christ and His disciples (Matt. xxvi. 30). As the full choir of Levites in the temple service took up the Alleluia, so in heaven the multitude in mighty chorus respond Alleluia to the voice from the throne, "Praise our God, all ye His servants," etc. (Rev. xxi. 1-6).

Alliances. Framed by dividing a victim into two parts, between which the contracting parties passed, praying the similar cutting up of him who should violate the treaty (Gen. xv. 10, Jer. xxxiv. 18-20). Hence the Heb. and Gr. for to make a treaty is "to cut" it. Forbidden with the doomed Canaanites (Deut. vii. 2, Jud. ii. 2). But peaceable relations with other nations, as distinguished from copying their idolatries, were encouraged (Deut. ii. 25, xv. 6; Gen. xxvii. 29). Solomon's alliance with Tyre for building the temple and other purposes was altogether right (1 Kings v. 2-12, ix. 27); and Tyre is subsequently reproved for not remembering the brotherly covenant (Amos i. 9). But alliances by marriage with idolaters are reprobated as incentives to latitudinarianism first and at last to conformity with heathenism (Deut. vii. 3-6). Solomon's alliance with Pharaoh by marriage was the precursor of importing horses contrary to the law, leaning too much on human forces, and of contracting alliances with Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite, Si-douian, and Hittite wives, who seduced him from God. Hence the care to guard against the same evil, at the return from Babylon (Ezra ix. x.; Neh. xiii.; Mal. ii. 11-17). When heathens renounced idolatry for Israel's God, Israelites might lawfully wed them, as Rahab, Ruth, Zipporah. Shishak's invasion of Rehoboam's kingdom was probably due to Shishak's alliance with Jeroboam of Israel (2 Chron. xii., 1 Kings xiv. 25, etc.). Ahab's appeal to Tiglath Pileser for help against Pekah of Israel and Reziu of Syria opened the way to Assyrian and Babylonian predominance (2 Kings xvi.). Aha's alliance with Benhadad against Baasha was the turning point from good to evil in his life (2 Chron. xiv. 15, 16; 1 Kings xv. 16, etc.). Jehoshaphat's alliance with ungodly Ahab and Ahaziah his son was the only blot on his character, and involved him in loss and reproof from God (2 Chron. xviii., xix. 2, xx. 35-37). Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram's marriage with Ahab's daughter, Athaliah, was fatal to him and to Ahaziah and his other sons except Josiah (chap. xxi., xxii.). Hoshea's alliance with Soor Sabacho of Egypt was his encouragement to rebel against Assyria, and brought on him the overthrow of Israel by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii. 4). Hezekiah was tempted to lean on Egypt against the Assyrian Sennacherib (Isa. xxx. 2), and Tirhakah of Ethiopia did make a diversion in his favour (2 Kings xix. 9). Josiah on the other hand was Assyria's ally against Pharaoh Necho of Egypt, and fell a victim to meddling in the world's quarrels (2 Chron. xxxv. 20-25). Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, leant on Egypt, and Pharaoh Hophra raised the siege of Jerusalem for a time; but Nebuchadnezzar returned and took it (Jer. xxxvii. 1-5, xxxix.).

A "covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19, 2 Chron. xiii. 5) expresses one indissoluble and incorruptible, as salt was sprinkled on the victim, implying incorruption and sincerity (Lev. ii. 13). A pillar was sometimes set up (Gen. xxxi. 45-52). Presents were sent by the seeker of the alliance (1 Kings xv. 18, Isa. xxv. 6). Violation of it brought down Divine wrath, even when made with a heathen (Josh. ix. 18, 2 Sam. xxi., Ezek. xvii. 16).

Allon = oak. 1. Or Elon, a city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33); others translate "the oak by Zaanaim" or "the oak of the loading of tents" (comp. Jud. iv. 11), "the plain of Zaanaim [the swamp, Ewald] by Kodesh." 2. ALLON BACHUTH, "the oak of weeping," viz. for Deborah, Rebekah's nurse: corrupted into Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3; comp. Jud. iv. 5).

Almodad. First of Joktan's descendants (Gen. x. 26, 1 Chron. i. 20). His name is preserved in El-Mudad, famous in Arab history, reputed father of Ishmael's Arab wife, Mir-at-az-Zeman, and chief of Jurhum, a Joktanite tribe that passed from Yemen to the vicinity of Mekkeh. The Al is the Arabic article.

Almon-Diblathaim. One of the last stages of the Israelites, between Dibon-Gad (= Diuban, N. of the Arnon) and the Abarim range (Num. xxxiii. 46, 47); probably the same as Beth-Diblathaim of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 22), which Mesha mentions in the famous Moabite stone as "built" by him and colonized with Moabites.

Almond tree (Jer. i. 11, 12; Heb. "I see a rod of the wakeful tree [the emblem of wakefulness] . . . Thou hast well seen: for I will be wakeful [Heb. for "hasten"] as to My word.") It first wakes out of the wintry sleep and buds in January. In Eccles. xii. 5, instead of "the almond tree shall flourish," Gesenius translates "the old man) loathes (through want of appetite) even the (sweet) almond;" for the blossom is pink, not white, the colour of the old man's hair. But as the Heb. means "bud" or "blossom" in Song of Sol. vi. 11 it probably means here "the wakefulness of old age sets in." Or the colour may not be the point, but the blossoms on the leafless branch, as the hoary locks flourish as a crown on the now arid body. Exod. xxv. 33, 34: in the tabernacle the candlesticks had "bowls made in the form of the almond flower" or "nut," most graceful in shape; perhaps the pointed nut within was the design for the cup, the sarcophagus containing the oil, and the flame shaped out of gold emitting the light from its apex. Luz, the original name of Bethel, was derived from one species of almond (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxx. 37), luz. It was almond, not hazel, rods wherewith Jacob secured the ringstraked and speckled offspring from the flocks. Jordan almonds were famed. The almonds growing on Aaron's rod, when laid up over night before the Lord, denote the ever wakeful priesthood which should continue till the Antitype should come; type also of the vigilance and fruitfulness which Christ's ministers should exhibit; also of the rod of Christ's strength which shall finally destroy every adversary (Num. xvii. 8; Ps. cx. 2, 5, 6).

Alms. From Gr. eleemosyne. Tho Heb. "righteousness" in O. T. and the Gr. in many MSS. of Matt. vi. 1, stands for ALMS. So Dan. iv. 27, "Break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor." The poor were entitled to leavings from the produce of the field, the vineyard, and the olive yard (Lev. xix. 9, 10, xxiii. 22; Deut. xv. 11, xxiv. 19, xxvi. 2-13), the third year's titling for the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, the widow. Comp. Job xxxi. 17, xxxiv. 16: "I was a father to the poor." Neh. viii. 10; Prov. x. 2, xi. 4; Esth. ix. 22; Ps. xli. 1, cxli. 9. Dorcas (Acts ix. 36). Cornelius (x. 2). God prefers such neighbourly love to fasting (Isa. lviii. 7). Thirteen receptacles for free offerings were in the women's court of the temple (Mark xii. 41-44). Begging was a practice only known after the captivity. In every city there were three collectors who distributed alms of two kinds: 1. Of money collected in the synagogue chest every sabbath for the poor of the city, "the alms of the chest." 2. Of food and money received in a dish, "alms of the dish." The Pharisees gave much alms, but with ostentation, figuratively blowing the trumpet before them (the figure being from the trumpet blowing in religious feasts): Matt. vi. 1, 2. The duty was recognised among Christians as a leading one (Luke xiv. 13, Rom. xv. 25-27, Gal. ii. 10). A laying by for alms in proportion to one's means on every Lord's day is recommended (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 4; Acts xi. 29, 30, xx. 35). Jesus and the twelve, out of their common purse, set the pattern (John xiii. 29). Not the costliness, but the love and self denial, and the proportion the gift bears to one's means, are what God prizes (Mark xii. 42-44). Such "come up as a memorial before God" (Acts ix. 36, x. 2, 4). The giving was not imposed as a matter of constraint, but of bounty, on Christians (Acts v. 4). The individual was not merged in the community, as in socialism; each freely gave, and distribution was made, not to the lazy who would not work, but to the needy (Acts ii. 45, 2 Thess. iii. 10). A neighbourly order is the very opposite of the Christian system. The Jewish tithe was not imposed, but the principle of proportionate giving having been laid down, the definite proportion is left to each one's faith and love to fix (2 Cor. ix. 5, 7). Love will hardly give less than legalism. An ecclesiastical order of winechord attended to charitable ministrations in the early church (1 Tim. v. 10). The deacons were appointed primarily for the distribution of alms (Acts vi.). Alms are "righteousness," not that they justify a man (which Rom. iii., iv., v. prove they do not), but they are the doing that which is right and which our neighbour has a rightful claim upon us for, in the court of God's equity, though not of human law. God gives us means for this very end (Eph. iv. 25).

Aloe. LIGN ALOE. Heb. ahalon, alahoth; Gr. agalloschus, from the native name ahil; "eagle-wood," imitating the sound. Not the common aloes, disagreeable in odour and taste. The more precious kind grows in Cochinchina and Siam, and is not exported, being worth its weight in gold. The perfume is from the oil thickening into resin within the trunk. The inferior kind, galeo, grows in the Moluccas, the Eccaropia apalbochi of Linnaeus. The best aloes wood is called calamitane, the produce of the Agave apallochum of Sillet in N. India. Used for perfuming garments (Ps. xlv. 8) and beds (Prov. vii. 17). An image for all that is lovely, fragrant, flourishing, and incorruptible (Num. xxiv.

6; S. of Sol. iv. 14). Used by Nicodemus, along with myrrh, 100 lbs. in all, to wrap amidst linen the sacred body of Jesus (John xix. 39).

Aloth. A district with Asher, under the ninth of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 16).

Alpha. Gr. (ΑΛΦΗ, "chief," "guide," Heb.) The first letter, as OMEGA is the last, of the Gr. alphabet. So Christ is the First and the Last, including all that comes between, the Author and Finisher of the visible and invisible, and of the spiritual creations (Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xii. 13; Heb. xii. 2; Isa. xli. 4, xlv. 6). As He made originally, so will He complete the whole. ALPHABET comes from the first two Gr. letters, Alpha, Beta=Heb. Aleph, Beth.

The Moabite stone of Dibon, probably of the reign of Ahaziah, Ahab's son, who died 896 B.C., exhibits an alphabet so complete that at that early date it can have been no recent invention. It has been discovered as mason's marks on the foundation stones of Solomon's temple. Yet even it was not the earliest form of the Palestinian alphabet. The fine discrimination of sounds, implied in inventing an alphabet, could hardly be brought to perfection at once. Rawlinson fixes the invention 15 centuries B.C. The language of the Dibon stone, and the Hebrew of the Bible, most closely agree. Mesha's victories are recorded there in the same character, and even the same idion, as in 2 Kings iii.

In symbols of the early Christian church A and Ω were often combined with the cross, or with Christ's monogram, e.g., on a tablet in the catacombs at Melos, of the early part of the second century. The rabbins (Jalkut Rubeni, fol. 17, 4, Schoettgen, Hor. Heb., i. 1086) say, "Adam transgressed the whole law from Aleph to Tau" (the last Heb. letter); so Christ fulfilled it from Alpha to Omega (Matt. iii. 15).

Alphæus. Father of James the Less, the apostle, and writer of the epistle, and "brother (i.e. cousin) of our Lord" (Matt. x. 3, Mark iii. 18, Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13); also of Josias (Mark xv. 40). Husband of the Mary who with Jesus' mother stood at the cross (John xix. 25). The same as Cleopas (as it should be written, not Clephas), both names being Gr. variations of Heb. Chalpai, or Ilhalpai. Possibly the Cleopas of Luke xxiv. 18. If the translation Luke vi. 16 be correct, "Jude, brother of James," A. was his father also. In Mark ii. 14 Levi (Matthew) is called the son of Alphæus. Whether he be the same is not certain; probably not.

Altar. The first of which we have mention was built by Noah after leaving the ark (Gen. viii. 20). The English (from the Latin) means an elevation or high place; not the site, but the erections on them which could be built or removed (1 Kings xii. 7, 2 Kings xxiii. 15). So the Gr. boas, and Heb. hamath. But the proper Heb. name misbeach is "the sacrificing place;" LXX. thusiasterion. Spots hallowed by Divine revelations or appearances were originally the sites of altars (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18, xxvi. 25, xxxv. 1). Mostly for sacrificing; sometimes only as a memorial, as that named by Moses Jehovah Nissi, the pledge that Jehovah would war against Amalek to all generations (Exod. xvii. 15, 16), and that built by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, "not for burnt offering, nor sacrifice, but as a witness" (Josh. xxii. 26, 27). Altars were to be made only of earth or else unhewn stone, on which no iron tool was used, and without steps up to them (Exod. xx. 21-26). Steps towards the E. on the contrary are introduced in the temple yet future (Ezek. xliii. 17), marking its distinctness from any past temple. No pomp or ornament was allowed; all was to be plain and simple; for it was the meeting place between God and the sumer, and therefore a place of shedding of blood without which there is no remission (Lev. xvii. 11, Heb. ix. 22), a place of fellowship with God for us only through death. The mother dust of earth, or its stones in their native state as from the land of God, were the suitable material. The art of sinful beings would mar, rather than aid, the consecration of the common meeting ground. The earth made for man's nourishment, but now the witness of his sin and drinker in of his forfeited life, was the most suitable (see Fairbairn, Typology). The altar was at "the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation" (Exod. xl. 29). In the tabernacle the altar of burnt offering was made of shittim (acacia) boards overlaid with brass, forming a square of five cubits, or eight feet, three cubits high or five feet, the hollow within being probably filled with earth or stones. A ledge (Heb. karkab) projected on the side for the priest to stand on, to which a slope of earth gradually led up on the S. side, and outside the ledge was a network of brass. At the corners were four horn shaped projections, to which the victim was bound (Ps. cxviii. 27), and which were touched with blood in consecrating priests (Exod. xxix. 12), and in the sin offering (Lev. iv. 7). The horn symbolises might. The culminations of the altar, being hornlike, imply the mighty salvation and security which Jehovah engages to the believing worshippers approaching Him in His own appointed way. Hence it was the asylum or place of refuge (1 Kings i. 50, Exod. xli. 14). So the Antitype, Christ (Isa. xxvii. 3, xxv. 4). To grasp the altar horns in faith was to lay hold of Jehovah's strength. In Solomon's temple the altar square was entirely of brass, and was 20 cubits, or from 30 to 35 feet, and the height 10 cubits. In Mal. i. 7, 12, it is called "the table of the Lord." In Herod's temple the altar was 50 cubits long, and 50 broad, and 15 high; a pipe from the S.W. corner conveyed away the blood to the brook Kedron. Except in emergencies (as Jud. vi. 24; 1 Sam. vii. 9, 10; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18, 25; 1 Kings viii. 64, xviii. 31, 32) only the one altar was sanctioned

(Lev. xvii. 8, 9; Deut. xii. 13, 14), to mark the unity and ubiquity of God, as contrasted with the many altars of the manifold idols and local deities of heathendom. Every true Israelite, wherever he might be, realized his share in the common daily sacrifices at the one altar in Zion, whence Jehovah ruled to the ends of the earth. Christ is the antitype, the one altar or meeting place between God and man, the one only atonement for sinners, the one sacrifice, and the one priest (Acts iv. 12, Heb. xiii. 10). Christ's Godhead, on which He offered His manhood, "sanctifieth the gift" (Matt. xxiii. 19), and prevents the sacrifice being consumed by God's fiery judicial wrath against man's sin. To those Judaizers who object that Christians have no altar or sacrificial meats, Paul says, "we have" (the emphasis in Gr. is on have; there is no we) emphatically, but it is a spiritual altar and sacrifice. So Heb. iv. 14, 15, viii. 1, ix. 1, x. 1, 19-21. The interpretation which makes "altar" the Lord's table is opposed to the scope of the Epistle to the Heb., which contrasts the outward sanctuary with the unseen spiritual sanctuary. Romanisers fall under the condemnation of Hos. viii. 11. The Epistle to the Heb. reasons, severe adherents to visible altar meats are excluded from our Christian spiritual altar and meats: "For He, the true Altar, from whom we derive spiritual meats, realized the sin offering type" (of which none of the meat was eaten, but all was burnt: Lev. vi. 30) "by suffering without the gate: teaching that we must go forth after Him from the Jewish highpriest's camp of legal ceremonialism and meats, which stood only till the gospel times of reformation" (ix. 10, 11). The temple and holy city were the Jewish people's camp in their solemn feasts. The brass utensils for the altar (Exod. xxvii. 3) were pans, to receive the ashes and fat; shovels, for removing the ashes; basons, for the blood; flesh hooks, with three prongs, to take flesh out of the cauldron (1 Sam. ii. 13, 14); firepans, or censers, for taking coals off the altar, or for burning incense (Lev. xvi. 12; Num. xvi. 6, 7; Exod. xxv. 38): the same Heb. maktoth means snuff dishes, as "tongs" means sufflers for the candlesticks.

Asa "renewed" the altar, i.e. reconsecrated it, after it had been polluted by idolatries (2 Chron. xx. 8). AHAZ [see] removed it to the N. side of the new altar which Urijah the priest had made after the pattern which Ahaz had seen at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 14). Hezekiah had it "cleansed" (2 Chron. xxix. 12-18) of all the uncleanness brought into it in Ahaz's reign. Manasseh, on his repentance, repaired it (2 Chron. xxxiii. 16). Rabbins pretended it stood on the spot where man was created. In Zerubbabel's temple the altar was built before the temple foundations were laid (Ezra iii. 2). After its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes, Judas Maccabæus built a new altar of unhewn stones. A perpetual fire kept on it symbolised the perpetuity of Jehovah's religion; for, sacrifice being the centre of the O. T. worship, to extinguish it would have been to extinguish the religion. The perpetual fire of the Persian religion was different, for this was not sacrificial, but a symbol of God, or of the notion that fire was a primary element. The original fire of the tabernacle "came out from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt offering and the fat" (Lev. ix. 24). The rabbins say, It couched upon the altar like a lion, bright as the sun, the flame solid and pure, consuming things wet and dry alike, without smoke. The Divine fire on the altar; the shekinah cloud, representing the Divine habitation with them, which was given to the king and the highpriest with the oil of unction; the spirit of prophecy; the Urim and Thummim whereby the highpriest miraculously learned God's will; and the ark of the covenant, whence God gave His answers in a clear voice, were the five things of the old temple wanting in the second temple. Heated stones (Heb.) were laid upon the altar, by which the incense was kindled (Isa. vi. 6). The golden altar of incense (distinguished from the brazen altar of burnt offering), of acacia wood (in Solomon's temple cedar) underneath, two cubits high, one square. Once a year, on the great day of atonement, the highpriest sprinkled upon its horns the blood of the sin offering (Exod. xxx. 6-10; Lev. xvi. 18, 19). Morning and evening incense was burnt on it with fire taken from the altar of burnt offering. It had a border round the top, and two golden rings at the sides for the staves to bear it with. It was "before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy seat;" between the candlestick and the shewbread table. In Heb. ix. 4, A. V., "censer," not "altar of incense," is right; for the latter was in the outer not the inner holy place. The inner, or holiest, place "had the golden censer" belonging to its yearly atonement service, not kept in it. The altar of incense also was close by the second veil, directly before the ark (1 Kings vi. 22), "by (Heb. belonging to) the oracle," i.e. holiest place. Jesus' death rent the veil, and has brought the antitypes to the candlestick, shewbread table, and altar of incense into the heavenly, holiest place. This altar alone appears there, viz. that of prayer and praise. Christ is the heavenly altar as well as the only intercessor, through the incense of whose merits our prayers are accepted. "The souls under the altar" (Rev. vi. 9) are shut up unto Him in joyful expectancy, until He come to raise the sleeping bodies (Rev. viii. 3, 4). NADAB and ABIHU [see] were smitten for burning "strange fire" (i.e. fire not taken from the altar of burnt offering), thereby breaking the tie between the incense altar and the sacrificial burnt offering altar. The incense daily offered symbolised prayer (Ps. cxli. 2, Luke i. 10). As the incense on the altar within drew its kindling from the fire of the sacrificial altar without, so believing prayer of the heart within, continually ascending to God, rests on one's having first once for all become sharer in the benefit of Christ's outward sacrificial atonement. Therefore the inner altar was ornate and golden, the outer altar bore marks of humiliation and death. Nowhere is an altar in the sacrificial sense in the Christian church recognised in the N. T. The words "we have an altar" (Heb. xiii. 10; note that it is not altars, such as apostate churches erect in their worship), so far from sanctioning a Christian altar on earth, oppose the idea; for Christ Himself is our altar of which we spiritually eat, and of which they who Judaize, by serving the tabernacle and resting on meats and ordinances, "have no right to eat." Our sacrifices are spiritual, not the dead letter; comp. ver. 2, 15, 16.

The "altar to an unknown God" mentioned by Paul (Acts xvii. 22) was erected in time of a plague at Athens, when they knew not what god to worship for removing it. Epimenides caused black and white sheep to be let loose from the Areopagus, and wherever they lay down to be offered to the appropriate deity. Diogenes Laertius, Pausanias, and Philostratus, heathen writers, confirm the accuracy of Scripture by mentioning several altars at Athens to the unknown or unnamed deity. "Superstitious" is too severe a word for the Gr.; Paul's object was to conciliate, and he tells the Athenians: Ye are "rather religious," or "more given to religion" than is common, "rather given to veneration."

In Ezek. xlii. 15 "altar" is lit. harel, "mount of God," denoting the high security which it will afford to restored Israel; a high place indeed, but the high place of God, not of idols.

Altaschith. The title of Ps. lviii., lviii., lix., lxxv. The maxim of David amidst persecutions, embodying the spirit of his psalm (Kimchi); drawn from Dent. ix. 26, Moses' prayer, "Destroy not Thy people and Thine inheritance, whom Thou hast redeemed." He used the same "destroy not" in 1 Sam. xxvi. 9, to Abishai, who urged him to slay Saul when in his power. We can say "destroy not" to God only when we ourselves bear no malice to our enemies. Aben Ezra less probably explains "some song named so, to the tune of which the psalm was to be chanted."

Alush. The last station before Rephidim, of Israel's journey to Sinai (Num. xxxiii. 13, 14). Rabbins assert, on Exod. xvi. 30, that here the first sabbath was instituted and kept.

Alvah, Aliah. Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51.

Alvan, Alian. Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i. 49.

Amad. In Asher, between Alamelech and Misheal (Josh. xix. 27).

Amal. Of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35).

Amalek. Son of Eliphaz, by his concubine Timnah, of the Horites; grandson of Esau; duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16). The Edomites seized the Horite territory. In Hezekiah's reign the last remnant of Amalek in Edom was dispersed by the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv. 42, 43).

Amalekites. Philo interprets "a people that licks up." A nomadic tribe, occupying the peninsula of Sinai and the wilderness between Palestine and Egypt (Num. xiii. 29; 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). Arab writers represent them as sprung from Ham, and originally at the Persian gulf, and then pressed westward by Assyria, and spreading over Arabia before its occupation by Joktan's descendants. This would accord with the mention of them (Gen. xiv. 7) long before Esau's grandson, the Edomite Amalek; also with Jud. iii. 13, v. 14, xii. 15, where "Amalek" and "the mount of the A." appear in central Palestine, whither they would come in their passage westward. Scripture nowhere else mentions any relationship of them with the Edomites and Israelites. The Amalek of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 16) in this view afterwards became blended with the older A. But Gen. xiv. 7 mentions merely "the country of the A.," i.e. which afterwards belonged to them; whereas in the case of the other peoples themselves are named, the Rephaims, Zuzims, Enims, Horites, Amorites (LXX., however, and Origen read for "the country" "the princes"). The descent of the A. from Amalek, Esau's grandson, is favoured also by the consideration that otherwise a people so conspicuous in Israel's history would be without specification of genealogy, contrary to the analogy of the other nations connected with Israel in the Pentateuch. Their life was nomadic (Jud. vi. 5); a city is mentioned in 1 Sam. xv. 5. AGAG (see) was the hereditary title of the king. On Israel's route from Egypt to Palestine, Amalek in guerrilla warfare tried to stop their progress, and was defeated by Joshua, under Moses, whose hands were stayed up by Aaron and Hur, at Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 8-16). It was a deliberate effort to defeat God's purpose at the very outset, whilst Israel was yet feeble, having just come out of Egypt. The motive is stated expressly, "Amalek feared not God" (Deut. xxv. 17-19; and Exod. xvii. 16 marg.). "Because the hand of Amalek is against the throne of Jehovah, therefore Jehovah will have war with Amalek from generation to generation." Saul's failure to carry out God's purpose of their utter destruction (1 Sam. xv.) brought destruction on Saul himself (1 Sam. xxviii. 18), and, by a striking retribution in kind, by an A. (2 Sam. i. 2-10).

David, the instrument of destroying them, was raised to the vacated throne (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, xxx. 1, 2, 17-26; 2 Sam. viii. 12). The A. are mentioned with the Canaanites as having discomfited Israel at Hormah, on the borders of Canaan, permitted by God because of Israel's unbelief as to the spies' report, and then presumption in going up to possess the land in spite of Moses' warning and the non-accompaniment of the ark (Num. xiv. 43-45). Subsequently the Moabite Eglon, in league with Amalek, smote Israel and took Jericho; but Ehud defeated them (Jud. iii. 13-30). Next we find them leagued with Midian (vi. 3, vii.), and defeated by Gideon: Balaam's prophecy (Num. xxiv. 20 Heb.), "Beginning of the heathen (was) Amalek, and its end (shall be) destruction" (even to the perishing, under Saul, David, and finally Hezekiah, 1 Chron. iv. 42, 43). In age, power, and celebrity this Bedouin tribe was certainly not "the first of the nations," but (as marg.) "the first heathen nation which opened the conflict of heathendom against the people of God." Thus its "latter end" stands in antithesis to its "beginning." The occasion of Amalek's attack was significant: at Rephidim, when there was no water for the people to drink, and God by miracle made it gush from the rock. Contentions for possession of a well were of common occurrence (Gen. xxi. 25, xxvi. 22; Exod. ii. 17); in Moses' message asking Edom and Sihon the Amorite for leave of passage, water is a prominent topic (Num. xx. 17, xxi. 22; comp. Jud. v. 11). This constitutes the special heinousness of Amalek's sin in God's eyes. They tried to deprive God's people of a necessary of life which God had just supplied by miracle, thus fighting not so much with them as with God. This accounts for the special severity of their doom. The execution was delayed; but the original sentence at Rephidim was repeated by Balaam, and 400 years subsequently its execution was enjoined at the very beginning of the regal government as a test of obedience; comp. 1 Sam. xii. 12-15. They then still retained their spite against Israel, for we read (1 Sam. xiv. 48), "Saul smote the A. and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoiled them." That the Israelites might perceive they were but the executioners of God's sentence, they were forbidden to take the spoil. Saul's taking of it to gratify the people and himself, under the pretext of "sacrifice," was the very thing which betrayed the spirit of disobedience, to his ruin.

Amam. A city in the S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 26).

Amara=truth; a mountain near Lebanon, perhaps the southern top of Antilibanus (S. of Sol. iv. 8). Assumed to be the hill whence the Abana springs (2 Kings v. 13).

Amariah. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 7, 52. 2. Highpriest under Jehoshaphat, son of Azariah (1 Chron. vi. 11, 2 Chron. xix. 11), a seconder of that good king "in all matters of the Lord."

3. 1 Chron. xxiii. 19. 4. Head of one of the 24 courses of priests which bore his name under David, Hezekiah, and Nehemiah (1 Chron. xxiv. 14=Immer; 2 Chron. xxxi. 15; Neh. x. 3, xii. 2, 13). 5. Neh. xi. 4, Ezra x. 42. 6. Zeph. i. 1.

Amasa. 1. Son (seemingly illegitimate) of Jether or Ithra, an Ishmaelite, by Abigail, David's sister (2 Sam. xvii. 25, 1 Chron. ii. 15-17). [See AISA-LOM.] Joined his rebellion, probably because neglected by David (as appears from his not being mentioned previously) on account of his Ishmaelite parentage (Zeruiah occurs always without mention of her husband; but Abigail always with her husband Jether, as though in disengagement). Defeated in the wood of Ephraim by Joab (2 Sam. xviii.). David, to atone for past neglect, pardoned, and even promoted him to command the army in the room of the overbearing Joab. A.'s slowness in crushing Shela's rebellion, perhaps owing to the disinclination of the troops to be under his command, obliged David to despatch Abishai with the household guards, and Joab accompanied them. A. and his force overtook them at "the great stone of Gibeon." There Joab, whilst taking with his right hand A.'s beard to kiss him, with his left stabbed him with his sword (2 Sam. xx. 10). 2. AMASAI, leader of a body of men of Judah and Benjamin, to join David in the hold at Ziklag; David's apprehension of treachery on the part of his own tribe was dispelled by A.'s words under the spirit which "clothed" him: "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse; peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers, for thy God helpeth thee." (Marg. 1 Chron. xii. 16-18.) 3. A prince of Ephraim, son of Hadlai, who, at the prophet Oded's command from God, opposed the detention of the Jews taken captive by Pekah of Israel from Abaz of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

Amashai. Neh. xi. 13.

Amasiah. (2 Chron. xvii. 16.) "Son of Zichri, who willingly offered himself unto the Lord" as a captain under Jehoshaphat; comp. Jud. v. 2, 9.

Amaziah. 1. Son of Joash; on his accession to the Jewish throne punished his father's murderers, but not their children (Deut. xxiv. 16); a merciful trait of character, which it is implied other kings had not. He had reigned jointly with his father at least one year before Joash's death; for 2 Kings xiii. 10 compared with xiv. 1 proves he reigned in the 39th year of Joash of Judah; 2 Chron. xxiv. 1 shows that Joash of Judah reigned 40 years; therefore A. must have been reigning one year before Joash's death. The reason comes out in that incidental way which precludes the idea of forgery, and confirms the truth of the history. In 2 Chron. xxiv. 23, 25 we read: "the host of Syria came up against him [Joash]. . . to Judah and Jerusalem, and destroyed all the princes; . . . and when they were departed [for they left him in great diseases] his own servants conspired against him for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest, and slew him on his bed." The "great diseases" under which Joash laboured, at the time of the Syrian invasion, were no doubt the cause of A. his son being admitted to a share in the government. Blunt well observes how circuitously we arrive at the conclusion, not by the book of Kings alone nor Chronicles alone; either might be read alone without suspicion of such a latent congruity. He slew of Edom in the Valley of Salt (S. of the Dead Sea, the scene of David's general's victory: 2 Sam. viii. 13; Ps. lx. title; 1 Kings xi. 15, 16; 1 Chron. xviii. 12) 10,000, and his forces threw 10,000 captives from the rocks, and he took Seilah or Petra their capital, which he named Jokteel (the reward of God) after a Jewish city (Josh. xv. 38). Then he showed that, whereas he partly did "right in the sight of the Lord," it was "not like David his father, with a perfect heart" (2 Chron. xxv. 2, 2 Kings xiv. 3). "He brought the gods of Seir to be his gods and bowed down himself before them and burned incense unto them." The Lord's prophet reproved him: "Why hast thou sought after the gods which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?" "Art thou made of the king's counsel? forbear; why shouldst thou be smitten?" was the king's reply; for God had determined to destroy him, and therefore gave him up to judicial hardening (Rom. i. 28).

Already he had provoked Israel by sending back 100,000 Israelite soldiers whom he had hired for 100 talents of silver, but whom, as being estranged from God (1 Cor. xv. 33), God forbade him to take with him (comp. 2 Chron. xix. 2, xx. 37); God assuring him that He could give him much more than the 100 talents which he thereby forfeited. The Israelites in returning fell upon the cities of Judah from Samaria to Bethhoron. The God who gave him the Edomite capital in compensation for his loss of money could have given amends for the Israelite depredations, if he had not lost His favour. Refusing advice from God's prophet (Prov. xii. 1), A. "took advice" of bad counsellors, and, irritated at the Israelite depredations, A. challenged Joash, who by the parable of "the thistle (or rather thorn bush) and cedar" warned him: not to overrate his strength through pride in his Edomite victories, as though the thorn bush were to think itself a match for the cedar, and to meddle with his own hurt. Routed at Bethshemesh, he was taken by Joash to Jerusalem, the wall of which Joash brake down from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate 400 cubits, facing Israel's frontier, besides taking the vessels of God's house, with Obed Edom, and the king's treasures and hostages. Jerusalem, according to Josephus, yielded so quickly, as Joash threatened otherwise to slay A. A. survived Joash 15 years, and then was slain by conspirators at Lachish, whither he had fled. He reigned from 857 B.C. to 809. 2. Priest of the golden calf at Bethel, under Jeroboam II. Fearing that his craft whereby he had his wealth was in danger, he informed the king: "Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel; the land is not able to bear all his words, for thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword and Israel . . . beled away captive." Also he said unto Amos: "O thou seer . . . get thee away into Judah and there eat bread [he judges of Amos by his own mercenary motives]. But prophecy not again any more in Bethel, for it is the king's chapel and . . . court." Therefore the Lord doomed his wife to harlotry, his sons and daughters to the sword, and himself to "die in a polluted land" (Amos vii. 10-17). So far from seeking prophecy as a bread-making business, Amos replies he gave up his own mode of livelihood to obey the Lord's call at all costs. Political expediency in all ages is made the pretext for dishonouring God and persecuting His servants (John xi. 48-50; Acts xvii. 6, 7, xix. 25-27, xxiv. 5). Probably A. met his doom in Pul's invasion; God is not anxious to vindicate His word, "the majesty of Scripture does not lower itself to linger on baser persons" (Pusey); the criminal's sentence implies its execution, whether recorded or not. 3. 1 Chron. iv. 34. 4. 1 Chron. vi. 45.

Ambassador. Stands for two Heb. words: mataheh, "messenger," and tsar, "ambassador." Israel's commanded isolation rendered embassies an infrequent occurrence; they were mere nuncios rather than plenipotentiaries. The earliest instances occur in the case of Edom, Moab, and the Amorites (Num. xx. 14, xxi. 21). Gibeon feigned an embassy (Josh. ix. 4). The ambassador's person was regarded as inviolable (2 Sam. x. 2-5, xii. 26-31). Men of high rank usually; as Sennacherib sent his chief captain, chief eubearer, and chief eunuch, Tartan, Rabсарis, Rabshakeh, whom Hezekiah's chief men of the kingdom, Eliakim over the household, Shebna the secretary, and Joah the recorder, met (2 Kings xviii. 17, 18; Isa. xxx. 4, xxxii. 7; comp. xviii. 2). Once in N. T., "we are ambassadors for Christ" (2 Cor. v. 20); treating with men "in Christ's stead": God "beseeching," and His ambassadors "praying" men to be reconciled to God. Majesty, faithfulness, yet withal tenderness, are implied. Our part is to send prayers, as our embassy, to meet God's ambassadors, desiring His conditions of peace (Luke xiv. 32, Isa. xxvii. 5).

Amber: chasmal. Ezek. i. 4, 27; viii. 2. Not our amber, a bituminous substance or fossil resin, but a metal. Smooth polished brass (Gesenius). Comp. Ezek. i. 7, brass in a glow or white heat; Ezra viii. 27 marg.; Rev. i. 15, "His feet like unto glowing brass" (chalcolibanus: from libben, "whiten"; brass in a white heat), "as if made red hot in a furnace." Else a compound of gold and silver, symbolising the dazzling brightness of God's glory. From Heb. nat (or else melala, "gold"), nechash, "smooth brass."

Amen (firm, faithful, else verily). Jesus is "the Amen, the faithful and true witness" (Rev. iii. 14). Comp. 2 Cor. i. 20; John i. 14, 17, xiv. 6. "The God of Amen" (Heb. for "truth") (Isa. lxx. 16). Jesus alone introduces His authoritative declarations with Amen in the beginning; in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, singly, in John (iii. 3, 5, 11, x. 1) always doubled. It is most marked how the apostles and others avoid the use of it in the beginning, which is His Divine prerogative. Jer. xxviii. 6 is not an exception; it is praying for the Divine ratification of what preceded. In oaths those who pronounce the "Amen" bind themselves by the oath (Num. v. 22, Deut. xxvii. 15-26). God alone can seal all His declarations of promise or threat with the "Amen," verily, in its fullest sense; our assertions mostly need some qualification. As John records Christ's discourses on the deeper things of God, which man is slow to believe, the double Amen is appropriately found at the beginning of such discourses 25 times. Amen was the proper response to a prayer, an oath, or a solemn promise (1 Kings i. 36; Neh. v. 13, viii. 6; 1 Chron. xvi. 36; Jer. xi. 5); the God of Amen witnesses our covenants. Jewish tradition states that the people responded to the priest's prayer not "Amen," but, "Blessed be the name of the glory of His kingdom for ever." But in synagogues, as in the Christian assemblies, and in family and private prayers, Amen was the response (Matt. vi. 13, 1 Cor. xiv. 16). Amethyst. Heb. root, dream; supposed to cause dreams to those who wore it. Gr., "protecting against drunkenness" Pliny says, because it approaches the colour of wine without reaching it. The third jewel in the third row of the breastplate of judgment. The twelfth of the precious foundation stones of the heavenly Jerusalem's walls (Rev. xxi. 20). A violet, or in the East a deep red, quartz; the eastern is a rare variety of the adamantine spar or corundum; the hardest substance next to the diamond, containing 99 per cent. alumine, with iron and silica. It loses colour in the fire, and becomes like a diamond.

Ami, or Amon. Ezra ii. 57, Neh. vii. 59.

Amittai. Father of Jonah: 2 Kings xiv. 25, Jonah i. 1.

Ammah. A hill facing Giah by way of the wilderness of Gibeon, where Joab ceased pursuing Abner after Asahel's death (2 Sam. ii. 21). Vulg.

mentions a watercourse near, and Robinson describes an excavated fountain under the high rock near Gibeon.

Ammi. (Hos. ii. 1, 23) "My people;" the name betokening God's reconciliation to His people, in contrast to Lo-ammi, "not My people" (Hos. i. 9), though once "Mine" (Ezek. xvi. 8). The Gentiles, once not God's people, shall become His people (Rom. ix. 25, 26; 1 Pet. ii. 10).

Ammiel. 1. Num. xiii. 12. 2. 2 Sam. ix. 4, 5; xvii. 27. 3. = Eliam, by transposition of letters; father of Bathsheba [see AUTHORITEL] (1 Chron. iii. 3, 2 Sam. xi. 3). 4. 1 Chron. xxvi. 5.

Ammihud. 1. Num. i. 10; ii. 18; vii. 48, 53; x. 22. 2. Num. xxiv. 20. 3. Num. xxiv. 28. 4. 2 Sam. xiii. 37. 5. 1 Chron. ix. 4.

Amminadab of the people of the prince; else, my people is willing. 1. S. of Sol. vi. 12: "My soul made me like the chariots of Amminadab," one noted for swift driving; comp. chap. i. 9. Rather: "My soul made me like the chariots of my willing people" (Ps. ex. 3), or else, "of the Prince of My people," Messiah. His chariots are His glorious angel escort. 2. Num. i. 7, ii. 3. Ancestor of David and Jesus (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 3; Num. i. 7, ii. 3; Ruth iv. 19, 20; 1 Chron. ii. 10). As Naasson, A.'s son, was prince at the first numbering of Israel in the second year from the exodus, A. probably died in Egypt before the exodus, at the time of Israel's heaviest oppression. His daughter Elisheba married Aaron, and bore Nadab (named from Amminadab), Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar; the earliest alliance of the kingly line of Judah and the priestly line of Aaron. 3. Chief of Uzziel's 112 sons, whom David sent for to bring the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 10-12). 4. = Izhar, son of Kohath, father of Korah (1 Chron. vi. 22; comp. ver. 2, 18).

Ammishaddai. Num. i. 12, vii. 66. One of the few names compounded with the ancient name of God, Shaddai.

Ammizabad. 1 Chron. xxvii. 6.

Ammon. A nation sprung from Ben-ammi, Lot's son by his younger daughter (Gen. xiv. 38, Ps. lxxviii. 7, 8), as Moab by his elder, after Lot escaped from Sodom. A. and Moab appear continually together; both are said to have hired Balaam (Deut. xiii. 4), though Moab alone is mentioned in the detailed account (Num. xxii. xxiii.). The land from Arnon river to Jabbok is assigned to both (Jud. xi. 12-18, 25). The Israelites dispossessed the Amorites of land which afterwards A. occupied, between Arnon and Jabbok, but did not, as Jephthah reasons, dispossess A. of it, though now claiming it as theirs (Num. xvi. 24, 26, 29). A. destroyed the aboriginal Rephaim or giants, named Zamzummim, and occupied their land, Jabbok being their boundary (Deut. ii. 20, 21, 37). Moab was probably the more civilized half of Lot's descendants; whence we read of the plentiful fields, hay, summer fruits, vineyards, presses, songs of the grape trenders, of Moab (Isa. xvi. xvi., Jer. xlviii.): A. the more fierce, plundering, Bedouin-like half; whence we read of their threat of thrusting out the right eye of all in Bashah Gilead (1 Sam. xi. 2), ripping up pregnant women in Gilead (Amos i. 13), treacherously murdering, as Ishmael, Balaam's agent, did (Jer. xl. 14, xli. 5-7), suspecting and insulting their ally David to their own ruin (2 Sam. x. 1-5, xii. 31). A.'s one stronghold, Rabbah, "the city of waters" (20 cities are mentioned Jud. xi. 33, perhaps some Moabite cities), forms a contrast to Moab's numerous towns with their "high places" (Jer. xlviii.); their idol, Moloch, accordingly they worshipped in a tent, the token of nomad life, not a fixed temple or high place, such as was appropriated to the god of the more settled people Moab (Amos v. 26, Acts vii. 43). They crossed Jordan and seized Jericho for a time (Jud. iii. 13). Chephar-ha-Ammoni (the hamlet of the Ammonites), in Benjamin, at the head of the passes from the Jordan westward, marks their having temporarily been in that region. Their unwillingness to help Israel, and their joining Moab in hiring Balaam (Deut. xxiii. 2, 46; Neh. xiii. 2), caused their exclusion (like that of a bastard) from the Lord's congregation for ten generations; whereas Edom, who had not hired him, was only excluded for three. The exclusion was from full Israelite citizenship, not from the spiritual privileges of the covenant, if they became proselytes. Previously to David, Jephthah and Saul had sorely punished them (Jud. xi. 33; 1 Sam. xi. 11, xiv. 47). A. joined with Moab in the expedition for uprooting Judah from its possession, in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chron. xx., Ps. lxxxiii. 3-7). So utterly were the confederates routed that the Jews spent three days in gathering the spoil. They had to bring gifts to Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 8). Jotham reduced them to pay 100 talents of silver, 10,000 measures of wheat, and 10,000 of barley. A. seized on the cities of Gad from which Tiglath Pileser had carried the Israelites (Jer. xlix. 1-6, Zeph. ii. 8, 9). On the return from Jerusalem Tobiah, an Ammonite, joined with Sanballat, of Horomina of Moab, in opposing Nehemiah's restoration of the city walls (Neh. ii. 10, 19). Naamah, Solomon's wife, mother of Rehoboam, was an Ammonite. Their idol, Moloch, appears also under the varied form Milcom and Molecham, as the Heb. for "their king" may be rendered. Comp. Zeph. i. 5, 2 Sam. xii. 30. Solomon's Ammonite wives seduced him to rear an altar to this "abomination," to his own hurt (Jer. xlix. 1, 3). Nahash, perhaps a common title of their kings, means a serpent. Shobi, the son of David's friend, followed his father's rather than Hama his brother's steps, showing kindness to David in adversity (2 Sam. xvii. 27).

Ammon. 1. David's eldest son by Abigail the Jezreelitess, born in Hebron whilst David reigned there over Judah only. Forced his half sister

Tamar, and was murdered by her brother ABSALOM [see] (2 Sam. xiii.)

2. 1 Chron. iv. 20.

Amok. Neh. xii. 7, 20.

Amon (Nab. iii. 8). No-A, i.e. Thebes, or No, the city of Amon Egyptian god (Jer. xlvii. 25), "the multitude of No," else "Amon of No" = the nourisher, Heb. The Egyptian name is Amen, "the hidden," or "mysterious"; one of the eight gods of the first order: chief of the Theban triad, worshipped as Amen-ra (i.e. the sun), represented as a man wearing a cap with two plumes, both male and female; accompanied with sacred trees, like the "groves" connected with Baal's worship. In the great Oasis he was worshipped as the ram-headed god Nun, and in Merse as Kaaph. The Greeks called him Jupiter Ammon.

Amon. 1. Son and successor of Manasseh in the throne of Judah = skilful in his art, Heb. Possibly the name was given by Manasseh, when an idolater, from the Egyptian god. He reigned from 642 B.C. to 640 (2 Kings xxi. 19; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20). His own servants conspired and slew him in his own house, and in their turn were slain by the people, who raised his son Josiah to the throne. 2. Governor of the city under Abah (1 Kings xxii. 26).

Amorite (the). Always singular in the Heb., "the dweller on the summits." The fourth son of Canaan, Ham's son. The Hamitic races were the earliest developed, and most brilliant, but had the greatest tendency to degeneracy, because averse to true religion, the great preserver of man. The tendency of the children of Japhet was to improve, that of the children of Shem to be stationary. As the Amorites, Hittites, and Jebusites were the highlanders, so were the Canaanites the lowlanders, by the sea W., and the Jordan E. Comp. Num. xiii. 29, Deut. i. 44. As early as Gen. xiv. 7, 13, they occupied the rugged heights afterwards called Engedi (font of the kid); then Hazezon Tamar (the cutting of the palm tree). Thence they stretched W. to Hebron. They subsequently crossed the Jordan eastward. Sihon took the pasture land S. of Jabbok, and drove Moab across the Arnon (Num. xxi. 13, 26-31). Israel, approaching from the S.E., was refused leave to pass through his land to the fords of Jordan. Sihon, having marched against them, was killed with his sons and people (Deut. ii. 32-37), and his land and cattle taken by them. The tract bounded by the Jabbok on the N., Arnon S., Jordan W., wilderness E. (Jud. xi. 21, 22), was specially the "land of the Amorites"; but their possessions embraced all Gilead and Bashan, to Hermion (1st cent. iii. 8, iv. 48, 49), "the land of the two kings of the Amorites," Sihon and Og (Deut. xxxi. 4). As the Amorites (highlanders) were the most powerful, the other Canaanites (even lowlanders) were sometimes called by their name. Thus Mamre in Hebron, of Gen. xiii. 18, is the "A." in xiv. 13; "Hittite" in chap. xxiii.; "Canaanite" in Jud. i. 10. The Hivites (Gen. xxxiv. 2) are called Amorites in xlviii. 22. Jerusalem is "A." in Josh. x. 5, but in xv. 63 "Jebusite." Grove, in Smith's Dictionary, conjectures that "A." expresses locality (highlander), not distinction of race; because the name is spread over a wide area, no connection appears between the Amorites on the E. and those W. of Jordan, Sihon and Og are both "kings of the Amorites," and yet their territories are separate. No individual Amorites are named except these two kings and Abraham's three confederates (Gen. xiv. 13). No traces appear of any distinctive government, worship, or customs, different from the other Canaanite nations. The A. name Senir (not Sheair) for mount Hermon (Deut. iii. 9) is mentioned; but this may be the Canaanite term, as distinguished from the Heb. "Hermon" (lofty peak) and the Phœnician "Sirion" (glittering as a breastplate; senir too means a breastplate, from a root, "clatter," the snowy round top glittering like a breastplate). Mountaineers are usually the most warlike; hence, undeterred by Joshua's slaughter of the five kings "dwelling in the mountains" (Josh. x. 5, etc.), they in the next age drove the children of Dan to the mountains, themselves keeping possession of the plain, as well as mount Heres (Jud. i. 34, 35); comp. also Amos ii. 9, 10.

Amos = a burden. Of Tekoah, in Judah, six miles S.E. of Bethlehem. A shepherd (probably owning flocks) and dresser of sycamore fig trees; specially called of the Lord to prophesy, though not educated in the prophets' schools (Amos i. 1, vii. 14, 15). These personal notices occur only as connected with the discharge of his prophetic function; so entirely is self put in the shade by the inspired men of God, and God is made the one all-absorbing theme. Though of Judah, he exercised his ministry in the northern kingdom, Israel; not later than the 15th year of Uzziah of Judah, when Jeroboam II. (son of Joash) of Israel died (comp. 1 Kings xiv. 23 with xv. 1), in whose reign it is written he prophesied "two years before the earthquake"; comp. Zech. xiv. 5. Allusions to the earthquake appear in v. 8, vi. 11, viii. 8, ix. 1, 5. The Divine sign in his view confirmed his words, which were uttered before, and which now after the earthquake were committed to writing in an orderly summary. The natural world, being from and under the same God, shows a mysterious sympathy with the spiritual world; comp. Matt. xxiv. 7, xxvii. 50-54. Probably A. prophesied about the middle of Jeroboam's reign, when his conquests had been achieved (Amos vi. 13, 14; comp. 2 Kings xiv. 25-27), just before Assyria's first attack on Israel, for he does not definitely name that power: chap. i. 5, v. 27 (Hos. x. 6, xi. 5). The two forces from God acted simultaneously by His appointment, the invading hosts from without arresting Israel's attention for the prophet's message from God within the land, and the prophets showing the spiritual meaning of those invasions, as designed to lead Israel to repentance. This accounts for the outburst of prophetic fire in Uzziah's and his successors' reigns. The golden calves, the forbidden representation of Jehovah, not Baal, were the object of worship in Jeroboam's reign, as being the great grandson of Jehu, who had purged out Baal worship, but retained the calves. Israel, as abounding in impostors, needed the more true prophets of God from Judah to warn her. Her prophets often fled to Judah from fear of her kings. Oppression, luxury, weariness of religious ordinances as interrupting worldly pursuits, were rife: chap. vii. 4, 5, iii. 15. The king's sanctuary and summer palace were at Bethel (vii. 13); here A. was opposed by AMAZIAH [see] for his faithful reproofs, and informed against to Jeroboam. Like the prophet in 1 Kings xiii., A. went up from Judah to Bethel to denounce the idol calf at the risk of his life. Calf worship prevailed also at Dan, Gilgal, and Beersheba, in Judah (iv. 4, v. 5, viii. 14), blended with Jehovah's worship (v. 14, 21-26); 2 Kings xvii. 32, 33, comp. Ezek. xx. 39. The book is logically connected, and is divisible into four parts. Chap. i. 1 to ii. 13: the sins of Syria, Philistia, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab, the neighbours of Israel and Judah. Chap. ii. 4 to vi. 14: Israel's own state and consequent punishment; the same coasts "from the entering in of Hamath," which Jeroboam has just recovered from Syria, shall be "afflicted," and the people carried into "captivity beyond Damascus" (v. 27). Chap. vii. 1 to ix. 10: A.'s visions of grasshoppers devouring the grass, and fire the land and deep, both removed by his intercession; the plumb line marking the buildings for destruction; Amaziah's interruption at Bethel, and foretold doom; the basket of summer fruits marking Israel's end by the year's end; the Lord standing upon the altar, and commanding the lintel to be smitten, symbolising Israel's destruction as a kingdom, but individually not one righteous man shall perish. Chap. ix. 11-15: David's fallen tabernacle shall be raised, the people re-established in prosperity in their own land, no more to be pulled out, and the conversion of the heathen shall follow the establishment of the theocracy finally; comp. ver. 12 with Acts xv. 17. Reference to agricultural life and the phenomena of nature abounds, in consonance with his own former occupation, an undesigning propriety and mark of truth: chaps. i. 3; ii. 13; iii. 1, 5; iv. 2, 7, 9; v. 18, 19; vi. 12; vii. 1; ix. 3, 9, 13, 14. The first six chapters are without figure; the last three symbolical, with the explanation subjoined.

He assumes his readers' knowledge of the Pentateuch, and that the people's religious ritual (excepting the golden calves) accords with the Mosaic law, an incidental confirmation of the truth of the Pentateuch. Stephen (Acts vii. 42) quotes v. 25 to 27; and James (Acts xv. 16) quotes ix. 11. Philo, Josephus, the Talmud, Justin Martyr, the catalogues of Melito, Jerome, and the council of Laodicea, confirm the canonicity of A. His use of the names Adonai (Lord) and God of hosts marks that Jehovah, Israel's covenant God, is universal Lord. Characteristic and peculiar phrases occur: "cleanness of teeth," i.e., want of bread (iv. 6); "the excellency of Jacob" (vi. 8, vii. 7); "the high places of Isaac" (vii. 9), "the house of Isaac" (vii. 16); "he that createth the wind" (iv. 13). Hosea, his contemporary, survived him a few years.

Amoz. Father of Isaiah (Isa. i. 1).

Amphipolis. A Macedonian city, through which Paul and Silas passed, by the Ignatian Way, in journeying from Philippi (23 Roman miles distant) to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). Their not staying there may have been because there were few, if any, Jews in it; and they hastened on to Thessalonica, "where was a synagogue of Jews," affording the suitable starting point for a Christian church. It means the city (almost) surrounded by the river Strymon, three miles from its entrance into the sea. An Athenian colony. Its commercial situation, and the neighbouring woods of Kerkine, and gold mines of mount Pangæus, gave it importance; also memorable in the Peloponnesian war for the battle fought at it, in which Brasidas and Cleon were killed. The site is now occupied by the village Neokhorio.

Amphas. A Roman Christian (Rom. xvi. 8).

Amram. 1. A Levite; father of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Exod. vi. 18-20). [See AARON and JOSEPH.] 2. Ezra x. 34.

Amraphel. One of the four invading kings (Gen. xiv. 9). Shinar, his kingdom, or Babylonia, was subordinate to the great Elamite king, CHEDORLAOMER [see]. The Assyrian monuments attest that an Elamite king invaded and plundered Babylonia in 2386 B.C.; and Babylonian remains bear traces of Elamite influence.

Amzi. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 46. 2. A priest (Neh. xi. 12).

Anab. A town once belonging to the Anakim, in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xi. 21); still so called; ten miles S.S.W. of Hebron.

Anah. Son of Zibson, son of Seir the Horite; father of AHOLIBAMAH (see), Esau's wife (Gen. xxvi. 2, 14, 20, 25). "Aholibamah, daughter of Anah, daughter of Zibson," is tantamount to granddaughter, i.e. descendant from Zibson; not that Anah was "daughter of Zibson," for ver. 20 calls him "son (i.e. grand-son) of Seir." Those descendants alone of Seir are enumerated who, being heads of tribes, were connected with Edom; so Anah is mentioned because he was head of a tribe, independently of his father. As sprung from Seir, he is called a "Horite," i.e. a dweller in caves or troglodyte; also a "Hivite," a branch of the Canaanites; also he is named "Beeri the Hittite," the "Hittites" being the general name for "Canaanites" (xxvi. 34). "Hivite" is thought by some a transcriber's error for "Horite." Instead of "mules" (xxvi. 24) translate yemin "water springs"; not as Luther, "he invented mules" (Lev. xix. 19), but "discovered hot-springs" (so Vulg. and Syriac vers.) of which there are several S.E. of the Dead Sea, e.g. Callirhoe in the wady Zerka Ma'in; another in wady el Ahsa, and in wady Hamad; whence he got the surname Beeri, or "the spring man." Judith is the same as Aholibamah.

Anaharath; within Naphtali's territory (Josh. xix. 19).

Anziah. Neh. viii. 4. x. 22.

Anakim = long-necked, or strong-necked. Descended from Arba (Josh. xv. 13, xxi. 11), dwelling in the S. of Canaan. Hebron was called from him Kirjath Arba, i.e. city of Arba. Anak is the name of the race rather than an individual; comp. Josh. xiv. 15. The three tribes bore the names of Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi. They were in the spies' time a terror to Israel (Num. xiii. 28), but were destroyed by Joshua, except a remnant who escaped to the Philistine cities, Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. xi. 21, 22). Caleb, who brought tidings as a spy concerning them, was eventually their destroyer (xv. 14). Hence we find a giant race among the Philistines, and in Gath, in David's days (1 Sam. xvii. 2 Sam. xxi. 15, 22); an undesigned coincidence between the independent histories Joshua and 1 and 2 Samuel, confirming the truth of both. Their chief city Hebron became Caleb's possession for his faith, shown in having no fear of their giant stature, since the Lord was on Israel's side (Josh. x. 14, Jud. i. 20; comp. Num. xiii. 22, 28, 30-33; xiv. 21). They are represented on Egyptian monuments as tall and fair. The hieroglyphic Tanmaha represents Talmi, and one of his tribe is depicted on the tomb of Omenaphthah I.

Ananim. Sprung from Mizraim (Egypt), son of Ham (Gen. x. 13). An E. African people, early absorbed into Egypt or Ethiopia.

Anammelech. The idol of Sapharvaim, introduced into Samaria by the Assyrian settlers (2 Kings xvii.

31). The name means "statue of the king," Moloch. ABRAMMELECH [see] is the sun's male power; Anammelech, the female power.

Anan. Neh. x. 26.

Anani. 1 Chron. iii. 24.

Ananiah. 1. Neh. iii. 23. 2. A place between Nob and Hazor, where the Benjamites lived on returning from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. xi. 32).

Ananias. 1. Highpriest (Acts xxiii. 2, etc.; xxiv. 1). Son of Zebedaeus, succeeded Joseph, son of Camydus, and was followed by Ismael, son of Phabi Herod, king of Chalcis A.D. 48, appointed him. The prefect Ummidius Quadratus in A.D. 52 sent him to be tried before the emperor Claudius on the charge of oppressing the Samaritans. Cumanius the procurator, his adversary, was not successful but was banished; so that A. seems not to have lost office then, but lost it before Felix left the province; and was at last assassinated by the Sicarii (zealot assassins and robbers) early in the last Jewish war. Violent tempered to such a degree that he caused Paul to be smitten on the mouth for saying, "I have lived in all good conscience before God"; himself on the contrary "a whited wall." Comp. Matt. xxiii. 27. 2. A disciple at Jerusalem, Sapphira's husband (Acts v.). Having sold his property for the good of the church, professedly, he kept back part of the price, and handed the rest to the apostles. Peter stigmatized the act as "lying to the Holy Ghost," who was in the apostles, and whom notwithstanding he thought he could elude. A. instantly fell down and expired. That this was no mere natural effect of excitement appears from the sentence expressly pronounced by Peter on Sapphira, and immediately executed by God, whose instrument of justice Peter was. The judgment had the salutary effect designed, of guarding the church in its infancy from the adhesion of hypocrites; for "great fear came upon all the church and upon as many as heard it; and of the rest durst no man join himself to them, but the people magnified them." A. was sincere up to a certain point, for he had cast in his lot with the despised "Nazarenes," but he wished to gain a high name in the church by seeming to have given his all, whilst he really gave but a part. He was not obliged to throw his property into a common Christian fund (as Peter's words show, "after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?") It was a compromise between love of Christian applause and worldliness; "Satan filled his heart" as "Satan entered into Judas" (Luke xxii. 3). At the beginning of the course of the N. T. church an awful example was given to guard her in guileless sincerity from the world's corruptions; just as at the beginning of the course of the O. T. church, Israel, a similar example was given in Achan's case, to warn her that she was to be a holy people, separate from and witnessing against the world's pollutions by lust (Josh. vii.). The common fund which the first disciples voluntarily brought was a kind of firstfruits to the Lord in entering on possession of the spiritual Canaan, as Jericho's spoil was a firstfruit to Jehovah of the earthly Canaan. The need there was for such a prescient warning appears from the last protest of the same apostle Peter in his 2nd Epistle, against the growing covetousness and lust within the church. 3. A Jew Christian at Damascus, "a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there" (Acts ix. 10, etc., xxii. 12, etc.). By the Lord's direction in a vision, he sought out Saul in his blindness and foodlessness for three days after Jesus' appearing to him; putting hands on Saul, A. was the Lord's instrument of restoring his sight, and conveying to him the Holy Ghost, that he might be "a chosen vessel to bear Jesus' name before the Gentiles, and kings and Israel, as a witness unto all men of what he had seen and heard, suffering as well as doing great things for His name's sake. A. told him, 'Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord.' How striking that A., whom Saul would have seized for prison and death, should be the instrument of giving him light and life. Tradition makes A. subsequently bishop of Damascus and a martyr.

Anath. Jud. iii. 31, v. 6.

Anathema. Heb. cherem; "a thing or person devoted;" so, accursed to the Lord, and incapable of being redeemed, and, if a person, doomed to death (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29; 1 Cor. xii. 3, xvi. 22; Gal. i. 9; Rom. ix. 3, comp. Exod. xxxii. 32). "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren," lit. "I was wishing," i.e., the wish was rising within me, so intense is my love for Israel, that I myself were sacrificed in soul as well as body for their sake, were such wish lawful, which it is not; the wish remained incomplete, checked by calmer and more sober thoughts, which vehement zeal for the moment forgot. It never passed beyond the region of deep feeling, wherein he was transported momentarily out of all other considerations into the all-absorbing one, "an ecstacy of charity" (Bacon).

"ANATHEMA-MARANATHA" (i.e., the Lord cometh; 1 Cor. xvi. 22). An Aramaic watchword of the first age, suitable for believers in all ages: If He come not to bless, He shall come to smite with a curse! alludes to Mal. iv. 5, 6: "To those who fear [in the N. T. 'love'] the Lord's name, He comes as the Sun of Righteousness with healing on His wings;" but to those who fear and love Him not, He will come smiting the earth with a "curse" (cherem or anathema). Paul pronounces the anathema on those loving Him not, whilst as yet He is not come, that by fleeing to Him now they may escape the curse and gain the blessing. Paul is God's inspired mouthpiece proclaiming the doom to which those not loving Jesus are set apart, and his inspired prayer of anathema is but praying that God's will be done.

In the O.T. forcible setting apart to His glory of what ought to have been, but was not willingly, consecrated to Him, is implied. So in the case of Jericho the city was so devoted to destruction, and all in it, except Rahab; and the silver, gold, brass, and iron, were consecrated to Jehovah (Josh. vi. 17-26). Similarly Israel's vow (Num. xxi. 1-3): "if Thou wilt deliver this people into my hand, I will utterly destroy [Heb. make a cheerem or anathema of] their cities." Therefore they called that place Hormah (Chormah, i.e., the place made a cheerem or anathema of; put under a ban; devoted to God for destruction as accursed). This gives the true view of the dooming of the Canaanites; the sinners themselves were to be made an awful example of God's punitive justice to which they were set apart; their possessions were properly the Lord's, but were given by Him to Israel as a gift henceforth to be used to His glory. The degree of the work of destruction varied: men alone (Deut. xx. 13); men, women, and children, the cattle and spoil kept for the army (Deut. ii. 34, 35); every living creature (Deut. xx. 16, 1 Sam. xv. 3); virgins excepted (Num. xxxi. 17). Had the Canaanites humbled themselves before God's judgment and submitted, they would have been spared; but they were given up to judicial hardening to their own ruin (Josh. xi. 19, 20).

Anathoth. 1. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 2. x. 19. 3. A priests' city of Benjamin. Meaning "echoes" (Josh. xxi. 18, 1 Chron. vi. 60). Abiathar the priest was banished thither by Solomon after his attempt to put Adonijah on the throne (1 Kings ii. 26). Abiezer's birthplace, one of David's 30 captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 27); Jehu's also, one of his mighties (1 Chron. xii. 3); Jeremiah's, the priest and prophet, also (i. 1). Among the restored captives from Babylon were 128 men of A. The name is variously given: Anethothite, Anetothite, Anothite. Near the road, about three miles N. from Jerusalem (Isa. x. 30). Now Anita, on a broad ridge, amidst fields of grain, figs, and olives. There are remains of walls, and quarries supplying stone to Jerusalem.

Ancient of Days. Dan. vii. 9, 13, 22. The everlasting Jehovah, as contrasted with the ephemeral transitoriness of the four successive world powers, stable as they seemed for a time.

Andrew. A Gr. name. A fisherman of Bethsaida at the lake of Genesareth, son of Jonas. One of the first two called of the apostles; who in his turn called his brother Simon to Jesus (John i. 35-41). Previously he had been John the Baptist's disciple, and by him had been pointed to Jesus twice as the Lamb of God. Prompt decision for Christ, not levity, led him to obey. A further call took place subsequently and more formally, when, after they had resumed their usual occupation, Jesus found them casting their net into the sea (Matt.

iv. 18). Void of the boldness and roeklike robustness of Peter's character, which but few can aspire to, he had that feature which makes him a pattern within the reach of all, a simple, earnest determination in carrying out the dictates of conscience. Another feature in A., though not so qualified for public usefulness as some, he was as ardent as any to win souls in private to Jesus. When we admire the foremost apostle through whom 3000 were added to the church on pentecost, let us not forget that, without A., Simon would never have become Peter. So well known was his love for souls, that when certain Greeks desired to see Jesus, A. was the person to whom Philip (whose name also is Gr., and who, like A., when called, in turn called Nathanael) brought them. Then he and Philip (the two whose names imply connection with the Greeks, an interesting coincidence, and who had shown their zeal for conversions) brought them to Jesus (John i. 43-46, xii. 20-22). A. had his faults too; he shared in the disciples' unbelief when Jesus tried their faith, "Whence shall we buy bread that these (5000) may eat?" (John vi.) A. answered, "There is a lad here that hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?" Even here he suggests a supply, but with defective faith. A. was one of the four who asked Jesus privately, "When shall these things be, and what is the sign of Thy coming and the end of the world?" A. was not elsewhere admitted to the private interviews which Peter, John, and James enjoyed: at the raising of Jairus' daughter, the transfiguration, and Gethsemane. In Matt. x. 2 and Luke vi. 14 A. is next after Peter; but in Mark iii. 16, Acts i. 14, after the first and foremost three, Peter, James, and John, and before his Greek-named associate Philip. Eusebius makes him after Christ's ascension preach in Scythia; Jerome, in Greece; where tradition makes him to have been crucified on a cruz decussata, an X-shaped cross.

Andronicus. A Christian at Rome, saluted by Paul (Rom. xvi. 7). He and Junia were Paul's "kinsmen" (or the Gr. may mean "fellow countrymen," vers. 11, 21) "and fellow prisoners, of note among the apostles" (in the wider sense than the Twelve; Acts xiv. 4, 14, 2 Cor. viii. 23, 1 Thess. ii. 6), "and in Christ" (by faith) "before" him. Bishop of Pannonia subsequently, says "Hippolytus."

Anem. City of Issachar, belonging to the Gershonites (1 Chron. vi. 73). In Josh. xix. 21 "Engannim," of which "Anem" may be contraction.

Aner. 1. City of Manasseh, W. of Jordan; of the Kohathites (1 Chron. vi. 70); Josh. xxi. 25, "Tanach," of which "Aner" may be the corruption. 2. One of the three Hebronite chiefs who helped Abraham against the four invading kings (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

Angels = messengers. Often with "of God" or "Jehovah" added. Sometimes called the "holy ones,"

"saints." The "Angel of God" often means the Divine Word, "the Image of the invisible God," God Himself manifested (Col. i. 15; Gen. xxii. 11, 12, xvi. 7, 13, xxxi. 11, 13, xlviii. 15, 16, xxxiii. 14; comp. Isa. lxiii. 9; Exod. iii. 2, 6, 14, xxiii. 20-22; Acts xxvii. 23, 24, comp. xxiii. 11; Num. xxii. 22, 32, 35); accepting as His due the worship which angels reject as mere creatures (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9); this manifestation was as man, an anticipation of the incarnation (John i. 18; Gen. xlviii. 2, 22, xix. 1, xxiii. 24, 30; Josh. v. 13, 15). "Angel," "Son of God," "Gods" (Elohim), "Holy One," in the fullest sense, are names of the Divine Word alone. His incarnation is the centre by reference to which all angelic ministration is best understood. Comp. John i. 51, Gr. (aparti), "from this time forth ye shall see heaven open" [heretofore shut against man by sin; Heb. ix. 8, x. 19, 20] "and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man," as the antitypical Jacob's ladder, the centre of communication between men and God, the redeemed and the angelic world; Jesus' miracles, of which mention immediately follows (chap. ii.), are a firstfruit of this newly opened communion of earth and heaven (Gen. xxviii. 12-17).

Secondarily, God's created messengers; as Israel (Isa. xlii. 19), Haggai (i. 13), John (Mal. iii. 1, ii. 7), the priesthood, ministers (Eccles. v. 6), the rulers or angels of the Christian churches (Rev. i. 20), as Elohim, "gods." Is applied to judges (Ps. lxxxii. 6); comp. Jesus' application, John x. 34-37. As to the nature of "angels" in the limited sense, they are "spirits" (Heb. i. 7, 14), of wind-like velocity, subtle nature, capable of close communion with God; sharers in His truth, purity, and love, since they ever behold His face (Matt. xviii. 10), even as the redeemed shall (1 John iii. 2); not necessarily incorporeal; Luke xx. 36 (comp. Phil. iii. 21), 1 Cor. xv. 44, seemingly but not certainly imply their having bodies. Their glorious appearance (Dan. x. 6), like our Lord's when transfigured and afterwards as the ascended Saviour (Rev. i. 14-16), and their human form (Luke xxiv. 4, Acts i. 10), favour the same view. Close kindred of nature between angels and men is implied in both being alike called "sons of God" (Job i. 6, xxxviii. 7; Dan. iii. 25, 28) and "gods" (Elohim) (Ps. viii. 5; Heb. Elohim, "angels," xxvii. 7; Luke iii. 38). Finite, but ever progressing in the participation of God's infinite perfection (Job iv. 18, Matt. xxiv. 36, 1 Pet. i. 12). Our fellow servants, "sent forth unto ministry for the sake of them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. i. 14), i.e., on ministrations appointed by God and Christ for the good of them who shall be heirs of salvation. Worship and service are their twofold function; priests in the heavenly temple (Isa. vi. 1-3, 1 Kings xxii. 19, Dan. vii. 9, 10, Rev. v. 11), and sent forth thence on God's missions of love and justice.

As finite, and having liberty, they were capable of temptation. Some "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation" (2 Pet. ii. 4, Jude 6). "The elect angels" fell not; they take part, by act and sympathy, in our affairs, and shall witness the judgment (Luke xv. 10, 1 Cor. iv. 9). The fallen are not yet actually confined in the bottomless pit, but are doomed to it, "reserved unto judgment," and though seeming free, and ranging in our air, under the prince of the powers of the air (Eph. ii. 2), are really in "chains of darkness" already, able only to hurt to the length of their chain. Satan is their prince, a liar, murderer, slanderer; and such are they (John viii. 44). The probation of the elect angels is over; their crown is won, they are the "holy ones" now (Dan. viii. 13), under the blessed necessity of sinning no more. "Watchers" of men, jealous for God's honour (Dan. iv. 13, 23). Bad angels are permitted to try believers now, as Job; good angels are God's ministers of vengeance on the bad (Rev. xii. 8, 9; x. 1, 2). Such shall the saints be at last, "equal to the angels," holy, made perfect, judges of angels and the world, ministering mediators of blessing to subject creatures (Heb. xii. 23; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3; Rev. v. 10).

In the natural world angels minister, as in directing wind and flame (according to one translation of Ps. civ. 4, Heb. i. 7): "the angel of Jehovah" wrought in the plague on the Egyptian firstborn (Exod. xii. 23, Heb. xi. 28), and on the rebels in the wilderness (1 Cor. x. 10), on Israel under David (2 Sam. xiv. 16, 1 Chron. xxi. 16), on Sennacherib's army (2 Kings xix. 35), on Herod (Acts xii. 23). An angel troubled the pool of Bethesda (the Alex. MSS. supports the verse, the Sin. and the Vat. MSS. reject it), giving it a healing power, as in our mineral springs (John v. 4). They act, in an unknown way, in and through "nature's laws." In the spiritual world too: by their ministry the Sinaiic law was given, "ordained by angels" (Gal. iii. 19), "spoken" by them (Heb. ii. 2), by their "disposition" or appointment (Acts vii. 53; comp. Dent. xxxiii. 2, Ps. lxxviii. 17). From the first creation of our world they took the liveliest interest in the earth (Job xxxviii. 7). When man fell by evil angels, with beautiful propriety it was ordered that other angels, holy and unfallen, should minister for God in His reparation of the evil caused to man by their fallen fellow spirits. They rescued at Jehovah's command righteous Lot from doomed Sodom, Jacob from his murderous brother (Gen. xix., xxxii.). "Manna" is called "angels' food," "the corn of heaven"; not that angels eat it, but it came from above whence angels come, and through their ministry (Ps. lxxviii. 25). When Elisha was in Dothan, surrounded by Syrian hosts, and his servant cried, "Alas! how shall we do?" the Lord opened his eyes to see the mount full of chariots and horses of fire round about (2 Kings vi. 15, 17, comp. Ps. xciv. 7).

By God's angel Daniel was saved in the lions' den (Dan. vi. 22); comp. Dan. iii. 28 as to the fiery furnace. Michael (whom some questionably identify with the Son of God) is represented as Israel's champion against Israel's (the literal and the spiritual) accuser, Satan (Dan. xii. 1, comp. Rev. xii. 7-10). Dan. x. unfolds the mysterious truth that there are angel princes in the spirit world, answering to the God-opposed leaders of kingdoms in the political world, the prince of Persia and the prince of Grecia standing in antagonism to Michael. In patriarchal times their ministry is more familiar, and less awful, than in after times. Comp. Gen. xxiv. 7, 49 (the angelic guidance of Abraham's servant in choosing a wife for Isaac, and encouraging Jacob in his loneliness at Bethel on first leaving home, xxviii.) with Jud. vi. 21, 22, xiii. 16, 22. They appear, like the prophets and kings in subsequent times, in the character of God's ministers, carrying out God's purposes in relation to Israel and the heathen world powers (Zech. i. ii., iii., iv., etc.). When the Lord of angels became flesh, they ministered before and at His birth (Luke i., ii., Matt. i. 20), after the temptation (Matt. iv. 11), in the agony of Gethsemane (Luke xxii. 43), at His resurrection and ascension (Matt. xxviii. 2, Luke xxiv. 4, John xx. 12, Acts i. 10, 11). Their previous and subsequent ministrations to men (Acts v. 19, viii. 26, x. 3, xii. 7, Peter's deliverance, xxvii. 23) all hinge on their intimate connection with and ministry to Him, redeemed man's Divine Head (Ps. xci. 11, Matt. iv. 6). Hence they are the guardians of Christ's little ones, not thinking it beneath their dignity to minister to them (Matt. xviii. 10); not attached singly to single individuals, but all or one ready at God's bidding to minister to each. (In Acts xii. the remark, "it is his [Peter's] angel," receives no countenance from Peter or the inspired writer of Acts, Luke; but is the unimpaired guess of those in Mary's house.) Rejoice over each recovered penitent (Luke xv. 10); are present in Christian congregations (1 Cor. xi. 10); exercising some function in presenting the saints' prayers, incensed by Christ's merits, the one Mediator, before God (Rev. viii. 3, v. 8); not to be prayed to, which is thrice forbidden (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9; Col. ii. 18): when we send an offering to the King, the King's messenger durst not appropriate the King's exclusive due. Ministers of grace now, and at the dying hour carrying the believer's soul to paradise (Luke xvi. 22), but ministers of judgment, and gathering the elect, in the great day (Matt. xiii. 39, 41, 49; xvi. 27; xxiv. 31). Their number is counted by myriads (Heb. xii. 22; Gr. "to myriads, namely the festal assembly of angels") (Dent. xxxiii. 2, Ps. lxxviii. 17, Dan. vii. 10, Jude 14). There are various ranks, thrones, principalities, powers in the angelic kingdom of light, as there are also in Satan's kingdom of darkness (Eph. i. 22, vi. 12; Col. i. 16; Dan.

x. 13, xii. 1; Rom. viii. 38). [See SERAPHIM, CHERUBIM, MICHAEL, GABRIEL.] Some conjecture that angels had originally natural bodies, which have been developed into spiritual bodies, as the saints' bodies shall (1 Cor. xv. 40, 46); for they in Scripture accept material food (Gen. xviii.) and appear in human form, and never dwell in men's bodies as the demons, who, naked and homeless, seek human bodies as their habitation (see Luke xx. 26, "equal unto the angels"; Phil. iii. 20, 21). Many of the momentous issues of life are seen often to hinge upon seemingly slight incidents. Doubtless, besides the material instruments and visible agents, the invisible angels work in a marvellous way, under God's providence, guiding events at the crisis so as to carry out the foreordained end. They "desire to look into" the mysteries of redemption, and they learn "by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10, 1 Pet. i. 12). The saints (the living creatures and 24 elders) occupy the inner circle, the angels the outer circle, round the throne of the Lamb (Rev. v. 11).

Aniam. 1 Chron. vii. 19.

Anim. A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 50). Derived from Ainain, "the two springs," perhaps at Khirbet el Jif, near Khirbet el Dibbel, the site of Achaiah's upper and lower springs (Conder, Pal. Expl.).

Anise. Some think the Pimpinella anisum, others more probably the dill, Anethum graveolens, of the order Umbellifera; the seeds used in medicine as carminatives, in cookery as condiments, like caraway seed. "Anise" is from the Gr. not conquerable (anikton) in its healing power; "dill" from the Norse, the soothing herb. The seeds, the leaves, and the stem of dill are (says Rabbi Eliczer) subject to tithe (Matt. xxiii. 23).

Anklet. (Isa. iii. 16, 18, 20). Women wore ankle rings on both feet, joined by short chains, which "tinkled" as they walked, and which made them take gracefully short steps. Livingstone describes an African chief's wife similarly wearing "a profusion of iron rings with little pieces of sheet iron attached to make a tinkling as she walked in her mincing African style."

Anna (Luke ii. 36, 37). Daughter of Phanuel, of Asher; a widow of 84; a prophetess, i.e. guided by Providence, when the infant Jesus was being presented in the temple, to come in "that instant," and enabled by the Spirit to discern and to announce to others the Messiah, and to render praises accordingly. After seven years of married life she had given up all other concerns to join the women who devoted themselves to a continual attendance at the temple services "night and day"; "a widow indeed" (1 Tim. v. 5). One of "God's own elect, which cry day and night unto Him," looking for the promised redemption "unto which the twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 7; contrast Rev. xii. 10, Luke xviii. 7; comp. Exod. xxxviii. 8). It is remarkable she is the only one of note mentioned in Scripture of the tribe of Asher, though the name means blessedness. A sample of an aged female's waiting faith, as Simeon is of an aged man's.

Annas. Son of Seth. Appointed A.D. 7, in his 37th year, to the high-priesthood by Quirinus, the imperial governor of Syria; obliged to give way to Ismael by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea, in the beginning of Tiberius' reign, A.D. 14. Eleazar, son of A., followed Ismael; then Simon; then Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law of A. (John xviii. 13). He remained till A.D. 37. A. is put before Caiaphas, and both are called "highpriests" (Luke iii. 2). Jesus' case was first heard before A., who virtually wielded the highpriest's power, and perhaps was sagan, the highpriest's deputy; then He was tried before Caiaphas. A. probably was president of the Sanhedrin, Caiaphas actually highpriest. But in Acts iv. 6 A. is called "highpriest," Caiaphas, John, and Alexander are called "of his kindred." He lived to old age, and had five sons highpriests.

Anoint. To put oil on the head or body; a practice common in the E. (Ruth iii. 3). To cease anointing was a mark of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2, Dan. x. 3, Matt. vi. 17). A mark of respect to a guest so common that to omit it implied defective hospitality (Luke vii. 46, Ps. xxiii. 5); Heb., "Thou hast made fat," or "unctuous" (John xi. 2, xii. 3). A body was prepared for burial with unguents (Mark xvi. 1, xiv. 8). Metaphorically, "anointed with oil" means successful, joyous (Ps. xcii. 10, Eccles. ix. 8). "Anointing with the oil of gladness" (Ps. xlv. 7, Heb. i. 9) expresses spiritual joy, such as Messiah felt and shall feel in seeing the blessed fruit of His sufferings (Isa. lxi. 3). Anointing prevents excessive perspiration in the hot and arid E., gives elasticity to the limbs, and acts as clothing in both sun and shade. The ordinary clothing is thin, and the heat and sand produce weariness and irritation, which the oil relieves. Oil was used as a medicament for the sick, and liniment for bodily pain (Isa. i. 6), so that it was used as a symbol in miraculous cures (Mark vi. 13). The usage which Christ practised Himself (John ix. 6, 11) and committed to His apostles was afterwards continued with laying on of hands as a token of the highest faculty of medicine in the church. Rome vainly continues the sign, when the reality, the power of miraculous healing, is wanting. Rome's "extreme unction" is administered to heal the soul when the body's life is despaired of. St. James's (v. 14, 15) unction was to heal the body.

The sacred use of oil was for consecrating things or persons to God. So Jacob anointed for a pillar the stone which had been his pillow at Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 18). The oil is a symbol of the Holy Spirit, and as applied to things gave them a ceremonial sacredness, fitting them for holy ministrations. As applied to prophets (1 Chron. xvi. 22, 1 Kings xix. 16), priests (Lev. iv. 3), and kings (Isa. xlv. 1), it marked their consecration to the office, and was a symbol of the spiritual qualification divinely imparted for its due discharge (Exod. xxx. 29, 30). 1 Sam. x. 1, 6: King Saul. 1 Sam. xvi. 13, 14: David thrice anointed: first to the right; then over Judah; then actually over the whole nation. Isa. lxi. 1: Messiah, twice so designated in the O. T. (Ps. ii. 2; Dan. ix. 25, 26), at once Prophet, Priest, and King, the Centre of all prophecy, the Antitype of all priesthood, and the Source and End of all kingship (Luke iv. 18; Acts iv. 27, x. 38). He was anointed with the Holy Ghost from the womb, then at His baptism (John i. 32, 33, 41). Hereby the N. T. marks Him as the Messiah of the O. T. (Acts ix. 22, xvii. 2, 3, xviii. 5, 28). What He is His people are, Messiahs or "anointed ones" by union with Him (Zech. iv. 14), having the unction of the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. i. 21, 1 John ii. 20). Though priests in general were at first anointed, afterwards anointing was restricted to the highpriest, called "the priest that is anointed:" the perfume used was of stacte, onycha, and galbanum, with pure frankincense, and it was death to imitate it. Antitypically, to Christ, the true highpriest alone, belongs the fulness of the Spirit, which it is blasphemy to arrogate. "The Lord's anointed" was the ordinary phrase for the theocratic king (1 Sam. xii. 3, Lam. iv. 20).

"Anointing the shield" was to make the hide of which it was made supple and less liable to crack (Isa. xxi. 5). "Anointing the eyes with eyesalve" expresses imparting of spiritual perceptions (Rev. iii. 18). "The yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing" (Isa. x. 27), i.e., the Assyrian oppression shall be taken away from Judah, because of the consecration that is upon the elect nation, its prophets, priests, kings, and holy place (Ps. ev. 15); the Antitype to all which is Messiah, "the Anointed" (Dan. ix. 24). It is for Messiah's sake that all their deliverances are vouchsafed to His people.

Ant. (Prov. vi. 6-8, xxx. 25: "provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest.") So Hesiod, Works and Days, 776; Horace, Sat., i. 1, 33; Virgil, Æneid, iv. 402; Plautus, Trinummus, ii. 4, 1, 7; Ælian, Natura Animal., ii. 25, vi. 43; Æsop's Fables, 92 (Tauchnitz edition). Ants in northern Europe lie dormant in winter; and do not feed on grain, but flesh of other insects, worms, birds, the honeydew of aphides, and saccharine matter, exuding from trees. But in southern Europe there are species which feed on grain and store it for winter use. Solomon implies, the ant providently and diligently uses the proper seasons for obtaining her food, though she has "no guide, overseer, or ruler," such as man has in parents, teachers, and masters; therefore men are inexcusable in sluggishness. "Redeem the time" (Gr. favourable season) is the spiritual lesson (Eph. v. 16). There is no monarch, such as the queen is among bees; but ants labour together as a republic, having "no ruler" as Solomon describes. Mogridge (Harvesting Ants) has by observation proved that there are four harvesting ants on the Riviera, viz.: Atta barbara, under two forms, the one wholly black, the other red headed; Atta structor, claret brown coloured; and Atta megacephala or Phidole, a minute bodied, yellow ant, with great head, which works chiefly at night. The Atta barbara, mounting the stem of a fruiting plant as shepherd's purse, and seizing a green pod in its jaws, and fixing its hind legs as a pivot, turns round and round and strains the fibres till they snap. Ants sometimes allow the capsules which they have cut to drop, and their companions below carry them away. Neither the Atta barbara nor the structor bring aphides into their nests. A host of ants seek and bring in the grain; others sort the materials, strip off the useless envelopes of seed or grain, and carry them out to throw away. Mogridge found masses of seeds stored in chambers and long sub-cylindrical galleries prepared in the soil. The granaries on a rock covered with earth lay horizontally from one and a half to six inches below the surface. The ants have some mysterious power which checks germination. The few seeds which may germinate the ants prevent from further growth by cutting off the end of the radicle. Heb., "ant," nemalah, is derived by some from Arabic for "clever." The Arabs put one in the new-born infant's hand, saying, "May he prove clever!" Others take it from namal, Heb., "cut off," the body being cut into segments, joined by but a slight thread. Similarly in Prov. xxx. 25 the ants' wisdom is set forth as making up for the absence of the strength of larger creatures. They belong to the family formiceæ, and order Hymenoptera. The mutual affection between the members of the republic is conspicuous in ants. In northern Europe ants strive with their antennæ and so make the aphides discharge the juice extracted by their suckers from vegetables; the ants in fact make the aphides their milk cows, imprisoning a number in their nests to serve as a supply in winter (Huber). Both the insect masters and the insect cows are torpid in winter in northern Europe; but in warm winters both at times come to life.

ANT HILLS.

The Indian ant (Atta providens), according to Col. Sykes, raises up heaps of grass seed in January when they ripen, in store for the season of need.

Antichrist. There are seven sets of passages noteworthy. (I.) Christ's predictions of false Christs and false prophets (Matt. xxiv. 3-31). (II.) John's prophecy of "Antichrist" (this name occurs only with him) (1 John ii. 18-23, iv. 1-3; 2 John 5, 7). (III.) Paul's "adversary" (Gr. antikeimenos, in sound and sense answering to Antichrist) (2 Thess. ii. 1-12; 2 Tim. iii. 1-5), "in the last days, perilous times," characterized by heady high-mindedness, with the form but without the power of godliness, the love of pleasure supplanting the love of God, contrasted with the earlier "latter times," marked by seducing spirits, doctrines of demons, celibacy, and abstinence from meats (1 Tim. iv. 1-5). (IV.) Daniel's "little horn" from among the ten horns of the fourth beast, or Roman empire (vii. 2-7). (V.) Daniel's "little horn" from one of the four notable horns of the third beast, or Græco Macedonia divided into four at Alexander's death, the wilful king (viii. 8-25, xi. 36-39). (VI.) The beast from the sea (Rev. xiii. 1-8), ridden by the whore (Rev. xvii. 1-7). (VII.) The beast from the earth and the bottomless pit, or the false prophet (Rev. xi. 7, xiii. 11-18, xvii. 8-18, xix. 11-21). (I.) The false Christs and false prophets (Matt. xxiv. 24) point to the pretenders to Messiahship before the fall of Jerusalem, the foreshadowing of the future impostors about to deceive all but the elect. They are the spirits of demons which prepare the false prophet's way, but they are not the false prophet himself (Rev. xvi. 13, 14). (II.) John's A. is stated to have been a subject of his oral teaching first (1 John ii. 18, iv. 3), so Paul (2 Thess. ii. 5), and is therefore alluded to, not described. All who deny Jesus's Messiahship and Sonship (as Cerinthus and the Gnostics of John's days) forerun the A. "to come" (the same Gr. verb is used as of Christ's "coming"). (III.) Paul's antikeimenos, "who opposeth all that is called God," is the "A." of John. He is not to come till "he who now letteth (hinders) and that which withholdeth" (hinders); the same Gr. verb as before, only neuter instead of masculine) be taken out of the way; i.e., the curbing power of human law (neuter) and the curber (masculine), viz., the Roman emperor and whoever may be representative of the fourth world kingdom's power just before A. The unanimous consent of the early Christians that the Roman empire is "what withholdeth" was so unlikely to suggest itself to them, inasmuch as regarding it as idolatrous and often persecuting, that this explanation seems to have been preserved from Paul's oral teaching. Another less probable view is that the Holy Spirit is "He who now letteth," and the elect church the thing "that withholdeth," and that is to be taken out of the way on the eve of A.'s coming. (IV.) Daniel's "little horn" (vii. 2-7) of the fourth kingdom is the papacy as a temporal power, rising on the ruins of the Roman empire, and plucking up three of its ten horns. (V.) Distinct from the "little horn" of chap. viii., which is connected with the third, not the fourth, kingdom; Antiochus Epiphanes, of the Syrian fourth part of the divided Græco-Macedonian or third kingdom, who persecuted the Jews, prohibited circumcision, and substituted the worship of Jupiter Olympius, with whom he identified himself as if God, instead of that of Jehovah, in the temple at Jerusalem. But this O. T. A. has a worse antitype in the N. T., viz. the A. of the last days. The language of Dan. viii. 8-25 and xi. 36-39, partially fulfilled by Antiochus, is exhaustively fulfilled only in the last A. (VI.) As the beast from the sea has ten horns, comprising both E. and W., and power is given to it for forty-two months (Rev. xiii. 1, 5), so the little horn (Dan. vii. 3, 7) absorbs the power of the ten-horned fourth beast out of the sea (the Roman empire) and wears out the saints for three and a half times (3½ years, i.e. 42 months, or 1260 years, a year for a day). Both have "a mouth speaking great things" (Dan. vii. 8, 11, 20, 25); both blaspheme against the Most High (Rev. xiii. 6, 7); both make war with the saints, and prevail; both persecute the saints (Rev. xiii. 7-10, xvii. 6), the beast being under the guidance of the harlot, "drunken with their blood." The little horn of Dan. vii. therefore is the first beast of Rev. xiii. Neither the little horn nor the first beast is A., who is an individual; it is a polity.

(VII.) The beast from the earth (Rev. xiii. 11), or as he soon reveals himself (xi. 7, xvii. 8), from the bottomless pit, the false prophet (xvi. 13, xix. 20, xx. 10), appears only when the harlot is unseated from the first beast. The harlot, the once pure woman (Rev. xii.) corrupted, the apostate church, is distinct from the beast which it rides. The church, though corrupted, retains the human form, i.e. God's image, in which man was originally formed. The beast is the world estranged from God and under Satan, and so, however powerful, intellectual, and refined, essentially bestial. The faithful city (Isa. i. 21) having become Babylon, the whore (Rome on the seven hills, Rev. xvii. 9) is punished in righteous retribution by that world upon which she rode, and for which she abandoned her faithful witness for God (Rev. xvii.). Then after her judgment follows A.'s development. The "falling away" of 2 Thess. ii. 3 answers to the first beast of Rev. xiii., also to the departure from the faith, in enforced celibacy, asceticism, doctrines of demons, etc., of 1 Tim. iv. 1-3. In the second Council of Nice, A.D. 787, image worship was sanctioned. In 754 the temporal power of the popes began by Pepin's grant to Pope Stephen III. of the three territories (answering to the three horns plucked up before the little horn, Dan. vii. 8): Rome, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the exarchate of Ravenna;

1260 years from this date would end in 2014. Others date from A.D. 533, Justinian's edict acknowledging Pope John II. head of the church. The wounding to death and then the healing of the beast's deadly wound answers to the revival of idolatry and the setting up of a virtually pagan kingdom again at Rome in the eighth century (Rev. xiii. 3). Again, in the case of the second beast or the false prophet, the wound given at the Reformation is healed, and he appears again as "the beast that was, and is not, yet is," a resurrection man, the embodiment of a resurrection empire, a mock Christ; as the true Christ saith, "I am He that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore" (Rev. i. 18, xvii. 8). As Christ is the second Person in the Trinity, so A. is the second in the anti-trinity, composed of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet (who bears witness to the first beast, as the Holy Spirit witnesseth of the Son). A.'s characteristics (2 Thess. ii.; 1 John ii. 18-22, iv. 3) shall be open opposition to God and religion, a claim to God's exclusive prerogatives, lawlessness, power of lying miracles and of beguiling souls under Satan's energizing, having a lamb's horns, i.e., outwardly resembling Christ or Messiah (Rev. xiii. 11); sitting in God's temple as God, apparently restored Israel's persecutor, whence the sacred Hebrew is the language of Dan. vii.-xii. wherein the little horn from the East is a leading subject, whereas the world's language, Chaldee, is that of Dan. vii. wherein the Romish little horn is described. At first hailed by Israel with hosannas as her Messiah (John v. 43), and making a covenant with the Jews, then breaking it (Dan. ix., xi., xii.; Zech. xi., xii., xiii., xiv.). A., as the second beast or false prophet, will be personally an avowed atheist (1 John ii. 22), yet represent himself as the decaying church's vindicator, compel men to reverence her, breathe new life into her by using the secular arm in her behalf (Rev. xiii. 12-17), concentrating in himself the infidel lawless spirit working in the world from Paul's days (2 Thess. ii. 7). Heretofore infidelity and superstition have been on opposite sides, but when these shall combine against law, liberty, and Christianity, a period mercifully brief shall ensue, unparalleled in horrors by any that has gone before (Dan. xii. 1-3). The two witnesses (Rev. xi.) are variously explained as Moses and Elijah; Joshua the highpriest and Zerubbabel the civil prince; the Word and the faithful church, to be slain or suppressed, perhaps about the same time that the harlot too is judged by the beast or A. (Rev. xvii., xviii., xix.) The place of their temporary death is Jerusalem (Rev. xi. 8), "where our Lord was crucified." "The number of the beast" is 666, i.e. 6, the world's number, in units, tens, and hundreds. Six is next to the sacred seven, which it mimics but falls short of; it is the number of the world given over to judgment. There is a pause between the sixth and seventh seals, the sixth and seventh trumpets; for the judgments of the world are completed in six; at the seventh the world kingdoms become Christ's. As twelve is the number of the church, so six, its half, symbolises the world kingdoms broken. The radicals in Christ are CH, R and ST (X P S); A's monogram personates it, but falls short of it, CH X St (X S S) (666). It is curious that the only unquestionable 666 (1 Kings x. 14, 2 Chron. ix. 13) in the O. T. is the 666 talents of gold that came in yearly to Solomon, and were among the corrupting influences that misled him. Moreover, the only two Gr. nouns in the N. T., whose value numerically is exactly 666, are precisely the two expressing the grand corrupters of the church and sources of idolatry, "tradition" (paradosis), the corrupter of doctrine, "wealth" or the pursuit of it (euporia, only in Acts xix. 25), the corrupter of practice (Col. iii. 5). The children of Adonikam are 666 in Ezra ii. 13, but 667 in Neh. vii. 18. Adonijah, bearing the name of the Lord Jehovah, rose up against the Lord's anointed, and so is a type of A. The Hebrew letters of Baham (type of the false prophet whose spiritual knowledge shall be perverted to Satanic ends; Rev. ii. 14 favours this, also the fact that A. mainly shall oppress Israel, Dan. viii., ix., xi., xii.) amount to 666. The Gr. letters of Lateinos (Irenæus), Rome's language in all official acts, amount to 666. The forced unity marked by Rome's ritual being everywhere in Latin is the premature counterfeit of the true unity, only to be realized when Christ, God's true Vicar on earth, shall appear, and all the earth shall "in a pure language serve the Lord with one consent" (Zeph. iii. 9). The last A. will be closely connected with his predecessor (as the second best is with the first in Rev. xiii.), and will arrogate all Rome's claims besides those peculiar to himself.

Antioch. 1. In Syria, capital of its Greek kings, and of its Roman governors subsequently. Built where Lebanon running N., and Taurus E., meet at a bend of the river Orontes; partly on an island, partly on the level left bank. Near it was Apollo's licentious sanctuary, Daphne. Nicolas the deacon was a proselyte of A. The Christians dispersed by Stephen's martyrdom preached at A. to idolatrous Greeks, not "Grecians" or Greek-speaking Jews, according to the Alexandrine MS. (Acts xi. 20, 26), whence, a church having been formed under Barnabas and Paul's care, the disciples were first called "Christians" there. From A. their charity was sent by the hands of Barnabas and Saul to the brethren at Jerusalem suffering in the famine. Paul began his ministry systematically here. At A. Judaizers from Jerusalem disturbed the church (xv. 1). Here Paul rebuked Peter for dissimulation (Gal. ii. 11, 12). From A. Paul started on his first missionary journey (Acts xiii. 1-3), and returned to it (xiv. 26). He began, after the Jerusalem decree, addressed to the Gentile converts at A., and ended, his second missionary journey there (xv. 36; xviii. 22, 23). His third journey also began there. Ignatius was subsequently bishop there for forty years, down to his martyrdom A.D. 107.

A. was founded by Seleucus Nicator, and Jews were given the same political privileges as Greeks. Antiochus Epiphanes formed a great colonnaded street intersecting it from one end to the other. Pompey made it a free city. The citizens were famed for sourdity and giving nick-names. "CHRISTIAN" [see] was probably a name of their invention, and not of the disciples' origination. Now called Antakia, a poor mean place: some ancient walls remain on the crags of mount Silpins. A gateway still bears the name of Paul.

PAUL'S GATE, ANTIOCH.

2. ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA. Also founded by Seleucus Nicator. Made a colony by Rome; called also Cesarea. Now Yalobatch, on a high ridge. When Paul, on his first missionary tour with Barnabas, preached in the synagogue there, many Gentiles believed. The Jews therefore raised a persecution by the wealthy women of the place, and drove him from Antioch to Iconium, and followed him even to Lystra (Acts xiii. 14, 50, 51; xiv. 19, 21). On his return from Lystra he revisited A. to confirm the souls of the disciples amidst their tribulations. In 2 Tim. iii. 11 he refers to Timothy's acquaintance with his trials at A. of Pisidia; and Timothy's own home was in the neighbourhood (Acts xvi. 1).

Antiochus. 1. Theus, "King of the N." (Dan. xi. 6.) Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, to end the war with him, gave Berenice his daughter to A., who divorced Laodice to marry Berenice. But Ptolemy having died, Berenice did "not retain the power of the arm," i.e., she was unable to be the mainstay of peace; for on Ptolemy's death A. took back Laodice, who then poisoned him, and caused Berenice and her son to be slain. "But out of a branch of her roots stood up" in the place of Philadelphus (marg.) Ptolemy Euergetes, Berenice's brother, who avenged her, overran Syria, and slew Laodice, "carrying captives into Egypt their gods, princes, and vessels of silver and gold." He restored to Egypt many of the idols carried away formerly by the Persian Cambyzes, whence the idolatrous Egyptians surnamed him Euergetes (benefactor). He "continued [four] more years than the king of the N.," A.

2. Antiochus the Great, the grandson of A. Theus, and son of Seleucus Callinicus, "came and overflowed and passed through," recovering all the parts of Syria taken by Euergetes, and reached "even to his [border] fortress," Raphia, near Gaza. Here "the king of the S.," Ptolemy Philopator, Euergetes' son, "shall fight with"

A., and A.'s "multitude [70,000 infantry and 500 cavalry] shall be given into his hand." 10,000 were slain and 4000 made captive. Ptolemy's "heart was lifted up" by the victory, so that though he "cast down many ten thousands, he was not strengthened by it," through his luxurious indolence. For A. "returned after certain years" (14 after his defeat at Raphia) against Philopator's son, Ptolemy Epiphanes. "In those times many stood against the king of the S.," Epiphanes, viz. Philip of Macedon and "robbers of the people," factions Jews, who, revolting from Ptolemy, helped A. unconsciously, "establishing the vision," i.e. fulfilling God's purpose of bringing trials on Judaea, "but failing," i.e. failing in their aim to make Judaea independent. So A., overcoming the Egyptian general Scopas at Panæas, near the Jordan's sources, forced him to surrender at Zidon, a "fenced city." Thus A. "did according to his own will, standing in the glorious land (Judaea) which by his hand was consumed," Heb. perfected, i.e. perfectly brought under his sway, or else desolated by being the arena of conflict between Syria and Egypt. The "upright ones with him" were Israelites, so called from their high privileges, though their practice of violence in support of a heathen king is reprobated. Next he thought, by wedding his "daughter" Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes, ultimately to gain Cilicia, Lycia, and even Egypt itself; "corrupting her," i.e. making her his tool; but "she did not stand on his side, but on that of her husband." Then he "took many of the isles" in the Ægean in his war with the Romans. But Scipio Asiaticus routed him at Magnesia 190 B.C., and so "caused the reproach offered by him [to Rome's allies] to cease." Then, compelled to cede his territory W. of Taurus, "he turned his face toward the fort of his own land," i.e. garrisoned the cities left to him. Finally, trying to plunder Jupiter's temple at Elymais, he "fell" in an insurrection of the inhabitants. Seleucus succeeded, "a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom," or, as Maurer explains, "one who shall cause the taxgatherer to pass through the glorious kingdom," Judaea; i.e. inheriting it by hereditary right. "Within a few days [12 years, "few" in comparison with A.'s 37 years] he was destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle," but poisoned by Heliodorus.

3. Antiochus IV. succeeded, surnamed Epiphanes, "the illustrious," for establishing the royal line against Heliodorus. Nicknamed Epimanes, "madman," for his great unkingly freaks, carousing with the lowest, bathing with them in public, and throwing stones at passers by. Hence, and because of his craftily supplanting Demetrius, the rightful heir, he is called in Dan. xi. "a vile person." He "came into the kingdom by flatteries" to Enmenes and to Attalus of Pergamum, and to the Syrians high and low. With his "flood" like hosts the Egyptians and Ptolemy Philometor, "the prince of the covenant," were "overflowed from before him." Philometor was in covenant with him by right, being son of Cleopatra, A.'s sister, to whom A. the Great had promised, as dowry in marrying Ptolemy Epiphanes, Coelosyria and Palestine. Philometor's generals in trying to obtain these covenanted promises were defeated, and Pelusium, the key of Egypt, was taken 171 B.C. A. Epiphanes "worked deceitfully," feigning friendship to young Philometor, and "with a small people" or force, "peaceably" in pretence, he took Memphis and "the fattest places," and seized Philometor. Thus he "did that which his fathers had not done," viz., gained Egypt, and "scattered among (his dependants) the prey." "He forecast his devices against the strongholds" of Egypt. He gained all except Alexandria. Retiring to Judaea, where the Jews in joy at the report of his death had revolted, he took Jerusalem. He then "stirred up his power with a great army against the king of the S.," Ptolemy Physcon (the gross), made king by the Egyptians because Philometor was in A.'s hands. The Egyptian king did "not stand," for his own nobles

"forecast devices against him." At last A., when checked at Alexandria, met the Egyptian king at Memphis, and "both spoke lies at one table," trying to deceive one another. In his capture of Jerusalem, guided by Menelaus the highpriest "against the holy covenant," he took away the golden altar, candlestick, vessels of gold and silver from the temple, sacrificed swine on the altar, and sprinkled swine broth through the temple; his spoils from it amounted to 1000 talents. A second time he openly invaded Egypt, but his invasion was not successful "as the former." Popilius Lenas, the Roman ambassador, arriving in Greco-Macedonian ships ("of Chittim") and compelling him to return. Finding that God's worship had been restored at Jerusalem, "he had indignation against the holy covenant." He "had intelligence (correspondence) with them that forsook the holy covenant." Menelaus and others, who had cast off circumcision and treated all religions as equally good for keeping the masses in check, and adopted Greek customs and philosophy. A.'s general, Apollonius, dismantled Jerusalem, and from a high fortress slew the temple worshippers. A. commanded all on pain of death to conform to the Greek religion, and consecrated the temple to Jupiter Olympius or Capitulinus. Identifying himself with that god "whom his fathers knew not," and whose worship he imported from Rome, he wished to make his own worship universal. The Jews were constrained to profane the sabbath and monthly on the king's birthday to eat of the idol sacrifices, and to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy. This was the gravest peril that ever befel the theocratic nation; hence arose the need of a prediction so detailed as Dan. viii. and xi. Porphyry, the opponent of Christianity, had to admit the accurate correspondence of the facts to the prediction, but explained it away by alleging the latter to have been written after the events. But as Messianic events are foretold in Daniel, Jesus' adversaries, the Jews, would never have forged the prophecies which confirm His claims. Dan. ix. would comfort the faithful Jews amidst the "abominations" against "the covenant," with the prospect of Messiah, who would confirm it. Bringing salvation, yet abolishing sacrifices, He would show that the temple services which they so missed were not indispensable to real worship. Language is used (Dan. xi. 31-45) which only in type applies to A., but exhaustively to Antichrist. A. "took away the daily sacrifice, and placed [on the 15th day of Cisleu, on Jehovah's altar] the abomination [idol, Jupiter Olympius' image] that maketh desolate," i.e. that pollutes the temple. The Maccabees (see 1 and 2 Mace. in Apocrypha), "who knew their God, were strong" in their determination not to deny Him, and "did exploits." Judas, son of the patriot Mattathias, took as his motto the initials of Mi Camokah Baclim Jehovah (Exod. xv. 11), "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods?" Allusion occurs to the martyrs under A. in Heb. xi. 35-37: "others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." Seven brothers and their mother submitted to a torturing death rather than deny their faith, the third saying, "Thou takest us out of this present life, but the King of the world shall raise us up who have died for His laws unto everlasting life" (comp. Dan. xii. 2). Two women who circumcised their infant boys were cast down with them headlong from the wall. Eleazar when forced to eat swine's flesh spit it out, choosing to suffer death at fourscore and ten rather than deny the faith (comp. the apocryphal 2 Mace. vi. and vii.). Some were roasted alive "by flame" in caves, whither they had fled to keep the sabbath. The first of the seven brothers, after his tongue was cut off, was fried to death in a heated pan. The persecution lasted three years; then, by the Maccabees, who defeated A.'s troops under Lysias, the Jews were "helpen with a little help," i.e. saved from extinction until the times of the Romans. A., whilst invading Egypt, hearing "tidings out of the E. and out of the N.," of a revolt of his vassal Artaxias, king of Armenia, in the N., and Arsaces of Parthia in the E., went forth with great fury, on the way took Arad in Judaea, devastated Phoenicia (according to Porphyry), "planting the tabernacles of his palace between the seas" (the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean), attacked the temple of Name at Elmais, ("the desire of women," the Syrian Venus; but the antitypical reference is to Messiah, whom Antichrist shall try to supplant,) to replenish his treasury, so as to renew the war with the Jews. But, failing, "he came to his end" at Tabe, and "none helped him" (1 Mace. iii. 10-37, vi. 1-16; 2 Mace. ix. 5). "The Lord Almighty, the God of Israel, smote him with an incurable plague; for as soon as he had spoken these words (that he would make Jerusalem a common burying place of the Jews) a remediless pain of the bowels came upon him," etc., 161 B.C. The prominence given to A. in Daniel is because it was the turning point in Jewish history, deciding whether Greek worldly refinements were to stifle Israel's true faith. Persecution was God's appointed way to save His people from seductions which had wellnigh made them compromise their witness for His truth. A. was the unconscious instrument. At first he followed the liberal policy of his predecessors; but when it suited his purpose to plunder the Jews and destroy their polity, he did not hesitate, and the corruptions prevalent and the rivalries of Jason and Menelaus for the highpriesthood afforded him the occasion. Disregarding his hereditary gods himself (Dan. xi. 37-39), and only recognising the Roman war god or "god of forces," he regarded "fortresses" as the true temples (the Heb. for "forces" may be translated "fortresses"), and was incapable of appreciating the power which true religion can call forth. Thus he is the vivid type of the last Antichrist, whose terrible, though short, persecutions shall drive Israel to their Saviour, and so usher in their coming glory (Zech. xi. xii., xiii., xiv.; Dan. xii.; Ezek. xxxvii., xxxviii., xxxix.).

Antipas. A martyr faithful unto death at Pergamos (Rev. ii. 13). "I know . . . where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is" (the idol Æsculapius was worshipped there under the serpent form); "and thou holdest fast My name, and hast not denied My faith, even in those days wherein A. was My faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth." Satan, the old serpent, instigated the idol's devotees, through the magistrates at Pergamos, to slay A. Comp. ver. 10, xii. 1-17.

Antipatris. Acts xxiii. 31. The station between Jerusalem and Caesarea where the soldiers left Paul, after their night march, in charge of the horsemen who were to take him forward to Caesarea on the morrow. The old name was Caplarsala. The modern Arabic Kejr Saba does not exactly correspond to A.; for A. was 16 miles from Jaffa, Kejr Saba is only 14; A. was well watered, Kejr Saba has no spring. Herod rebuilt it, and called it Antipatris from his father. It lay in a well watered and wooded plain, near a hilly ridge. The remains of the old Roman road by Gopina to A. were discovered by Dr. Eli Smith. It reaches Ras-el-Ain by Jifneh and Tibneh, thence along the foot of the hills to Jiljuleh, Kalkilia, and Caesarea (Kaisariyeh). Its el Ain is probably the true site. The crusaders' castle of Mirabel was built on the foundations of an older edifice; at its foot are the largest springs in Palestine. The Roman road between Jerusalem and Caesarea strikes the plain immediately E. of A. It is, as Josephus describes, in the plain, yet near the mountains. It lies near the nahr Aujeh (Aujeh river), at a point where by a ditch to the mountains the course of a hostile army might be stopped. Not so Kefr Saba. (See Josephus, Ant. xiii. 15, 1; xvi. 5, 2. B. J. i. 4, §7.)

Antothijah. 1 Chron. viii. 21.

Anub. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

Apelles. A Christian saluted in Rom. xvi. 10 as "approved in Christ." A common Jewish name, probably not, as Origen thought, Apollon. Said to have been afterwards bishop of Smyrna.

Apes. Imported once every three years in Solomon's and Hiram's Tarshish fleets (1 Kings x. 22, 2 Chron. ix. 21). Heb. quoph. The ape in Sanskrit is called kapi, "numble;" Gr. kepos, akin to Engape. Solomon, as a naturalist, collected specimens from various lands. Tarshish is identified by Sir Emerson Tennent with some Ceylon seaport; so the apes (quophim) brought to Solomon probably came from Ceylon, which abounds also in "ivory and peacocks." The Tamil names, moreover, for "apes," "ivory," and "peacocks," are identical with the AFRICAN APE.

Heb. Others think Ophir was on the E. African coast; then the apes would be of Ethiopia.

Apharsathelchites. Apharsachites identical (Ezra iv. 9, v. 6). Apharsites distinct (Ezra iv. 9). There were mountaineers, Paratace, between Media and Persia, who may answer to the former. The latter seems to correspond to the Persians, in a local and restricted sense; else the Parthasii.

Aphek = strength. 1. Same as Aphekah (Josh. xv. 53). A Canaanite royal city, the king of which was killed by Joshua (xii. 18). 2. In the extreme N. of Asher (Josh. xix. 30). The Aplik from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Jud. i. 31). Probably too the A. on the N. "border of the Amorites" (Josh. xiii. 4, 5), the Aphaca of the classics, famed for Venus' temple, now Afka, on the N.W. slopes of Lebanon; mentioned in company with Baal-Gad, the other northern sanctuary. 3. The place of the Philistines' encampment before the Israelites' defeat in which Eli's sons were killed and the ark was taken (1 Sam. iv.); also before the battle in which Saul was slain (1 Sam. xxix.); on the Philistines' high road to Jezreel. 4. On the road from Syria to Israel (1 Kings xx. 25, 26), in the level plain E. of Jordan; a common field of battles with Syria (2 Kings xiii. 17). Now Fik, at the head of the wady Fik, six miles E. of the sea of Galilee, still on the great road between Damascus, Nabulus, and Jerusalem.

Aphiah. 1 Sam. ix. 1. [See BECHER.] Aphrah. Mic. i. 10. Meaning dust, which the following words, "roll thyself in the dust," allude to. Identified by Winer with Ophrah of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23); or, as Rabbi Tanchum, a town near Jerusalem. The prophet tells his countrymen not to declare their sorrow in hostile Gath, but in their own cities.

Apshes. 1 Chron. xxiv. 15.

Apocrypha=hidden, and so spurious. Applied by Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian to forged books which heretics put forward as canonical, and as possessing a secret esoteric knowledge, known only to the initiated; comp. Col. ii. 3. The orthodox applied in scorn a term which the heretics used in honour. They are not included in the lists by Melito, bishop of Sardis, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Jerome; the last noted as "apocryphal" the writings added in the LXX., I. and II. Esdras, Tobit, Judith, the sequel of Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, the Song of the Three Children, Story of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Manasses' Prayer, and I. and II. Maccabees. In his Prologus Galeatus, having enumerated the canonical books, he says: "whatever is beside these is to be placed in the A., and is to be read only for edification, . . . not to establish the authority of ecclesiastical doctrines." In the face of the authority of the Heb. church, "to whom were committed the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 2), and in the face of Jerome, the author of the Vulg., Rome's standard version of the Bible, the Council of Trent raises the A. to the same level as the inspired O. T. Scriptures. Josephus rejects the A.; Philo never refers to it; the Lord and His apostles, though quoting the O. T. so frequently, never quote the A. The N. T. links itself immediately with the end of O. T., as if no inspired writing came between. The gospel begins at the onset with claiming to be the fulfilment of Malachi (iii. 1. iv. 5, 6; comp. Mark i. 2, Luke i. 16, 17). There is a lack of inherent power and majesty in the A., as compared with canonical Scripture. The son of Sirach (Prologue, chap. xxxix., vii. 27) claims no higher pretension than that of wisdom and learning. Comp. also 1 Macc. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41 for their own confession of the inferiority in prophetic gifts of the age after, as contrasted with the age before, the canon was closed. No one claims the coming to him of "the word of Jehovah." Moreover, in the A. occur unscriptural fables, fictions, and doctrinal errors: comp. Tobit (vi. 1-8), Judith (ix. 10), 2 Macc. ii., Bel and the Dragon, the merit-earning power of alms, prayers for the dead, etc. They utterly want the progressive plan and mutual interconnection of the O. T. and N. T. Scriptures. Historical errors, inaccuracies, and evidently fictitious stories and speeches occur.

Still, the apocryphal writings possess great interest as unfolding to us the workings of the Jewish mind in the long uninspired age between Malachi and Matthew. They mirror forth the transition period between the O. T. and the N. T., the age of the heroic struggle wherein the Maccabees rescued their country and race from the persecuting fanaticism of Antiochus Epiphanes. The earliest book dates about the beginning of the third century B.C., the 2nd Book of Esdras about 30 B.C. Above all the Book of Wisdom rises to a strain among the loftiest in human productions. Its personification of wisdom as "the unspotted mirror of God's power, and the image of His goodness," the teacher of all "holy souls" in "all ages" (chap. vii. 26, 27), guiding and ruling God's people, foreshadows John's revelation of "the Word," the Declaration of the unseen God, the Light that lighteth every man. Its representation of the temple as "a resemblance of the holy tabernacle" which God "has prepared from the beginning" (chap. ix. 8) is sanctioned by Heb. viii. and ix. It rises above many Jewish prejudices, vindicating God's universal love and righteousness and the spirituality of His worship; thus preparing the way for the higher gospel revelation (chaps. i., ii., iii. 1, xi. 23-26, xii. 16, xiii. 6).

The apocryphal books of N. T. times have been universally excluded from Scripture. The Epistle of Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas are among the oldest, and are genuine though uninspired; most of them are spurious, as the Apostolical Constitutions, the Gospel of James, etc. Apollonia. A city of Macedonia. Paul and Silas passed through it on their way to Thessalonica from Philippi and Amphipolis (Acts xvii. 1). In Myzdonia, 30 miles from Amphipolis, 37 from Thessalonica.

Apollon=Apollonius, or Apollodorus. An Alexandrine Jew, "eloquent (or learned)" (which had been translated into the famous Gr. version, the Septuagint, at his birthplace) (Acts xviii. 21, 25). "Instructed in the way of the Lord," so far as John the Baptist could instruct him; for this had been the main subject of John's ministry, "prepare ye the way of the Lord" (Matt. iii. 3). A. was "fervent in spirit;" and so when he came to Ephesus, "he spake and taught diligently the things of Jesus" (so the three oldest MSS. read), as John had pointed to Jesus as the Messiah. But A. knew only the water baptism of John; he did not yet know that what John had foretold ("I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance, but He [Messiah] shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire") had actually come to pass, in the church's baptism with the Spirit on pentecost, and that graces and gifts were now being bestowed on the several living stones composing "the temple of the Holy Ghost." (Comp. Acts ix. 1-6.) But Aquila and Priscilla, on hearing him, "took him unto them and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly." Thus having received new light he went forth to Achaia, watering the seed there that Paul had already planted (1 Cor. iii. 4-6), and "helped them much which had believed through grace." His deep knowledge of the O. T. gave him especial power with the Jews, "for he mightily convinced them publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ." Some at Corinth abused his name into a party watchword, saying, "I am of Apollos," so popular was he. But Paul, whilst condemning their party spirit, commends A., and writes that he had "greatly desired our brother A. to come" unto the Corinthians (1 Cor. xii. 12). But A. was disinclined to come at that time; probably to give no handle for party zeal, until the danger of it should have passed away. Those who made his name their party cry were attracted by his rhetorical style acquired in Alexandria, as contrasted with the absence of "excellency of speech and enticing words of man's wisdom" (1 Cor. ii. 1-4), and even in their estimation "the contemptible speech" (2 Cor. x. 10), of Paul. The last Bible notice of him is in Tit. iii. 13, where Paul charges Titus, then in Crete, "bring Zenas the lawyer and A. on their way diligently, that nothing may be wanting to them." Jerome states that A. remained at Crete till he heard that the divisions at Corinth had been healed by St. Paul's epistle; then he went and became bishop there. A.'s main excellency was as builder up, rather than founder, of churches. His humility and teachableness in submitting, with all his learning, to the teaching of Aquila and even of Priscilla (a woman), his fervency and his power in Scripture, and his determination staying away from where his well-deserved popularity might be made a handle for party zeal, are all lovely traits in his Christian character.

Apollyon = destroyer. Satan (Rev. ix. 11). He is the tempter, in order that he may be at last the destroyer. The Gr. trans. of the Heb. Abaddon (destruction). As the twofold names Abba (Heb.) Father (Gr.) in Mark xiv. 36 combine Jew and Gentile in the common salutation, so Satan's two names Abaddon (Heb.) and A. (Gr.) combine them in a common destruction.

Apostle = one sent forth. The official name of the twelve whom Jesus sent forth to preach, and who also were with Him throughout His earthly ministry. Peter states the qualifications before the election of Julius' successor (Acts i. 21), viz., that he should have companied with the followers of Jesus "all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them, beginning from the baptism of John unto the day that He was taken up, to be a witness with the others of His resurrection." So the Lord, "Ye are they that have continued with Me in My temptations" (Luke xxii. 28). The Holy Spirit was specially promised to bring all things to their remembrance whatever Jesus had said, to guide them into all truth, and to enable them to testify of Jesus with power to all lands (John xiv. 26; xv. 26, 27; xvi. 13, 14). They were some of them fishermen, one a toll collector, and most of them unlearned. Though called before, they did not permanently follow Him till their call as apostles. All were on a level (Matt. xx. 20-27; Mark ix. 34-36). Yet three stood in especial nearness to Him, Peter, James, and John; they alone witnessed the raising of Jairus' daughter, the transfiguration, and the agony in Gethsemane. An order grounded on moral considerations is traceable in the enumeration of the rest: Judas, the traitor, in all the lists stands last. The disciples surrounded Jesus in wider and still wider expanding circles: nearest Him Peter, James, and John; then the other nine; then the seventy; then the disciples in general. But the "mystery" was revealed to all alike (Matt. x. 27). Four catalogues are extant: Matthew's (x.), Mark's (iii. 16), Luke's (vi. 14) in the Gospel, and Luke's in Acts i. 13. In all four the apostles are grouped in three classes, four in each. Philip heads the second division, i.e. is fifth; James the son of Alphaeus heads the third, i.e. is ninth. Andrew follows Peter on the ground of brotherhood in Matthew and Luke; in Mark and Acts James and John, on the ground of greater nearness to Jesus, precede Andrew. In the second division Matthew modestly puts himself after Thomas; Mark and Luke give him his rightful place before Thomas. Thomas, after his doubts were removed (John xx. 28), having attained distinguished faith, is promoted above Bartholomew (= Nathanael) and Matthew in Acts. In Matthew and Mark Thaddeus (= Lebbaeus) precedes Simon Zelotes (Heb. "Canaanite," i.e. one of the sect the Zealots). But in Luke and Acts Simon Zelotes precedes Jude (Thaddeus) the brother of James. John gives no catalogue, but writing later likes it for granted (Rev. xxi. 14, 19, 20). In the first division stand Peter and John, N. T. writers, in the second Matthew, in the third James and Jude. The Zealot stood once the last, except the traitor, but subsequently became raised; bigotry is not always the best preparation for subsequent high standing in faith. Jesus sent them in pairs: a good plan for securing brotherly sympathy and co-operation. Their early mission in Jesus' lifetime, to preach repentance and perform miracles in Jesus' name, was restricted to Israel, to prepare the way for the subsequent gospel preaching to the Jews first, on and after pentecost (Acts iii. 25). They were slow to apprehend the spiritual nature of His kingdom, and His crucifixion and resurrection as the necessary preliminary to it. Even after His resurrection seven of them returned to their fishing; and it was only by Christ's renewed call that they were led to remain together at Jerusalem, waiting for the promised Comforter (John xxi. Acts i. 4). From the day of the pentecostal effusion of the Holy Ghost they became new men, witnessing with power of the resurrection of Jesus, as Jesus had promised (Luke xxiv. 48, 49; Acts i. 8, 22, ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32, xiii. 31). The first period of the apostles' working extends down to Acts xi. 18. Excepting the transition period (Acts viii.-x.) when, at Stephen's martyrdom, the gospel was extended to Samaria and to the Ethiopian eunuch by Philip, Jerusalem is its centre, and Peter the prominent figure, who opened the kingdom of heaven (according to Jesus' promise to him, Matt. xvi. 18, 19) to the Jews and also to the Gentiles (Acts ii., x.). The second period begins with the extension of the kingdom to idolatrous Gentiles (Acts xi. 19-26). Antioch, in concert with Jerusalem, is now the centre, and Paul the prominent figure, in concert with the other apostles. Though the ideal number always remained twelve (Rev. xxi. 14), answering to the twelve tribes of Israel, yet just as there were in fact thirteen tribes when Joseph's two sons were made separate tribal heads, so Paul's calling made thirteen actual apostles. He possessed the two characteristics of an A.; he had "seen the Lord," so as to be an eye witness of His resurrection, and he had the power which none but an A. had, of conferring spiritual gifts (1 Cor. ix. 1, 2; 2 Cor. xii. 12; Rom. i. 11, xv. 18, 19). This period ends with Acts xiii. 1-5, when Barnabas and Saul were separated by the Holy Ghost unto missionary work. Here the third apostolic period begins, in which the twelve disappear, and Paul alone stands forth, the A. of the Gentiles; so that at the close of Acts, which leaves him evangelizing in Rome, the metropolis of the world, churches from Jerusalem unto Illyricum had been founded through him.

"A." is used in a vaguer sense of "messengers of the churches" (2 Cor. xiii. 23, Phil. ii. 25). But the term belongs in its stricter sense to the twelve alone; they alone were apostles of Christ. Their distinctive note is, they were commissioned immediately by Jesus Himself. They alone were chosen by Christ Himself, independently of the churches. So even Matthias (Acts i. 24). So Paul (Gal. i. 1-12, Rom. i. 1, 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10). Their exclusive office was to found the Christian church; so their official existence was of Christ, and prior to the churches they collectively and severally founded. They acted with a Divine authority to bind and loose things (Matt. xviii. 18), and to remit or retain sins of persons (John xx. 21-23), which they exercised by the authoritative ministry of the word. Their infallibility, of which their miracles were the credentials, marked them as extraordinary, not permanent, ministers. Paul requires the Corinthians to acknowledge that the things which he wrote were the Lord's commandments (1 Cor. xiv. 37). The office was not local; but "the care of all the churches." They were to the whole what particular elders were to parts of the church (1 Pet. v. 1, 2 John 1). Apostles therefore could have strictly no successors. John, whilst superintending the whole, was especially connected with the churches of Asia Minor, Paul with the W., Peter with Babylon. The bishops in that age coexisted with, and did not succeed officially, the apostles. James seems specially to have had a presidency in Jerusalem (Acts xv. 19, xxi. 18).

Once the Lord Himself is so designated, "the A. of our profession" (Heb. iii. 1); the Ambassador sent from the Father (John xx. 21). As A. He pleads God's cause with us; as "High Priest," our cause with God. Appropriate in writing to Hebrews, since the Hebrew high priest sent delegates ("apostles") to collect the temple tribute from Jews in foreign countries, just as Christ is the Father's Delegate to claim the Father's due from His subjects in this world far off from Him (Matt. xxi. 37).

Appaim. 1 Chron. ii. 30, 31.

Appeal. Deut. xvii. 8, 9 implies a court of appeal in hard cases; comp. Jud. iv. 5. The king subsequently deputed persons to inquire into and decide appeals (2 Sam. xv. 3). Jehoshaphat appointed Levites, priests, and some of the fathers to constitute a court of appeal (2 Chron. xix. 8). Comp. Ezra vii. 25. Afterwards the final appeal lay to the Sanhedrim. A Roman citizen could appeal, in criminal cases, from the magistrate to the people; and in after times to the emperor, who succeeded to the power of the people. Paul's appeal (Acts xxv. 11) was from a trial by a provincial magistrate to one by the emperor.

Apphia: Lat. Appia. The wife, or close relative, of Philemon. She would not otherwise be mentioned with Philemon in the address (Philem. 2), on a domestic matter.

Appii Forum. (Acts xviii. 15.) A stage 43 miles from Rome, on the Appian Way, the road from Rome to the Bay of Naples. Here Christian brethren from Rome met Paul. Called from Appius Claudius, who constructed this part of the road. The site is still marked by ruins near Treptoni.

Apple: Heb. tappach. (S. of Sol. ii. 3, 5, vii. 8, viii. 5; Prov. xxv. 11.) The colour was golden, the odour fragrant, the tree green and shady. Probably the citron tree, of which the foliage is perennial, and the blossoms and golden fruit most fragrant. It abounds in W. Asia. In S. of Sol. ii. 5, "Comfort me with apples," the Heb. is "Straw me," etc., i.e., let my couch be strewn with citrons, to refresh me with their scent, or with citron leaves. Prov. xxv. 11: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver"; i.e., like citrons, antifebrile medicinally, attractive to the eye, pleasing the sense of smell and the palate; served up in elaborately figured silver vessels. Oriental ladies make the citron their vinaigrette.

"Apple of the Eye." The promise is in Zech. ii. 8, "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of His eye"; the prayer is Ps. xvii. 8, "Keep me as the apple of the eye"; the fulfilment Deut. xxxii. 10, "He kept him as the apple of His eye." A different Heb. word from tappach, viz., ishon, "little man," i.e. pupil (Gr. kore) of the eye. Called so from the image formed on the retina. The part most precious and most guarded from attack; which feels most acutely the least hurt, and the loss of which is irreparable.

Apples of Sodom. Found on the shores of the Dead Sea; like a cluster of oranges, yellow to the eye, and soft to the touch; but on pressure they explode with a puff, leaving only shreds of the rind and fibres. The Arabs twist the silk into matches for their guns. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 32. The Cubotropis procera, an Indian plant, which thrives in the warm valley of Engedi, but is found scarcely elsewhere in Palestine. Its fruit in winter contains a yellowish dust, of pungent quality. [See VINE OF SODOM.]

Aquila and Priscilla. Always spoken of together. Husband and wife one in Christ. She is named Priscia Rom. xvi. 3 in the three oldest MSS.; Priscilla is its diminutive (2 Tim. iv. 19), the name of endearment. As she is often named first (only in Acts xviii. 2, 1 Cor. xvi. 19) Aquila has the first place; Acts xviii. 26 in Sin., Vat., Alex. MSS. has Priscilla first, she seems to have been the more energetic Christian. Paul found them at Corinth on his first visit there (Acts xviii. 2). They had been driven from Rome by Claudius' decree (mentioned also by Suetonius, Claud., c. 25, who, confounding Judaism with Christianity, writes: "he banished from Rome the Jews who were constantly making disturbances instigated by one Chrestus," i.e. Christ). Aquila was a Jew, born in Pontus (as was the Aquila who translated the O.T. into Gr.); the name is Lat., assumed as Jews often took a Roman name, when thrown into much intercourse with Romans. Their common work, making the Cilician hair or tent cloth, threw Paul and him together, and probably led to his and Priscilla's conversion. A year and a half after Priscilla and Aquila accompanied Paul from Corinth to Ephesus on his way to Syria. There they remained and taught APOLLOS [see] the way of the Lord more perfectly (Acts xviii. 18-28). In 1 Cor. xvi. 19 we find them still at Ephesus, and having "a church (assembling) in their house." So also at Rome (Rom. xvi. 3-5): "My helpers in Christ Jesus; who have for my life laid down their own necks; unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles. Greet the church that is in their house." Afterwards we find them near Timothy, in or about Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 19). The use of opportunities is one great lesson from their history. Paul probably availed himself of his intercourse in their common trade to bring the gospel home to the Jew A., he to his wife. She and he together, as true yokefellows in the Lord, to all within their reach; to Apollos, who became the mighty champion of Christianity, convincing the Jews from the Scriptures at Corinth; setting up "a church in their house" wherever they were; in Ephesus; then at Rome, risking their lives for Paul, and earning thanks of "all the churches of the Gentiles."

Ar. The chief city (as the name means) of Moab (Deut. ii. 9, Num. xxi. 15, 28). On the S. side of the Arnon, due E. of the Dead Sea. Jerome calls it Arcopolis, and Rablath Moab, i.e. great Moab. The site is still called Rabba on the Roman road. Keil however denies that A. is identical with the modern Rabba; he places A. at the confluence of the Lejunn and Mojeib, "in a fine green pasture, where there is a hill with some ruins" (Burekhardt). Rabba is six hours S. of Lejunn. A stone from the Moabite city Medeba has been found inscribed with letters like the Sinaitic. "We drove them away: . . . the people of A., Moab at the marsh ground (or in the midst of the valley); there they made a thankoffering to God their King, and Jeshurun rejoiced, as also Moses their leader." Comp. Num. xxi. 13-15, 21-30, Deut. ii. 18, 29, Josh. xiii. 9, 15, 16. "What the Lord did . . . at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of A., and lieth upon the border of Moab . . . the city that is in the midst of the river." The Amorites of Heshbon had laid waste A., and in their turn were destroyed by Israel. Thus Israel came into possession of A., as the inscription records, confirming Scripture. Thus Keil's site would be the true one. But the reading of the inscription is doubtful. Eusebius implies that Arcopolis is not A., but the same as Rablath Moab, a city of late growth and not mentioned in the Bible.

Ara. 1 Chron. vii. 38.

Arab. A city of Judah in the hilly district (Josh. xv. 52).

Arabah (Josh. xvi. 18) = the plain, is akin to Arabia. The article in Heb. marks it as some definite spot, viz., the deep sunken gorge extending from mount Hermon to the Eleanitic gulf of the Red Sea; the most extraordinary depression on the earth. The Jordan rushes for 150 miles through its northern part (el Ghor) by lakes Huleh and Gennesareth, to the deep abyss of the Dead Sea. The Ghor extends to precipitous cliffs, 10 miles S. of the Dead Sea. Thence to the gulf of Akaba it resumes its old name, wady el Arabah. In Josh. xi. 16, xii. 8, the Arabah takes its place among the natural divisions of the country, and in Deut. iii. 17 in connection with the sea of Chinnereth (Gennesareth) and the Dead Sea. In the plural it is connected with either Jericho or Moab; the A. being in Jericho's case W. of Jordan, in Moab's case E. of Jordan, bare and parched as contrasted with the rich fields of the upper level. The S. A. was the scene of Israel's wanderings in the wilderness, N. of which stood Hormah and Kadesh. They went down the A. southwards (after Edom's refusal to let them pass), from mount Hor, toward the head of the gulf, then up one of the left wadies, by the back of mount Seir to Moab. Remains of a Roman road are traceable along this route. From the absence of the Jordan in S. A. circles of verdure are scarce, such as are met in the Ghor. Its length is 100 miles, its breadth narrowing from 14 at its broadest to about three miles at its entrance into the gulf. The limestone ranges of Tih in long white lines stand on the W. crowned with the table land of "the wilderness of the wanderings" (et Tih), and rise 1500 feet above the A. The pass En Nakh is that of the Mecca pilgrims, between the Akabah and Suez mountains. The other pass, Es Sufah, is probably that at which Israel was defeated by the Canaanites (Deut. i. 44, Num. xiv. 43-45). It goes not, as En Nakh, from the A. to the plateau, but from it to a level 1000 feet higher. The Ghor stands nearly due N. and S.; the A. N.N.E. by S.S.W. On the E. dark porphyry is the body of the mountain; above it sandstone ridges, and highest of all limestone. But Hor is 5000 feet high. According to Isaac's promise to Esau, the dwelling of his descendants is "the fatness of the earth, with corn and wine" (Gen. xxvii. 37-39). A line of chalk cliffs six miles S.W. of the Dead Sea is the bound between the Ghor on the N. and the A. on the S. The Ghor ends with the marsh beneath them. The A. begins level with their summit. The wady el Jeb is the drain of the A., and the route for entering the valley from the N. Heat, desolation, and barrenness characterize this desert. The sirocco blows almost continually, and the ghiblah, the arta, the Anthus virginata, the cobiquinta, and the tamarisk, almost the only traces of vegetation.

The supposition that the Jordan once flowed through the A. into the Red Sea is not likely; for the Red Sea and the Mediterranean are nearly on one level. The depression of the surface of the sea of Galilee is 652 feet, that of the Dead Sea 1316 feet, below the surface of the Mediterranean, and so of the Red Sea. The Jordan therefore could not have flowed into the gulf of Akabah. The northern part of the A. drains into the Dead Sea, the land rising from the N. to the S. The southern part drains into the gulf of Akabah, the land rising from it to the N.

Arabia arid tract. THE ARABIAN (see), originally restricted to one wady, came to be applied to all A. Bounded on the N. by Palestine and Syria, E. by the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, S. by the Arabian Sea and strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, W. by the Red Sea and Egypt, 1700 miles long by 1400 broad. Designated Gen. xxy. 6 "the east country," the people "children of the East" (Gen. xxix. 1, Jud. vi. 3), chiefly meaning the tribes E. of Jordan and N. of the Arabian peninsula. "All the mingled people" is in Heb. ha'ereb (Exod. xii. 38, Jer. xxy. 20, Ezek. xxx. 5), possibly the Arabs. The three divisions are Arabia Deserta, Felix, and Petra. The term Kedem, "the East," with the Hebrews probably referred to ARABIA DESERTA, or N. Arabia, bounded E. by the Euphrates, W. by the mountains of Gilead. Jeremiah (li. 6) describes its features, "a land of deserts and pits, a land of drought and of the shadow of death, that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt." Tadmor or Palmyra "in the wilderness" was on its N.E. border (1 Kings ix. 18). Moving sands, a few thorny shrubs, and an occasional palm and a spring of brackish water, constitute its general character. The sand wind, the simoom, visits it. Hither Paul resorted after conversion for that rest and reflection which are needed before great spiritual enterprises (Gal. i. 17). Moses' stay of 40 years in the same quarter served the same end of preparatory discipline. Its early inhabitants were the Rephaim, Emim, Zuzim, Zamzummim (Gen. xiv. 5); Ammon, Moab, Edom, the Hagarenes, the Nabatheans, the people of Kedar, and many wandering tent-dwelling tribes, like the modern Bedouins, succeeded. The portion of it called the Hamrau, or Syrian desert, abounds in ruins and inscriptions in Greek, Palmyrene, and an unknown tongue. ARABIA FELIX or happy, S. Arabia, bounded on the E. by the Persian Gulf, S. by the Arabian Sea, W. by the Red Sea. Yemen, famed for its fertility (=the right hand, so the south, comp. Matt. xii. 42), and Hadramaut (Hazarmaveth, Gen. x. 26) were parts of it. Sheba answers to Yemen (Ps. lxxii. 10), whose queen visited Solomon (1 Kings x. 1). The dominant family was that of Himyer, son of Saba; one of this family founded the modern kingdom of the Himyerites, now called el Hedjaz, the land of pilgrimage, on account of the pilgrimages to Mecca, the birthplace, and Medina the burial place, of Mahomet. The central province of the Nejd is famed for the Arab horses and camels, "the ships of the desert." Joktan, son of Eber (Gen. x. 25), was the original founder, Ishmael the subsequent head, of its population. The Hagarenes, originally the same as the Ishmaelites, subsequently are mentioned as distinct (1 Chron. v. 10, 19, 22; Ps. lxxxiii. 6). The people of Yemen have always lived in cities, and practised commerce and agriculture. It was famed for gems and gold, spices, perfumes, and gums (1 Kings x. 10, Ezek. xxvii. 22). Many of the luxuries attributed to it, however, were products of farther lands, which reached Palestine and Egypt through Arabia. ARABIA PETREA, called from its city Petra, the rock, or Selah (2 Kings xiv. 7), now Hadjar, i.e. rock. Between the gulfs of Suez and Akabah; Palestine and Egypt are its northern boundary. The desert of mount Sinai (Burr et tur Sinai), where Israel wandered, Kadesh Barnea, Pharan, Rephidim, Ezion Geber, Rithmah, Obodh, Arad, Heshbon, were in it. The wady Leja (perhaps the valley of Rephidim), near Jebel Mousa, and the wady Feiran (Paran, Num. xiii. 3), are most luxuriant. Hawarah (Marah, Exod. xv. 23) is 33 miles S.E. of Ayoun Mousa (the fountain of Moses); 7 miles S. of this is wady Gurundel, perhaps the Elim of Exod. xv. 27. Precipitous bare rocks, void of herbage, form the southern coast. Cush, son of Ham, originally peopled A. (the ruins of Marib, or Seba, and the inscriptions are Cushite; in Babylonia too there are Cushite traces); then Joktan, of Shem's race (Gen. x. 7, 20, 25, 30). The posterity of Nabor, of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv.), of Lot also, formed a part of the population, viz. in Arabia Deserta. Then Ishmael's, then Esau's descendants, for Esau identified himself with Ishmael by his marrying Ishmael's daughter (Gen. xxviii. 9). The head of each tribe is the sheikh; the office is hereditary in his family, but elective as to the individual. The people are hospitable, eloquent, poetical, proud of ancestry, but predatory, superstitious, and revengeful. The wandering and wild Bedouins are purest in blood and preserve most the Arab characteristics foretold in Gen. xvi. 12: "He will be a wild" (Heb. a wild ass of a) "man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him" (marking their incessant feuds with one another or with their neighbours). "and he shall dwell [tent] in the presence of all his brethren." The image of a wild ass untamable, roaming at its will in the desert (comp. Job xxix. 5-8), portrays the Bedouin's boundless love of freedom as he rides in the desert, spear in hand, despising town life. His dwelling in the presence of his brethren implies that Ishmael would maintain an independent nationality before all Abraham's descendants. They have never been completely subjugated by any neighbouring power. Comp. Job i. 15; Jer. xlix. 8, iii. 2; 2 Chron. xxi. 16. From their dwelling in tents they are called Scimitar. Their tents are of goats' hair cloth, black or brown (S. of Sol. i. 5), arranged in a ring, enclosing their cattle, each about 25 feet long and 7 high. The town populations by intermarriages and intercourse with foreigners have lost much of Arab traits. Mecca, in their belief, is where Ishmael was saved and Hagar died and was buried. The Kaaba or Square was built by Seth, destroyed by the flood, and rebuilt by Abraham and Ishmael. Sabeanism, or the worship of the hosts, the sun, moon, and stars, was the first lapse from original revelation (Job xxxi. 26, 27); but just before Mahomet they were divided into Judaism, Magianism, and corrupted Christianity. Mahometanism became the universal faith in A.D. 628. The Wahabees are one of the most powerful sects, named from Abdel Wahab, who in the beginning of last century undertook to reform abuses in Mahometanism.

To the Arabs we owe our arithmetical figures. They took the lead of Europeans in astronomy, chemistry, algebra, and medicine. They spread their colonies from the Senegal to the Indus, and from Madagascar to the Euphrates. The Joktanites of southern A. were seafaring; the Ishmaelites, more northward, the caravan merchants (Gen. xxxvii. 28).

The Arabic language is the most developed of the Semitic languages. In the 14th or 13th century B.C. the Semitic languages differed much less than in later times. Comp. Gen. xxi. 47, Jud. vii. 9-15; Phurah, Gideon's servant, evidently understood the Midianites. But in the 8th century B.C. only educated Jews understood Aramaic (2 Kings xviii. 23). In its classical form Arabic is more modern than Heb., in its ancient form probably sister to Heb. and Aramaic. The Himyaritic is a mixture with an African language, as appears from the inscriptions; the Ekkili is its modern phase. Monuments with Himyaritic inscriptions are found in Hadramaut and the Yemen. There was a Cushite or Ethiopian Sheba, as well as a Shemitic Sheba (Gen. x. 7, 28). The Himyarites had a Cushite descent. The Arabic is one of the most widely spoken languages. The Heb. literature dates from the 15th century B.C., the Arabic only from the 5th century B.C. For this reason, and the greater simplicity of Heb. modes of expression, it seems probable the Heb. is the elder sister. A few Arabic forms are plainly older than the corresponding Heb. The Book of Job in many of its difficult Heb. roots receives much illustration from Arabic. The Arabic is more flexible and abounding in vowel sounds, as suits a people light hearted and impulsive; the Heb. is weightier, and has more consonants, as suits a people graver and more earnest. The Arabic version of the Scriptures now extant was made after Mahomet's time. That in the London Polyglott was in part by R. Saadias Gagn (the Excellent).

Arad. 1. 1 Chron. viii. 15. 2. A Canaanite royal city (Josh. xii. 11). N. of the wilderness of Judah (Jud. i. 16). In Num. xvi. 1, xxxiii. 40, for "king Arad the Canaanite" translate "the Canaanite king of Arad." Robinson identifies it as on the hill Tel Arad between Moladah and Hebron. A large white mound is all that is left to mark the site of the city of the king who attacked Israel.

Arah. 1. 1 Chron. vii. 39. 2. Ezra ii. 5.

Aram (high table land). 1. The elevated region from the N.E. of Palestine to the Euphrates and Tigris. Balam's home (Num. xxiii. 7, Deut. xxxiii. 4). Syria, stretching from the Jordan and lake Gemesareth to the Euphrates, rising 2000 feet above the level of the sea. In contrast to Canaan, the lowland bordering on the Mediterranean. In Gen. xxiv. 10 (Heb.) Aram Nabaraim means "the highland between the two rivers," i.e. Mesopotamia. Padan Aram (from padlah, a plough), "the cultivated highland," is the same as Aram (Gen. xxxi. 18). In Shalmaneser's inscriptions, 900-800 B.C. the Hittites (Khathé), under the name Patena, occur as occupying the valley of the Orontes and eastward. Some identify this name with Padan Aram and Batanea or Bashan. Many petty kingdoms in David's time formed parts of the whole A., ARAM REHOE, ARAM ZOBAR, etc. [see.] Damascus subsequently absorbed these. In Gen. x. A. is described as son of Shem; Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, and A. (arranged in the geographical order from E. to W.) being the four brethren. A. (Syrian) stands for Assyrian in 2 Kings xviii. 26, Jer. xxxv. 11. 2. Another Aram (Gen. xxii. 21), son of Kennel, descended from Nahor; probably head of the tribe Ram, to which belonged Elihu, Job's friend (xxxii. 2).

Aran. A Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 28).

Arazat. Sanskrit=holy ground. A mountainous district in Armenia; the resting place of the ark after the deluge (Gen. viii. 4); but see NOAH. Thither Sennacherib's sons fled after murdering their father (2 Kings xix. 37). The ally of Minni and Ashchenaz (Jer. li. 27). In Gen. xi. 2 translate "they journeyed eastward," Mesopotamia being described relatively to the writer's country, rather than to A., which is N. of Mesopotamia. It overlooks the plain of the Araxes on the N. Berosus the Chaldaean, in Alexander the Great's time, makes the Kurdistan mountains, on the S. frontier of Armenia, the ark's resting place. Nachdjeeon, on the Araxes, is thought to be Noah's place of landing, from Josephus' statement (Ant. i. 3), as also his place of burial. The mountain there, the loftiest in the district, is called Massis by the Armenians, Kuh-i-Nuh, i.e. "Noah's mountain," by the Persians. There are two conical peaks, the greater and the less, seven miles apart; the former 17,300 feet above the sea, and 14,300 above the plain of the Araxes; the latter 4000 feet lower; 3000 feet of the greater covered with perpetual snow.

Lava, cinders, and porphyry cover the middle region, marking the volcanic origin of the mountain. A second summit is about 400 yards from the highest; and on the slope between the two the ark is surmised to have rested. On the side of the greater is a chasma, probably once the crater of the volcano; silence and solitude reign all around; Arguri, the only village on the descent, is the traditional site of Noah's vineyard. In the wide sense A. comprises the whole Armenian range in the N. to the Kaukasian range in the S. The plateau of Armenia is a vast extent of plains rising high above the surrounding plain; and from that plateau, as a fresh base, mountain ranges spring, running generally from E. to W.; transverse ridges connect these. The whole stands in the central point between the Buxine and Caspian on the N., and the Mediterranean and the Persian gulf on the S. The Acampsis, the Araxes, the Euphrates, and the Tigris connect it respectively with the four great seas. The greatest nations, the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Medes, and the Colehians, lay along these routes. A. even now is the central boundary between Russia, Turkey, and Persia. The Armenian plateau, from the longer period of action of the volcanic powers, and from there being room for the expansion of the molten masses in the region around, is far more accessible than the neighbouring region of Caucasus. At Erzerum, 6000 feet above the sea, crops appear in June and are cut in August. The vine ripens at 5000 feet, but in Europe at not higher than 2650 feet. Thus it appears the A. plateau was one especially suited for being the ark's appointed resting place, and its geographical and physical features fitted it as the centre for the even distribution of the human race. The severe climate would drive them after a time to the milder plains below; and in the meantime the grass such as feeds now the flocks of nomad Kurds, in the same region, would meet the wants of Noah's descendants in their nomad life. However, in the Babylonian legend of the Flood deciphered by Mr. G. Smith, Nizir answers to A., not the northern mountain near Erivan, but the A. of Assyrian and Armenian geography, the precipitous range overlooking the Tigris N.E. of Mosul. Arabic Judi, Assyrian Guli.

Araunah=Ornan. A Jebusite, at whose threshingfloor the plague sent for numbering the people was, at David's intercession, stayed. He offered the area as a site for Jehovah's altar, and only by constraint accepted David's pay (50 shekels of silver, 2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24; 600 shekels of gold, 1 Chron. xxi. 25). As 50 silver shekels is far too low a price for the whole land, if there be no transcriber's error here, which is possible, probably the 50 silver shekels were paid for the small floor, the oxen, and wood of the yokes only; the 500 gold shekels for the whole hill on which David afterwards built the temple). Contrast his kingly spirit, "Behold, here be oxen for burnt sacrifice and threshing instruments for wood," with the grovelling excuse of the man invited to the king's banquet (Luke xiv. 19). But comp. Elisha's similar spirit when called of God's prophet (1 Kings xix. 21). Self-sacrifice raises one from degradation low as that of the accursed Jebusites to be in Israel a "king and a priest unto God" (comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 23 with Exod. xix. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Rev. i. 6, v. 10, xv. 6). "These things did A. as a king give" hardly warrant the guess that he was of the royal Jebusite race. Keil translates "all this giveth A. as a king, to the king," which suits the fact that A. gave it in intention, but his offer was not accepted (comp. Matt. viii. 11, 12; 1 Cor. i. 27). Josephus (Ant. vii. 13, § 9) says A. was one of David's chief friends, and spared by him when he took the citadel (v. 7). Probably he made his friendship when fleeing before Saul, when also he made that of Uriah the Hittite, Ittai the Gittite, etc.

Arba = Ar Bual = hero of Bual. Progenitor of the Anakim. From him their city Hebron got its name, Kirjath Arba (Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, xxi. 11). Hebron it was first called, then Mamre, then Kirjath Arba, then it resumed its first name (Gen. xiii. 18, xxiii. 2).

Arbathite (2 Sam. xxiii. 31) = dweller in the ARBATH [see] or Ghor.

Arbite (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). Parai, one of David's guard: a native of Arba, called Naarai, the son of Ezbai (1 Chron. xi. 37).

Archelaus. Son of Herod the Great by Malthea, a Samaritan. Brought up at Rome with his brother Antipas. Originally Herod excluded him from any share in his dominions, because of his elder brother Antipater's accusations. But at Herod's death the kingdom, by a change in the will, was divided between his three sons, Antipas, Archelaus, and Philip. A. received Idumea, Judea, Samaria, and the cities Caesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, which yielded 600 talents income. Augustus refused him the title "king," and only allowed him the title "ethnarch"; but he had the reality of kingship (Matt. ii. 22, "did reign." For the short time only between his father's death and his going to Rome, to seek confirmation of the kingship from Augustus, had he the title. Josephus (Ant. xvii. 9, § 2) at this period calls him "king." How seemingly near to error, yet how accurately Matthew expresses himself. In the tenth year of his reign (A.D. 6) his brothers and his subjects complained of his tyranny. So he was dethroned, and exiled to Vienna in Gaul, where he died; but Jerome says his sepulchre was near Bethlechem. When Josephus at Herod's death, was about to return with the child Jesus from Egypt to the Holy Land, "he heard that A. did reign in Judaea," and "he was afraid to go thither" (Matt. ii. 22). A. must therefore have given at the outset of his reign some notorious specimen of his cruelty. Josephus undesignedly supplies this confirmation of Scripture. One of Herod's last deeds was the putting Judas and Matthias to death for instigating young men to pull down a golden eagle set up contrary to Moses' law over the temple gate by Herod; at the pass-over which succeeded Herod's death, before A. had as yet the emperor's ratification of his accession, A., finding several commiserating the martyrs, caused his cavalry to inclose at the temple and slay 3000 men. The rest fled to the mountains; and all by A.'s command "left the feast, fearing lest something worse should ensue." A deputation of Jews in consequence went to Rome to beg Augustus not to ratify his appointment; but the emperor confirmed Herod's will (Ant. xvii. 9, § 3). That this cruel act was what made Joseph afraid of him is the more likely, as before his accession he had no public post whereby men might have known his character. Joseph turned to Galilee, where the less cruel brother Antipas reigned. The kingdom was originally designed for Antipas; its unexpected transference to A. made Joseph change his direction. The fact of Joseph's fear is stated, the cause is not; but A.'s character otherwise known accounts for it. He wedded illegally his brother Alexander's former wife, Glaphyra, who had children by Alexander, thereby giving much offence to the Jews.

Archevites. Men of Erech, transplanted to Samaria (Ezra iv. 9).

Archippus. A Christian minister at Colosse, whom Paul calls "our fellow soldier," viz. in the Christian warfare (2 Tim. ii. 3). A member of Philemon's family, possibly his son, whence Paul includes him in the same salutation with Philemon and Apphia, and the church in Philemon's house (Philem. 2). In both the Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 17) and that to Philemon (which accompanied it) A. is mentioned. The Colossians are charged, "Say to A., Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil (make full proof of) it." Probably a self-sparing and less zealous spirit betrayed itself in A. Laymen may admonish clergy of their duty, when scriptural faithfulness requires it and they admonish in meekness. Martyred, according to tradition, at Choma, near Laodicea. A. with some reason is supposed to be the angel of Laodicea, whom the Lord, like Paul, reproves (Rev. iii. 14-21).

Archite (the). (2 Sam. xv. 32.) Archi was near Bethel (Josh. xvi. 2).

Arcturus. Gr., answering to the Latin-named constellation Ursa Major; Heb. Yash, or Yash (Job ix. 9, xxxiii. 32, 33). The Great Bear always revolves about the pole, and to our northern hemisphere never sets. The Chaldees and Arabs early named the stars, and grouped them in constellations. Their nomad life, in tending flocks and travelling often by night, tended to make them observe the stars, marking the seasons by their rise and setting, and using them as their nocturnal guide. This throws light on "Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? Or canst thou guide A. with his sons (the three stars in its tail)?" Nay, thou art dependent on him for guiding thee (Gen. i. 14, viii. 22).

Ard (Gen. xlii. 21, Num. xxvi. 40) = Addar (1 Chron. viii. 3).

Ardon. 1 Chron. ii. 18.

Arelh. Gen. xlii. 16, Num. xxvi. 17.

Areopagus (Mars' Hill). A rocky eminence in

Mythology made it the scene of the god Mars' trial before the gods, at Poseidon's accusation, for murdering the son of the latter, Halirrhottus. The most venerable of all the Athenian courts, consisting of all ex-archons of blameless life. It was the Upper Council, to distinguish it from the five hundred, who met in the valley below. It met on the S.E. top of the rock. Sixteen stone steps in the rock still exist, leading from below to Mars' hill, and directly above is a bench of stones cut in the rock facing S., and forming three sides of a quadrangle. Here the judges sat, in criminal and religious cases, in the open air. The accuser and accused had two rude blocks, still to be seen, one on the E., the other on the W. side, assigned them. Paul, "daily disputing" in the market (agora), which lay between the A., the Acropolis, the Pnyx (the place of political assemblies), and the Museum, attracted the notice of "certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoicks." They brought him up from below, probably by the steps already described, and, seated on the benches, heard from him the memorable address, so happily adapted in its uncompromising faithfulness, as well as scholarly allusions, to the learned auditory, recorded in Acts xvii. Paul's intense earnestness strikingly contrasts with their frivolous dilettantism. With the temple of Mars near, the Parthenon of Minerva facing him, and the sanctuary of the Emmenides just below him, the beautiful temple of Theseus, the national hero (still remaining) in view, what Divine power he needed to nerve him to declare, "God that made the world . . . dwelleth not in temples made with hands"; and again in the midst of the exquisitely chiselled statues in front, crowning the Acropolis, Minerva in bronze as the armed champion of Athens, and on every side a succession of lesser images, to reason, "Forasmuch as we are the offspring of God" [which he confirms by quoting his fellow countryman Aratus' poem, "We are His offspring"], "we ought not to think that the Godhead is like gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art or man's device." Yet he does not begin by attacking their national worship, but draws them gently away from their ignorant worship of the Deity under many idols to the one true God, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you." In opposition to the Greek boast of a distinct origin from that of the barbarians, he says, "God hath made of one blood all nations to dwell on all the face of the earth"; and endswith announcing the coming judgment by the Lord Jesus.

Aretas. A common name of many Arabian kings. 2 Cor. xi. 32: "In Damascus the governor [ethnarch] under A. the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me; and through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands." The ethnarch did it to please the Jews, who (Acts ix. 24) "watched the gates day and night to kill Paul." His office was to exercise authority under the king, over the many Jews in large cities: comp. Acts ix. 24. Damascus had been a city of the Roman province, Syria; and we have Damascene coins of Augustus and Tiberius, and afterwards of Nero, etc., but we have none of Caligula. This implies that some change in the government of Damascus took place under Caligula, Tiberius's successor. Moreover, A., king of Arabia Nabatea and its capital Petra, made war on Antipas for divorcing A.'s daughter, and defeated him. But Tiberius, at Antipas's entreaty, commanded Vitellius, governor of Syria, to take A. dead or alive. Before the order was executed Tiberius himself was dead. Then all was reversed. Antipas was banished by Caligula to Lyons, and his kingdom given to Agrippa, his nephew and his foe. It seems therefore to harmonize with history, as well as with Scripture, to assume that in A.D. 38 or 39, when Caligula made several changes in the E., he also granted Damascus to A. The incidental way in which Paul alludes to A.'s skipping over Damascus at the time of his escape from the ethnarch under him, by being let down in a basket from a house on the city wall (comp. Acts ix. 23-25), is a strong presumption for the truth of the Acts and Second Epistle to Corinthians. This was three years after Paul's conversion; so that A.D. 36 will be the date of his conversion.

Argob: 2 Kings xv. 25. Pekahiah's aide de camp, slain by the conspirators under Pekah, in defending the king.

Argob = the stony; a tract E. of Jordan, in Bashan, in Og's kingdom, containing 60 great and fortified cities "with walls and brazen bars"; allotted to Manasseh, and taken by Jair, a chief of that tribe (Num. xxxii. 41). Afterwards one of Solomon's commissariat divisions under an officer at Ramoth Gilead (1 Kings iv. 13). Trachonitis, "the rugged region," was its later Gr. name. Now the Lejah, S. of Damascus, E. of the sea of Galilee; described by Burchardt, Porter, etc., 22 miles from N. to S., 14 from E. to W.; of oval shape, a vast accumulation of basaltic rocks, in wild disorder, intersected with fissures; the black basalt seemingly having issued from the ground liquid, then become agitated, then split by internal convulsion. The cuplike cavities whence it exuded, and the wavy surface, are still to be seen. The rock is hard as flint, and emits a metallic sound when struck. A singular propriety appears in the Heb. for "the region of A." (Deut. iii. 4, 13); it is the same term as for a rope (chebel), i.e. a sharply defined frontier, as if measured off by a rope, the rocky rampart that encircles the Lejah "in a circle clearly defined as a rocky shore line." This region stands 30 feet above the plain below. No other term is used of the region of A.; it is possible therefore that chebel was a provincialism of Manasseh, the tribe that possessed A., for we find Manasseh using the term to Joshua (xvii. 5, 14), "portion," Heb. chebel. [See TRACHONITIS.] Improbable as the statement of Scripture appears, yet it is strictly true. Sixty walled cities are still traceable in a space of 308 square miles. The architecture is ponderous and massive. Solid walls, four feet thick, and stones on one another without cement; the roofs enormous slabs of basaltic rock, like iron; the doors and gates are of stone, 18 inches thick, secured by ponderous bars. The land bears still the appearance of having been "called the land of giants," under the giant Og. A striking contrast to A. is the surrounding plain of the Hauran (Bashan) described as "the plain" (mis-hor), a high plateau of rich pasture and tillage, stretching from the sea of Galilee to the Lejah and beyond to the desert, almost without a stone. The Heb. terms could not have been more happily chosen, A., Chebel, Mishor.

Aridai, Aridatha. Esth. ix. 8, 9. Arieh = lion (2 Kings xv. 25). Slain with King Pekahiah by the conspirator Pekah.

Ariel = lion of God. 1. A brave "chief," who directed under Ezra (xiii. 16) the caravan from Babylon to Jerusalem. ARELI is akin (Num. xxvi. 17). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 20 Winer translates for "two lion like men" two (sons) of A.; but Gesenius supports A. V.

2. A symbolic name for Jerusalem (Isa. xxix. 1, 2), the lion of God, rendered by God invincible. For "the lion of the tribe of Judah" is on her side (Rev. v. 5). "It shall be unto Me as A."; it shall emerge from its dangers invincible, Sennacherib's invasion shall recoil on himself. In Ezek. xliii. 15 "the altar"; the secret of Israel's lion-like strength, her having God at peace with her through the atoning sacrifice there. Mercurius guesses that the lion (ari) was carved on it; but as the word in Heb. of Ezek. xliii. 15 (ariel) is somewhat different from that in Isaiah, perhaps in Ezekiel it means, from an Arabic root, "the hearth of God." Ganneau has deciphered on the Moabite stone that the A. of David is mentioned as taken by Mesha, the Moabite king, at Ataroth, and dragged before the face of Chemosh at Kerioth. The A. here must mean a lion carved altar of God.

Arimathea (Matt. xxvii. 57). The birthplace or abode of the rich man Joseph, who, by Pilate's leave, which he "boldly" craved, casting away the "fear" which had previously kept him from open discipleship (Mark xv. 43, John xix. 38), buried our Lord's body in his own "new tomb" at Jerusalem. A., a "city of the Jews" (Luke's vague expression for the Gentiles, to whom no more precise information seemed needful: xxiii. 51) is possibly identical with Ramath, Samuel's birthplace, called Armathaim in the LXX. (1 Sam. i. 1, 19); but many associate it with Ramleh, on the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem.

Arioeh = lion like. 1. King of ELLASAR [see] (Gen. xiv. 1, 9). 2. Captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard (Dan. ii. 14).

Arisai. Esth. ix. 9.

Aristarehus: of Thessalonica. Paul's companion on his third missionary tour, and dragged into the theatre with Gaius by the mob at Ephesus; he accompanied Paul to Asia, afterwards to Rome (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 2). Paul calls him "my fellow prisoner" (lit. fellow captive, viz. in the Christian warfare), "my fellow labourer," in his epistles from Rome (Col. iv. 10, Philem. 24). Epaphras similarly (Philem. 23, Col. i. 7) is called "my fellow prisoner," "our fellow servant." Paul's two friends possibly shared his imprisonment by turns, A. being his fellow prisoner when he wrote to the Colossians, Epaphras when he wrote to Philemon. Bishop of Apamea, according to tradition.

Aristobulus, whose "household" is "saluted" (Rom. xvi. 10). Himself not being greeted, it is likely either he was not a Christian or was absent from Rome. The family would hardly be called after him, if he were dead.

Ark [see NOAH]. The term (teebah) is applied to the infant Moses' ark. [see BULRUSH]. Teebah is evidently the Egyptian teb, "a chest," Hebraised. It has no Semitic equivalent. It is a type of the manger which disclosed to the shepherds Messiah, who, beginning with the manger, at last ascended to His Father's throne; also of the paper ark to which God has committed His revelation.

Ark of the Covenant (aron, not teebah). An oblong chest of shittim wood (acacia), two and a half cubits long, one and a half broad and deep. F. W. Holland measured acacias nine feet in girth, in the region of Israel's wandering; he attributes their being usually stunted there to the Arabs cutting off the young shoots for the she goats. Thus Colenso's cavil that "not a single acacia" is to be seen where the ark is said to have been constructed is answered. It is a propriety characteristic of the truth of the Scripture narrative that it represents the ark as not made of oak or cedar, the best woods of the Holy Land, but of acacia, the wood of the wilderness. Cedar actually was the wood used for the Jerusalem temple. In the thorn of man's curse appeared the angel of the covenant to Moses, to bless man; and out of its wood was formed the ark of the covenant, the typical source of his blessing. Overlaid with gold within and without. The mercy seat supporting the cherubim, one at each end, was on the lid, with a crown or raised border, and was Jehovah's mystical throne. It had rings at the four corners for the two staves to pass through, where-with the Kohathite Levites or priests carried it. The staves were permanently in the rings. Within the veil was its proper place, the ends of the staves, however, being visible, in Solomon's temple, in the outer holy place. When carried about, the ark was wrapped in the veil, the badger's skin, and blue cloth. Its title, "the ark of the testimony," implies its purpose, viz., to keep intact God's "covenant" written by God on the two stone tables (Exod. xxxiv. 28), as the sacred deposit of the Israelite church (Exod. xxv. 22, Num. x. 33). The outward keeping taught symbolically the moral and spiritual keeping of God's commandments. In the wilderness "the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey to search out a resting place for them; and when the ark set forward, Moses said, Rise up, Lord, and let Thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate Thee flee before Thee. And when it rested, he said, Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel" (Num. x. 33-36; Ps. lxxviii. 1, cxxviii. 8). At the passage of the Jordan it was when the ark was borne by the priests and their feet had touched the water, that an open way was made for Israel. Only when the material ark, apart from obedience, was expected to give that favour of God which only obedience to the law contained within the ark could ensure, did God "deliver His strength" (the pledge of God's strengthening His people) "into captivity, and His glory into the enemy's hands" (Ps. lxxviii. 61, 1 Sam. iv. 11). When the ark was taken the "glory" was departed (1 Sam. iv. 21, 22). The ark and the sanctuary were "the beauty of Israel" (Lam. ii. 1). The antitype, Messiah, goes before His redeemed, exploring their way through the wilderness, making a clear passage through death's waters into the heavenly Canaan. Like the ark with the Philistines, Messiah was the captive of the grace for a brief space, but with triumph He rose again; and as when the ark went up to the tabernacle reared for it by David on Zion, so on Christ's ascending the heavenly mount the glorious anthem arose: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in" (Ps. cxviii.). Every Gogon must fall before Him now; for even in His temporary captivity in death the powers of darkness were crushed before Him (Col. ii. 14, 15; Matt. xxvii. 50-54).

As the ark blessed the house of Obed Edom, so Christ is the true bestower of blessings (Acts iii. 26). The restriction of the ark's contents to the decalogue implies that this is the central core of all the various precepts, the moral end for which the positive precepts were given. They were in the innermost shrine, to mark their perpetually obligatory nature and the holiness of God; in the ark, the type of Christ, to mark that in Him alone, "the Lord our righteousness," they find their perfect realization. 1 Kings viii. 9 states there was nothing in the ark of Solomon's temple save the two stone tables of the law; but 11eb. ix. 4 states there were also the golden pot of manna (the memorial of God's providential care of Israel), and Aaron's rod that budded (the memorial of the lawful priesthood, Num. xvii. 3-10). Probably by the time of Solomon the other two relics had been lost, perhaps when the ark was in the hands of the Philistines. "Before the Lord" and "before the testimony" was where they were directed to be laid up (Exod. xvi. 32-36). The mercy seat was not merely regarded as the lid of the ark, but as the most important feature in the holiest place (Exod. xxv. 17, xxvi. 34; Lev. xvi. 2), the only meeting place between God and man. It was the caporeth or covering, not merely of the ark, but (when sprinkled with the sacrificial blood once a year on the great day of atonement) of Israel's sins against the law contained within the ark. Hence it is called in the LXX. "the propitiatory" (hilasterion); and Christ, the true mercy seat (Ps. lxxv. 10) and place of meeting between the holy God and guilty man, is called the very same (Rom. iii. 25), "propitiation," lit. propitiatory. In 1 Chron. xxviii. 11 the holiest is called "the place of the mercy seat," so prominent was the latter in symbolical significance. The ark was never seen save by the highpriest; symbol of God whom no man can see, and whose likeness is only to be seen in Christ (John i. 18, 11eb. i. 3), the true Ark, and our High Priest with the Father. Thus every tendency to idolatry was excluded, an ark occupying the central place of holiness, and that seen only once a year by the one religious representative of the people. Even it is to be superseded in the coming temple at Jerusalem, when "they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord, neither shall it come to mind, neither shall they remember it"; for Jehovah Jesus, the Antitype, will be there, "at that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it" (Jer. iii. 16). The absence of the ark after its capture by the Philistines possibly impaired the reverential awe felt towards it (1 Chron. xiii. 3, 9). But the stroke on Uzza, and the rearing of the tabernacle for it in Zion by David, after its long abode of 20 years in Kirjath Jearim, in Abinadab's house, recovered for it all its sanctity. The altar of burnt offering where the sacrifices were offered continued separate from it at Gibeon, the "great high place" (1 Kings iii. 4) (in the tabernacle of the ark on Zion the service was song and praise alone) until the two were reunited in the temple of Solomon, a type of the gospel separation of the spiritual service of prayer and praise going on here below, from the priestly intercession being carried on above by our Lord Jesus. The spiritual and the literal priestly services will perhaps be reunited in Ezekiel's millennial temple at Jerusalem, one antitype to Solomon's temple. Comp. Acts xv. 16, 17. Manasseh set up an idol, a carved image, instead of the ark which contained the testimony against him. Josiah restored it to its place in the house of God (2 Chron. xxxiii. 7, xxxv. 3). The ark was wanting in the second temple, having been probably burnt with the temple (2 Chron. xxxvi. 19); comp. (apocryphal) 2 Esdras x. 22, "the ark of our covenant is spoiled." Its absence was one of the points wherein the second was inferior to the first temple. [See ALTAR.] There must have been some substitute for it, on which to sprinkle the blood, in the holiest, on the great day of atonement; the Jews mention an altar stone, slightly raised from the floor. Heathen nations too had their mystic arks (whence arcana is the term for a mystery), but so distinct in use from the Mosaic that the differences are more prominent than the resemblances. The Egyptian arks (on their monuments) were, like the Hebrew ark, carried by poles on men's shoulders. Some had too on the cover two winged figures like cherubim; but between these was the material symbol of a deity, and the arks were carried about in procession to make a show before the people. The ark of the covenant on the contrary was marked by the absence of any symbol of God. It was never carried in procession. When moved it was carefully covered up from the eyes even of the Levites who bore it (Num. iv. 5, 6, 19, 20): "they shall not go in to see when the holy things are covered, lest they die." Comp. 1 Sam. vi. 19. In the tabernacle the ark was withdrawn from view in the mysterious holy of holies. It was not moved from its "rest" (Ps. cxxxii. 8, 14) when once Jerusalem became the fixed capital, and the hill of Zion (God's chosen seat, until its forcible removal under Nebuchadnezzar, God giving up the apostate Jews to the heathen world power. Previously it had a few times accompanied the army (1 Sam. iv. 3, xiv. 18; 2 Sam. xi. 11). But from the first rest was appointed as its final condition, and under David it obtained that "rest" (Dent. xii. 10, 11; 1 Chron. vi. 31, xvi. 1). Its simple and grand purpose was to be the casket containing the precious tables of stone written with the moral law by God Himself. The originality of the tabernacle furniture and arrangements is more striking than the superficial resemblances which have been traced to heathen usages.

Arkites. One family of Canaanites (Gen. x. 17, 1 Chron. i. 15). A place N. of Phœnicia, called subsequently Casarea Libani (at the base of Lebanon) from being Alexander Severus' birthplace; well known to the crusaders. Now Arka, two and a half hours from the shore; twelve miles N. of Tripoli; and five S. of Nahr el Kebir (Eleutheris). The ruins are scattered on a hill of about two acres, and on a plateau N. of it.

Arm. Figure for might, of God (Isa. liii. 1). "Break the arm," i.e. the power (Ezek. xxx. 21). "Stretched out arm," image from a warrior with spear or sword thrust forth: all the power put forth (Josh. viii. 23, Isa. v. 25).

Armageddon=mount of Megiddo; from a root gadad, "to cut off," i.e. slaughter (Rev. xvi. 16). The plain of Esdraelon, the great O. T. battle field between Israel and the various enemies of Jehovah's people: the scene of Barak's victory over Canaan, and Gideon's over Midian (Jud. iv. v., vii.), the scene also of Saul's death and Israel's defeat before the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi.), and of Josiah's death in battle with Pharaoh Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30). Both this and "the valley of Jehoshaphat" (the scene of his great victory, 2 Chron. xix. 26, comp. Zech. xiv. 2-4) may be figurative phrases for the scene of the final conflict of Christ and Antichrist. But they may also be literal. The mourning at Josiah's death in the valley of Megiddo became proverbial for the most poignant grief. As he and his army represent the professing church, so Pharaoh Necho and the Egyptians the God-opposed world. The triumph of Pharaoh then shall be utterly reversed in the last conflict of the ten confederate kings under Antichrist against the Lamb and His hosts (not merely professors, but "called, chosen, and faithful") (Rev. xvii. 12-14, xix. 11-21). The last Antichrist is developed after executing judgment on the whore, the apostate church; he then, with his ten confederate kings and the false prophet, opposes Christ Himself, and perishes.

Armenia. [See ARARAT.] The name in Heb., translated A. from Har-Mini, "the mountains of Minni" = Miuyas, in the upper valley of the Murat-su branch of the Euphrates. Togarmah is the name of the race, the Armenians referring their own origin to Thorgomass or Tiorgarmah. In Ezek. xvii. 14 its trading in "carriage horses, riding horses and mules" (so the Heb.), for which A. is still famous, as well as for the keenness of its traffickers, is mentioned.

Armlet: bracelet. Heb. a fetter, from a root, "a step" (Isa. iii. 18-20). [See ANKLET.] A general ornament in the E. A badge of kings (2 Sam. i. 10). The signet was sometimes a jewel on the armlet; which explains, "Set me as a seal upon thine arm" (S. of Sol. viii. 6). Their weight (comp. Gen. xiv. 22), and their tightness on the arm (so that in putting them on blood is often drawn) make their female wearers pay dearly for their love of admiration.

Armoni. Saul's son by Rizpah (2 Sam. xxi. 8). Slain to appease the Gibeonites, whose blood Saul had shed.

Arms. Neither remains of Heb. A., nor representations of them in Scripture, or on vases, bronzes, mosaics, paintings, coins, or jewels, have been preserved to us. Of offensive armour there was the SWORD (chereb), first mentioned Gen. iii. 24. Lighter and shorter than our modern sword (2 Sam. ii. 16, xx. 8-10; 1 Sam. xvii. 51, xxi. 9, 10). It was carried in a sheath, slung by a girdle, resting upon the thigh (Ps. xlv. 3, 2 Sam. xx. 8). In peace even a king wore no sword (1 Kings iii. 24). So that "gird on the sword" was a phrase for begin war (Ps. xlv. 3). "De-vour with the sword" (Isa. i. 20), "smite with the edge (month) of the sword," are familiar personifications. Some swords were "two edged" (Ps. cxlix. 6), type of the Word (Heb. iv. 12, Rev. i. 16). Traces of the primitive use of flint for swords or knives appear in Exod. iv. 25, Josh. v. 2. The SPEAR (chanith), Saul's regular companion (appropriate to his own stately height), at his head when sleeping, in his hand when gathering his soldiers, his leaning staff when dying (1 Sam. xxvi. 7, xxii. 6; 2 Sam. i. 6). It was this ponderous (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 23) weapon, not the lighter "javelin" (as A. V.) which he hurled at David twice, and at Jonathan (1 Sam. xviii. 11, xix. 10, xx. 33). The JAVELIN (kidon) was lighter, appropriate to manoeuvring, easy to hold outstretched (Josh. viii. 14-27); carried on the back between the shoulders. In 1 Sam. xvii. 6 translate, not "target," but "a JAVELIN of brass," distinguished from "the spear" (chanith), ver. 7; so ver. 45, "with a javelin," not "a shield"; Job xxxix. 23, "the glittering spear and the JAVELIN." The LANCE (ronach), translated A. V. "spear," "javelin," "lancet" (1 Kings xviii. 28). The DAER (shelach) (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). The BATON, or SCYTHRE (shebet) used in 2 Sam. xvii. 14 of the "darts" with which Joab killed Absalom. The Bow (qesheth). Captains of high rank did not disdain to seek expertise in it: as Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 22), Jehu (2 Kings ix. 24). The tribe Benjamin was noted for archery (1 Chron. viii. 40, xii. 2), where a bow for shooting stones forth is implied (2 Chron. xiv. 8). The phrase for "bend the bow" is "tread" it, implying that it was bent with the foot. Some bows were made of brass or "steel" (Ps. xviii. 34). In the beginning of Saul's reign the Philistines had reduced Israel so as that "no smith was found throughout all the land of Israel; for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears; so in the day of battle there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people but with Saul and with Jonathan" (1 Sam. xiii. 19-22). Curiously analogous to this is the stipulation mentioned in the league which the Etrurian Por-sena conceded to the vanquished Romans (Pliny, xxxiv. 14), viz. "that they should not use iron save in agriculture." The arrows (chitzim) were carried in a quiver (theli); Job vi. 4 refers to poisoned arrows; Ps. cxx. 4 to the practice of attaching burning material to some arrow heads. Divination by arrows was practised by the Chaldees. Nebuchadnezzar, undecided whether to attack Jerusalem or Ammon first, wrote their names on distinct arrows; the arrow first drawn from the quiver decided his course (Ezek. xxi. 21, 22). The SLING (Jud. xx. 16), the usual weapon of a shepherd, as David, to ward off beasts from the flock.

SLINGS.

His weapon in slaying Goliath; hence gracefully alluded to by Abigail in her prayer for him (1 Sam. xxv. 29): "the souls of thine enemies . . . shall God sling out, as out of the middle of a sling." ENIGMES for "shooting great stones" prepared by king Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 15). Of defensive armour there was the COAT OF MAIL (1 Sam. xvii. 5), Heb.

ARMOUR.

"breastplate (shirion) of scales." In 1 Kings xxii. 34, translate as marg. "between the joints and the breast-plate." A. V. trans. shirion "habergeons" (2 Chron. xxvi. 14, Neh. iv. 16), i.e. hauberks, a quilted shirt or doublet put over the head. From its breastplate-like outline Hermon is called Siron, contracted into Sion (Dent. iii. 9, iv. 48). The HELMET from a root meaning "high and round." GREAVES of brass, for the feet (1 Sam. xvii. 6). Two kinds of SHIELD: the tinnah protecting the whole person (Ps. v. 12), carried before the warrior when not in actual battle (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 41); the Roman doorlike oblong shield, four feet long by two broad (thureon, from thura, a door), is meant Eph. vi. 16, "above all," i.e. over all, covering all the body, not the small round shield. The mayeen was smaller, a buckler for hand to hand fight. 1 Kings x. 16, 17: "six hundred shekels of gold went to one target" (tinnah), but "three pounds of gold went to one shield" (mayeen); the greater weight required for the tinnah shows its larger size. The light mayeen is that in 2 Chron. xii. 9, 10. The shebet ("buckler," from shalat, to exercise authority), probably a small peculiarly shaped shield of gold, the badge of men high in authority. In 2 Sam. viii. 7 "shields" of gold taken by David from Hadadezer king of Zobah, and dedicated in the temple, used in proclaiming Joash king (2 Kings xi. 10, comp. S. of Sol. iv. 4). In the N. T. comp. Eph. vi. 14-17 for the Roman armour, except the spear. The breast-plate had a girdle beneath to brace up the person. The Greek greaves protected the legs as well as the feet. The light armed troops (psiloti), instead of shield and cuirass, wore a garment of leather, and fought with darts, bows, stones, and slings. The targeteers (pelastai) also were more lightly equipped than the heavy armed (hoplites). Three integuments are specified in Eph. vi.: the breast-plate, girdle, and shoes; two defences, the helmet and shield; two offensive weapons, the sword and the spear (not the type, but its antitype, prayer, shot up as a javelin mightily; ejaculation is derived from jaculum, "a javelin"). There is no armour for the back, but only for the front; we must never turn our back to the foe (Luke ix. 62), our only safety is ceaseless fighting (Matt. iv. 11, Jas. iv. 7). The girdle kept the armour in its place and supported the sword; so the

ARMOUR.

"truth" in Jesus appropriated secures the believer, and braces him for the good fight (Eph. iv. 21; comp. Exod. xii. 11, Luke xii. 35). The Roman soldier wore military sandals (caligae, whence the emperor Caligula took his name); so Christians, "your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace"; the peace within beautifully contrasting with the raging war outside (Isa. xvi. 3). To be at peace with God and ourselves we must ever war with Satan. In Assyrian remains we see a coat of scale armour reaching down to the knees or ankles. The MAUL or mace is alluded to in Ps. ii. 9; Prov. xxvi. 18; Jer. i. 23, li. 20; Nah. ii. 1: literally "that which scatters in pieces." So "Martel," a little HAMMER, was the surname of the king of the Franks.

Army. In Israel's, at the exodus, every man above 20 was a soldier (Num. i. 3); each tribe a battalion, with its own banner and leader (Num. ii. 2; x. 5, 6, 14). Their positions in camp and on march were accurately fixed. The whole host moved according to preappointed alarms on the trumpet. So (Exod. xiii. 18) they "went out harnessed" (margin, five in a rank: chamushum, from chameesh, "five"; or from chomesh, "the loins," with the loins girt), prepared for the march, not fleeing away as fugitives. Five was a number regarded as inauspicious by the Egyptians, but honoured by Israel; witness the five books of the pentateuch, the jubilee of fifty years. Manetho describes the Israelites as 250,000 lepers, five \times fifty thousand. The exactness of their martial order is implied in Balaam's metaphors (Num. xxiv. 6). The "scribe of the list" made the conscription and chose the officers when needful (Deut. xx. 5-9, 2 Kings xxv. 19, 2 Chron. xxvi. 11). The army was divided into thousands and hundreds with captains over each; the family too was respected in the army organization, as being the unit in the Jewish polity (Num. ii. 31, xxxi. 14). Before the time of the kings their tactics were of a loose desultory kind; but the kings established a body guard, the first step towards a standing army. Saul had 3000 picked men (1 Sam. xiii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2). David had 600 before his accession (xxiii. 13); after it he added the Cherethites and Pelethites and Gittites (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18), and veteran guards (shalishim, "captains," 1 Chron. xii. 18; Ezek. xiii. 15, 23, "princes," "great lords") whose "chief" was about David's person as adjutant. He called out also monthly a regiment of national militia, twelve regiments in all, under officers (1 Chron. xxvii. 1). A "captain of the host," or commander in chief, led the army in time of war; as Abner under Saul, Joab under David. Judaea and the northern kingdom Israel being hilly, were little suited for chariots and horsemen, except in the plains of Esdraelon and Philistia, and towards Egypt and Syria. Moreover, God had forbidden the multiplication of horses (Deut. xvii. 16). But their own unfaithfulness exposed them to the enemy's powerful chariots; so they too longed to have similar ones (Josh. xvii. 16, xi. 9; Jud. i. 19, iv. 2; 1 Sam. xiii. 5). David reserved 100 from the Syrian spoils (2 Sam. viii. 4). Solomon afterwards largely increased the number from Egypt (1 Kings x. 26-29, ix. 19); in all 1400 chariots, 12000 horsemen. The grades in the army appear in 1 Kings ix. 22, "men of war" (privates), servants (subalterns), princes (captains), captains (staff officers), rulers of chariots and horsemen (cavalry officers). The body guard was permanently maintained (1 Kings xiv. 28), the militia only exceptionally called out. The Syrians reduced the cavalry to a mere fragment in Jehoahaz's reign. Jotham in Judah had a large cavalry force (Isa. ii. 7), but it was much brought down in Hezekiah's reign, so that the Jews, in violation of God's prohibition (Deut. xvii. 16), looked to Egypt for horses and chariots (Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9; Ps. xx. 7). In action the army was often in three divisions (Jud. vii. 16, 1 Sam. xi. 11, 2 Sam. xviii. 2). Jehoshaphat divided his into five bodies (answering to the five geographical divisions then), but virtually Judah's heavy armed men formed the main army, the two light armed divisions of Benjamin the subsidiary bodies. At the exodus the number of soldiers was 600,000 (Exod. xii. 37), at the borders of Canaan 601,730; under David, 1,300,000 men capable of service, viz. 800,000 for Israel, 500,000 for Judah (2 Sam. xxiv. 9), but in 1 Chron. xxi. 5, 6 it is 1,570,000; viz. 1,100,000 for Israel, and 470,000 for Judah. The discrepancy is due to the census having been broken off (1 Chron. xxvii. 24). The militia (1 Chron. xxvii. 1, etc.), 288,000, was probably included in Chronicles, not in Samuel. The exact census was not entered in the annals of the King.

EGYPTIAN HORSE SOLDIER.

dom (1 Chron. xxvii. 24); hence the amount is given in round and not exact numbers. Levi and Benjamin were not reckoned, the latter owing to Joab's repugnance to the census (1 Chron. xxi. 6). Jehoshaphat's army was 1,160,000 (2 Chron. xvii. 14-18). John Hyrcanus first introduced mercenaries.

The Roman army was divided into legions, each under six tribunes ("chief captains," chiliarchs, Acts xxi. 31), who commanded in turn. The legion had 10 cohorts ("bands," speira, Acts x. 1), the cohort into three maniples, the maniples into two centuries (each 100 men originally), commanded by a centurion (Acts x. 1, 22; Matt. viii. 5). The "Italian band" or cohort consisted of volunteers from Italy, perhaps the procurator's body guard. "Augustus' band" or cohort (Acts xxvii. 1) were either volunteers from Sebaste, or a cohort similar to "the Augustan legion." Casarea was the Roman head quarters in Palestine. The ordinary guard was a quaternion of four soldiers, answering to the four watches of the night, and relieving each other every three hours (Acts xii. 4, John xix. 23). Two watched outside a prisoner's door, two inside (Acts xii. 6). "The captain of the guard" (Acts xxviii. 16) was probably commander of the Praetorian guards, to whom prisoners from the provinces were committed. The "spearmen" (dexolabi, Acts xxiii. 23) were light armed body guards, literally "protecting the right side," or else "grasping the weapon with the right hand."

Arnan. 1 Chron. iii. 21.

Arnon=swift, noisy. The torrent boundary between Moab and the Amorites on the N., and afterwards between Moab and Reuben (Num. xxi. 13, 14, 24, 26; Deut. ii. 24, 36). A branch of the A. (Seit es Saideh) flowing N.W. seemingly formed the eastern boundary of Moab (Jud. xi. 18, 2 Kings x. 33). Aroer was by its northern brink; the ruins still bear the name. Rising in the Arabian mountains (the branch Soies Saideh in the mountains of Gilead near Kalaat el Kabane), it flows through the wilderness and falls into the Dead Sea. Now the ready el Mzheb, flowing through a precipitous, rugged, gloomy ravine. The sides are of red and brown sandstone where it meets the Dead Sea; it is 10 feet deep at that point. The Roman road between Rabba and Dhiban crosses it at two hours' distance from Rabba.

Arod. Num. xxvi. 17; called Arodi Gen. xvi. 16.

Aroer=ruins, places with the foundations laid bare. [See ARNON.]

1. The city taken from Sihon, king of the Amorites, and assigned to Reuben (Deut. ii. 36, Josh. xiii. 9, 16). Afterwards in Moab's possession (Jer. xlviii. 19), though A. may there be regarded as only lying in Moab's way, when fleeing into the desert, and as asking the cause of Moab's flight. With A. is associated some "city that is in the midst of the river." Mr. Grove suggests that at the Arnon junction with the Lejuni, one hour E. of Arar or A., the hill with ruins on it may be the site of the city in question; no city could have stood in such a position immediately near A. 2. A. facing Rabbah of Ammon: "built," i.e. restored and enlarged, by Gad (Num. xxxii. 34, Jud. xi. 33); now perhaps Ayru. Isa. xvii. 2 refers to this A. with its dependent "cities," then "forsaken" through Tiglath Pileser's having carried away the inhabitants (2 Kings xv. 29). 3. A town in Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 28) to which David sent portions after his victory over the Amalekites at Ziklag. In the wady Ararah, 20 geographical miles S. of Hebron, on the road from Petra to Gaza.

Arpad. A city dependent on Damascus, and always named with Hamath (now Hamah on the Orontes). It fell before Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 34, Isa. x. 9).

Arphaxad (Gen. x. 21-24. Professor Rawlinson translates: "unto Shem also, the father of all the children of Eber, the elder brother of Japhet, were children born, A."; xi. 10) = the stronghold of the Chaldees. Shem's descendants are mentioned last, because the subsequent sacred history concerns them chiefly. His being forefather to Eber or Heber is specified, to mark that the chosen people of God, the Hebrews, sprang from Shem: A. was father of Salah. There was a portion of Assyria called Arrapachitis, from Arapkhā, "the city of the four sacred fish," often seen on cylinders; but the affinity is doubtful.

Artaxerxes. From arta, "great," or "honoured"; Artaiou, Arian, Sansk. Arya, being the old name of the Persians, and kshershe, "a king" = Xerxes = Ahasuerus [see]. A. I. (Ezra iv. 7) is the Magian usurper, who personated Smerdis, Cyrus' younger son. To him the adversaries of the Jews wrote, in order to frustrate the building of the temple. Certainly the Ahasuerus of Ezra iv. 6 was Cambyses, and the Darius of iv. 24 was Darius Hystaspes; so that the intermediate king must be Smerdis the pretender, who by usurpation reigned for eight months 522 B.C. Cambyses did not act on the accusation of the Jews' enemies; Ahasuerus Smerdis did, forbidding the continuation of a work commenced under Cyrus, and continued under his son and successor. His creed as a Magian, opposed to that of Zoroaster, as declared in Herodotus iii. 61, Ctesias Exc. Pers. 10, Justin i. 9, and Darius' great inscription at Behistun, account for his reversing the policy of his two predecessors on a point of religion. The sympathy of Cyrus and Cambyses with the Jews in restoring their temple was to him just the reason for prohibiting it. In his decree (Ezra iv. 17-22) no symptom of the faith in the supreme God appears, which characterizes the decree of Cyrus. The Magian creed was pantheism, the worship of the elements, earth, air, water and fire.

A. II. was A. Longimanus, son of Xerxes, who reigned 464-425 B.C. He allowed Nehemiah (ii. 1) to spend 12 years at Jerusalem to settle the affairs of the returned Jews. He had 13 years previously permitted Ezra (vii. 1) to go on a similar errand. The reign of Ahasuerus III. = Xerxes, described in Esther, comes chronologically between Ezra vi. (515 B.C.) and vii., which is in the 7th year of A. Longimanus, 457 B.C. The gap occupies 58 years in all, of which Xerxes reign takes 21 years. Thirteen years after Ezra's going to Jerusalem, 457 B.C., it was found that a civil as well as an ecclesiastical head was required there. So in 444 B.C. A. Longimanus, who was noted among the Persian kings for wisdom and right feeling, sanctioned Nehemiah's going as civil governor. Like Cyrus and Darius he identified Jehovah with his own supreme god, Ormuzd (Ezra vii. 12, 21, 23), supported the Jewish worship by offerings and grants from the state and provincial treasuries, and threatened death, banishment, imprisonment, or confiscation against opponents. The oriental despot, who at personal inconvenience would suffer his servant's departure for so long, to cheer him up, must have been more than ordinarily good natured. Secular history so represents him, "the first of Persian monarchs for mildness and magnanimity." The Persians, says Diodorus Siculus (xi. 71:2), admired his "equity and moderation in government."

Artemas. Paul's companion (Tit. iii. 12), whom he proposed sending to Titus at Crete. In tradition, bishop of Lystra.

Aruboth. Third of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 10), including Sechoh.

Arumah. Near Shechem, where Abimelech resided (Jud. ix. 41).

Arvad = wandering. "The Arvadite" was a descendant of Canaan, like Zidon, Hamath, etc. (Gen. x. 18, 1 Chron. i. 16). In Ezek. xxvii. 8, 11, "the men of A." are among the mariners of the ship, viz. Tyre. A. is the isle Road, off Tortosa, two or three miles from the Phœnician coast, at the N. end of the bay above Tripoli. It is elevated and rocky, but hardly a mile round. Strabo mentions A.'s likeness to Tyre, and the superior seamanship of its people. The inhabitants still, to the number of a thousand, are employed as pilots, shipbuilders, sponge divers, and sailors. There are remains of the sea walls, some of the stones 12 feet long by 10 high, not bevelled, but indented with deep grooves on the upper surface, one groove square, three semicircular.

Arza. Steward of King Elah's house in Tirzah. Elah, whilst drinking himself drunk in his house, was slain by the conspirator Zimri. A very different steward from Obadiah (1 Kings xviii. 3, comp. 1 Cor. iv. 2).

Asa = healing. Son of Abijah; third king of Judah. Faithful to Jehovah; determined in rooting out idolatry and its attendant licentiousness (1 Kings xv. 9-15; 2 Chron. xiv. xv., xvi.). He built fenced cities, the Lord giving him and his land rest and prosperity. No respecter of persons; so much so that he deposed Maachah, the queen-mother (wife of Rehoboam and A.'s grandmother), because she made an idol (Heb. "horror," some abominable and impure object of worship) in a grove; and he cut her idol down, stamped, and burnt it at the brook Kedion, as Moses had done to the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 20). For "in a grove," translate "to Asherah" (Heb. haasheerah), the Phœnician Venus (1 Kings xv. 14, 2 Chron. xv. 16). The high places to idols he took away (2 Chron. xiv. 3). But those to Jehovah, being an irregularity of a secondary kind, he did not take away (xv. 17, 1 Kings xv. 14). Moreover, the gifts dedicated by his father Abijah, in the earlier and better part of his reign, silver, gold, and vessels, but afterwards appropriated by the heathen priests for idolatry, he brought into the house of God (2 Chron. xv. 18). Encouraged by the prophecy of Azariah, the son of Odod, "the Lord is with you while ye be with Him," he renewed the altar of Jehovah before the porch, after its desecration. The first ten years of his reign were occupied peacefully in such religious reforms. But in the eleventh year danger of war seems to have been anticipated, for "the land," it is said, "was quiet ten years" only (2 Chron. xiv. 1, 2, 8-15). Then follows A.'s preparation of an army with targets and spears, 500,000 of Judah and 280,000 of Benjamin, bearing shields and drawing bows. In the 14th year the threatened danger came. ZERAH [see], the Cushite or Ethiopian, invaded Judah at Mareslah with 1,000,000 men and 300 chariots. The valley of Zephthah, at Mareslah (Mariss, S.W. of Judah, near the later Eleutheropolis), was the battle field. Like Judah, in his father Abijah's time, in the hour of imminent peril (2 Chron. xiii. 14, 15), A. cried unto Jehovah his God: "Lord, it is nothing with Thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power; help us, O Lord our God, for we rest on Thee. . . . Let not man prevail against Thee" (comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 6). So Jehovah smote the Ethiopians before A. (comp. Isa. lx. 19). At this very time a king called Azerch, Amen, we know from recently deciphered monuments, reigned in Ethiopia (G. Rawlinson). Ewald and Hincks identify him with Osorkon I., king of Egypt, second of the 22nd dynasty. Zerah's army is composed of much the same elements (2 Chron. xvi. 8, xii. 3), Ethiopians and Libyans (Libyans), as Shishak's (the Sukkiim being peculiar to the latter); mercenaries, we know, were much employed in the 22nd dynasty. Others fix on Osorkon II., son in law of his predecessor, and reigning in right of his wife. He was probably, if this view be true, an Ethiopian, ruling over both Egypt and Ethiopia. A., having refused to pay the tribute imposed by Shishak on Rehoboam, was invaded. A. on his return from having refused to pay the tribute imposed by Shishak on Rehoboam, was invaded. A. on his return from the victory gathered all Judah and Benjamin and strangers out of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Simeon, who joined his kingdom, seeing the Lord was with him, in the 15th year of his reign. At this feast of thanksgiving all "entered into a covenant to seek the Lord God of their fathers with all their heart and with all their soul." "The Lord gave them rest round about" for a time. But Baasha, king of Israel, jealous of the defections from his own kingdom and the growing prosperity of Judah, fortified Ramah on the road N. of Jerusalem, "that he might not suffer any to go out or come in to A." (comp. 1 Kings xii. 27, xv. 17.) This is said (in 2 Chron. xvi. 1, 11) to be in the 36th year of A.'s reign; but Baasha was at that time long dead (1 Kings xv. 33), therefore this 36th year must be calculated from the separation of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. This calculation was probably drawn from "the book of the kings of Judah and Israel." Baasha's act was probably in the 17th year of A.'s reign. A., instead of trusting in Jehovah, bought the help of the heathen world power, Benhadad I. king of Damascus, against Israel, with the treasures left in the temple and the palace from the tribute for Egypt, which he had ceased to pay. Benhadad smote Ijon, Dan, and Abelmaim, and the store cities of Naphtali. So Baasha had to cease fortifying Ramah, and A. used the materials to fortify Geba (the hill) and Mizpeh (the watchtower) in Benjamin to guard against future invasion. The large cistern or pit made by A. to obviate scarcity of water in the event of a siege by Baasha is mentioned long after in Jer. xli. 7, 9. Hanani, the seer, reproved A., telling him that if he had not relied on the king of Syria, instead of on Jehovah, he should have had him as a vassal instead of being himself subordinate to Syria. Carnal policy brings on the very evil which it shuns, and which would have been completely averted by a policy of faith. So far from escaping wars by his unbelieving course, he must henceforth have them (1 Kings xv. 32, 2 Chron. xvi. 7-9). A., instead of being humbled, was wroth, and put the seer in prison and oppressed some of the people, probably sympathisers with the man of God. It is true he succeeded in capturing cities of Ephraim (2 Chron. xvii. 2), but his end was under a spiritual cloud. Discised in his feet, after a reign of 30 years, "he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians," i.e., his trust was less in Jehovah than in human remedies (comp. Jer. xvii. 5). That in the main, nevertheless, he served the Lord truly, appears from 1 Kings xv. 14: "A.'s heart was perfect with the Lord (sincere) all his days." The funeral, with its "sweet odours and divers spices" and "very great burning for him," marks how lightly he was esteemed. His whole reign lasted 41 years, 956 to 915 B.C. His later diminishes warn even believers; "let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (comp. Gal. v. 7).

Asadiab=Jehovah loveth. 1 Chron. iii. 20.

Asahel=made by God. 1. David's nephew, youngest son of Zeruiah, David's sister; brother of Joab and Abishai. Swift on foot, he pursued Abner after Ishbosheth's army was defeated at Gibeon, in spite of Abner's warning, and was pierced with the hinder end of his spear (2 Sam. ii.). [See ARNER.] 2. Three others (2 Chron. xvii. 8, xxxi. 13; Ezra x. 15).

Asahiah, or Asaiah. 1. Sent with Hilkiah to inquire of Jehovah concerning the book of the law found in the temple (2 Kings xxii. 12-14). 2. Four others (1 Chron. ix. 5, iv. 36, vi. 30, xv. 6, 11).

Asaph=assembler. 1. A Levite, son of Berachiah; one of David's choir leaders (1 Chron. vi. 39). An inspired seer, as well as a composer of music (2 Chron. xxix. 30, Neh. xii. 46). "The sons of A." were poets and musical composers of the school founded by him; as Heman and Jeduthun also were heads of schools of sacred inspired music. 1 Chron. xxv. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 14; Ezra ii. 41; Ps. l., lxxiii., lxxxiii. are all attributed to his authorship; but lxxxiii. celebrates the victory of Jehoshaphat long after A.'s time, therefore "A." in this psalm's title must mean "one of the school of A." 2. 2 Kings xviii. 18, 37. 3. Neh. ii. 8. 4. Neh. xi. 17.

Asareel. 1 Chron. iv. 16.

Asarelah, or Jesharelah. 1 Chron. xxv. 2, 14.

Asenath. Daughter of Potipherah, prince priest of On; Joseph's wife; mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xli. 50, xlvii. 20). Her name is probably Egyptian, and means "she who is consecrated to Neith," the goddess of wisdom, a tutelary deity of On or Re Athom, the city of the sun god, the Athens of Greece. If it be the Hebrew name assumed on her conversion (as BITHIAH [see] means "daughter of Jehovah") and union with Joseph, it may be from asan, "a storehouse," in allusion to Joseph's national service, and Ephraim's name meaning fruitfulness. Canon Cook makes it a compound of "Isis" and "Neith," two goddesses akin. The marriage into this idolatrous family seems to have borne evil fruit afterwards in the idolatry of Joseph's descendants, Ephraim, and the calf worship. Foreigners had been raised to high rank by Pharaohs of the early empire; Joseph, as Abraham's descendant, would be regarded as of noble birth, and he admitted, especially at the command of an absolute king, into alliance with the haughty priest caste. His circumcision, if, as in afterages, it was then practised in Egypt by the priests, would be a recommendation. However, as it is not represented in the monuments till the 19th dynasty, long after Joseph, he probably first introduced it.

Ash (Isa. xlv. 14): Heb. oren, akin to Arabic aran, slender, graceful. Probably a pine; so the LXX. and Vulg. The Latin ornus seems akin.

Ashan (Josh. xiv. 42): a city of the low country of Judah. In 1 Chron. iv. 32 mentioned as of Simeon. In 1 Chron.

vi. 59 a priests' city; holding the same place as the similar Ain in Joshua's list (xxi. 16). In 1 Sam. xxx. 30 Chor-aschan is in "the south." Probably it is the same as Ain, of which traces exist at Kl Ghuneir.

Ashbea=I adjure. 1 Chron. iv. 21.

Ashbel. Gen. xlvii. 21, Num. xxvi. 38, 1 Chron. viii. 1.

Ashdod, or Azotus=fortress. Now Esud. On a commanding height. One of the five confederate Philistine cities, 30 miles from the S. of Palestine, three from the Mediterranean, midway between Gaza and Joppa. A seat of the worship of ASHU GOD.

DAGON [see]; there the idol fell before God's captive ark, the head and palms cut off, and only the fishy stump (margin) left (1 Sam. v. 3-8). Ashdod had been originally assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 47), but never occupied by the Jews, nay, made a point of attack on them: not till King Uzziab was its "wall broken down and cities built about it," i.e. forts on the surrounding hills (2 Chron. xxvi. 6). In Nebemiah's time Ashdod still retained its distinctive language and race, and ensnared by marriages the Jews returned from Babylon, after vainly striving to prevent the walls of Jerusalem being built (iv. 7, 8; xiii. 23, 24). It was the key of entrance between Palestine and Egypt. As such, it was besieged by the Assyrian general Tartan under Sargon (716 B.C.), to counteract Hezekiah's league with Egypt (Isa. xx. 1). So strongly did the Assyrians fortify it that it stood a 29 years' siege (the longest on record) under the Egyptian Psammetichus, who took it 630 B.C. These calamities were foretold Jer. xxv. 20, Amos i. 8, Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6, "a bastard shall dwell in A.," i.e. an alien; perhaps referring to an Arabian occupation of it during the Babylonian exile. Comp. Neh. iv. 7, xiii. 21. Destroyed by the Maccabees. Restored by the Roman Gabinus 55 B.C. Assigned to Salome by Augustus. Visited by Philip the evangelist, who preached there on his way from Gaza to Caesarea (Acts viii. 40). A bishop from it was present at the councils of Nice and Chalcedon.

Ashdodth Pishgah="Springs of Pishgah," or "the hill" (Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49; Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20). The mountains E. of the Dead Sea are hereby defined; "the springs" is one of the leading physical divisions of the country, viz. those at the base of the Moabite mountains (Josh. x. 40, xii. 8). Comp. Num. xxi. 15: "the stream (pouring) of the brooks (torrents)."

Asher, or Aser. 1. Eighth son of Jacob by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid (Gen. xxx. 13). "In my happiness the daughters will call me happy: and she called his name A." (happy.) A. had four sons and one daughter, the heads of families (Num. xxvi. 41-47). At the exodus they numbered 41,500; at the close of the forty years in the wilderness 55,400. Their allotment was the rich sea coast between Carmel and Lebanon, N. of Manasseh, N.W. of Zebulun and Issachar, and S.W. of Naphtali. The portion near Zidon, Dor, Aecho, Ahiab, Achzib, Heibah, Aphik, Rehob, they never made themselves masters of (Jud. i. 31, 32; Josh. xix. 24-31, xvii. 10, 11). The southern boundary was a stream S. of Dor (Tantura) flowing into the Mediterranean, Nahr el Defneh or Nahr Zorba. Their land included the maritime portion of the plain of Esdraelon. Moses' blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25) represents A. "acceptable to his brethren"; but Keil, "favoured among his brethren and dipping his feet in oil" (i.e. having a land flowing with oil; Job xxix. 6), "his shoes" (but Keil translates castle, min'al; Maurer, bolt, i.e. dwellings secured by bolt) "iron and brass" (abounding in these metals, which the Phœnicians manufactured). Contented with the luxuries which nature and intercourse with the enterprising Phœnicians afforded (for already Zidon was "the great" or "the strong"), A. shrank from jeopardizing life with Zebulun and Naphtali, against Sisera the Canaanite; A. "abode on the sea shore in his breaches" (creeks) (Jud. v. 17, 18). "As thy days so shall thy rest (taboulat) be," Maurer and Keil; but Gesenius, "so shall thy death be" (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25). Jacob (Gen. xlix. 20) prophesied: "out of A. his bread shall be fat [the fat that comes from him shall be his own bread, so fruitful shall be his soil] and he shall yield royal dainties;" fulfilled when Solomon thence supplied King Hiram's household with wheat and oil (1 Kings v. 11). A.'s self-indulgent weakness acted injuriously on his own people. Selfishness and faint heartiness in the Lord's cause became their own punishment. From being more numerous at mount Sinai than Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, in David's time they had become so few that A.'s name is omitted from the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii. 16-22). Asherites were among those who came to Jerusalem to Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxx. 11). A. and Simeon are the only tribes W. of Jordan which produced no hero or judge. ANNA [see], daughter of Phanael, of the tribe of A., in the N. T. alone reflects honour on her tribe (Luke ii.). 2. A boundary of Manasseh on the S. (Josh. xvii. 7.) Eusebius places it on the road from Shechem to Bethshean or Scythopolis. Porter makes it now Tel-yasir, three quarters of an hour from Tubas or Thebez. Tel um el Aschera (Van de Velde), Um Ajra (Robinson and Knobel), an hour S. of Beisan.

Ashes. Sitting down in, or covering one's self with is the symbol of mourning (Job ii. 8, xlii. 6; Esth. iv. 1; Isa. lxi. 3; Matt. xi. 21). To eat ashes expresses figuratively mourning is one's food, i.e. one's perpetual portion (Ps. cii. 9). "He feedeth on ashes," i.e., tries to feed his soul with what is at once humiliating and unsatisfying, on an idol which ought to have been reduced to ashes, like the rest of the tree of which it is made (Isa. xlv. 20). The ashes of a red heifer burnt entire (Num. xix.), when sprinkled upon, purified ceremonially the unclean (Lev. ix. 13) but defiled the clean person.

Ashima. The idol of Hamath, introduced by the Hamathites, the colonists planted in Samaria by Esarhadon king of Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 24, 30; Ezra iv. 2, 10); represented as a goat with short hair, answering to the Egyptian form of the Greek god Pan, to whom the goat was sacred. The Phœnician god Esmun, answering to the Greek Esculapins as well as Pan.

Ashkelon, Askelon, Ascalon. One of the five Philistine lords' cities (Josh. xiii. 3, 1 Sam. vi. 17). Remote in the S. on the coast of the Mediterranean, so less brought into contact with the Jews; omitted in the towns allotted to Judah (Josh. xv.; but comp. Jud. i. 18). Gaza was still more S., but on the main road from Egypt to Palestine. Samson slew thirty of the Ashkelonites, took their spoil, and gave change of raiment unto them of Timnath who expounded his riddle (Jud. xiv. 19). Later, the temple and lake of Derceto (with a female head and bust and fish's tail, like Dagon), the Syrian Venus, stood near it. Here Julian cruelly persecuted the Christians. Its name still appears in our "eschelot" or "shallot," an onion for which it was famous, as for its figs, olives, etc. Within the walls, of which the ruins still stand, Richard I. held his court in the crusades. After the brilliant battle here the crusaders would have taken the city, but for Count Raymond's jealousy; and for long A. was a thorn to the Christian kingdom. The Mahometans call it "the bride of Syria." In the Sam. version of Gen. xx. 1, 2, xxvi. 1, A. stands instead of Gerar; and curiously tradition in Origen's time pointed out wells there as those dug by Isaac. The city stands on the very shore of the Mediterranean, its walls were along the ridge of rock sweeping round inland in continuation of the shore cliffs. Conder (Pal. Expl., July, 1875) thinks that the A. of the Bible, of Herod, and of the crusaders, is one and the same town on the seashore, distinguished from another early Christian inland A. by the title Ascalon Maiumas. Maiumas, "watering place," applies not to a port only, but to any place abounding in water. But A. and its port town of Maiumas were distinct, as a bishop of each signed the acts of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. The present A. is the Maiumas of Ascalon; the original A. was probably inland, and is now buried in sand. (Pusey.)

Ashkenaz. One of the three sons of Gomer, Japhet's son, i.e. of the Gomerian branch of the Japhetic division of the human race. Mentioned by Jeremiah (li. 27) in connection with Ararat and Minni, so that their locality then must have been the Armenian highland. [See ARARAT.] Their accompanying Cyrus to the siege of Babylon (538 B.C.) is there foretold. Probably a Cymric tribe. The name perhaps appears in Ascania, a river in Asia Minor, and in Scandinavia. Knobel derives the German race from Ashkenaz, the name still given by the rabbins to Germany. He derives the name from As (the original of As-ia) and genus, gens, "a race," our "kin." Haase suggests a connection with Aeneas, Euxine Sea.

Ashnah. Two cities of Judah, both in the shephelah or low hills. 1. Between Zorea and Zanoah, N.W. of Jerusalem, Asna (Josh. xv. 33). 2. Between Jiphthah and Nezib, S.W. of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 43), now Esna.

Ashpenaz. Dan. i. 3.

Ashtaroth, or Astaroth. A city N.E. of Jordan, called so from being a seat of Ashtaroth's worship. "Og dwelt in A., in Edrei" (Deut. i. 4; Josh. xii. 4, xiii. 12, 31, ix. 10). Allotted to Machir, son of Manasseh; and, out of Manasseh's portion, then allotted to the sons of Gershon, their other Levitical city here being Golan (Josh. xxi. 27), called Be-eshterah (i.e. Beth Ashterah, "the house of A."). Between Adara and Abila (according to Eusebius and Jerome) lay two villages, probably the one A., the other Ashtaroth-Karnaim. There is still a Tel Ashterah in this region. One of David's valiant men was Uziah the Ashterahite (1 Chron. xi. 44).

Ashtaroth-Karnaim. "A. of the two horns" or "peaks," situated between two hills, perhaps called from the two horned goddess Astarte, the crescent moon on her head. The Rephaim's abode in the time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gen. xiv. 5). Perhaps identical with Es Samamein ("the two idols"), 25 miles S. of Damascus, N.W. of the Lejah. Professor Paine identifies A.-K. with extensive ruins of immense basaltic blocks on a double ridge in the E. border of Gilead. The ridge is called El Birah, in front is the plain of Asherah.

Ashtoreth. The chief goddess of the Phœnicians, as Baal was the male. By the plural (ASHTAROTH, Baahim; Jud. x. 6, 1 Sam. vii. 4) different phases of the same deity, according to the different places of worship, are indicated. Always plural till under Solomon Ashtoreth or Astarte of Zidon was introduced (1 Kings xi. 5, 31). She appears among the Philistines as the idol in whose temple they hung up Saul's armour (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). She is identified as Ishtar or Nana, the planetary Venus among the Assyrian gods in inscriptions. Her name appears also in Cyprian and Carthaginian monuments; and on the sarcophagus of a king Esmunazar, who restored her temple at Zidon, along with his mother her priestess, Am-ashtoreth. She partly represents the planet Venus, partly the moon, "the queen of heaven" (Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 17, 18). [See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.] Our "star," Gr. "aster," Lat. "stella," is akin. Her worship was most licentious and abominable; closely connected with that of ASHERAH,

"THE GROVE" [see]. A. is the goddess, asherah "the grove," the image or the symbol of the goddess, of wood; asher, yashar, "to be straight," a straight stem of a tree living, or fixed upright (1 Kings xviii. 19; 2 Kings xvi. 7, xxiii. 6, 13, 14, 15; Jud. vi. 25, 30). The "bringing out the asherah from the house of the Lord," and the "cutting down," suit such a symbol, not a grove in our sense. The active and passive powers of nature, generative and receptive, suggested the male and female deities, Baal and A. The ewes of a flock were called Ashteroth on this principle, propagating the flock (Deut. vi. 13). The earliest worship of apostasy was that of the sun, moon, etc. This naturally was grafted on idol worship, Baal sometimes being the sun god, sometimes distinct (2 Kings xxiii. 5). So A. and the moon. The stone pillar was the symbol of Baal, as the sacred tree was the symbol of A.; stone marking his strength as the male, the tree her fruitfulness (Deut. xvi. 21). The sacred tree constantly accompanies the gods in the Assyrian monuments. In the Moabite Dibon stone the male form Ashtar is prefixed to Chamos or Chemosh, answering to the female Ashtarte. Identical with Attar or Ahtor of the Hymeric inscriptions, and Estar of the Ninevite inscriptions; the Canaanite form of the male Aphroditos answering to the female Aphrodité.

Ashur. 1 Chron. ii. 24, iv. 5.

Ashurites. Ruled by Ishbosheth (2 Sam. ii. 9). Arab., Syr., and Vulg. versions have it the Geshurites S.E. of Damascus. But these had Tahni as their king, whose daughter David married about this time (1 Chron. iii. 2, 4). The Targum of Jonathan reads Beth Asher, "the house of Asher," so also several Heb. MSS. The Asherites will then be the whole country W. of Jordan above Jezreel and the plain of Esdraelon. Thus the enumeration begins with the N. and ends with Benjamin on the S. Bachiene suggests the city "Asher" (Josh. xvii. 7), S.E. of Jezreel.

Ashvath. 1 Chron. vii. 33.

Asia. In the N. T. not the continent, nor Asia Minor, but the W. of Asia Minor, with Ephesus as its capital, including Mysia, Lydia, Caria. Attalus, king of Pergamus, left it to the Romans 133 B.C. It was placed by Augustus among the senatorial provinces, as distinguished from the imperial provinces. Hence it was governed by a "proconsul," as Acts xix. 38 (anthupatos), with the minute propriety which marks truth, incidentally intimates. It had its assize days (aparaté, marc. "the court days are kept"). Here were the seven churches addressed in the Revelation. In the O. T. "A." does not occur.

Asiarchs. "CHIEF OF ASIA" (Acts xix. 31). Officers, like the Roman aediles and Greek leitourgoi, yearly chosen by the cities in that part of Asia of which Ephesus was metropolis, to defray the cost and to undertake all the arrangements of the national games and theatrical sacred spectacles. Only wealthy persons could undertake the office. Each city chose one deputy, and out of the whole number ten were chosen, over whom one presided, selected by the Roman proconsul. The ten probably had the title, as well as the president, pre-eminently called "the A." Ex-asiarchs also probably retained the title.

Asiel. 1 Chron. iv. 35.

Asnah. Ezra ii. 50.

Asnapper. "The great and noble" (Ezra iv. 10). He planted the Cantheans, etc., in Samaria, after the deportation of the Israelites. He is either Esarhaddon, as ver. 2 implies, or some able general under him who effected the plantation = Asardana-ger = Esarhaddon.

Asp. See ADDER.

Aspatha. Esth. ix. 7.

Asriel. Num. xxvi. 31, Josh. xvii. 2, 1 Chron. vii. 14.

Ass. Heb. athon; from athan, short in step. 1. The domestic she-ass, named so from its slowness. 2. The chamor, the he ass, whether domesticated or not, distinguished from the athon, Gen. xlv. 23. From chamar, "red," as the Spaniards call the ass "burro," from its red colour. Used in riding and ploughing. Not held in contempt for stupidity, as with us. Issachar is compared to an "ass, strong boned, crouching down between the hurdles" (Gen. xlix. 14); he saw that rest was a good and the land pleasant; so he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became servant unto tribute; ease at the cost of liberty would be his characteristic. Robust, and with a prime agricultural inheritance, his people would strive after material good, rather than political rule. The prohibition of horses rendered the ass the more esteemed in Israel. In the E. it is a far superior animal to ours. The bearing of the Arab ass is erect, the limbs well formed and muscular, and the gait graceful. It is spirited, and withal docile. The upper classes, judges, (as Jair's 30 sons, and Abdon's 40 sons and 50 nephews,) and kings, (as David and Solomon,) rode upon asses or mules (Jud. v. 10, x. 4, xii. 14; 1 Kings i. 33). The white ass, combining symmetry with colour, is especially esteemed. The ass, by its long hollow sharp-edged hoofs, is more sure footed than the flat hoofed horse; it suffers little from thirst, and is satisfied with prickly herbs, scarcely sweats at all, and so is best suited for the arid hilly regions of western Asia. It is lowly as compared with the horse; it symbolises peace, as the horse does war, and as such bore the meek and lowly yet divinely royal Saviour, the Prince of peace, in His triumphal entrance into His own capital (Zech. ix. 9); the young untamed colt bearing Him quietly marks His universal dominion over nature as well as spirit. It was not to be yoked with the ox (Deut. xxii. 10); for the distinctions which God has fixed in nature are to be observed; humanity would forbid animals of such different size and strength being yoked together. Spiritually see 2 Cor. vi. 14, Lev. xix. 19. As it did not ewe the end (Lev. xi. 26), it was unclean; hence is marked the extremity of the famine in Samaria (2 Kings vi. 25), when "an ass' head (an unclean beast from which they would ordinarily shrink) was sold for fourscore pieces of silver." Balaam was rebuked for his iniquity, the voiceless beast of burden (ass) speaking with man's voice forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii. 16). It turned aside at the sight of the angel; but he, after God's express prohibition, wished to go for gain, a dumb beast forbidding an inspired prophet! The brute's instinctive obedience rebukes the gifted seer's self-willed disobedience. Hosea (viii. 9) compares Israel to a wild ass: "they are gone up to Assyria, (whereas he ought to dwell) a wild ass alone by himself" (Num. xxii. 9). The stubborn wild ass is wiser than Ephraim, for it avoids intercourse with others through love of freedom, whereas Ephraim courts alliances fatal to his freedom. (Maurer.) In Jer. ii. 24 headstrong, undisciplinable (bustaney, and untamable perversity, and lust after the male, answering to Israel's spiritual lust after idols and alliances with heathen, are the point (Hos. ii. 6, 7): "all they (the males) that seek her will not (have no need to) weary themselves in searching for her, in her month (the season when sexual impulse is strongest), they shall find her" putting herself in their way, and not needing to be sought out by the males. 3. The arod, the khur of Persia; light red, grey beneath, without stripe or cross; or the wild mule of Mongolia, superior to the wild ass in beauty, strength and swiftness, called so either from the sound of the word resembling neighing, or from the Arabic arod, "flee." 4. Air, from ir, to be fervent, lustful; so the chamor, perhaps from chamar, "fervent in lust" (Ezek. xxiii. 20). "Young asses;" "ass colts" (Isa. xxx. 6, 24). 5. Pere, the wild ass of Asia; the ghoorchur, mouse brown, with a broad dorsal stripe, but no cross on the shoulders, the Latin cauger (Gen. xvi. 12); Ishmael "shall be a wild ass man;" from pava, "to run swiftly"; comp. Job xxxix. 5: "who hath sent out the wild ass (pereh) free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass (arod)?" Doubtless some of the most useful animals to man were created to be, from man's first being, his domestic attendants. Possibly some of the wild species have sprung from those originally tame. The wild asses' characteristics noticed in holy writ are their love of unrestrained freedom, self will in pursuit of lust (Jer. ii. 24), fondness for solitary places (Hos. viii. 9), standing on high places when athirst (Jer. xiv. 6; when even the pere, usually so inured to want of water, suffers, the drought must be terrible indeed).

2. 1 Chron. vi. 23, 37. 3. 1 Chron. iii. 17.

Assos, Assus. Seaport of Mysia, on the N. of the gulf Adramyttium. Seven miles from the island Lesbos opposite, near Methymna; 20 miles from Troas (Acts xx. 13, 14). The ship with Luke, Sopater, Aristarchus, etc., from Troas, went round cape Lectum, whilst he went the shorter way (20 Roman miles) by land on foot to A., where he reached the ship in time for her to arrive that evening at Mitylene. It was a thoroughly Greek city. The remains are in good preservation, being of granite. The citadel above the theatre commands a fine view. The Street of Tombs (each formed of one granite block) leading to the great gate is a striking feature. The Assian stone, near the city, was thought to have flesh consuming properties, whence the stone coffins were called sarcophagi, "flesh consumers."

Assur, Assyria, Asshur. The region between the Armenian mountains on the N., Elam or Susiana, now the country near Bagdad, on the S., and beyond it Babylonia, the mountains of Kurdistan, the ancient Lagros chain and Media on the E., the Mesopotamian desert (between Tigris and Euphrates), or else the Euphrates, on the W.; a length of about 500 miles, a breadth of from 350 to 100. W. of the Euphrates was Arabia, higher up Syria, and the country of the Hittites. Kurdistan and the pachalik of Mosul nearly answer to A. Named from Asshur, Shem's son, latterly made the Assyrian god. Its capital was Nineveh on the Tigris (a name meaning arrow, implying rapidity, but see Hiddekel). Gen. x. 11, 12, 22; ii. 14. All over the vast flat on both sides of the Tigris rise "grass covered heaps, marking the site of ancient habitations" (Layard). They are numbered by hundreds, and when examined exhibit traces of their Assyrian origin. They are on the left bank of the Tigris, and on the right abound both on the N. and the S. of the Sinyar (a limestone range extending from Iwan in Luristan nearly to Rakka on the Euphrates), and eastward beyond the Khabour, northward to Mardie, and southward to near Bagdad. Huzzab (Nah. ii. 7), answering to Adiabene, the richest region of all, lying on the rivers Zab or Diab, tributaries of the Tigris, whence it is named, is the only district name which occurs in Scripture. The chief cities were Nineveh, answering to the mounds opposite Mosul (Nebi Yenus and Koyunjik), Calah or Hulah, now Nimrud; Asshur, now Kileh Sherghat; Sargina, now Khorsabad; Arbela, Arbil (G. Rawlinson). Others identify Kileh Sherghat on the right bank of the Tigris with the ancient Calah, Nimrud with Resen. Erech is the modern Warka; Accad, now Akkertuf. Calneh answers to the classical Otesiphon on the Tigris, 18 miles below Bagdad, the region round being named by the Greeks Calonitis. Rehoboth answers to ruins still so named on the right of the Euphrates, N.W. of the Shinar plain, and three and half miles S.W. of the town Mayadin (Chesney): Gen. x. 10-12. G. Smith thinks the ridges enclosing Koyunjik and Nebi Yenus were only the wall of inner Nineveh, the city itself extending much beyond this, viz. to the mound Yarenijah. Nineveh was at first only a fort to keep the Babylonian conquests in that quarter; but even then a temple was founded to the goddess at Koyunjik. Samsi-ru, prince of the city Assur, 60 miles S. of Nineveh, rebuilt the temple; the region round Nineveh in the 19th century being under A.'s rulers. Again Assurnabid, 1400 B.C., rebuilt, and a century later Shalmaneser, one of whose brick inscriptions G. Smith found.

Classical tradition and the Assyrian monuments confirm Scripture, that A. was peopled from Babylon. In Herodotus Ninus the founder of Nineveh is the son of Belus, the founder of Babylon. The remains prove that Babylon's civilization was anterior to A.'s. The cuneiform writing is rapidly punched on moist clay, and so naturally took its rise in Babylonia, where they used "brick for stone" (Gen. xi. 3), and passed thence to A., where chiselling characters on rock is not so easy. In A. too the writing is of a more advanced kind; in early Babylonia of a ruder stage. Babylon is Hamitic in origin; A. Shemitic. The vocabulary of Ur, or S. Babylonia, is Cushite or Ethiopian, of which the modern Galla of Abyssinia gives the best idea. At the same time traces exist in the Babylonian language of the other three great divisions of human speech, Shemitic, Aryan, and Turanian, showing in that primitive stage traces of the original unity of tongues. Rehoboth 1r (i.e. city markets), Calah, Resen, and Nineveh (in the restricted sense), formed one great composite city, Nineveh (in the larger sense): Jon. iii. 3. The monuments confirm Gen. x. 9-12, that the Shemitic Assyrians proceeding out of Babylonia founded Nineveh long after the Cushite foundation of Babylon. The Babylonian shrines were those at which the Assyrians thought the gods most accessible, regarding Babylon as the true home of their gods (Arrian, Exp. Alex., 7).

Moses knew A. (Gen. ii. 14, xxv. 18; Num. xxiv. 22, 24), but not as a kingdom; had it been a kingdom in Abraham's time, it must have appeared among Chedorlaomer's confederates (Gen. xiv.). Chushan-Rishathaim (Jud. iii. 8), the first foreign oppressor of Israel, was master of the whole of Syria between the rivers (Arum Naharaim) or Mesopotamia, in the time of the judges, so that at that time (about 1100 B.C.) A. can have had no great power. According to Herodotus and the Babylonian historian Berosus, we can infer the empire began about 1228 B.C., 520 years before its decay through the revolt of subject nations, the Medes, etc.; or else 526 years from 1273 B.C. (as others suggest) to the reign of Pul.

He first brought A. into contact with Israelite history by making Menahem his tributary vassal (2 Kings xv. 19). Under Tiglath Pileser the Assyrian empire included

CAPTIVE JEWS

Media, Syria, and N. Palestine, besides A. proper. Shalmaneser added Israel, Zidon, Acre, and Cyprus. Assyrian monuments, pillars, boundary tablets, and inscriptions are found as far as in Cyprus at Larnaka (a portrait of a king with a tablet, now in Berlin), and in the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea.

Their alabaster quarries furnished a material better than the Babylonian bricks for portraying scenes. Their pictures partake more of the actual than the ideal; but in the realistic school they stand high and show a progressive power unknown in stationary Egyptian art. The sculptures in Sardanapalus II.'s palace are the best, and the animal forms, the groupings, the attitudes most lifelike. The Assyrians knew the arch, the lever, the roller, gem engraving, tunnelling, drainage. Their vases, bronze and ivory ornaments, bells, and earrings, show considerable taste and skill. But their religion was sensual and their government rude. No funeral ceremonies are represented. They served as God's scourge of Israel (Isa. x. 5, 6), and they prepared the way for a more centralized and better organized government, and a more spiritual religion, such as the Medo-Persians possessed. The apocryphal book of Baruch describes the Assyrian deities exactly as the ancient monuments do. Asshur, the deified patriarch, was the chief god (Gen. x. 22). Ahaz' idolatrous altar set up from a pattern at Damascus, where he had just given his submission to Tiglath Pileser, may have been required as a token of allegiance, for the inscriptions say that wherever they established their supremacy they set up "the laws of Asshur," and "altars to the great gods." But this rule was not always enforced and in no case required the supplanting of the local worship, but merely the superaddition of the Assyrian rite. Athur, on the Tigris, five hours N.E. of Mosul, still represents the name A. Syria (properly called Arum) N. of Palestine is probably a shortened form of A., the name being extended by the Greeks to the country which they found subject to A.

Ctesias' list of Assyrian kings is evidently unhistoric. However the inscriptions of Sargon, king of Agane near Sippara (Sophravain), describe his conquests in Elam and Syria, and his advance to the Mediter-ramean coast, where he set up a monument 1600 B.C. He records that his mother placed him at his birth in an ark of rushes and set it afloat on the Euphrates; seemingly copied from the account of Moses. The oldest Assyrian remains are found at Kileh Sherghat on the right bank of the Tigris, 60 miles S. of the later capital; here therefore, at this city then called Asshur, not at Nineveh, was the early seat of government. 14 kings reigned there during 350 years, from 1273 to 930 B.C., divisible into three groups.

[G. Smith, by recent discoveries, adds to this list Ismi-Dagan, 1850-1820 B.C.; Samsi-Vul I., 1820-1800; Igur-Kap-Kapu and Samsi-Vul II., about 1800; Haba and Iritak, about 1750 B.C. Bel-Kap-Kapu, about 1700 B.C., in G. Smith's list, seems the same as Bel-Sumili-Kapi above. G. S. adds Adasi and Belbani, called "lord of countries," about 1650; Assur-zakir-esir and Ninip-Tugul-Assuri, about 1600; Assur-Nirari I. about 1500 B.C. So Shamas-Vul or Samsi-Vul in 1110-1070 B.C. above is Samsi-Vul III., Shamas-Vul II. is Shamas-Vul IV., and Asshur-Cush or Assur-Nirari is Assur-Nirari II. G. S. inserts Bel-zakir-iskum, 626-620 B.C., between Asshur-bani-pal and Asshur-enid-ilim. (G. S. notices of Israel's kings mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions Omri (Humri), Ahab (Ahabbu), Jehu (Yahna), Menahem (Minihimnu), Pekah (Papuaba), Hoshea (Husia); of Judah's kings, Azariah (Azriyabu), Ahaz (Yahu-hazi), Hezekiah (Hazaquiyahu), and Manasseh (Manasel).]

Tiglath Pileser I. was contemporary with Senned about the close of the 12th century B.C. Cylinders of clay, resembling a small egg diminishing in size from the middle to the ends, more durable for records than the hardest metals, are now in the British Museum, which had lain under the four corner stones of the great temple of A. at Kileh Sherghat for 3000 years, and which relate the five successive campaigns of Tiglath Pileser I., 1130

B.C. He is the first Assyrian king of whose exploits we have full details; two duplicate cylinders in the British Museum were deciphered by Sir H. Rawlinson, Fox Talbot, Hincks, and Oppert, furnished simultaneously with lithographed copies and working independently. The agreement substantially of their readings proves the truth of the decipherment. Asshur-bani-pal (the Greek Sardapalus) is the only monarch who keenly patronised literature. A royal library of clay tablets, numbering probably 10,000, was made by him at Nineveh, from which the British Museum has got its most precious treasures. They filled the chambers to the height of a foot or more from the floor. A religious character appears in all the Assyrian kings' names. Tiglath Pileser I. (= Be worship given to Nin or Hercules) claims to have conquered in the first five years of his reign "42 countries from the Lower Zab to the Upper Sea of the setting sun," the region from A. proper to the Euphrates, from Babylon's borders to mount Taurus, and to have fought the Hittites in northern Syria, and invaded Armenia and Cappadocia. Later on he was defeated by the Babylonian king, who carried captive several Assyrian idols.

Sardanapalus I. (Asshur-izir-pal) transferred the seat of government from Kileh Sherghat (Assur) to Nimrud (Calah), where he built the gorgeous palace lately discovered. Most of the Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum are from it; and from them we learn that Sardanapalus I. (Asshur-izir-pal) warred in Lower Babylonia and Chaldea, as well as in Syria and upon the Mediterranean coast. Shalmaneser II., or Shalmanubar, his son, set up the black obelisk now in the British Museum to commemorate his father's victories. He himself overran Cappadocia, Armenia, Azerbijan, Media Magna, the Kurd mountains, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Phoenicia. Cuneiform scholars all agree that Benhadad and Hazael, of Damascus, are mentioned as opposed to him in his Syrian wars, and that he took tribute from Jehu of Israel. In 854 B.C. his advance into Hamath was interrupted by the league of Syria and Palestine, 85,000 in all, under Benhadad. Among them inscriptions mention 2000 chariots and 10,000 footmen of Alah of Israel. The battle was at the Orontes. Shalmaneser claims the victory, but he was forced to return to Nineveh. In 842 B.C., when Moab had revolted from Israel and the league of Syria and Israel was dissolved, Shalmaneser attacked Hazael, Benhadad's successor, at the mountains of Saurin (Shenir) in Lebanon, and completely defeated him. Unable to take Damascus, Shalmaneser marched to the Mediterranean coast, where he set up a pillar at the mouth of the Dog River commemorating his victories. Jehu, called in the inscription "son (i.e. successor) of Omri," gave him tribute. (G. Smith in Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat.)

Jonah's mission to Nineveh was shortly before Pul's reign. Pul, Phul, or Phaloch, supposed to be his grandson, is the first Assyrian king mentioned in Scripture. Identified by some with Pul-lush of the Assyrian lists, who reigned at Calah (Nimrud) from 800 to 750 B.C., and who married Semiramis of Babylon (whose son Nabonassar Pul is supposed to have sat on the Babylonian throne). But as it is impossible to identify Tiglath Pileser's predecessor Asshur-lush with Pul, and as A. was then in a depressed state through internal troubles, Pul was probably monarch at Babylon (Berosus, the Babylonian historian, calls him "king of the Chaldeans") whilst Asshur-lush reigned at Nineveh. In the disturbed 10 years before Tiglath Pileser's accession, he probably deprived A. of her western province and invaded Palestine from the Assyrian direction, and so was loosely designated "king of A." instead of "Babylon." Tiglath Pileser II., 745 B.C., founded a new dynasty. He was an usurper, for he makes no mention of his father or ancestors. He conquered Rezin, king of Damascus, at Abaz' solicitation, also Israel, whom he deprived of much territory. The captives he carried to Kir, a river flowing into the Caspian Sea. In the inscriptions mention is made of Menahem of Syria paying him tribute, also Jahuhazi (Ahaz), of Judah, and of his setting Hoshea on the Israelite throne on Pekah's death. The Assyrian monuments clear the seeming discrepancy of Isa. xx. mentioning Sargon, whilst he is ignored in 2 Kings. Sargon is by them proved to have been successor of Shalmaneser II. (Tiglath Pileser's successor), and father of Sennacherib, and grandfather of Esarhaddon. The siege of Samaria for three years, under Hoshea, was begun by Shalmaneser and was ended by Sargon (2 Kings xvii.).

About the middle of the eighth century B.C. there is a break in the line of Assyrian kings and a loosening of the tie which held together the subject nations under A., so that 23 years after Pul, 747 B.C., the Babylonians reckon as the era of their independence. At this time Tiglath Pileser II. seems to have been the founder of the "lower empire." This more than revived the glories of the former empire, and recovered the supremacy over Babylon. The magnificent palace of Sennacherib (the assailant of HEZEKIAH [see]) at Nineveh, as also the buildings erected by Sargon and Esarhaddon (the carrier away of Manasseh to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) show the power and wealth of A. at this period. The remains at Koyunjik and Khorsabad are the work of these later kings alone; at Nimrud the earlier kings shared in the erections. By the end of Esarhaddon's reign Hamath, Damascus, and Samaria had been absorbed, Judaea made tributary, Philistia and Idumea subjected, Babylon recovered, and cities planted in Media. Sardanapalus II. succeeded, who was wholly given to the chase, and who decorated his palace walls at Nineveh with sculptures representing its triumphs. The growing power of the Medes gave the final blow (foretold long ago, Isa. x. 5-19) to A., already enervated by luxury and having lost in prosperous ease its military spirit. Long before Arbaces the Mede (594 B.C.) is said to have made himself king of A. About 633 B.C. they began attacking A., at first unsuccessfully; but Cyaxares the Mede having gained the Babylonians under Nabopolassar, the Assyrian viceroy of Babylon, as allies, about 625 B.C. besieged Nineveh. Sarcus, probably Esarhaddon's grandson, after a brave resistance set fire with his own hand to his palace with its treasures, and himself and his wives perished amidst the flames. Nah. ii. and Zeph. ii. 13-15 shortly before the catastrophe foretold it; and Ezekiel (xxxi.) shortly afterwards about 586 B.C. attests how completely A. was overthrown, as a warning of the fatal end of pride.

Never again did A. rise as a nation, for God had said (Nah. iii. 19) "there is no healing of thy bruise." The only revolt attempted by her along with Media and Armenia was crushed. The political cause of her downfall was probably the non-fusion of the subject kingdoms into one organic whole. These kingdoms were feudatories, rendering homage and tribute to the great monarch; as Menahem (2 Kings xv. 19), Hoshea (xvii. 4), Ahaz (xvi. 8), Hezekiah (xviii. 14), Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11); and ready therefore at the first opportunity, whether the king's death or some Assyrian disaster or the promise of some antagonistic ally, to revolt.

Astrologers. Isa. xlvii. 13. [See DIVINATION.] Hobreev, Kethib; Hobreev, Qeri. "Those who form combinations of the heavens," i.e. watch conjunctions and oppositions of the stars; "dividers of the heavens" (Gesenius). In casting a nativity they observed: (1) the horoscope, or sign which arose at birth, (2) the mid heaven, (3) the sign opposite the horoscope towards the W., and (4) the hypogee.

Asuppim: "gathering" marg. 1 Chron. xxvi. 15, 17. Not a proper name. From asaph, to "gather." The house of stores, where were kept the grain, wine, and other offerings for the sustenance of the priests. Near the S. door of the temple in the outer court; it had two entrances, for ver. 19 states that two guard stations were assigned to it. In Neh. xii. 25 the same Heb. is translated "thresholds," marg. "treasuries," "assemblies."

Asyncrius. A Roman Christian (Rom. xvi. 14).

Atad: "the floor of the thorn," a trodden space for threshing, beyond Jordan, where Joseph and his brethren and the Egyptian retinue made for seven days "great and very sore lamentation" over the body of Jacob, whence the Canaanites called the place Abel Mizraim, "the mourning of the Egyptians." Canaan being the central standpoint of the sacred history, the E. of Jordan is naturally called "beyond Jordan." The same route by which Joseph had been led captive was that by which the grand Egyptian procession doing honour to his deceased father proceeded. Grove however makes A. W. of Jordan, as Jerome identifies it with Beth Hagra (the house of gyratory dances, or movements attendant on the funeral ceremony), known to lie between the Jordan and Jericho. The Canaanites, "the inhabitants of the land," were on the W. of Jordan (comp. Gen. i. 13, Num. xiii. 29). "Beyond Jordan" will thus be from the standpoint of the E. of Jordan, where Moses the writer was (Gen. i. 10, 11). Atarah. 1 Chron. ii. 26.

Ataroth = crowns. 1. A town in the land of Jazer and Gilead, taken and "built" by Gad (Num. xxxii. 3, 34). 2. A place on the boundary of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 2, 5, 7); possibly the same as ATAROTH ADDAR, on the W. border of Benjamin, "near the hill that lieth on the S. side of the nether Beth-horon" (Josh. xviii. 13). 3. ATAROTH THE HOUSE OF JOAB (1 Chron. ii. 54), or "Crowns the house of Joab," a town in Judah.

Ater. Neh. x. 17.
Athaliah. Daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, married Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram, king of Judah. It was a union (comp. 1 Cor. xv. 33, vi. 14-18) fatal to the cause of piety in Judah, a cause which the godly Jehoshaphat had so much at heart. She bore a hideous likeness to Jezebel her mother, as the history with such unstudied truthfulness brings out. By her influence Jehoram was led to walk in the way of the kings of Israel, like as did the house of Ahab (2 Chron. xxi. 6). Baal worship through her was introduced into Judah, as it had been through her mother into Israel. Worldly policy, the hope of reuniting Israel to Judah, and concession to his son, whose reckless violence was afterwards seen in the murder of his own brothers (2 Chron. xxi. 3, 4), infatuated Jehoshaphat to sanction the union. The same bloodthirstiness, lust of dominion over husband and over the state, and unscrupulous wickedness in killing all that stood in the way of ambition, appear in the daughter as in the mother. When her son Ahaziah was slain by Jehu, along with the brethren of Ahaziah and their sons (42 men), she arose and destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah (2 Chron. xxii. 10). As queen-mother she was determined to keep the regal power which she exercised during Ahaziah's absence in Jezreel (2 Kings ix. 16). Ahaziah's youngest son Joash alone escaped her murderous hand, secreted by Jehoshaphat's aunt, daughter of Jehoram (probably not by A., but another wife) and wife of the priest Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxii. 11, 12). For six years he was hid, but in the seventh year Jehoiada took into covenant with him for restoring the rightful king "the captains of hundreds," two Azariah, Ishmael, Maasiah, and Elishaphat; they next enlisted the co-operation of the Levites, gathered out of Judah, and the chief fathers of Israel who came to Jerusalem. Then they made a covenant with the king in the temple. A third part of the soldiers of the guard usually guarded the palace, whilst two thirds restrained the crowds on the sabbath by guarding the gate Sur (1 Kings xi. 6), or "the gate of the foundation" (2 Chron. xxiii. 5), and the gate "behind the guard," the N. and S. entrances to the temple. The two thirds in the temple were to guard the king with David's spears and shields, that the restoration of his descendant might be connected with his name. Any who should approach beyond the fixed limits were to be killed. Joash was duly anointed, crowned, and received the testimony or law, the statute book of his reign (Deut. xvii. 18-20). A., roused by the acclamations of the people, hastened to the temple, and there saw the king "by a pillar" or "upon" it, i.e. on a throne raised upon it (for "pillar" Gesenius translates "stage" or "scaffold," such as in 2 Chron. vi. 13). In vain she (who herself was the embodiment of treason) cried "Treason!" She was hurried out, and slain at the entering of the horse gate by the king's house. Mattan, Baal's priest, was the only other person slain. Her usurpation lasted 883-877 B.C. As she loved blood, blood was her own end; having lived as her mother, as her mother she died, slain at her own walls amidst the hoofs of the horses (comp. Rev. xvi. 5, 6).

Athens. Capital of Attica, the centre of Grecian refinement and philosophy. Paul visited it in journeying from Macedonia, and stayed sometime (Acts xvii. 14, etc.; 1 Thess. iii. 1). Four hills are within it: the Acropolis, N.E., a square rock 150 feet high; W. of it is the AREOPAGUS [see]. S.W. is the Pnyx, or Assembly Hill. S. of this is the Museum Hill. The Agora where Paul disputed was in the valley between the four. The news-mongering taste of the people (Acts xvii. 21) is noticed by their great orator Demosthenes, "Ye go about the marketplace asking, Is there any news?" Their pure atmosphere, open air life, and liberal institutions, stimulated liveliness of thought. Pausanias (i. 24, §3) confirms St. Paul's remark on their religiousness even to superstition; "the zeal devoted by the Athenians to the rites of the gods exceeds that of all others." [See ALTAR, AREOPAGUS.] Dionysius the Areopagite convert of Paul was, according to tradition, the first bishop of an Athenian church. Theseus' temple is the most perfect of the remaining monuments. The Parthenon or temple of Minerva, built of Pentelic marble, 228 feet long, 102 broad, 66 high, with 8 Doric columns on each front and 17 on each side, was the masterpiece of Athenian architecture. The colossal statue of Minerva Promachus, Phidias' workmanship, was 70 feet high, so as to be seen towering above the Parthenon by the mariner in doubling Cape Sunium.

Athlai. Ezra x. 28.
Atonement. [See RECONCILIATION.] Literally, the being at one, after having been at variance. Tyndale explains "One Mediator" (1 Tim. ii. 5): "at one maker between God and man." To make A. is to give or do that whereby alienation ceases and reconciliation ensues. "Reconciliation" is the equivalent term given for the same Heb. word, kopher, in Dan. ix. 24, Lev. xiii. 15, Ezek. xlv. 15. In the N. T. A. V. once only "A." is used (Rom. v. 11): "by whom (Christ) we have received the A." (katalage), where the reconciliation or A. must be on God's part towards us, for it could not well be said, "We have received the reconciliation on our part towards Him." Elsewhere the same Gr. is translated "reconciliation" (2 Cor. v. 18, 19). A kindred term expressing a different aspect of the same truth is "propitiation" (hilasmos) (1 John ii. 2), the verb of which is in Heb. ii. 17 translated "to make reconciliation." Also "ransom," or payment for redeeming a captive (Job xxxiii. 24), kopher, "an A." Matt. xx. 28. Heb. ix. 12: Christ, "having obtained eternal redemption for us" (lutrosos), the deliverance bought for us by His bloodshedding, the price: 1 Pet. i. 18). The verb kipper 'al, "to cover upon," expresses the removing utterly out of sight the guilt of person or thing by a ransom, satisfaction, or substituted victim. The use of the word and the noun kopher, throughout the O. T., proves that, as applied to the A. or reconciliation between God and man, it implies not merely what is man's part in finding acceptance with God, but, in the first instance, what God's justice required on His part, and what His love provided, to justify His entering into reconciliation with man. In Lev. i. 4, iv. 26, v. 1, 16-18, xvi., and xvii. 11, the truth is established that the guilt is transferred from the sinful upon the innocent substitute, in order to make amends to violated justice, and to cover (atone; kipper 'al) or put out of sight the guilt (comp. Mic. vii. 19 end), and to save the sinner from the wages of sin which is death. On the great day of A. the highpriest made "A. for the sanctuary, the tabernacle, and the altar," also, as well as for the priests and all the people; but it was the people's sin that defiled the places so as to make them unfit for the presence of the Holy One. Unless the A. was made the soul "bore its iniquity," i.e. was under the penalty of death. The exceptions of A. made with fine flour by one not able to afford the animal sacrifice (Lev. v. 11), and by Aaron with incense on a sudden emergency (Num. xvi. 47), confirm the rule. The blood was the medium of A., because it had the life or soul (nephesh) in it. The soul of the offered victim atoned for the soul of the sinful offerer. The guiltless blood was given by God to be shed to atone for the forfeited blood of the guilty. The innocent victim pays the penalty of the offerer's sin, death (Rom. vi. 23).

This A. was merely typical in the O. T. sacrifices; real in the one only N. T. sacrifice, Christ Jesus. Kopher and kopher is in Gen. vi. 14, "Thou shalt pitch the ark with pitch," the instrument of covering the saved from the destroying flood outside, as Jesus' blood interposes between believers and the flood of wrath that swallows up the lost. Jacob uses the atax verb (Gen. xxxii. 20), "I will appease Esau with the present," i.e., cover out of sight or turn away his wrath. The "mercy seat" whereat God meets man (being reconciled through the blood there sprinkled, and so man can meet God) is called kapporeth, i.e. the lid of the ark, covering the law inside, which is fulfilled in Messiah who is called by the corresponding Gr. term, hilasterion, "the propitiatory" or mercy seat, "whom God hath set forth to be a propitiatory through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 25). God Himself made a coat (singular in Heb.) of skin, and clothed Adam and his wife (Gen. iii. 21). The animal cannot have been slain for food, for animal food was not permitted to man till after the flood (Gen. ix. 3); nor for clothing, for the fleece would afford that, without the needless killing of the animal. It must have been for sacrifice, the institution of which is presumed in the preference given to Abel's sacrifice, above Cain's offering of firstfruits, in Gen. iv. Typically God taught that the clothing for the soul must be from the Victim whom God's love provided to cover our guilt for ever out of sight (Ps. xxxii. 1) (not kaphar, but kasah) (Rom. iv. 17, Isa. lxi. 10), the same Heb. (he-bash) as in Gen. iii. 21, "clothed."

FROM THE LOUIS MARBLE.

The universal prevalence of propitiatory sacrifices over the heathen world implies a primitive revelation of the need of expiatory A., and of the inefficacy of repentance alone to remove guilt. This is the more remarkable in Hindostan, where it is considered criminal to take away the life of any animal. God's righteous character and government interposed a barrier to sinful man's pardon and reception into favour. The sinner's mere desire for these blessings does not remove the barrier out of the way. Something needed to be done for him, not by him. It was for God, against whom man sinned, to appoint the means for removing the barrier. The sinless Jesus' sacrifice for, and instead of, us sinners was the mean so appointed. The sinner has simply by faith to embrace the means. And as the means, the vicarious A. by Christ, is of God, it must be efficacious for salvation. Not that Jesus' death induced God to love us; but because God loved us He gave Jesus to reconcile the claims of justice and mercy, "that God might be just and at the same time the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26, 2 Cor. v. 18-21). Jesus is, it is true, not said in Scripture to reconcile God to the sinner, because the reconciliation in the first instance emanated from God Himself. God reconciled us to Himself, i.e. restored us to His favour, by satisfying the claims of justice against us. Christ's A. makes a change, not in God's character as if God's love was produced by it, but in our position judicially considered in the eye of the Divine Law. Christ's sacrifice was the provision of God's love, not its moving cause (Rom. viii. 32). Christ's blood was the ransom paid at the expense of God Himself, to reconcile the exercise of mercy and justice, not as separate, but as the eternally harmonious attributes in the same God. God reconciles the world unto Himself, in the first instance, by satisfying His own just enmity against sin (Ps. vii. 11; Isa. xii. 1, comp. 1 Sam. xxix. 4; "reconcile himself unto his master," not remove his own anger against his master, but his master's anger against him). Men's reconciliation to God by laying aside their enmity is the after consequence of their believing that He has laid aside His judicial enmity against their sin. Penal and vicarious satisfaction for our guilt to God's law by Christ's sacrificial death is taught Matt. xx. 28: "the Son of man came to give His life a ransom for (anti) many" (anti implies vicarious satisfaction in Matt. v. 28, Mark x. 45). 1 Tim. ii. 6: "who gave Himself a ransom for (antitutor, an equivalent payment in substitution for) all." Eph. v. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 24, iii. 18: "the Just for the unjust. . . suffered for us." John i. 29: "the Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the world." 1 Cor. v. 7, 1 Pet. i. 19, John x. 15, Rom. iv. 25: "He was delivered on account of (dia) our offences, and raised again for the sake of (dia) our justification." (Rev. i. 5; Heb. ix. 13, 14.) Conscience feels instinctively the penal claims of violated Divine justice, and can only find peace when by faith it has realized that those claims have been fully met by our sacrificed Substitute (Heb. ix. 9, x. 1, 2, 22; 1 Pet. iii. 21). The conscience reflects the law and will of God, though that law condemns the man.

Opponents of the doctrine of vicarious A. say, "it exhibits God as less willing to forgive than His creatures are bound to be;" but man's justice, which is the faint reflex of God's, binds the judge, however lamenting the painful duty, to sentence the criminal to death as a satisfaction to outraged law. Also, "as taking delight in executing vengeance on sin, or yielding to the extremity of suffering what He withheld on considerations of mercy." But the claim of God's righteousness is not pressed apart from that of God's love; both move in beautiful unity; the A. is at once the brightest exhibition of His love and of His justice; it does not render God merciful, but opens a channel whereby love can flow in perfect harmony with His righteous law, yea "magnifying the law and making it honourable" (Isa. xlii. 21). At the same time it is a true remark of Macdonell (Donellan Lectures): "Christ's work of redemption springs from an intimate relationship to those whom He redeems. It is not only because He suffers what they ought to have suffered that mercy becomes possible; but because He who suffered bore some mysterious relation to the spirits of those for whom He suffered; so that every pang He felt, and every act He did, vibrated to the extremities of that body of which He is the head, and placed not their acts, but the actors themselves, in a new relation to the Divine government and to the fountain of holiness and life." It is only as Representative Head of humanity, that the Son of man, the second Adam, made full and adequate satisfaction for the whole race whose nature He took. He died sufficiently for all men; efficiently for the elect alone (Heb. ii. 9-15, 1 John ii. 2, Acts xx. 28, 2 Pet. ii. 1, 1 Tim. iv. 10). Anything short of an adequate satisfaction would be so far an abatement of Divine justice; and if part of the sin might be forgiven without the satisfaction, why not all? If God can dispense with the claims of justice in part, He can as well do it altogether. A partial satisfaction would be almost more dishonouring to God's righteousness than a gratuitous forgiveness without any satisfaction whatever. With God alone it rested to determine what is adequate satisfaction, and how it is to become available to each man, without injury to the cause of righteousness. God has determined it, that in Christ's infinite dignity of person and holiness above that of any creature, there is ensured the adequateness of the satisfaction, made by His obedience and suffering, to meet the claims of justice against those whose nature He voluntarily assumed; nay more, to set forth God's glory more brightly than ever; also God has revealed that by believing the sinner becomes one with the Redeemer, and so rightly shares in the redemption wrought by Him the Head of the redeemed. No motive has ever been found so powerful as the sinner's realization of the A., to create love in the human heart, constraining the accepted believer henceforth to shun all sin and press after all holiness in order to please God, who first loved him (Rom. viii. 1-3; 2 Cor. v. 14, 15; 1 John iv. 19).

Atonement, Day of: Yom hakkippurim, Heb.: "the day of propitiation" or "expiation" (exilasmus), Gr. Acts xxvii. 9, "the fast," the great day of national humiliation, the only one enjoined in the law. For the mode of observance comp. Lev. xvi. 3-10, which sets forth the general ceremonial, 11-34 details; Num. xxix. 7-11, the special victims; Lev. xxiii. 26-32, how the people were to act. The day was the 10th of Tisri (the seventh month), from the evening of the 9th to that of the 10th, five days before the feast of tabernacles. For this latter feast implied rest in Israel's inheritance; and before rest can be realized atonement must precede. It was kept as a sabbath; but not, as other sabbaths, with joy, but with affliction of themselves, as the day on which the nation's collective sin was brought to remembrance. The mode of affliction was not prescribed, but all work was forbidden on pain of cutting off from the Lord's congregation. For the one work of atonement by the high-priest was to be the all absorbing thought; just as in the case of the work of the great Antitype (John vi. 28, 29). Only this once in the year was the highpriest to enter the holiest. Having bathed, and dressed, not in his robes "for glory and beauty" (Exod. xxviii.), but in the white linen garments symbolising the holiness required for admission into God's presence (Heb. xii. 14), he brought a bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, at his own cost, to offer for himself and his priestly family; and two goats for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, at the public cost, to offer for the people. Then he presented the two goats before the Lord at the tabernacle door, and cast lots upon them, implying that Christ's sacrifice was "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" (Acts ii. 23, iv. 28); on one was written "For Jehovah," on the other "For Aazel." Next he slew the bullock as a sin offering for himself and his family. Taking a censer with burning coals from the brazen altar, and applying a handful of incense, he entered the holiest, where the mercy seat became enveloped in the cloud of smoke from the incense. Then he took of the bullock's blood (going out probably for it, and coming in again) and sprinkled it with his finger upon the mercy seat: not on the top, but on its front, then seven times before the mercy seat, upon the ground in front of it; "eastward" (Lev. xvi. 14) means the side of the ark towards the veil. The cloud of incense "covering the mercy seat upon the testimony, lest he should die," typifies Christ's merits incensing our prayers, so as to make them a sweet smelling savour to God (Rev. viii. 3, 4). His meritorious obedience makes His atoning blood acceptable, so that the sinner dies not in the presence of Him who would otherwise be "a consuming fire." The goat "for Jehovah" was then slain, and its blood sprinkled as the bullock's. Going out from the holiest, the highpriest purified, by sprinkling seven times with the bullock's and the goat's blood, the holy place and the golden altar; and then outside he poured the rest of the blood round the altar of burnt offering; the places defiled by the priest's and the nation's sins being thus made ceremonially and typically fit for the indwelling of God; comp. as to the Antitype Heb. ix. 22, 23. During this no ordinary priest was allowed to be in or about the sanctuary (Lev. xvi. 16-20, Exod. xxx. 10); teaching that Messiah has a priesthood exclusively His own, and that no work of layman or priest is to be added to His complete work of atonement (Heb. vii. 24, ix. 12, x. 12-18). Then the highpriest laid his hands upon the head of the goat "for Aazel," confessing over it all the sins of the people. Next a man chosen for the purpose led it into the wilderness, "a land not inhabited," and there let it loose.

The two goats constitute one offering: the slain one typifying Jesus' vicarious bearing of our sin's penalty, death; the scapegoat the complete removal of our sin out of sight to where no witness will rise in judgment against us. The life after death also points to our being dead with Christ to sin and its penalty and power, and becoming alive unto God by union with Him in His resurrection life (Rom. vi. 5-11). In Lev. xvi. 10, 26, instead of "the goat for the scapegoat," which is tautology, translate "the goat for complete sending away" (from the Arabic root 'azal, "to remove completely"). Comp. Ps. ciii. 12, Mic. vii. 19.

Many think Aazel to be the devil, to whom, as the source of sin, "the entirely separate one," the scapegoat, with its load of sin taken off from the congregation, was sent to the wilderness (the abode of evil spirits) to be given up to, as sin and the wicked shall be hereafter (Rev. xv. 14, 15; Matt. xxv. 41; Luke xvi. 26); entirely separated from God. But both goats were "presented before Jehovah" as consecrated to Him (ver. 7); and both alike in colour, height, and value, form but two parts of one complex act of atonement; the one alone could not in the nature of things have expressed the whole truth. The one "for Jehovah," by its death, expresses Christ's life sacrificed instead of our forfeited lives; the "goat for complete sending away" expresses the blessed effect of that sacrifice, "as far as the E. is from the W. so far hath He removed our transgressions from us" (Ps. ciii. 12); the slain goat expresses "Christ was delivered for our offences," so that in believing union with Him we are dead to sin, and to the law as a condemning power, and to death; the living goat expresses "Christ rose again for our justification" (Rom. iv. 25), so that we live by union with His resurrection life, sin being utterly put away in proportion as that life works in us (John xiv. 19, Rom. vi., Col. iii.). Death and life are marvellously united alike in Christ and His people. Comp. the similar twofold type, the slain bird and the bird let loose after having been dipped in the blood of the killed bird (Lev. xiv. 4-7).

On the analogy between the highpriest's entrance in his white garments once a year into the holiest, and the Antitype's entrance into heaven once for all, wherein He so infinitely exceeds the type, inasmuch as He "by that one offering hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified," "having obtained eternal redemption for us," so that "there is no more offering for sin" (which condemns the notion of the Lord's supper being a sacrifice), see Heb. ix. and x. He needed not, like the type, to atone first for Himself, for He had no sin. The veil was rent at His death, throwing open the holiest heaven continually to all believers through faith in His sacrifice; whereas the veil continued as much after the typical highpriest's atonement as before it to preclude access to priests and people alike.

As other offerings atoned typically for the sins of the individual, the nation's sins as a whole congregation or church were expiated on the great day of atonement. As the passover was the nation's feast of joy, so the day of atonement was its day of penitent humiliation; and the atonement was its indispensable preparation for the joy that followed in the feast of tabernacles or ingathering of fruits. We can only "joy in God" when "through our Lord Jesus Christ we have received the atonement" (Rom. v. 11). After the live goat was sent away, the highpriest returned into the holy place, bathed again, put on his usual official garments, and offered the two rams as burnt offerings, one for himself, the other for the people: the burnt offering after the atonement expressing whole dedication of themselves to Jehovah. He also burnt upon the altar the fat of the two sin offerings, while their flesh was being burned outside the camp. The entire flesh of the burnt offering was burnt on the altar; but that of the sin offerings, which ordinarily was counted most holy and eaten (type of Christ our holy sin offering, Heb. ix. 14), could not in this case be eaten by the priest properly, as it had been offered for the priests as well as for the people, and was therefore taken and burnt outside (Lev. vi. 25-27). They who took away the flesh, and the man who had led away the living goat, had to bathe and to wash their clothes afterwards. The additional burnt offerings (Num. xxix. 7-11) were a young bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a young goat. The successive steps in the whole were: the highpriest atoned (1) for himself and his family; then, being purified himself, (2) for the sanctuary and all in it; then (3) for the altar of burnt offering outside; (4) for the whole people. The Yoma in the Mishna informs us that the highpriest on the day of atonement performed all the ordinary duties, as lighting the lamps, offering the daily sacrifices and the incense; then bathed and put on the white linen garments and proceeded with the atonement rites. He went four times into the holiest (which are all regarded as the one "once" entering, Heb. ix. 7): (1) with the censer and incense; (2) with the bullock's blood; (3) with the goat's blood; (4) after offering the evening sacrifice, to bring out the censer and plate which had held the incense; comp. Lev. xvi. 12, 14, 15. The lots were at first of boxwood, latterly of gold, put into an urn, into which he put both his hands and took out a lot in each, while the two goats stood before him, one on the right, the other on the left; the lot in each hand belonged to the corresponding position: when the lot "for Aazel" was in the right, it was a good omen. He then tied a turgie shaped piece of scarlet cloth on the scapegoat. The Gemara says the red cloth ought to turn white as a token of God's acceptance of the atonement; which illustrates Isa. i. 18, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." No such change took place for 40 years before the destruction of Jerusalem; a singular testimony from Jewish authority to Messiah, as His ministry was precisely 40 years before the destruction of the holy city; the type ceased when the Antitype came.

Atroth. (Num. xxii. 35.) City of Gad, named between Aroer and Jaazer. Shophan is appended to the name, and no comma should separate it from A., to distinguish it from the neighbouring Atroth.

Attai. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 35, 36. 2. 1 Chron. xii. 11. 3. 2 Chron. xi. 20.

Attalia. (Acts xiv. 25.) Whence Paul and Barnabas sailed, on returning from their missionary tour inland to Antioch. The city was founded by and named from Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, as a port at the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, for the commerce of Egypt and Syria, as Troas was for that of the Ægean. Its modern name is Satulia.

Augustus Caesar. The first Roman emperor, reigning at Christ's birth (Luke ii. 1, etc.).

COIN OF AUGUSTUS CAESAR.

His decree that all the world should be taxed, each going to his own city, was the divinely ordered (Mic. v. 2) occasion of Jesus' birth taking place at Bethlehem. Born 63 B.C. Called also Octavius and Octavianus from his father, who died whilst he was young. Educated by his great uncle Julius Caesar, triumvir with Antony and Lepidus. Dissension having arisen, Octavianus overcame Antony, and gained supreme power at the battle of Actium, 31 B.C. Saluted emperor (imperator, military commander in chief originally), and surname A., "majestic." Leaving the names and rights of the chief republican officers unchanged, he united them all, one by one, in himself. Herod, who had been on Antony's side, he not only pardoned, but even increased in power; Herod thereby became attached to his dynasty, and built him a temple of marble near the sources of the Jordan. A. died at Nola in Campania, in his 76th year, A.D. 14. Some time before his death he associated Tiberius with himself in the empire (Luke iii. 1).

Ava, in Assyria; colonists thence re-peopled Samaria after the removal of the Israelites (2 Kings xvii. 24). Probably = Ivali (2 Kings xvii. 34). The Assyrians according to their usual policy, having conquered Ivali, transplanted its inhabitants to Samaria, vacated by Israel's deportation.

Avan = nothingness, vanity. (Amos i. 5.) A plain in Syria, "the plain of A.," i.e. idols threatened with depopulation, probably for idolatry. Probably the great plain of Lebanon, Coele-Syria (included in the Scripture designation, "Syria of Damascus"), in which the idol temple of Baalbek or Heliopolis, the city of the sun god Baal, stood. The Heb. in Amos i. 5 (see marg.) and Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7, for this "plain" or "valley," is Biqu'ah; the very name it still retains, el Baka'a. A. is the contemptuous term appended to stigmatize its vanity, with all its idolatrous pomp, just as Hos. v. 8 calls Bethel, where the idol calf was set up, Beha'rem.

Avim, Avims, Avites. 1. Properly

Avvim (Deut. ii. 23). They had dwelt in Hazerim ("the villages," or nomad encampments, chatzerim), even unto Azzah (Gaza), i.e. S.W. of Palestine, the S. part of the shephelah or lower hills of Judah (possibly having come thither from the southern desert). The Caphtorim out of Caphtor (i.e. the Philistines, Amos ix. 7) supplanted them; and the latter appear in the plain of Sharon, just N. of the shephelah. Comp. the order of enumeration from S. to N. (Josh. xiii. 2, 3.) Gesenius interprets the name Avvim, "ruin." A trace of them may be in Avvim, a city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23), whither they may have been driven when they took refuge in the hills of Bethel. The LXX. and Jerome identify them with the Hivites, in whose district was situated the Avvim city just mentioned. Comp. Josh. ix. 7, 17 with xviii. 22-27. 2. The people of AVVA who were planted by Assyria in Samaria; their idols were Nibhaz and Tartak (2 Kings xvii. 31).

Avith. The city of Hadad ben Bedad (Gen. xxvi. 35, 1 Chron. i. 46), who smote Midian (the main body) in the field of Moab. This would be early in the time of Moab's sojourn among a branch of the Midianites. Moab was allied to Midian in the Mosaic age (Num. xxii. 7), but in Gideon's time Midian was destroyed. Hence Moses naturally records the fact.

Awl. The boring of a slave's ear with it was the token of his volunteering perpetual service, when he might be free at the year of release (Exod. xxi. 6, Deut. xv. 17). So Messiah, volunteering to become God's servant by taking man's nature; (Ps. xl. 6); Isa. i. 5, "the Lord God hath opened Mine ear," i.e., hath made Me obediently attentive as a servant to his master. Heb. x. 5-10 quotes it as LXX. renders it: "a body hast Thou prepared Me," the strongest proof of willing obedience. The ear symbolises obedience.

Axe. Heb. kardom, meaning sharp; large, for felling trees (Jud. ix. 48, Jer. xli. 22); garzen, meaning cutting, as "hatchet" from "hack," securis from sco; barzel, "iron;" garzen sometimes means the "adze." The head was fastened to the handle by thongs, and so was liable to slip off (Deut. xix. 5, 2 Kings vi. 5). For "axe" in Isa. xlv. 12 marg., Jer. x. 3, ma'atzad, others trans. a "knife" or "chisel," such as a carver of wood idols would use. But A.V. is good sense and good Heb.; the "axe" is meant as the instrument to cut down the tree in the forest. Mappetz (Jer. li. 20), "battle axe," a heavy mace or maul, whence Charles Martel was designated. Kasshil occurs only once, Ps. lxxiv. 6, a large axe.

EGYPTIAN AXE.

Azal. (Zech. xiv. 5.) The limit to which "the valley" or cleft of the mount of Olives will extend, when Jehovah shall go forth to fight against those nations which shall have assailed Jerusalem. The Heb. name means adjoining, i.e. near the city: the valley reaching up to the city gates will enable the citizens fleeing to escape to it.

Azaliah. 2 Kings xxi. 3.

Azaniah. Neh. x. 9.

Azareel, AZARIEL. 1. Neh. xii. 36.

2. 1 Chron. xii. 6. 3. Or Uzziel, 1 Chron. xxv. 18, 4. 4. 1 Chron. xxvii.

22. 5. Ezra x. 41. 6. Neh. xii. 13.

Azariah = whom Jehovah helps [see UZZIAH], like in sense to Eleazar = whom God (El) helps, and to LAZARUS.

1. 1 Chron. ii. 8. 2.

Son of Abimaaz (1 Chron. vi. 9), succeeded Zadok his grandfather in the highpriesthood in Solomon's reign, Abimaaz having died before Zadok (1 Chron. vi. 10, the "he" refers to the Azariah in ver. 9). He officiated at the consecration of Solomon's temple, and was the first highpriest that ministered in it. 3.

Isaiah's contemporary, who with four score priests withstood so faithfully king Uzziah when burning incense (2 Chron. xxvi. 17-20). 4.

Grandson of the Azariah 2, high-priest under Abijah and Asa, as Ananiah his son was in the days of Jehoshaphat son of Asa. 5. A., son of Oded, also called simply Oded, a prophet along with Hanani; encouraged Asa in his religious reformation (2 Chron. xv. 1-8). 6. Chief priest of the house of Zadok, in Hezekiah's reign, who appointed chambers in the house of the Lord for storing the tithes and offerings, on which were dependent the attendance of the priests at the temple services (Neh. x. 35-39, xii. 27-30, 44-47; 2 Chron. xxxi. 10-13). 7.

1 Chron. vi. 13, Ezra vii. 1, 2 Kings

xxv. 18. 8. Heb. name of AFR-

NEGO [see] (Dan. i. 6-19, and iii.); of the seed royal of Judah; fulfilling the prophecy to Hezekiah (Isa.

xxxix. 5-7); famed for beauty, wisdom, above all faithfulness unto death, and for his miraculous deliverance from the furnace. 9. 2

Chron. xxi. 2. 10. Several others:

1 Chron. vi. 36 = Ezra, 1 Chron.

ix. 11; Neh. iii. 23, 24, vii. 7; 2

Chron. xxix. 12, xxviii. 12; comp.

Jer. xliii. 2, Neh. xii. 32, 33, 1 Chron.

ii. 38, 39; A. whose name proves that the genealogy in 1 Chron. ii. 36-41 was made in Hezekiah's reign, for

A. (ver. 38) appears from 2 Chron.

xxiii. 1, xxiv. 1, to have been captain when Joash was seven years old, i.e.

about one generation older than Jo-ash. After A. in that genealogy are six generations, ending with Elisha-ma; and from Joash to Hezekiah also six; therefore Elishama was contemporary with Hezekiah. Zalad in 1 Chron. ii. 36, 37 (comp. xi. 41) was contemporary of David. 11. Uzziah, meaning much the same, the might of Jehovah (2 Kings xv. 21, xv. 1-6).

Azaz. 1 Chron. v. 8.

Azaziah. 1. 1 Chron. xv. 21. 2. 1

Chron. xxvii. 20. 3. 2 Chron. xxxi.

Azbuk. Neh. iii. 16.

Azekah. From a root, "to till the ground." A town of Judah, with dependent villages, in the shephelah, the low hills of Judah, near Shechoh

(1 Sam. xvii. 1, Josh. xv. 35). Fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9, Neh. xi. 30). Assailed by the king of Babylon (Jer. xxiv. 7). Ganneau fixes it at Ellar, half way between Jerusalem and Beit Jibrin; Conder at Deir el Aashak (the monastery of the lover), S. of Sorek valley, eight miles N. of Shochoh (Shirweikeh). A road leads to it from Elah valley. Azel. 1 Chron. viii. 37, 38; ix. 43, 44. Azem: Ezem. A city S. of Judah; afterwards allotted to Simeon (Josh. xv. 29, xix. 3). Azgad. Ezra ii. 12, viii. 12; Neh. vii. 17, x. 15. Aziel. Contrasted from Jaaziel (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20). Aziza. Ezra x. 27. Azamaveth. 1. 2 Sam. xxiii. 31, 1 Chron. xi. 33. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 36, ix. 42, xii. 3. 3. 1 Chron. xii. 3. 4. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. 5. A place in Benjamin (Ezra ii. 21). Beth-Azamaveth (Neh. vii. 28, xii. 29). The singers from it built villages round Jerusalem. Azmon. On the S. border of Palestine, near the torrent of Egypt, valley of Arish (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4). Aznoth-Tabor=the ears (earlike summits) of Tabor. Marking the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 24). Azor. Matt. i. 13, 14. Azriel=God my help. Like the Carthaginian Hasdrubal=Baal his help. 1. 1 Chron. v. 24. 2. 1 Chron. xxvii. 13. 3. Jer. xxxvi. 26. Azrikam. 1. 1 Chron. iii. 24. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 38. 3. 1 Chron. ix. 14. 4. Governor of Ahaz's house; slain by Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim (2 Chron. xxviii. 7). Azubah. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 18, 19. 2. 1 Kings xxii. 42. Azur: Azzur. 1. Jer. xxviii. 1. 2. Ezek. xi. 1. 3. Neh. x. 17. Azzah. The right designation of the Philistine city (Deut. ii. 23, 1 Kings iv. 24, Jer. xxv. 20). Elsewhere less accurately read Gaza. Azzan. Num. xxxiv. 26.

Baal. The chief male deity, as Ashtoreth is the chief goddess, of the Canaanites and Phoenicians. Baalim, the plural form, expresses the various aspects of B., as different localities viewed him. B. is also associated with ASHERAH [see], inaccurately translated "THE GROVE" or "groves" (Jud. iii. 7; 2 Chron. xxiii. 3, xxiv. 4; 2 Kings xxii. 5, 6). B. means lord, in the sense owner, possessor; but Adon means lord, master. The Heb. article distinguishes the proper name B. from the common noun; Bel, the Babylonian idol (Isa. xli. 1), is akin. Midian and Moab, as early as Moses' time, tempted Israel, by Baalim's devilish counsel (Rev. ii. 11, Josh. xiii. 22, Num. xxv. 18), to worship the phase of the deity called Baal-peor (Num. xxv.), from pe'or, "aperire hymenem virginum," answering to the Latin Priapus. Fearful licentiousness not only was sanctioned, but formed part of the worship. A plague from Jehovah destroyed 24,000 Israelites in consequence, and was only stayed by the zeal of Phin'has. Moses subsequently, when warning the people from this example, notices no circumstance of it but one, which, though in the original narrative not stated, was infinitely the most important to advert to, but which none but spectators of the fact, perfectly acquainted with every individual concerned in it, could possibly feel the truth of. "Your eyes have seen what Jehovah did because of Baal-peor, for all the men that followed Baal-peor the Lord thy God hath destroyed them from among you. But ye that did cleave unto the Lord your God are alive every one of you this day" (Deut. iv. 3). For Moses to have used this argument was extremely natural; but if a forger had asserted this at hazard, and put it in Moses' mouth, it seems very strange that it is the only circumstance he should forget to notice in the direct narrative, and the only one he should notice in his reference to it (Graves, Pentateuch, i. 4). B. worship prevailed much in Israel, except during Gideon's judgeship (hence called Jerubbaal, "let B. plead"), up to Samuel's time (Jud. ii. 10-13, vi. 26-32, viii. 33, x. 6-10). At Samuel's reproof they put away this worship (1 Sam. vii. 4). Solomon brought back Ashtoreth worship to please his foreign wives. Ahab, king of Israel, under Jezebel's influence (daughter of Ethbaal, priest of B. and king of Sidon), established the worship of B. and Asherah ("the groves"): 1 Kings xvi. 31-33, xviii. 19-22. Elijah successfully for a time resisted it. His influence and that of king Jehoshaphat produced its effect in the following reign and that of Jehu. It was laid aside for Jeroboam's calves, under Jehoram, Ahab's son (2 Kings iii. 2), and under Jehu (x. 28); but for the most part prevailed until the Lord in vengeance removed the ten tribes from their land (2 Kings xvii. 16). B. worship also in Judah found entrance under Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 2, 3), but was suppressed by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 4). Manasseh sought to bring Judah to the same state of B. worship as Israel had been under Ahab (2 Kings xxi. 3; comp. Mic. vi. 16). Josiah made a thorough eradication of it (2 Kings xxiii. 4-14). A remnant of it and an effort to combine idolatry with Jehovah worship still in part survived till the final purgation of all tendency to idols was effected by the severe discipline of the Babylonian captivity (Zeph. i. 4-6). The Heb. for "Sodomites" (1 Kings xiv. 24, xv. 12, xxii. 46; 2 Kings xxiii. 7) is qedeshim, "those consecrated" to the vilest filthiness, which constituted part of the sacred worship! Flat roofs at Jerusalem were often used as altars (Jer. xxii. 20). "Standing images," or possibly pillars or obelisks (mat- zebah) were his symbols (1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xviii. 4, xxiii. 14; Mic. v. 13). "Sun images" (hammanim, Isa. xlvii. 8, xxvii. 9; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4) "were on high above the altars" of B. (Jer. xliii. 13); "the images of Bethshemesh," literally "the pillars (obelisks) of the house of the sun." At Tyre one title was Malquereth "King of the city." In a Maltese inscription, Melkart, lord of Tyre, is identified with "Hercules, the prince leader" of the Greeks; from molek "king," and quereth "of the city." Tyre's colonies (Carthage, etc.) honoured Melkart, the god of the mother city; the name appears in Hamilcar. An inscription at Palmyra names him B. Shemesh, owner of the sun. Philo says his title among the Phoenicians was Beel-samen (shamain), "owner of the heavens." Plautus also in his Poenulus calls him Bal-samen. Contrast Melchizedek's title for Jehovah, "Possessor [Quoniam: not B.] of heaven and earth" (Gen. xiv. 19). High places were chosen for B. worship, and human victims were sometimes offered as burnt offerings (Jer. xix. 5). The worshippers were peculiar vestments (2 Kings x. 22). They gashed themselves with knives at times to move his pity (1 Kings xxvii. 26-28). The name appears in Asdrubal (help of B.), Hannibal (grace of B.), Adherbaal, Ethbaal. His generating, vivifying power is symbolised by the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 5), as Ashtoreth is by the moon, Venus, and the heavenly hosts. BAAL-BERITH. Worshipped at Shechem by Israel after Gideon's death (Jud. viii. 33, ix. 4) = B. in covenant, viz. with his worshippers; or perhaps a compromise, to combine B. with the "covenant" of Jehovah. BAAL-GAD=B. the fortune-bringer, the planet Jupiter (Isa. lxx. 11 marg.); "Gad" is the Babylonian god of fortune, Bel. The Arabs called it "the greater good fortune"; and "Meni," the planet Venus, answers to "the lesser good fortune." The city (Josh. xi. 17) bears the same name. BAAL-HAMON=the owner of a multitude, the sun god, and a city where Solomon had a vineyard with a multitude of vines. In mount Ephraim, not far N. of Samaria (comp. Isa. xxxviii. 1, S. of Sol. viii. 11). BAALHANAN="B. is gracious". Contrast Johannes, "Jehovah is gracious." 1. An early king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39), son of Aehbor. 2. David's officer over his olives and sycamores in the shephelah (low plain). Of Gederah (Josh. xv. 36), or Bethgader (1 Chron. ii. 51). BAALZEBUB; BEELZEBUB. Worshipped at Ekron; consulted by Ahaziah as to his recovery, for which Jehovah by Elijah declared he should die (2 Kings i. 2, 3, 16). "Lord of flies," i.e., avener of the plague of flies, which often caused such ravages. A seal found near Gaza by De Hass represents a human figure with four wings like those of a fly, in low relief, probably the god of Ekron. BEELZEBUL [see] was the Jewish contemptuous term, by a slight alteration, for Beelzebub; i.e., god of dung.

Baal: as applied to places. It sometimes refers to B.'s worship there; sometimes it means that the place possesses some attribute denoted by the other part of the compound. It is a Canaanite not Heb. term; applied to the men of Jericho whilst Canaanites (Josh. xiv. 11), "the men [baali, possessors, occupants] of Jericho." Also "the men [baali, occupants] of Shechem," the ancient city of the Hivite Hamor (Jud. iv. 2-51); the occupants of Keilah, bordering on heathendom (1 Sam. xxiii. 11, 12); Uriah the Hittite; "lords of the heathen" (Isa. xvi. 8). So strong was Israelite orthodox feeling against the name, that they altered names in which it occurred: Jerubbaal into Jerubbesheth, Meribbaal into Merdibosheth: comp. Hos. ii. 16. "At that day, saith Jehovah, thou shalt call Me Ishi, and shalt call Me no more Baah." Though both express "my husband," yet Baali by being used for the images of B. whose name ought not to be taken up into the lips (Ps. xvi. 4), was to be renounced for the unambiguous Ishi.

BAAL. A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 33), identical with BAALATH BEER (Josh. xix. 8), i.e. B. of the well, holy well. Also called RAMATH NEGBE, "the heights (Ramath) of the S." (Negbe), a parched region (Josh. xix. 8).

BAALAH (the Canaanite designation) = KIRIATH JEARIM, or KIRIATH BAAL, now Kariat el Enab (Josh. xv. 9, 10, 11 ("Mount B."), 60); supposed by many to be Ennab. In 2 Sam. vi. 2 called BAALE of Judah; Josh. xix. 3 Balah; 1 Chron. iv. 29 Bilhar.

BAALATH. A town of Dan, enlarged by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 18, 2 Chron. viii. 6).

BAAL GAD. A Canaanite sanctuary of Baal, as "the lord of fortune." The N.W. limit of Joshua's victories, as Hamath was the N.E. limit (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7, xiii. 5). "Under mount Hermon, in the valley of Lebaanon," still retaining the Heb. name for "the valley," el buka'a, between Lebanon and Antilebanon. Probably now Banias, at the fountain which is one of the Jordan's sources, formerly a sanctuary of Pan. Baalbek (=the city of the sun) is situated too far N. at the lowest declivity of Antilibanus to be identified with B.

BAAL HAZOR = Baal's village. A Canaanite idol sanctuary on the borders of Ephraim and Benjamin. There Absalom had his sheep farm, and invited all David's sons to feast at his sheepshearing, and killed Amnon (2 Sam. xiii. 23).

BAAL HERMON: Jud. iii. 3, 1 Chron. v. 23 (translate "B. Hermon, even Senir, even mount Hermon"). The mountain had three names (Dent. iii. 9); B. H. was probably one used among the Phœnician worshippers of Baal, whose sanctuary BAAL GAD [see] was at the base of the mountain.

BAAL MEON = owner of an habitation. Reuben in occupying it along with Nebo (Num. xxii. 38) changed the names, probably for the idol name Baal substituting Beth Meon. Ezekiel (xxv. 9) calls it a city on Moab's frontiers, and with Beth-jeshimoth and Kiriaihaim, "the glory of the country." The reputed birth-place of Elisha. Jerome describes it as a very large village, nine miles from Heshbon. The famous Moabite stone of Dibon mentions that as Omri made Medeba a military centre for opposing Moab, so Mesha occupied Baal Meon as his centre for assailing Israel; "1 Mesha, son of Kamos (Chemosh), fortified Baal Meon, and I besieged and took Kiriaihaim and Nebo," etc.

BAAL PERAZIM = lord of breaches, where Jehovah broke forth on David's enemies, the Philistines, as a breach (bursting forth) of waters (2 Sam. v. 20, 1 Chron. xiv. 11). Comp. Isa. xxviii. 21, "mount Perazim"; once the idol Baal's high place, henceforth it was to be noted for Jehovah's bursting forth on David's idolatrous foes.

BAAL SHALISHA = lord of Shalisha (2 Kings iv. 42, 1 Sam. ix. 4). Not far from Gilgal, Baith Sarisa in the LXX. The Onomasticon makes it about 15 Roman miles N. of Lydda (Diospolis). The ruin Sirisia exactly corresponds to this; the tellahin interchange l and r often. It lies in the low district, where, as the Talmud says, the fruits ripen early.

BAAL TAMAR = lord of a palm tree (Jud. xx. 33), near Gibeah of Benjamin. Deborah's palm tree (Jud. iv. 4) was between Ramah and Bethel, in this neighbourhood. The battle at Baal Tamar was prior to her time, 1406 B.C.

BAAL ZEPHON. In Egypt, where Israel encamped before Pharaoh overtook them at the Red Sea (Ezek. xiv. 2, 9; Num. xxxiii. 7), W. of the gulf of Suez, below its head. Migdol and Baal Zephon were opposite one another, Baal Zephon being behind Pihahiroth in relation to the Israelites. Gesenius explains the name = secret to Typhon; others from the root tephah, "to watch" = "watchtower," as Migdol also means "tower."

Baalis. King of the children of Ammon, at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem. He hired Ishmael to slay Gedaliah, who was appointed by the king of Babylon governor over the cities of Judah (Jer. xl. 14).

Baana. 1. 1 Kings iv. 12. 2. Neh. iii. 4.

Baanah. 1. Son of Rimmon, a Benjamite. With his brother Rechab, he murdered Ishbosheth; they were slain in turn by David, their hands and feet cut off, and their bodies hung over the pool at Hebron (2 Sam. iv. 2-9). 2. 2 Sam. xxiii. 29, 1 Chron. xi. 30. 3. 1 Kings iv. 16. 4. Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7, x. 27.

Baara. 1 Chron. viii. 8.

Baaseiah. 1 Chron. vi. 40.

Baasha. Son of Abijah, of Issachar, first of the second dynasty of kings of the ten tribes' northern kingdom, which supplanted Jeroboam's dynasty (1 Kings xv. 27). Gesenius explains the name = wicked: others from ba'ah, "he who seeks;" sha'ah, "he who lays waste." Though the instrument of God's vengeance on the seed of Jeroboam who both "sinned and made Israel to sin," "leaving not to Jeroboam any that breathed," he walked in the same sinful way. Therefore the word of Jehovah came to Jehu son of Hanani: "Forasmuch as I exalted thee out of the dust [which implies that he was of low origin], and made thee prince over My people Israel; and thou hast walked in the way of Jeroboam, and hast made My people Israel to sin . . . Behold, I will take away the posterity of B. and his house . . . him that dieth of B. in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth of his in the fields shall the fowls of the air eat" (1 Kings xvi. 1-4, 7, 8-14). As he conspired against king Nadab, son of Jeroboam, who was besieging the Philistine town of Gibeathon, and slew all Jeroboam's seed, so Zimri, a servant, conspired against B.'s son, Elah, and slew all B.'s house, "leaving him not one of his kinsfolk or of his friends." Retribution in kind. God did not the less punish B. "because he killed Nadab," though in his killing Nadab he was unconsciously fulfilling God's purpose; the motive is what God looks to, and B.'s motive was cruel selfish ambition, reckless of bloodshed if only it furthered his end. His chief act in his reign was "he built Ramah, that he might not suffer any to go out or come in to Asa, king of Judah" (1 Kings xv. 17). It might seem strange that Judah, so much weaker numerically, should not have kept Ramah, as a fortress to guard against invasion by Israel, numerically the stronger state. Instead, the people of Judah took away the stones and timber of Ramah to build Geba of Benjamin and Mizpah. An incidental notice explains it (1 Kings xii. 26): "Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David if this people go up to do sacrifice in the house of Jehovah at Jerusalem." Further, in 2 Chron. xi. 13-17 we read, "the priests and Levites in all Israel resorted to Rehoboam out of all their coasts. For the Levites left their suburbs and their possession, and came to Judah and Jerusalem: for Jeroboam and his sons had cast them off from executing the priest's office unto the Lord . . . And after them out of all the tribes of Israel such as set their hearts to seek the Lord God of Israel came to Jerusalem, to sacrifice unto the Lord God of their fathers. So they strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and made Rehoboam the son of Solomon strong." Israel's king B. was naturally anxious to stop this continuous drain of the best out of the northern kingdom, and reared Ramah, which commanded the N. road from Jerusalem, into a fortress for the purpose. Judah's king was equally anxious to remove this obstacle put to the influx from Israel of those God-fearing men, who would so materially strengthen his kingdom. The happy foretelling of the incidental Scripture notices just mentioned into this solution of the difficulty is a proof of the truth of the narrative. B.

reigned 24 years, and had the beautiful city Tzirah for his capital. (S. of Sol. vi. 4.)

Babel, Babylon. Babel (Heb.) means Babylon; so that "the tower" should be designated "the tower of B." Capital of the country Shinar (Genesis), Chaldaea (later Scriptures). The name as given by Nimrod (Gen. x. 10), the founder, means (Bab-il), "the gate of the god Il," or simply "of God." Afterwards the name was attached to it in another sense (Providence having ordered it so that a name should be given originally, susceptible of another sense, signifying the subsequent Divine judgment), Gen. xi. 9; babel from balal, "to confound"; "because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth," in order to counteract their attempt by a central city and tower to defeat God's purpose of the several tribes of mankind being "scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth," and to constrain them, as no longer "understanding one another's speech," to disperse. The Talmud says, the site of the tower of B. is Borsippa, the Birs Nimrod, 7½ miles from Hillah, and 11 from the northern ruins of Babylon. The French expedition found at Borsippa a clay cake, dated the 30th day of the 6th month of the 16th year of Nabonid. Borsippa (the Tongue Tower) was a suburb of Babylon, when the old B. was restricted to the northern ruins. Nebuchadnezzar included it in the great circumvallation of 480 stadia. When the outer wall was destroyed by Darius Borsippa became independent of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar's temple or tower of Nebo stood on the basement of the old tower of B. He says in the inscription, "the house of the earth's base [the basement substructure], the most ancient monument of Babylon I built and finished; I exalted its head with bricks covered with copper . . . the house of the seven lights [the seven planets]; a former king 42 ages ago built, but did not complete its head. Since a remote time people had abandoned it, without order expressing their words; the earthquake and thunder had split and dispersed its sundried clay." The substructure had a temple sacred to Sin, god of the month (Oppert). The substructure is 600 Babylonian ft. broad, 75 high; on it Nebuchadnezzar built seven other stages. God had intimated His will that "the earth should be divided," the several tribes taking different routes, in the days of Peleg (=division), born 100 years after the flood (Gen. x. 25, 32; Dent. xxxii. 8). Another object the B. builders sought was to "make themselves a name"; self relying pride setting up its own will against the will of God, and dreaming of ability to defeat God's purpose, was their snare. Also their "tower, whose top [pointed towards, or else reached] unto heaven," was designed as a self deifying, God defying boast. Comp. Isa. xiv. 13; God alone has the right to "make Himself a name" (Isa. lxiii. 12, 14; Jer. xxxii. 20). They desired to establish a grand central point of unity. They tacitly acknowledge they have lost the inward spiritual bond of unity, love to God uniting them in love to one another. They will make up for it by an outward forced unity; the true unity by loving obedience to God they might have had, though dispersed. Their tower towards heaven may have marked its religious dedication to the heavens (sabeism, worship of the saba, the hosts of heaven), the first era in idolatry; as also the first effort after that universal united empire on earth which is to be realized not by man's ambition, but by the manifestation of Messiah, whose right the kingdom is (Ezek. xxi. 27). "The Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded," i.e. (in condescension to human language), Jehovah took judicial cognizance of their act: their "go to, let us," etc. (ver. 3, 4), Jehovah with stern irony meets with His "Go to, let us," etc.

The cause of the division of languages lies in an operation wrought upon the human mind, by which the original unity of feeling, thought, and will was broken up. The one primitive language is now lost, dispersed amidst the various tongues which have severally appropriated its fragments, about to rise again with reunited parts in a new and heavenly form when Jehovah will "turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of Jehovah, to serve Him with one consent" (Zeph. iii. 9). "And the Lord shall be king over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one" (Zech. xiv. 9). The fact that the Bible names in Gen. i.-x. are Heb. does not prove it the primitive tongue, for with the change of language the traditional names were adapted to the existing dialect, without any sacrifice of truth. The earnest of the coming restoration was given in the gift of tongues at pentecost, when the apostles spake with other tongues, so that "devout men out of every nation under heaven" heard them speak in their own tongues "the wonderful works of God." The confusion of tongues was not at random, but a systematic distribution of languages for the purpose of a systematic distribution of man in emigration. The dispersion was orderly, the differences of tongue corresponding to the differences of race: as Gen. x. 5, 20, 31, "By these were . . . the Gentiles divided in their lands, every one after his tongue, after their families in their nations."

ORIGIN. Genesis (x. 8-10) represents Nimrod as the son of Cush (Ethiopia), and that "the beginning of his kingdom was B. (Babylon)." Bunsen held that there were no Cushites out of Africa, and that an "Asiatic Cush existed only in the imagination of biblical interpreters," and was "the child of their despair." But the earliest Babylonian monuments show that the primitive Babylonians whose structures by Nebuchadnezzar's time were in ruins, had a vocabulary undoubtedly Cushite or Ethiopian, analogous to the Galla tongue in Abyssinia. Sir H. Rawlinson was able to decipher the inscriptions chiefly by the help of the Galla (Abyssinian) and Mahra (S. Arabian) dialects. The system of writing resembled the Egyptian, being pictorial and symbolic, often both using the same symbols. Several words of the Babylonians and their kinsmen the Susianians are identical with ancient Egyptian or Ethiopic roots: thus, hyk or hak, found in the Egyptian name hyksos or shepherd kings, appears in Babylonian and Susianian names as khak. Tirkhak is common to the royal lists of Susiana and Ethiopia, as Nimrod appears in those of both Babylon and Egypt. As Ra was the Egyptian sungod, so was Ra the Cushite name of the supreme god of the Babylonians. Traces appear in the Babylonian inscriptions of all the four great dialects, Hamitic, Semitic, Aryan, and Turanian, which show that here the original one language existed before the confusion of tongues. The Babylonian and Assyrian traditions point to an early connection between Ethiopia, S. Arabia, and the cities on the lower Euphrates near its mouth. A first Cushite empire (Lenormant quoted by G. Rawlinson) ruled in Babylonia centuries before the earliest Semitic empire arose. Chedorlaomer (or Lagomer, an idol), king of Elam, is represented in Gen. xiv. as leader of the other kings including the king of Shinar (Babylonia). Now Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions show that Elam (Elymais or Susiana, between Babylonia and Persia) maintained its independence through the whole Assyrian period, and that at a date earlier than that commonly assigned to Abraham (2286 B.C.) an Elamite king plundered Babylonia. About this date a Babylonian king is designated in the inscriptions "ravager of Syria." Originally "the gate of the god's" temple, whereat justice used to be ministered, B. or Babylon was secondary in importance at first to the other cities, Erech, Ur, and Ellasar. The earliest seat of the Chaldeans' power was close on the Persian gulf; as Berosus, their historian, intimates by attributing their civilization to Oannes the fish god, "who brought it out of the sea." Naturally the rich alluvial soil near the mouth of great rivers would be the first occupied. Thence they went higher up the river, and finally fixed at Babylon, 300 miles above the Persian gulf, and 200 above the junction of the Tigris with the Euphrates.

SIZE AND GENERAL FEATURES. So extensive was it that those in the centre knew not when the extremities were captured (Jer. li. 31). Herodotus gives the circumference as 60 miles, the whole forming a quadrangle, of which each side was 15. M. Oppert confirms this by examinations on the spot, which show an area within the wall of 200 square miles. The arable and pasture land within was enough to supply all its inhabitants' requirements. The population has been conjectured at 1,200,000. The wall was pierced with 100 gates of brass, 25 on each side (Isa. xlv. 2). The breadth and height of the walls (the latter almost as great as that of the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral; 350 ft. high, 87 broad) are alluded to in Jer. li. 58, 53. A deep wide moat of water surrounded the wall, the 30 lower courses of bricks were wattled with reeds, and the whole cemented with hot asphalt from Is (Hit). The streets crossed at right angles, the cross streets to the Euphrates being closed at the river end by brazen gates. The temple of Belus was a kind of pyramid, of eight square towers, one above the other, the basement tower being 200 yards each way, and a winding ascent round the tower leading to the summit, on which was a chapel sacred to the god but containing no statue. (Does not this favour the view that the words "whose top . . . unto heaven" mean that it was dedicated to the visible heavens, to which it pointed, and of which therefore it needed no symbol or image?) The "hanging gardens" were a square of 400 ft. each way, which rose in terraces, the topmost being planted with large trees. So the monuments of Nineveh speak of the mounds of the palaces being planted with rows of fir trees. Comp. Nah. ii. 3, "the fir trees shall be terribly shaken." Oppert thinks that the lesser measurement of the interior of Babylon given by Strabo, Ctesias, etc., is due to their giving the measurement of Herodotus' inner wall, which alone remained in their day; Herodotus speaks of the outer wall which could be traced in his time. Movable platforms of wood, stretching from stone pier to stone pier, formed a bridge uniting the two parts of the city. Ctesias says there were 250 towers on the walls to guard the weakest parts. In the midst of each half of the city were fortifications, in one the palace, in the other the temple, of Belus. On the W. of the city was an artificial lake, into which the river was turned during the erection of the bridge; when the river was brought back the lake as a marsh defended the city. Herodotus says the Greeks learned from B. the pole, the sundial, and the division of the day into twelve parts. The first eclipse on record, a lunar one, was accurately observed at B., March 19th, 721 B.C. Ptolemy has preserved an account of lunar eclipses as far back as this date. Numerous canals intersected the country for drainage and irrigation. Ps. cxxxvii. 1, "By the waters of Babylon . . . we hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof." The largest, the royal canal, navigable to merchant vessels, connected the Euphrates and Tigris.

SITES AND PRESENT STATE. Five miles above Hillah, on the left bank of the Euphrates, enormous mounds mark the site of the capital of S. Babylonia. The principal are three of unbaked brickwork; Babil, the Kasr or palace, and a high mound now surmounted by the tomb of Amram ibn Alb; two parallel lines of rampart, on the E. and parallel to the river, and enclosing between them and it the chief ruins; lower lines immediately on the river (which runs from N. to S.) and W. of the ruins, also a line on the N.; a separate heap in a long valley (perhaps the river's ancient bed); two lines of rampart meeting at a right angle, and forming with the river a triangle enclosing all the ruins except Babil. On the W. or right bank of the river the remains are few. Opposite the Amram mound there is a kind of enclosed building. Scattered mounds of the same date with the general mass upon the river exist throughout the region. The Birs Nimrud (by G. Smith regarded as the tower of B.) six miles S.W. of Hillah, and six from the Euphrates, is the most remarkable, 153½ ft. high and 2000 round the base; surmounted by a tower. It is rent in two nearly the whole way down, and bears traces of fire. G. Smith reads an Assyrian fragment of writing in columns to the effect that "wickedness of men caused the gods to overthrow B.; what they built in the day the god overthrew in the night; in his anger he scattered them abroad; their counsel was confused." Sir H. Rawlinson found by excavation the tower consisted of seven stages of brickwork on an earthen platform three feet high, each stage of a different colour. The temple was devoted to the seven planets: the first stage, an exact square, was 272 ft. each way, and 26 high, the bricks black with bitumen, probably devoted to Saturn; the second stage 230 square, 26 high, orange bricks, devoted probably to Jupiter; the third, 188 square by 26 high, red bricks, probably devoted to Mars; the fourth, 146 square by 15 high, probably plated with gold and devoted to the sun; the fifth, guessed to be 104 square; the sixth 62; the seventh 20; but these three, probably dedicated to Venus, Mercury, and the Moon, are too ruinous for measurement. The whole was probably 156 high. The slope with the grand entrance faced N.E.; the steeper was S.W. It was called "the temple of the seven spheres." It is thought from the inscriptions to mark the site of Borsippa, beyond the bounds of B. The palace of Nebuchadnezzar, E. of the river Sippara, the ancient course of the Euphrates, and that of Neriglissar on the W. of the river, are still distinguishable. The Shēbil canal anciently interposed between the Kasr and Babil. Babil is probably the ancient temple of Belus; 140 feet high, flat at the top, 200 yards long, 140 broad (the temple towers of lower Babylonia had all this oblong shape). It was originally coated with fine burnt brick; all the inscribed bricks bear the name of Nebuchadnezzar, who rebuilt it. The shrine, altars, and priests' houses were at the foot within a sacred enclosure. Kasr is Nebuchadnezzar's great palace, a square of 700 yards each way. The pale yellow burnt bricks are stamped with Nebuchadnezzar's name and titles; "Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, king of B." The enamelled bricks found bear traces of figures, confirming Ctesias' statement that the walls represented hunting scenes in bright colours. The Amram mound is the ancient palace, as old as B. itself; its bricks containing the names of kings before Nebuchadnezzar; that king mentions it in his inscriptions. The separate heaps close upon and W. of the river's ancient bed answer to the lesser palace, connected with the greater by a bridge across and a tunnel beneath the river (Ctesias). A mound in the middle of the ancient channel marks the site of the piers of the bridge. The inscription of the bricks with Neriglissar's name marks him as the founder of the lesser palace. The two lines of rampart parallel to the river are probably embankments of the great reservoir mentioned by Nebuchadnezzar in the monuments, and lying E. of his palace. With only "brick for stone," and at first only "slime for mortar," the Babylonians by the forced labour of multitudes erected monuments of genius so vast as to be still among the wonders of the world.

HISTORY. For the last 3000 years the world has owed its progress mainly to the Semitic and the Indo-European races. But originally the Hamitic races (Egypt and B.), now so depressed, took the lead in arts, sciences, and power. The first steps in alphabetical writing, sculpture, painting, astronomy, history, navigation, agriculture, weaving, were taken by them. Berosus, their historian's account of their traditions of the flood, and of the confusion of tongues at B., accords with Scripture in most points. Nimrod the son of Cush came over in ships to lower Mesopotamia, and built Ur on the right of the Euphrates near the mouth. Its inhabitants were Chaldei, i.e. moon worshippers. Hur means the moon goddess. Its vocabulary is Cushite or Ethiopian. A dynasty of 11 monarchs followed. One Orchamar Urkhar, in the inscriptions, was the builder of gigantic works. Chedorlaomer of Elam established a short lived empire, extending to the mountains of Elam and to Palestine and Syria. This early Babylonian empire, which subsequently to Chedorlaomer's reign in Elam lasted 458 years, fell by the invasion of barbarous hordes, probably Arabs. For seven and a half centuries it was depressed, during which time it became gradually assimilated to the Semitic stock. Nimrod is not mentioned in the Babylonian remains; he probably answers to their god Bel. He united tribes previously independent. The cuneiform inscriptions often designate the people of the lower Euphrates region Kiriath Arbol, "the four nations;" such a confederacy appears in Gen. xiv., of which the king of Shinar was one.

The southern tetrarchy (arba lison, "the four tongues," or kīprat arbat, "the four nations") consisted of Ur, Harak, Nipar, and Larsa or Laracheh, answering to the scriptural Ur of the Chaldees, Erech, Calneh, and Ellasar. The northern tetrarchy consisted of B., Borsippa, and Sippara (Sepharvaim): Gen. x. 10-12. The Assyrians adopted the Babylonian number on their emigration to the N. The "four tongues" and the fourfold language of Chedorlaomer answer to the fourfold ethnic division, Cushite, Turanian, Semitic, and Aryan. Erech (Haraka) and Ur (Mupheir) were then the capitals; the land was Shinar, and the people (according to the monuments) Akkadim (Accad, Gen. x. 10). The remains from these two cities date about 2000 B.C. Writing had begun, for the bricks are stamped with their kings' names. The bricks, rudely moulded and of various sizes, are some kilburned, others sundried; buttresses support their buildings; mortar is unknown, clay and bitumen being substituted. Reed matting compacts the mass, that it may not crumble away. The first dynasty of 11 kings probably lasted from 2334 B.C. to 1976; the dynasty succeeding Chedorlaomer's short lived Elamite empire from 1976 to 1518 B.C., 458 years. Then it fell under Semitic influence, Arabia for two and a half centuries, and then (about 1270 B.C.) under Assyria for five. At the close of the earlier and the beginning of the later Assyrian dynasties it again rose to the importance which it had when it colonised and gave letters and the arts to Assyria, and had the supremacy during the second or great Chaldean dynasty. Rawlinson completes Berossus' chronological scheme.

Urak is mentioned earliest on the monuments after Nimrod; his bricks are the lowest down and the rudest in make. Next comes Elgi, "king of Ur." Kadur Nakhunta of Elam, whose court was at Susa, in 2286 invaded Chaldea and carried off the Babylonian images. He is identified with Zoroaster (Ziru-Ishtar). Kadur Lagomer (Chedorlaomer, the Cushite) is next in the dynasty, having as vassals Amraphel (Semitic), Arioch (Aryan), Tidal (Turanian or Scythic, or Turgal, "the great chief") reigning over nomadic races (goin, "nations"). Kadur Nabuk enlarged the dominions of Ur, and was, according to the monuments, Apila Martia, "conqueror of the west." The early monarchs reign at Ur, and leave traces no farther N. than Niffer. Sin-shala holds court at Erech 25 miles to the N. of Ur; Narum-sin, farther N., at B. Kara-Indas was contemporary with Asshur-bel-nisi-su, 1440 B.C. Purna-puriyas with Bazar-Asshur, 1420-1400. Urak was the Chaldean builder to whom belongs the credit of designing the Babylonian temple, with its rectangular base facing the four cardinal points, its receding stages, buttresses, drains, and sloped walls, external staircases, and ornamental shrine crowning the whole. No trace of the original B. exists in our day. The oldest structures are Urak's. Kadur Lagomer was the great conqueror, subduing distant Palestine and Syria, a feat not again achieved till Nebuchadnezzar, 1600 years later. Tiglath-Nin (1300 B.C.) conquered Chaldea. Thenceforward Semitic superseded Cushite influences and the Babylonian kings have Assyrian instead of Turanian or Cushite names.

The "canon of Ptolemy" gives the succession of Babylonian kings and their lengths of reign, from 747 B.C. (when Nabonassar began to reign) to 331 B.C. (when the last Darius was dethroned by Alexander). Twelve monarchs and two interregnums interpose between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar; then come consecutively Nebuchadnezzar, Illoeradamas, Nerigassassar, Nabonadius, Cyrus. Nabonassar destroyed all his predecessors' annals, that the Babylonians might date from himself. There was a Semiramis at this time, a Babylonian queen (Herodotus says) five generations before Nitocris, mother of the last king. Assyrian monuments also place her at this date, but do not expressly connect her with B. Some hence guess that Nabonassar was her son or husband. Mardocempalus, the fourth king after him, is the Merodach or Berodach Baladan of Scripture; he reigned twice, first for 12 years, contemporaneously with the Assyrian Sargon, and the second time for six months only. During the first year of Sennacherib his sons and grandsons were at war with Esarhaddon and his successor. He shows his independence of Assyria in his embassy to Hezekiah; and his inquiry as to the astronomical wonder done in the land of Judah, the sun's shadow having gone back on Ahaz' dial, is characteristic of a prince of the Chaldees whose devotion to astronomy is well known. Sargon, according to the inscriptions, deprived him of his throne after his first reign of 12 years. Arceanis was made viceroy, and held the post five years. Two years of anarchy followed. Then one Acises reigned a month, and Merodach Baladan held the throne six months, and was then supplanted by Belibus, whom Sennacherib made his viceroy for three years and then placed his eldest son Aparanadius on the throne. Two followed, then a second interregnum of eight years, and Asaridamus or Esarhaddon followed, son and successor of Sennacherib. He held his court alternately in Nineveh and Babylon, which explains the difficulty and shows the accurate propriety of the Scripture statement that Manasseh, king of Judah, was carried by the captains of the king of Assyria to B. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11).

A new era begins with Nabopolassar, appointed ruler of B. by the last Assyrian king just when the Medes were making their final assault on Nineveh. Nabopolassar deserted to the enemy, arranged a marriage between his son NEBUCHADNEZZAR [see] and the Median leader's daughter, and joined in besieging the Assyrian capital. On the capture of the city (625 B.C.) the S. W. of Assyria was assigned to Nabopolassar in the division of the spoil. So the Babylonian empire was extended over the whole Euphrates valley to the Taurus range, over Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, Idamæa; and the Jews passed as tributaries under B., as they had been under Assyria. Pharaoh Necho, son of Psamatik I., 608 B.C., in the later years of Nabopolassar conquered the whole region between Egypt and the Euphrates. Josiah, as ally of B., met him in spite of warning and was slain at Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxv. 20-25, 2 Kings xxiii. 29). Nabopolassar sent Nebuchadnezzar; and the latter at the battle of Carchemish, on the Euphrates, regained all the lost territory for B. (2 Kings xxiv. 7, Jer. xli. 2-12). Nebuchadnezzar was already at Egypt when tidings of his father's death recalled him, and he ascended the throne 604 B.C. He reigned 43 years, during which he recovered Syria and Palestine, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried away the Jews to Babylon, reduced Phœnicia and Tyre, and ravaged Egypt; above all he was the great builder of the most beautiful monuments of his country and city. His palace with threefold enclosure, plated pillars, enamelled brick, and hanging gardens, was celebrated throughout the civilized world. The ruins of ancient temples repaired by him, and cities restored and adorned, still attest his genius, with their bricks inscribed with his name. How appropriate the language assigned to him in Dan. iv. 29, 30, as he walked in the palace of the kingdom of B., possibly on the highest terrace of the hanging gardens: "Is not this great B. that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?"

Evil Merodach, his son, succeeded in 561 B.C., who in the beginning of his reign "did lift up the head of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, out of prison" (2 Kings xxv. 27, Jer. lii. 31). After a two years' reign, in consequence of bad government he was murdered by Neriglissar, his brother in law, the Nergal Sharezer, Rabmag (chief of the magi, or priests, a title assigned to Neriglissar in the inscriptions) of Jer. xxxix. 3, 13, 14. He calls himself in the inscriptions "son," i.e. son in law of the "king of B." He built the palace on the right bank of the ancient bed of the Euphrates. Nabonidus the last king was an usurper who seized Laborosoarchod, Neriglissar's son, after a nine months' reign, and tortured him to death. He only claims for his father the rank of Rabmag. Herodotus makes him son of a queen Nitocris and Labynetus; but the inscriptions do not directly support his having any connection with Nebuchadnezzar. Probably Belshazzar was grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, as indeed is asserted by Scripture (Jer. xxvii. 7; Dan. v. 2, 11, 13), and was suffered by the usurper Nabonahit (as Nabonidus is called in the inscriptions), who adopted him as son, to be subordinate king and his acknowledged successor, in order to conciliate the legitimate party; perhaps Nabonahit married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter or granddaughter (Nitocris) to strengthen his throne, and by her was father to Belshazzar. Nabonahit (as Berosus records) having allied himself to Croesus, king of Lydia, Cyrus' enemy, brought on himself Cyrus' assault of Babylon in 539 B.C. He headed the forces in the field, whilst Belshazzar commanded in the city. Shut up in Borsippa (Birs-i-Nimrud, the sacred city of the Babylonians, containing their most revered objects of religion and science) he surrendered and was spared, and Cyrus gave him an estate in Carmania. Belshazzar (from Bel the idol, and shar, a prince), by a self confident careless watch and unseasonable and profane revelry (Dan. v.), allowed Cyrus' forces on a great Babylonian festival to enter by the bed of the river which the invader had drained into another channel, and was slain. B.'s capture by surprise during a festival was foretold in Jer. li. 31, 39, and that the capture should be by the Medes and Persians, 170 years earlier in Isa. xxi. 1-9. Thus Berosus' account of the king not being slain, and Daniel's account of his being slain, supposed once to be an insurmountable difficulty, is fully cleared up by the monuments. Rawlinson found clay cylinders in Umuqueer (Ur of the Chaldees), two of which mention Belshazzar as eldest son of Nabonahit. Berosus gives the Chaldean account, which suppresses all about Belshazzar, as being to the national dishonour. Had the book of Daniel been the work of a late forger, he would have followed Berosus' account which was the later one. If he gave a history different from that current in Babylonia, the Jews of that region would not have received it as true.

Darius the Mede took the kingdom at the age of 62, upon Belshazzar's death. Rawlinson thinks that he was set up by Cyrus, the captor of B., as viceroy there, and that he is identical with the Median king Astyages, son of Ahasuerus (Cyaxares), whom Cyrus, the Persian king, deposed but treated kindly. The phrase (Dan. ix. 1), "Darius, son of Ahasuerus (Cyaxares), of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans," implies that Darius owed the kingdom to another, i.e. Cyrus. Herodotus makes Astyages the last king of the Medes, and that he was conquered by Cyrus and left no issue. Josephus, on the contrary (Ant. x. 11, § 4), makes Darius=Cyaxares II., son of Astyages (Ahasuerus). Able critics (Hengstenberg, etc.) think his reign was ignored by Herodotus, etc., because through indolence he yielded the real power to his nephew Cyrus, who married his daughter and received the crown at his death. Xenophon, in his romantic story (Cyropaedia), mentions Cyaxares II. Cyrus thus in assaulting Babylon acted in his name, which accounts for the prominence given to Darius the Median, and for the Medes being put before the Persians in the capture of Babylon (Isa. xiii. 17, xxi. 2; Dan. v. 31, vi. 23). Future discoveries may decide which is the right view.

DECLINE. The Persian kings held their court at B. a large part of each year. In Alexander's time it was the second city of the empire. Twice in Darius' reign (Behistun inscriptions), and once under Xerxes, B. rebelled and suffered severely for it. Alexander's designs for restoring its architectural beauties were frustrated by his death. The seat of empire under his Syrian successors, the Seleucids, was removed to Antioch. Selencia rose subsequently near it and carried away both its population and much of its materials. Ctesiphon, Bagdad, Kufa, Hillah, etc., are mainly built of its old bricks. Thus "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency" has "become heaps" "without an inhabitant" (Jer. li. 37, l. 39). "A drought is upon her waters," the irrigation which caused Babylonia's fertility having long ceased. "Wild beasts of the desert," "doleful creatures," and "owls [for ostriches] dwell there" (Isa. xiii. 20-22). The "wild beasts of the islands" (rather "of the howlings," i.e. jackals) and "dragons" (serpents) abound; so that "neither the Arabian pitches his tent, nor the shepherd folds his sheep there," as believing the whole region haunted.

Babel, Tower of. (See BABEL, BABYLON.) Bochart (Phaleg, i. 9) records the Jews' tradition that fire from heaven split it through to its foundation. It is curious that the Birs is so rent; hence perhaps arose the Jews' tradition. Alexander Polyhistor said that the four winds blew it down. The Birs Nimrud was probably its site, and gives an idea of its construction, being the best specimen of a Babylonian temple tower. It is an oblong pyramid, in seven receding and successively lessening stages. Lowest is a platform of crude brick, three feet high. The angles face the cardinal points, N. S. E. W. This implies that the temple towers were used as astronomical observatories; which Diodorus expressly states of the temple of Belus. In the third were found two terra cotta cylinders, now in the British Museum, stating that having fallen into decay since it was erected it was repaired by Nebuchadnezzar. The great pyramid was much higher, being 480 ft. The temple at Warka is of ruder style than the tower of B. (Gen. xi.) The bricks are sundried, and of different sizes and shapes. The cement is mud; whereas in the tower of B. they "burnt them thoroughly," and had bitumen ("slime") "for mortar." The Mugheir temple is exactly such in materials. The writing found in it is assigned to 2300 B.C. The tower of B. was probably synchronous with Peleg (Gen. x. 25) when the earth was divided, somewhat earlier than 2300 B.C. The phrase "whose top (may reach) unto heaven" is a figure for great height (comp. Deut. i. 28). Abydenus in Euseb. Præp. Evan., ix. 14, 15, preserves the Babylonian tradition. "Not long after the flood men were so puffed up with their strength and stature that they began to despise the gods, and laboured to erect the tower now called Babylon, intending thereby to scale heaven. But when the winds approached the sky, lo, the gods called in the aid of the winds and overturned the tower. The ruin is still called B., because until this time all men had used the same speech, but now there was sent on them a confusion of diverse tongues." The Greek myth of the giants' war with the gods, and attempt to scale heaven by piling one mountain upon another, is another corrupted form of the same truth. The character of the language in the earliest Babylonian monuments, as far back as 2300 B.C., is remarkably mixed: Turanian in structure, Ethiopian (Cushite) mainly in vocabulary, with Semitic and Aryan elements,—conformably with the Bible account that B. was the scene of the confusion of tongues. Turano Cushite themselves, they adopted several terms from the Aryan and Semitic races, of whom some must have remained at B. after the migration of the majority. This mixed character is not so observable in other early languages.

Babylon, Mystical (Rev. xvi. 19, xvii., xviii., xix. 2, 3). Not 1 Pet. v. 13, where "B." can only mean the literal B.: "the (church) at B. . . . saluteth you." A friendly salutation is hardly the place wherein to find mystical phraseology. The whole epistle, moreover, is remarkably plain, and contains none of the imagery of prophecy. Moreover the literal B. was the centre from which the Asiatic "dispersion" (dispersed Jews), whom Peter addresses, was derived. B. contained many Jews in the apostolic age ("one of the greatest knots of Jews in the world;" Lightfoot, quoted in Smith's Dict.), and doubtless "the apostle of the circumcision," Peter, who had among his hearers on pentecost (Acts ii.) "the dwellers of Mesopotamia," would visit the Jews there. "Bosor," which Peter uses for Pethor (Num. xxii. 5, 1 Pet. v. 15), is the Chaldee pronunciation moreover; Josephus c. Apion, i. 7, Ant. xv. 3, § 1, also favours Chaldee B. The "woman arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication, and upon her forehead having a name written, MYSTERY, B. THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS

AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH" (Rev. xvii. 4, 5), is grotesquely mystical. The later Jews regarded Rome in the same light as their fathers regarded B. (Jer. li. 7, comp. Rev. xiv. 8.) John had seen the woman "clothed with the sun, and the moon (the earth's satellite) under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars"; i.e. God's pure church of the O. T. and of the N. T. clothed with the Sun of righteousness, and having the twelve patriarchs and the twelve apostles as her coronet (Rev. xii.). Then she was "persecuted" by "the dragon, Satan," but nourished by Divine Providence for "three and a half times" "in the wilderness" of the Gentile world. But now he prophetically sees her sadly and awfully changed. So he "wondered with great admiration." The spiritual Jerusalem has become mystical B.; the church has become the harlot! The same truth under the same imagery appears in Isa. i. 21, "How is the faithful city become a harlot!" That the world should be beastly (Dan. vii.) is natural, but that she whose calling was to be the faithful bride should become the Babylonish whore is monstrous (Jer. ii. 12, 13, 20). Not that the elect apostatize; but Christendom, as a whole, and as the visible "woman," has apostatized from its first faith and love. The elect invisible church, the true "woman" and "bride," remains hidden in the visible that has become the harlot, and shall only be manifested when Christ our Life is manifested (Col. iii. 1). External providence over the world, and internal corruption by the world, (the spirit of the world ruling the church) is symbolised by the world-city's name B.; the contrast to "Jerusalem above, the mother of all" believers (Gal. iv. 26), the "holy Jerusalem, that great city," which shall hereafter on the "new earth" "descend out of heaven from God, having the glory of God" (Rev. xxi. 10). The Romish church is the prominent type of B., resting on the world-power, and arrayed like it in its "scarlet" gauds, and ruling it by its claim of supremacy, whilst the least or secular power on which it rests is "full of names of blasphemy," which after the harlot's overthrow shall be more glaringly displayed. It and the Greek apostasy are whorish in politics, by external and internal idolatry and systematized worldliness. The evangelical Protestant church is pure in theory, and eschews image and host-mass worship; but in so far as it yields to "consciousness which is idolatry," and conforms to the world, it partakes of the harlot and ceases to be the bride. Comp. Achan's "Babylonish garment," Josh. vii. 21; Heb. "a robe of Shinar." Whilst the Syrians were noted for dyeing, and the Phrygians for patchwork, the Babylonians involve their garments (Fortallian De Habitu Mul. i.), i.e. tapestry work with coloured figures woven or wrought with the needle; Pliny H.N., viii. 48. LXX. has psile psibile, "a smooth, pictured coat." Such garments passed through Jericho in the trade between the Phœnicians and B. (Ezek. xxvii. 24.) In the case of both the Catholic churches and the Protestant churches God's retributive law holds good. When the church forsakes her true Husband for the love of the world (contrast Ps. xlv. 10, 11), the world, the instrument of her sin, becomes the instrument of her punishment. Already this is taking place in Spain, Italy, Austria, and France (Rev. xvii. 16). Our turn shall come next; as in the case of Israel first, then Judah (Ezek. xxiii.), then the restored Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem by Rome, for whom Jerusalem gave up the true "King of the Jews" (John xi. 48, 50; xix. 15). Then "iniquity" shall be no longer as now in "mystery," but openly developed in the last awful Antichrist who shall combine the world against Christ in a system of superstitious credulity and infidelity together (2 Thess. ii.; Rev. xvi. 13-16, xvii. 17, xix. 19). The final judgment on B. the whore (Rev. xvii.), after the elect shall have been translated out of it and transfigured, seems to be just before the judgment on Antichrist. B., the spiritual whore, is succeeded by "the false prophet," who ministers to Antichrist and perishes with him (Rev. xix. 20). Rome's forced outward unity, of which its one official language, Latin, is the symbol, whilst inwardly there is spiritual confusion, answers to Babel, the scene of the forced attempt at concentration of power and peoples, issuing in utter confusion of tongues; so too, in a wider sense, does all Christendom in its apostasy from apostolical unworldly purity, faith, and love. The harlot retains human shape as woman, does not become a beast; i.e., has "the form of godliness whilst denying the power." (Mauliness is godliness, because man was made in the image of God.) The worldliness of the church is therefore the most worldly of all worldliness, and shall be terribly judged by God. But the whore or B. is not to be confounded with the beast. She, however degraded, has borne the Divine image; the beast never has. She must fall before the beast develops all his hostility to God.

Baca (Ps. lxxxiv. 6). "Valley of B.," i.e. the vale of tears (comp. Bachin, Jud. ii. 5, "the place of weepers"). The Heb. form in Ps. lxxxiv. 6 means "mulberry trees." The Heb. poet, by a play on the name, refers to the similarly sounding word for "tears." The B. (mulberry) trees delight in a dry valley; such as the ravine of Hinnom below mount Zion, where the bacain (mulberry trees) are expressly mentioned on the ridge separating the valley of Rephaim from that of Hinnom (2 Sam. v. 23). Abulfodl says B. is the Arabic for a balsam-like shrub with round large fruit, from which if a leaf be plucked a tearlike drop exudes. As the valley of B. represents a valley of drought spiritually and dejection, where the only water is that of "tears," so the pilgrim's "making it a well" (by having "his strength in Jehovah") symbolises ever-flowing comfort and salvation (John iv. 14, Isa. xii. 3; comp.

Ps. xxiii. 4). David, to whom this 84th Psalm refers, passed through such a valley of drought and tears when, fleeing from Absalom, he went up mount Olivet weeping as he went.

Bachrites. The family of Becher (Num. xxvi. 35), called Bered 1 Chron. vii. 20. [See BECHER.]

Badger (Exod. xxvi. 14). Badger skins were the outer covering of the tabernacle, in the wilderness; and of the ark, the table, the candlestick, the golden altar, and altar of burnt offering (Num. iv. 6-14). In Ezek. xvi. 10 Jehovah alludes to this, under the image of the shoes made of badger skins for delicate and beautiful women; "I shod thee with badger skin." This was the material of the shoes worn by Hebrews on festival days. Weighty authorities render Heb. tachash a "seal," not a "badger"; seals were numerous on the shores of the Sinaite peninsula. Others the halicore, a Red Sea fish, which still is used by the Arabs to make soles for shoes and like purposes; called dahash, like tachash. Others the stay goat, of the antelope kind, called thacasse, akin perhaps to tachash, to be seen on Egyptian monuments. A great objection to the badger is, it is not found in Bible lands, Syria, Arabia, or Egypt, and certainly not in sufficient quantities for the Israelites' purpose. The objection to the halicore is Lev. xi. 10: "all that have not fins and scales in the seas." But that prohibition refers only to using them as food; moreover the tachash probably includes marine animals in general, their skins made into "leather" were well fitted to protect against the weather. Josephus makes the colour sky blue (Ant. iii. 6, § 4).

Bags. The currency in the East being mainly in silver, large sums ready counted, and sealed with a known seal in a bag, passed current (comp. 2 Kings v. 23, xii. 10; Luke xii. 33; Job xiv. 17, "my transgression is sealed up in a bag"; Deut. xxxii. 34; Hos. xiii. 12, sealed securely for punishment). (Charitim, cone shaped bags (2 Kings v. 23); trans. for "crisping pins," Isa. iii. 22, "reticules," his, bags for carrying weights (Deut. xxv. 13) or money (Prov. i. 14). Keib, the "shepherd's bag," for carrying materials for healing or binding up lame sheep (Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16). Glossokoronon, used for the mouth-pieces of musical instruments (John xii. 6, xiii. 29). Judas carried in it the common property of the Twelve.

Bahurim = youths. E. of Jerusalem, the abode of Shimei, son of Gera (2 Sam. xvi. 5, xvii. 18; 1 Kings ii. 8). When David left the summit of Olivet behind and was descending the eastern slopes to the Jordan valley below, in his flight from Absalom, Shimei came forth from B. and ran along the side ("rib") of the hill, abusing David and flinging stones and dust, in a manner common in the East in the case of fallen greatness. B. was evidently off the main road. Here, in the court of a house, Jonathan and Ahimaaz lay hid under the well's covering upon which corn was spread. Here Phaltiel parted with his wife Michal, when she was claimed by David (2 Sam. iii. 16). Azmaveth, one of David's valiant men, was a Babarumite (1 Chron. xi. 33), or Barhumite (2 Sam. xxiii. 31). Gamneau identifies with Fakhoury, a locality between Olivet, Siloam, Bethany, and Abou Dis.

Bajith. Isa. xv. 2: "he is gone up to B.," rather, "to the temple," answering to "the sanctuary" (xvi. 12) in a similar context. With the definite article "the," the "high places" (Bamoth) follow in the context. In the Moabite stone of Dibon there is inscribed: "I Mesba, son of Chemosh god, built Beth Bamoth, for it was destroyed, and Beth Diblathaim, and Beth Baal Meou." The Bajith, followed by Dibon, and Bamoth in Isa. xv. 2 correspond. B., like Dibon, was a "high place." The peculiarity of B. was it had a sacred "house" or sanctuary, on the high place, to the national god Chemosh. In the same high places where they had exulted in their idol they shall weep, to find it unable to save them from destruction.

Bakbakkar. 1 Chron. ix. 15.

Bakbukiah. 1. Neh. xi. 17, xii. 9. 2. Neh. xii. 25.

Balaam = (Heb. bal'am) not of the people (Israel), a foreigner; else bela'am, "the destroyer of the people," answering to the Gr. Nicolaos, "conqueror of the people" (Rev. ii. 14, 15), viz. by having seduced them to fornication with the Moabite women (Num. xxv.), just as the Nicolaitans sanctioned the eating of things sacrificed to idols and fornication. The am, however, may be only a formative syllable. He belonged to Pethor, a city of Aram Naharaim, i.e. Mesopotamia (Deut. xxiii. 4). "Balak, the king of Moab" (he says, Num. xxiii. 7), "hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the E.," a region famous for soothsayers (Isa. ii. 6). Pethor, from pathur, "to reveal," was the head quarters of oriental magi, who used to congregate in particular spots (Dan. ii. 2, Matt. ii. 1), Phathuse, S. of Ciresium. It is an undesigned propriety, which marks the truth of Scripture, that it represents Balak of Moab, the descendant of Lot, as having recourse to a diviner of the land from which Lot came when he accompanied Abraham to Canaan. It was a practice of ancient nations to devote their enemies to destruction at the beginning of their wars; the form of execration is preserved in Macrobius, Saturnalia, iii. 9. The traditional knowledge of the true God lingered among the descendants of Laban and Bethuel. Abimelech of Gerar, Melchizedek, Job, Jethro, are all instances of the truth that knowledge of the one true God was not restricted to Abraham's descendants. B. was son of Beor. The same name (omitting the last part, am, of Balaam), Bela, (and he also "son of Beor," from ba'ar, to "burn up,") occurs among the Edomites connected with Midian by a victory recorded in Gen. xxxvi. 32-37; also with the "river" Euphrates through Saul of Rehoboth which was on it, king of Edom. Now B. is mentioned in conjunction with the five kings of Midian (Num. xxxi. 8, 16). A dynasty of B.'s ancestors from near the great river probably reigned once over Edom.

Moab in his application to him was not alone. "Moab was sore afraid . . . because of the children of Israel, and Moab said unto the elders of Midian, Now shall this company liek up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field" (how natural the image in the mouth of a shepherd king, as "the king of Moab was a sheep master," 2 Kings iii. 4). So "the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand." It is natural that Balaam, living amidst idolaters, should, like Laban of old in the same region (Gen. xxxi. 20), have been somewhat tainted. Hence, whilst owning Jehorah for his God and following patriarchal tradition (Job xlii. 8, who is thought by the decipherers of the Assyrian and Babylonian monuments to have lived in the region about the mouth of the Euphrates, Uz, the early seat of the first Babylonian empire) in offering victims by sevens, B. had recourse to "enchantments" also, so that he is called "the soothsayer" (Josh. xiii. 22) (ha-kosem, distinguished from the true prophet, Isa. iii. 2), a practice denounced as "an abomination to the Lord" (Deut. xviii. 10, 12). In the portion that follows (Num. xxii. 7-xxiv.) no further mention of Midian occurs, but only of Moab. But after B.'s vain effort to curse, and God's constraining him to bless, Israel, "he went and returned to his place" (Num. xxiv. 14, 25). He had said: "Behold, I go unto my people." But then follows (Num. xxv.) Israel's whoredom, not only with Moabite women but also with Midianite women, of whom Cozbi, daughter of Zur (slain by Phinehas, with Zimri her paramour), was principal; and in Num. xxxi. 8, 16, Israel's slaughter of the Midianites with their five kings (Zur was one), and also of B., son of Beor, because of his "counsel." Beside those kings that fell in battle, Israel slew five Midianite kings and executed B. judicially after the battle (Num. xxxi. 8). So after all B. did not return as he had said, to his own place, Mesopotamia. Dismissed by the Moabites in dissatisfaction, he suffered his mind to dwell on the honours and riches which he had lost by blessing Israel, and so instead of going home he turned to the Midianites, who were joined with Moab in the original application to him. Availing himself of his head knowledge of Divine truth, he, like Satan in Eden, used it with fiendish wisdom to break the union between God and Israel by tempting the latter to sin by lust. They fell into his trap; but staying among the Midianites, who doubtless rewarded with mammon his hellish counsel which succeeded so fatally against Israel, he in turn fell into the righteous judgment executed by Moses and Israel on his guilty patrons, Israel's seducers. The undesigned dovetailing together of these scattered incidents into such a harmonious whole is a strong confirmation of the truth of the Scripture history.

In Num. xxii. 12, at the first inquiry of Balaam, God said, "Thou shalt not go with them, thou shalt not curse the people." B. acquiesced, although in language betraying the revolt of his covetous will against God's will he told Balak's princes, "Jehorah refuseth to give me leave to go with you." Hence, instead of going back to Pethor, he begs them to tarry another night to see "what Jehorah will say unto him more." In the very moment of saying "I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God," he tempts the Lord as if He might change His purpose, and allow him to earn "the wages of iniquity"; yet himself, with strange inconsistency, such as marks those who "hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. i. 18), declares what condemns his perverse thought, "God is not a man that He should lie, nor the Son of man that He should repent: hath He said, and shall He not do it, or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?" (Num. xxiii. 19.) God did come that night, and seems to contradict His former command, "If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them." But God's unchangeable principle is, with the pure to show Himself pure (Ps. xviii. 26), with the froward to show Himself froward. He at first speaks plainly to the conscience His will; if the sinner resists the voice of His Spirit and His word He "answers the fool according to his folly," and "gives him up to his own desire" (1's. lxxviii. 29, 30; comp. Rom. i. 25, 26, 28; Prov. i. 31); after long resistance by man, God's Spirit ceases to strive with him (Gen. vi. 3). Balaam rose up in the morning, and it is not written he waited for the "men to come and call" him. Certainly "God's anger was kindled because he went"; for his going was in spite of the former plain prohibition; and the second voice was a permission giving him up in judicial answer to his own perversity (comp. 1 Kings xxii. 15), a permission too resting on the condition, which B. did not wait for, "if the men come to call thee."

Jude (11) saith the "error of Balaam" was his "running greedily for reward." The apostle Peter (2 Pet. ii. 15) says, "Balaam the son of Bosor" (the same as Beor; Bosor is akin to baser, "flesh," and B. showed himself the "son of carnality." Bosor is probably the Aramaic or Chaldean equivalent of Beor, 2 being submitted for 3). Peter residing at Babylon would naturally adopt the name usual in the Aramaic tradition) "loved the wages of unrighteousness; but was rebuked for his iniquity, the dumb (voiceless) ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet": an awful contrast, a dumb beast forbidding an inspired prophet! The ass turned aside at the sight of the angel; but B., after God had said "thou shalt not go," persevered in wishing to go for gain. Not what the ass said, but its speaking at all, withstood his perversity. The ass indirectly, the angel directly, rebuked his worse than asinine obstinacy. The miracle, the object of the infidel's scoff, has a moral fitness which stamps its truth. He who made the cursing prophet bless could make an ass, his own creature, speak (Neh. xiii. 2; Josh. xxiv. 9, 10). The "seer" lacks the spiritual eye to discern the angel of the Lord, because it was blinded by lust of riches and honour. God opens the mouth of the irrational brute to show the seer his blindness in not seeing what even the brute could see. Even a beast can discern the spiritual world better than a man blinded by lust. B.'s worse than brutish mind must be taught by the brute, in order to chastise his vanity. Not till after the Lord opened the ass's mouth is it written that "his eyes were opened" (Num. xxiv. 3, 4), whereas they had been "shut" (marg.): "falling" refers to his falling with his ass (not as A. V., "into a trance") and then having his eyes "opened."

No more efficient agent than B. could have been chosen to testify to his friends, Israel's enemies, the hopelessness of their conflict with the people whom Jehovah marks as His own. This famed diviner, brought to curse, blesses; lured by love of gain which depended on his cursing, he contradicts his own nature by forfeiting the promised gain, to bless a people from whom he expected no gain. A master of enchantments, he confesses "there is no enchantment (which can avail) against Jacob, neither any divination against Israel" (Num. xxiii. 23). The miracle wrought on him, whereby he belied his whole nature, is greater than that wrought on the ass. This truth moreover came with more weight from him than from any other, and this publicly before a king and a whole people, the most esteemed soothsayer in spite of himself proclaiming Israel's blessedness.

Balak first feasted B. at Kirjath Huzoth, a place of reputed sanctity on the borders. Thence B. was taken to "the high places (banoth) of Bal," called Beth Bamoth in the Moabite stone. Thence to Pisgah's top by the field of Zophim. Thence to Peor's top looking towards Jericho. Then B., seeing God's determinate counsel, forbore seeking further enchantments, but looking at Israel in their beautiful order by tribes, he compares them to the rows of lignum-aloes and cedars by the waters, and foretells the advent of a Hebrew prince who should smite Moab and Edom (David, 2 Sam. viii., the type), and of the Messiah, the "Star out of Jacob" (comp. Rev. xxii. 16, Matt. ii., announced to the Gentile wise men from the E., B.'s country, by the star in the sky) whose "sceptre shall have dominion"

(Rev. ii. 27, 28; Ps. cx. 2; He shall restore "the sceptre departed from Judah," Gen. xlix. 10). B. foretold also AMALEK'S (see) utter ruin; the Kenites' being carried captive by Assyria; and Assyria in its turn being afflicted by the Greeks and Romans from Chittim (Cyprus, put for all western lands whence the approach to Palestine was by sea); and these, the last destroying power, in turn, "shall perish for ever" before Messiah's kingdom. "Eber," who was to be "afflicted" by Assyria, includes Eber's descendants through Peleg, and also through Joktan; the western Semites, sprung from Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram (Gen. x. 21). B.'s prophecy is a comprehensive germ, which Isaiah and the prophets, especially Daniel, develop, concerning the four successive world empires which, after their successive rise and fall, shall be superseded by the universal and everlasting kingdom of Messiah (Dan. ii., vii.). Jacob saw the dominion of the victorious Lion out of Judah attaining its perfection in Shiloh's (the Prince of peace) peaceful reign. B., in the face of Israel's foes seeking to destroy her, declares that it is they who shall be destroyed. Appropriately the seer that God appoints to announce this belonged to Mesopotamia, the centre of the great world powers whose doom he foretells, as rebels against Jehovah's purpose concerning Israel and Israel's Messianic king (Ps. ii.).

As a Judas was among the apostles, so B. among the prophets, a true seer but a bad man; at the transition to the Mosiac from the patriarchal age witnessing to the truth in spite of himself, as Caiaphas did at the transition from the legal to the Christian dispensation. Head knowledge without heart sanctification increases one's condemnation. Making "godliness a source of gain" is the damning sin of all such as B. and Simon Magus: 1 Tim. vi. 5 (Gr.). In Mic. vi. 5 ("O My people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted, and what B. the son of Beor answered him from Shittim"), the sense is, Remember the fatal effects at Shittim of Israel's joining Baal Peor and committing whoredom with the daughters of Moab, and how but for God's sparing mercy Israel would have been given to utter destruction. Like Judas and Abithophel, B. set in motion the train of events which entailed his own destruction. Balak's summons was the crisis in his history, bringing him into contact with God's people and so giving him the possibility of nearer communion with God than before. Trying to combine prophecy and soothsaying, the service of God and the wages of iniquity, he made the choice that ruined him for ever! He wanted to do opposite things at once, to curse and to bless (Jas. iii. 10-12), to earn at once the wages of righteousness and unrighteousness, if possible not to offend God, yet not to lose Balak's reward.

Balah. Josh. xix. 3: a town of Simeon.

Balak vain, empty, son of Zippor. Not hereditary king, but imposed on Moab by Sihon [see BALAAM and HUR(2)]. His employment of Balaam to curse Israel was near the close of Israel's journeyings. His knowing as to the seer in Mesopotamia would imply a circulation of intelligence, great considering the times. Moab's descent from Lot, originally of Mesopotamia; also the merchant caravans passing across the deserts; also the advanced civilization of Moab in letters, proved by the Moabite stone some centuries later: all make it intelligible. Finding Israel "too mighty" for him (Num. xxii. 6), and his hope of prevailing by Balaam's enchantments being disappointed, he let them alone thenceforth. His "warring against Israel" (Josh. xxiv. 9, 10) consisted not in "fighting," which is denied in Jud. xi. 25, but in hiring B. against them.

Balance: emblem of justice (Job xxxi.

BALANCE.

6, 1's. lxii. 9, Prov. xi. 1), the test of truth and honesty. The emblem of scarcity, food being weighed out with scrupulous care (Rev. vi. 5). Mocen-am, double scales (Gen. xxiii. 16). Quaneh, the beam of a balance (Isa. xlv. 6). Peles, "scales" (Isa. xi. 12): lit. the beam, or else the aperture in which the tongue or beam moves.

Baldness. Rare among Israelites; so an object of derision, as Elisha's was to the children: 2 Kings ii. 23, "Go up thou baldhead," i.e., thou art old enough to leave this world and "go up" to heaven after thy master. A humiliation to captives (Deut. xxi. 12, Isa. iii. 24). A mark of mourning (Jer. xvi. 6, xlvii. 5; Ezek. vii. 18; Isa. xv. 2). It was sometimes a mark of leprosy: Lev. xiii. 40-42. Priests were forbidden to make baldness on their heads, or to shave off the corners of their beards (Lev. xxi. 5, Ezek. xlv. 20); as mourners and idol priests did (Jer. ix. 26 marg., Lev. xix. 27). The reason Israel was forbidden to do so was, "for thou art an holy people unto the Lord" (Deut. xiv. 1, 2). Nebuchadnezzar's army grew bald in besieging Tyre with the hardships of their work (Ezek. xxix. 18). The Egyptians, contrary to oriental custom, shaved on joyous occasions and only let the hair grow in mourning; the mention of Joseph's "shaving" when summoned before Pharaoh is therefore an undesigned coincidence in Gen. xli. 14, and mark of the truth of the Scripture record. Artificial baldness marked the ending of a Nazarite's vow (Num. vi. 9; Acts xviii. 18, xxi. 24).

Balm. Contracted from balsam, a word formed by the Greeks from Heb. Baal shemen, "lord of oil." That of Gilead was famed as among Canaan's best fruits as early as Jacob's time, and was exported by Ishmaelite caravans to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), also to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 17). Used to heal wounds (Jer. viii. 22, xlv. 11, li. 8). It was cultivated near Jericho and the Dead Sea, in Josephus' time. Burckhardt says: "it still grows in gardens near Tiberias." Heb. tzori, from tzarah, "to split." A balsamic oil, the modern "balsam of Jericho," is extracted from the kernels of the zuckum thorn bush, a kind of eleagnus, in the region about the Dead Sea; but this cannot be the tree. The queen of Sheba, according to Josephus, brought "the root of the balsam" as a present to Solomon (Ant. viii. 6, § 6); but it was in Gilead ages before her. The fragrant resin known as "the balsam of Mecca" is from the Amrys Gileadensis, or opobalsamum. The height is about 14 ft., the trunk 9 in., in diameter. Incisions in the bark yield three or four drops a day from each, and left to stand the balsam becomes of a golden colour and pellucid as a gem. The balsam was so scarce, the Jericho gardens yielding but six or seven gallons yearly, that it was worth twice its weight in silver. Pompey exhibited it in Rome as one of the spoils of the newly conquered province, 65 B.C. One of the far famed trees graced Vespasian's triumph, A.D. 79. Titus had to fight two battles near the Jericho balsam groves, to prevent the Jews in despair destroying them. Then they were put under the care of an imperial guard. The Pistacia lentiscus (mastick) has its Arabic name dseri answering to the Heb. tzori, which seems to favour its claim to being the balm of Gilead.

Bamah. Ezek. xx. 29: "What is the high place wherunto ye lie [habaim, alliteration to Bamah]?" And the name thereof is called Bamah [i.e. high place, akin to the Gr. heathenbomos] unto this day." The very name implies the place is not sanctioned by Me (God); it implies its own heathenishness: My place is called mizbeach, "altar." Your sacrifices even to Me on a "high place" instead of My "altar" in the temple, were therefore a "provocation," ver. 28 (Deut. xii. 1-5). Ewald makes the clause in Ezekiel a quotation from an older prophet.

Bamoth-Baal = high places of Baal. (Josh. xiii. 17, called "Bamoth in the valley" Num. xxi. 20, xxii. 41.) Baal Meon or Beth Baal Meon was near, sacred to the same idol. [See BAJITH, "the temple," in close proximity to Bamoth, "high places;" Isa. xv. 2.] Beth Bamoth occurs on the Moabite stone. Mesha says, on the stone, he rebuilt Beth Bamoth, it having been probably destroyed in the struggles between Moab and Reuben or Gad. Israel's halt at Bamoth is identical with that in Num. xxxiii. 45, connected with Dibon Gad, for Dibon and Bamoth Baal were near (Josh. xiii. 17). Bamoth was "in the valley" or ravine (Num. xxi. 20). In the wady Waleh, two miles N. of Dibon, a detached knoll on the right bank of the rivulet contains a quadrangle of rude stones put together without cement; this was one of the Bamoth or high places; others, whence Balaam could have seen Israel, were probably to the W., where are the ruins Keraum Abu el Hossein, or on Jebel Attarus. Bands. (1.) Of love (Hos. xi. 4), parallel to "ends of a man," not such as oxen are led by, but humane methods, as a father draws his child by leading strings, "teaching him to go" (ver. 1). (11.) Christ's "bands" (Ps. ii. 3), an "easy yoke" to the regenerate, seem galling chains to the natural man, and he strives to "break them asunder." (111.) Christ's body, the church, "by bands," i.e. sinews and nerves binding limb to limb, "having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God" (Col. ii. 19). Faith, love, and peace are the spiritual "bands" (Col. ii. 2, iii. 14; Eph. iv. 3). (IV.) The bands tying the yoke to the neck of a beast of burden is the image of the captivity in which Jerusalem and Israel have been held, and from which Christ shall free them at His glorious coming (Ezek. xxxiv. 27; Isa. xxviii. 22, lii. 2); also the captivity to Satan of the spiritual Israel, from which Christ releases us. (V.) "Bands" means, in Zech. xi. 7, the bond of brotherhood which originally bound together Judah and Jerusalem, severed because of their unfaithfulness to the covenant, but to be restored everlastingly when they shall turn to Messiah (Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28), and when Messiah "shall make them one nation upon the mountains of Israel." (VI.) "There are no bands in their death" (Ps. lxxiii. 4); i.e., the prosperous wicked, thought the psalmist in a desponding fit of unbelief for a time, have no pains enchainning them in their dying hour; passion and impatience here lost sight of the real death-bringing pains hanging over the wicked (Job xxi. 17, Ps. xi. 6).

Bani. 1. 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. 2. 1 Chron. vi. 46. 3. 1 Chron. ix. 4. 4. Ezra ii. 10; x. 29, 34. 5. Neh. iii. 17, viii. 7, ix. 4, x. 13, xi. 22.

Banner. Heb. nees, not, in the English sense of the term, an arbitrary token to distinguish one band or regiment of Israel from another, but a common object of regard, a signal of observation, a rallying point to awaken men's hopes and efforts (Exod. xvii. 15). Moses called the altar of thanksgiving, after Amalek's defeat, JEHOVAH NISSI, "Jehovah my banner." The altar is the pledge that Jehovah, in covenant with Israel, shall enable His people to defeat utterly Amalek and all his foes. (Comp. Num. xxi. 8, "a pole;" Isa. v. 26, xi. 10, "a root of Jesse shall stand for an ensign of the people," xiii. 2, xxx. 17, xlix. 22, Ps. lx. 4.) Messiah set forth manifestly as the crucified Saviour (Gal. iii. 1) is the rallying point for the gathering together in one unto Him of all the redeemed in spirit, in the glorified body also hereafter (Gen. xlix. 10, Matt. xxiv. 31, 2 Thess. ii. 1). His love displayed is the "banner" under which His people rally for almighty protection and unspeakable comfort (S. of Sol. ii. 4). As nees is a "signal," raised on some special occasion, always on an elevation and conspicuous, so degel is a military standard for a large division of an army; oth, for a small one. [See ENCAMPMENT.]

Banquets. Both social and religious.

At the three great religious feasts, when all the males appeared before Jehovah, the family had its feast, of which the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow had their share (Deut. xvi. 11). Sacrifices were accompanied by a feast (Exod. xxiv. 15, Jud. xvi. 23-25). The "lovefeasts" of the early Christians sprang from these sacrificial feasts; as the Lord's supper came from the passover. The tithes and firstlings were to be eaten at the sanctuary, if not too far off (Deut. xii. 17, 18; xiv. 22, 23). Males and females met together at feasts of old (John ii. 1). Vashti's separate women's banquet was a Persian, not Jewish, custom (Esth. i. 9). In magnificent feasts, as at royal weddings, a general invitation was given; the accepters were summoned by a second message at the time of the feast (Prov. ix. 1-3, Luke xiv. 17, Matt. xxii.). The entertainer provided robes for the guests, to be worn in his honour and as a token of his regard. In O. T. times the Israelites sat at table (1 Sam. xvi. 11); and in the order of their dignity or seniority (Gen. xliii. 33); which explains the point of Jesus' exhortation to take the lowest place (Luke xiv. 7-10, Matt. xxiii. 6). The Persians reclined on couches (Esth. vii. 8). So the Romans. From these the Jews adopted reclining. Thus the sinful woman could come behind the couch where Jesus lay, and anoint His feet (Luke vii. 37, 38); and Mary, sister of Lazarus (John xii. 2, 3); and "John leaned on the Lord's bosom" at the last supper (John xiii. 23, 25). Amos reprobrates the luxury (Amos vi. 4, 6). Perfumes were freely used at rich feasts (Ps. xxiii. 5, Eccles. ix. 7, 8). A "governor of the feast" was appointed (John ii. 8, 9). The usual time was evening, to begin earlier was a mark of excess (Isa. v. 11, Eccles. x. 16). "Spiced wine" was often used (S. of Sol. viii. 2). Garlands or crowns of flowers on the head (Isa. xxviii. 1). Music, vocal and instrumental (Isa. v. 12), and dancing (Luke xv. 25). Wedding feasts often lasted seven days (Jud. xiv. 12). Portions were sent from the entertainer to each guest, and a double or fivefold portion, or special part, to a distinguished guest (1 Sam. i. 5; ix. 23, 24; comp. 2 Sam. xi. 8, Gen. xliii. 34). Portions direct from table were sent to poorer friends (Neh. viii. 10; comp. Luke xiv. 13, Esth. ix. 19, 22). A kiss was the proper courtesy wherewith the host received each guest; to omit it was to be wanting in kindness (Luke vii. 4, 5). In the absence of modern knives, forks and spoons, they dipped their hands together in the same dish (Mark xiv. 20; Prov. xix. 24, xxvi.

ORIENTAL COUCH.

17, for "bosom" translate dish). After dinner the hands were wiped in a cloth, after a servant had poured water on them (comp. Elisha's office for Elisha, 2 Kings iii. 11), or were wiped on pieces of bread, which were then thrown to the household dogs (which illustrates Matt. xv. 27). A banquet is a frequent emblem of heavenly happiness (Isa. xlv. 6, Luke xiv. 15, Rev. xix. 9). "To eat bread" includes drinking. So in the case of the Lord's supper (Acts xx. 7). So the cup is not expressly mentioned in the passover supper in the O. T.; but Deut. xiv. 26, Isa. xlv. 6 imply the use of wine at it. In Eli's days drinking to excess even at the Lord's feasts was not uncommon (1 Sam. i. 14, 15). Four cups of wine were mixed with water, blessed and passed round by the master of the feast at the passover. In S. of Sol. ii. 4 the heavenly Bridegroom's "banqueting house" (house of wine) is the church in its public ordinances for refreshing the soul, the ministry of the word, joint prayer, and the Lord's supper (comp. Ps. xxxvi. 8).

Baptism. Baptisms in the sense of purifications were common in the O. T. The "divers washings" (Gr. "baptisms") are mentioned in Heb. ix. 10, and "the doctrine of baptisms," chap. vi. 2. The plural "baptisms" is used in the wider sense, all purifications by water; as of the priest's hands and feet in the laver outside before entering the tabernacle, in the daily service (Exod. xxx. 17-21); of the highpriest's flesh in the holy place on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 23); of persons ceremonially unclean (Lev. xiv. xv., xvi. 26-28, xvii. 15, xxii. 1-6), a leper, one with an issue, one who ate that which died of itself, one who touched a dead body, the one who let go the scab or buried the ashes of the red heifer, of the people before a religious festival (Exod. xix. 10, John xi. 55). The highpriest's consecration was threefold: by baptism, unction, and sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 1, xl. 12-15; Lev. viii.). "Baptism" in the singular is used specially of the Christian rite. Jewish believers passed naturally from the O. T. baptismal purifications, through John's transitional baptism, to Christian baptism and the subsequent laying on of hands, accompanied with the Holy Ghost (Acts viii. 12, 14-17). The spiritual sense of ceremonial baptisms was recognised in the O. T. (Psa. xvi. 6, li. 2, 7, lxxv. 13; Isa. i. 16, iv. 4; Jer. iv. 14, Zech. xiii. 1). Ceremonial washing had been multiplied by tradition, before the Lord's coming (Mark vii. 3, 4). Even the Gentile Philo washed his hands to symbolise his innocence of Jesus' blood. The Targum of Jonathan in Exod. xii. 11 is the earliest authority for the ceremonial notion that the Jews baptized male (besides circumcising them) and female proselytes. No notice of such a custom occurs in Philo, Josephus, or the Targum of Onkelos; the commonness of such ceremonial purifications makes it a probable one. In the 1st century A.D. it certainly prevailed. In the case of Jewish proselytes from Ishmaelites and Egyptians, who were already circumcised, some such rite would be needed. Probably it was at first merely the customary purificatory washing before the sacrifice offered in admitting the proselyte, whence Philo and Josephus would omit mentioning it as being usual at all sacrifices. When sacrifices ceased, after the destruction of the temple, the washing would be retained as a baptism of initiation into Judaism.

John's "baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Luke iii. 3) was the pledge his followers took of their determination to separate themselves from the prevalent pollutions, as the needful preparation for receiving the coming Messiah, who remits the sins of His believing people. The "remission" was not present but prospective, looked for through Messiah, not through John (Acts x. 43). John's baptism was accompanied with confession (Matt. iii. 6), and was an act of obedience to the call to renounce all sin and believe in the coming Redeemer from sin. The universal expectation of the Messianic king "in the whole East" (says Suetonius, a heathen writer, Vespas. 4) made all ready to flock to the forerunner. The Jews hoped to be delivered from Rome's supremacy (Mal. iii. 1, iv. 5, 6). The last of the prophets had foretold the coming of Elijah before the great day of the coming of the Lord, the Sun of righteousness, the messenger of the covenant. Elijah was to "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers," viz., the disobedient children to the faith and fellowship of their pious forefathers, Abraham, Jacob, Levi, Elijah (Luke i. 17), lest Messiah at His coming "should smite the earth with a curse." The scribes accordingly declared, "Elias must first come." Jesus declared that John was this foretold Elias (Matt. xi. 13, 14, xvii. 10-12). John's preaching was "Repent, for the kingdom of the heavens is at hand," the latter phrase referring to Dan. ii. 44, vii. 14. The Jews, as a nation, brought the "curse" on their land ("earth") by not repenting, and by rejecting Messiah at His first advent. Their sin delayed the kingdom's manifestation, just as their unbelief in the wilderness caused the 40 years of delay in entering into their inheritance in Canaan. He brought blessing to those who accepted Him (John was the instrument in turning many to Him; John i. 11, 36), and shall bring blessing to the nation at His second advent, when they shall turn to the Lord (R. m. xi. 5, 26; Luke xiii. 35). John's baptism began and ended with himself; he alone, too, administered it. But Christ's baptism was performed by His disciples, not Himself, that He might mark His exclusive dignity as baptizer with the Holy Ghost (John iv. 2), and that the validity of baptism might not depend on the worth of the minister but on God's appointment. It continues to the end of this dispensation (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). John's was with water only; Christ's with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Luke iii. 16). The Holy Ghost in full measure was not given till Jesus' glorification at His ascension (John vii. 39). Apollos' and John's disciples at Ephesus knew not of the Holy Spirit's baptism, which is the distinctive feature of Christ's (Acts xviii. 25, xix. 2, 6; comp. chap. i. 5, xi. 16). The outward sign of an inward sorrow for sin was in John's baptism; but there was not the inward spiritual grace conferred as in Christian baptism. Those of the twelve who had been baptized by John probably received no further baptism till the extraordinary one by the Holy Spirit on pentecost. Christian baptism implies grafting into fellowship or union with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; for the Gr. expresses this (Matt. xxviii. 19): "Go ye, make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name [the revealed person] of the Father," etc. John, being among the O. T. prophets, not in the kingdom of God or N. T. church, preached the law and baptism into legal repentance and reformation of morals, and Messiah's immediate advent. Christian baptism is the seal of gospel doctrine and spiritual renewal.

Jesus' own baptism by John was, Christ saith, in order "to fulfil all righteousness" (Matt. iii. 15). Others in being baptized confessed their sins; Jesus professed "all righteousness." He submitted, as part of the righteousness He undertook to fulfil, to be consecrated to His ministry in His 30th year, the age at which the Levites began their ministry (Luke iii. 23), by the last of the O. T. prophets and the harbinger of the N. T., His own forerunner. At the same time that the outward minister set Him apart, the Holy Spirit from heaven gave Him inwardly the unction of His fulness without measure; and the Father declared His acceptance of Him as the sinners' saviour, the anointed prophet, priest, and king (John iii. 34, i. 16): "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Since God, against whom we have sinned, is satisfied with Him (and God cannot but be so, seeing it was the Father's love and justice which provided Him), so also may we. As the highpriest's consecration was threefold, by baptism, unction, and sacrifice, so Jesus' (comp. Acts x. 38) baptism began His consecration, the Holy Spirit's unction was the complement of His baptism, and His sacrifice fully perfected His consecration as our priest for evermore (Heb. vii. 28 marg.). This is the sense of 1 John v. 6: "this is He that came by water and blood;" by water at His consecration by baptism to His mediatorial ministry for us, when He received the Father's testimony to His Messiahship and His Divine Sonship (John i. 33, 34).

Corresponding to His is our baptism of water and the Spirit, the seal of initiatory incorporation with Him (John iii. 5). Jesus came "by blood" also, viz., "the blood of His cross" (Heb. ix. 12). His coming "by water and blood," as vividly set forth in the issue of water and blood from His pierced side, was seen and solemnly attested by John (John ix. 34, 35). John Baptist came only baptizing with water; therefore was not Messiah. Jesus came, undergoing Himself the double baptism of water and blood, then baptizing us with the Spirit cleansing, of which water is the sacramental seal, and with His atoning blood once for all shed and of perpetual efficacy; therefore He is Messiah. It is His shed blood which gives water baptism its spiritual significance. We are baptized into His death, the point of union between us and Him, and, through Him, between us and God, not into His birth or incarnation (Rom. vi. 3, 4; Col. ii. 12). "The Spirit, the water, and the blood agree in one" (Gr. "tend to the one result," "testify to the one truth"), i.e., agree in testifying to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship by the sacramental grace in water baptism received by the penitent believer through His atoning blood and His inwardly witnessing Spirit (1 John v. 5, 6, 8, 10), answering to the testimony to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship by His baptism, by His crucifixion, and by the Spirit's manifestation in Him. By Christ's baptism, by His blood shedding, and by the Spirit's past and present working in Him, the Spirit, the water, and the blood are the threefold witness to His Divine Messiahship. On and after the pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the apostles preached, Repent (including faith in Christ), and be baptized, as the sacramental seal to yourselves inwardly of your faith, and the open confession outwardly of it before the world. Comp. Rom. x. 9, 10; Acts ii. 38, viii. 12, 36, x. 47, xvi. 15, 33. As circumcision was the painful entrance into the yoke of bondage, the law of Sinai, so baptism is the easy entrance into the light yoke of Christ, the law of liberty and love. Circumcision was the badge of Jewish exclusiveness in one aspect; baptism is the badge of God's world-wide mercy in Christ. As He was "the desire of all nations," consciously or unconsciously, so all nations are invited to Him. Any spiritualizing that denies outward baptism with water, in the face of Christ's command and the apostles' practice, most logically lead to rationalistic evasions of Scripture in general. Preaching, no doubt, takes the precedence of baptism with the apostles, whose office was evangelistic rather than pastoral (1 Cor. i. 14, 17). The teaching and acceptance of the truth stands first; the sealing of belief in it by baptism comes next, not vice versa. "Go ye, teach [or make disciples], baptizing," etc. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not [whether he be baptized or not] shall be damned." There might be salvation without baptism, as the penitent thief on the cross was saved; but not salvation without believing, to those capable of it.

As circumcision bound the circumcised to obedience to the law, and also admitted him to the spiritual privileges of Judaism, so baptism binds the baptized to Christ's service, and gives him a share in all the privileges of the Christian covenant. But in stating these privileges Scripture presumes that the baptized person has come in penitence and faith. Thus 1 Pet. iii. 21, literally "which water, being antitype [to the water of the flood] is now saving [puts in a state of salvation] us also [as well as Noah], to wit, baptism." It saves us also, not of itself [any more than the water saved Noah of itself; the water saved him only by sustaining the ark, built in faith], but the spiritual thing conjoined with it, repentance and faith, of which it is the seal: as Peter proceeds to explain, "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God [the instrument whereby it so saves, being] by the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (Col. ii. 12; Eph. i. 19, 20); not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but of the soul. Water baptism can put away that filth, but the Spirit's baptism alone can put away this (Eph. ii. 11). The ark (Christ) and His Spirit-filled true church saves, by living union with Him and it; not the water which only flowed round the ark and buoyed it up, and which so far from saving was the very instrument of destroying the anarchy. The "good conscience's" ability to give a satisfactory "answer" to the interrogation concerning faith and repentance ensures the really saving baptism of the Spirit into living fellowship with the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The same union of the sign and the grace signified, repentance and faith being presupposed, occurs (John iii. 5, Acts xxii. 16): "Be baptized, washing away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord" (Eph. v. 26, Tit. iii. 5; comp. 1 Cor. x. 1, 2). The passage through the Red Sea delivered Israel completely from Egyptian bondage, and thenceforward they were, under God's protecting cloud, on their way to the promised land; hence it is written, "they were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (the sea, according to some of the fathers, representing the water, the cloud the Spirit).

In Col. ii. 11, 12, baptism is represented as our Christian "circumcision made without hands," implying that not the minister, but God Himself, confers it: spiritual circumcision ("putting off the body of the sins of the flesh") is realized in union with Christ, whose "circumcision" implies His having undertaken for us to keep the whole law (Luke ii. 21). Baptism, coincident with this spiritual circumcision, is the burial of the old carnal life, to which immersion corresponds (or affusion in colder climates, and in cases where immersion would be inconvenient: as in the case of the 3000 on pentecost; the jailer's household at Philippi in the night; the sick: the water alone is essential to the sacrament, the quantity used and the manner of use are of secondary importance).

"Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him by faith in the operation of God who hath raised Him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12; Eph. i. 19, 20). Here, and in Rom. vi. 3, 4, 5, 6, baptism is viewed as identifying us with Christ, by our union to His once crucified and now risen body, and as entailing in us also a death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness, and as involving as the final issue our bodily sharing in the likeness of His resurrection, at the coming first resurrection, that of the saints.

Figuratively, death is called a "baptism" (Matt. xx. 22, Mark x. 38, Luke xii. 50). The Gr. word does not necessarily mean immersion of the whole body: comp. Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke xi. 38; Heb. ix. 10). In some cases the palpable descent of the Spirit was before, in others after, the baptism, and in connection with the laying on of hands (Acts ii. 38, x. 47, xix. 5, 6); proving that the water sign and the Spirit are not inseparably connected. At the same time, there being but one preposition to govern both nouns, "born of water and the Spirit" implies the designed close connection of the two in the case of penitent believers (John iii. 5). In Eph. v. 26 "Christ gave Himself for the church, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the laver (Gr.) of water by the word." The bride, the church, must pass through her purifying bath before being presented to the Bridegroom, Christ. The gospel word of faith, confessed in baptism, carries with it the real, cleansing, regenerating power (John xv. 3, xvi. 17; 1 Pet. i. 23, iii. 21). Baptism being regarded according to its high ideal, Scripture asserts of its efficacy all that is involved in a believing appropriation of the Divine truths it symbolises. In Tit. iii. 5, "He saved us by the laver (Gr.) of regeneration, and [by] the [subsequent, gradually progressive] renewal of the Holy Ghost." Paul in charity assumes that Christian professors are really penitent believers (though some were not so: 1 Cor. vi. 11), in which case baptism with water is the visible laver of regeneration by the Holy Spirit. "Faith then is confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer to God" (Church of Eng. Art. xxvii.).

Infants are charitably presumed to have received a grace in connection with their Christian descent, in answer to the believing prayers of their parents or guardians presenting them for baptism (1 Cor. vii. 14), which grace is visibly sealed and increased by baptism. They are presumed to be regenerated, until years of developed consciousness prove whether they have been actually so or not. The tests whether it has or has not taken place in the baptized are 1 John iii. 9, 14, v. 1, 4. The infants of heathen parents are not admissible to baptism, because there is not faith in the parents. The faith of the heads consecrated the households (1 Cor. vii. 14), as in the case of Lydia and the jailer of Philippi, so that even the young were not recipients of baptism. Christ's power and willingness to bless infants is proved by Matt. xix. 13-15. So that infant unconsciousness is no valid objection to infant baptism. Since the believer's children are "holy" in the Lord's view, why refuse them the seal of consecration? (1 Cor. vii. 14; Acts xvi. 1, 15, 33.) Infant baptism tacitly superseded infant circumcision, just as the Lord's day superseded the Jewish sabbath, without our having express command for the transference. A child may be heir of an estate, though incapable of using or comprehending its advantage; he is not hereafter to acquire the title to it; he will hereafter understand his claim, take his wealth, and be responsible for the use. So the baptized infant. The words which follow Jesus' command, "baptizing them," etc., express the necessary complement of baptism for it to be availing, "teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you."

"Illumination," in subsequent writers used for "baptism," is found connected with it in Heb. vi. 4, x. 32. The "baptizing with fire" (Matt. iii. 11), symbolised by the "tongues of fire" at pentecost (Acts ii. 3), expresses the purifying of the soul by the Spirit, as metal is by fire. In Gal. iii. 27, "as many of you as have been baptized into Christ [comp. Rom. vi. 3, Matt. xxviii. 19, Gr. 'into the name'] have put on Christ;" ye did in that act of being baptized into Christ, clothe yourselves in Christ. Christ is to you the man's robe (the toga virilis assumed by every Roman on reaching manhood). Christ being the Son of God by generation, and ye being one with Him, ye also become sons by adoption. Baptism, when it answers to its ideal, is a mean of spiritual transference from legal condemnation to living union with Christ, and sonship to God through Him (Rom. xiii. 14). Christ alone, by baptizing with the Spirit, can make the inward grace correspond to the outward sign. As He promises the blessing in the faithful use of the means, the church rightly presumes in charity that it is so, nothing appearing to the contrary (comp. on the other hand Acts viii. 13, 18-24). In 1 Cor. xii. 13, "by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body, . . . and were all made to drink into one Spirit" (all the oldest MSS. omit "into"), the two sacraments are alluded to. Where baptism answers to its ideal, by the Spirit the many members are baptized into the one body (Eph. iv. 4, 5), and are all made to drink the one Spirit (symbolised by the drinking of the wine in the Lord's supper). Jesus gives the Spirit to him only that is a first (John vii. 37). God (1 John iii. 9, v. 1, 4, 18) gives us crucial tests of regeneration: whoever looks these, though baptized, is not, in the Scripture view, "re-generated" or "born again." "Whoever is born of God doth not commit sin (habitually); for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin (be sinning), because he is born of God"; i.e., his higher nature doth not sin, his normal direction is against sin; the law of God after the inward man is the ruling principle of his true self (Rom. vi. 14, vii. 22), though the old nature, not yet fully deadened, rebels: "whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God"; "whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world"; "whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." The Nicene Creed has no authority but so far as it can be proved from Scripture; the clause, "one baptism for the remission of sins" was the decision arrived at by its members as to the question, Were those baptized by heretics, or those who having been baptized had lapsed into heresy, to be rebaptized? Basil on the contrary thought they ought to be rebaptized.

A questioning at the time of baptism as to the candidate's repentance and faith seems implied as customary in 1 Pet. iii. 21. A profession of faith in a "form of sound words" is spoken of in 2 Tim. i. 13. Timothy "professed a good profession before many witnesses" (1 Tim. vi. 12). Christians derived "sponsors" from the Jewish usage in baptizing proselytes; mention of them occurs first in Tertullian in the 3rd century.

The laying on of hands after baptism is spoken of as among the first principles of the Christian teaching in Heb. vi. 1, 2. Though the miraculous gifts imparted thereby at first have long ceased, the permanent gifts and graces of the Spirit are in all ages needed. The sevenfold gift is described Isa. xi. 2, 3. Our dispensation is that of the Holy Ghost, who is Christ's second self, His only Vicar in His bodily absence (John xiv. 16-18). Besides the first sealing by the Spirit in baptism, a further confirmation, unction, or sealing by the Spirit is needed to establish us firmly in the faith, and to be an earnest, or instalment, of future blessedness (Acts viii. 12-14 [see PETER]; 2 Cor. i. 21, 22; Eph. i. 13, iv. 30; 1 John ii. 20). The laying on of hands, as a sign of spiritual blessing or strengthening, occurs in Jacob's blessing on Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14); Joshua's ordination in Moses' room (Num. xxvii. 18, Dent. xxxiv. 9); in Christ's blessing of children (Matt. xix. 13) and healing the blind man (Mark viii. 23); in the apostles' healing of the sick (Mark xvi. 18); in Saul's recovery of sight, and Paulinus' father's healing of fever (Acts ix. 17, xxviii. 8). The laying on of hands, originally following close on baptism as a corollary to it (Acts xix. 5, 6), became subsequently, and rightly in the case of infants, separated by a long time from it. The Latins made it then a sacrament, though wanting both the material element or sign and the institution of Christ.

Baptism for the dead. 1 Cor. xv. 29: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all?" What profit would they get who are baptized to take the place of the dead? (2 Tim. ii. 2.) Of what use are fresh witnesses for Christianity, baptized to minister instead of those dead? "Why are they then baptized for?" (literally, in behalf of) "the dead? Why then (too) stand we in jeopardy every hour?" "Why are they baptized, filling up the place of the martyred dead, at the risk of sharing the same fate?" Possibly some symbolical rite of baptism or dedication of themselves to follow the martyred dead even to death, grounded on Matt. xx. 22, 23, is alluded to. Or, without such rite, "baptized" may be figuratively used, as in 1 Cor. x. 2 (where "baptized in the cloud," which became FIRE by night, typifies the baptism with water and the Holy Ghost). As the ranks of the faithful are thinned by death (natural or violent), others step forward to be baptized to take their place. This is in behalf of the dead saints, seeing that the consummated glory will not be till the full number of saints shall have been completed.

Barabbas=son of the father. A contrast to the true Son of the Father! The Jews asked the murderous taker of life to be given as a favour to them (it being customary to release one prisoner at the pass-over), and slew the Prince of life! (Acts iii. 14, 15.) A robber (John xviii. 40) who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark xv. 7) and was cast into prison (comp. Matt. xxvii. 15-26). [See PILATE for the probable reason of the Jews' keenness for his release.]

Barachel=blessing of God: implying his separation from the surrounding idolatry (Job xxxii. 2-6).

Barachias. [See ZACHARIAS.]

Barak=lightning. So the family name of Hannibal was Barcas, "the thunderbolt of war"; also Beamer-ges, "sons of thunder," applied to James and John. Son of Abinoam, of Kedesh, a refuge city of Naphtali. Incited by Deborah the prophetess to deliver Israel from the yoke of Jabin II., king of northern Canaan, of which Hazor, on lake Merom (now Hulah), was the capital. Hazor had been destroyed with Jabin I., its king, more than a century before, under Joshua; but owing to Israel's unfaithfulness had been permitted to be rebuilt, and a succeeding Jabin regained the possessions taken from his forefather. But his general Sisera, of Harosheth, inhabited by a race half Israelite half Gentile, where he had systematically and "mightily oppressed Israel" for 20 years, was defeated by B. and Deborah at the head of 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulon (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 10). This little army, aided by a providential storm in the enemy's face (according to Josephus), rushed down the hill of their encampment, Tabor, and routed Jabin's 900 iron chariots and unwieldy host in the plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon), "the battlefield of Palestine." The Kishon's impetuous current (especially that of Megiddo, its western branch), and the sandy soil (as Taanach means), contributed to the enemy's disaster, as their chariots were entangled, like Pharaoh's at the Red Sea. Harosheth was taken, Sisera slain by Heber's wife, Jabin's country taken, and a peace of 40 years secured. The triumphal ode of Deborah and B. is very spirited (Jud. iv., v.). Lord Hervey makes the narrative a repetition of Josh. xi. 1-12, from the sameness of names, Jabin and Hazor; the subordinate kings (Jud. v. 19, Josh. xi. 2, etc.); the locality; the chariots; "Mizrephoth Maim," burning by the waters marg. But if fancied chronological difficulties [see JUDGES] be hereby removed, geographical difficulties are thus created; above all, the plain word of God, which "cannot be broken," makes Jabin's oppression of Israel in Hazor to be "when Ehud was dead"; it is impossible then it can be identical with the narrative in Joshua. The judges Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, and B., did not rule all their lives, but were raised up at intervals as need required. Jabin (= present) was probably a standing title of the kings of Hazor. Heretofore, foes without, Mesopotamia and Moab, had chastised Israel; but now their sin provokes God to raise an oppressor within their own borders, Canaan itself! Jabin seduced them into idolatry, besides oppressing them (Jud. v. 8). B. is made an example of faith (Heb. xi. 32), though it was weak; he was therefore deprived of the glory of stronger faith by a woman, Jael (comp. Jud. iv. 8).

Barbarian. All not Greek, in contrast to the Greeks (Rom. i. 14). Primatively all speaking an unknown tongue (1 Cor. xiv. 11); the Maltese, as speaking a Punic dialect (Acts xxviii. 2, 4). Subsequently the word implied cruelty and savagery. Distinguished from Scythians, the wild races beyond the Roman empire; "barbarians" were within it (Col. iii. 11).

Bariah. 1 Chron. iii. 22.

Barkos, children of. Ezra ii. 53, Neh. vii. 55.

Barley. First mentioned in Exod.

ix. 31, which shows the barley harvest was earlier than the wheat, a month earlier in Egypt. Neither is found wild. Cereals and the art of converting them into bread were probably God's direct gift to man from the first. The worship of Ceres was probably a corruption of this truth. Canaan was "a land of wheat and barley" (Deut. viii. 8). Barley was a food for horses (1 Kings iv. 28), but also for men. The hordeum distichum, or "two rowed barley" was that usual in Palestine (Jud. vii. 13, Ezek. iv. 12). Its inferiority to wheat is marked by the jealousy offering being of barley, whereas the ordinary (mincho) meat offering was of fine wheaten flour (Lev. ii. 1), and the purchase price of the adulteress (Hos. iii. 2). The scanty supply, marking the poverty of the disciples, but multiplied by Jesus, was five barley loaves (John vi. 9). The people in Palestine still complain that their oppressors leave them nothing but barley bread to eat (Thomson's Land and Book, p. 449). A measure of wheat is made equivalent to three of barley (Rev. vi. 6). Barley rapidly ripens. Some was sowed at the autumnal rains in October or November, other barley seed immediately after winter. Barley harvest was a note of time; as when it is said Rizzah, the afflicted widow of Saul, watched over her seven sons' bodies "from the beginning of barley harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven" (2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10), i.e., from May till September. In the Midianite's dream Gideon was regarded as a mere vile barley cake, yet it is just such whom God chooses to overthrow the mighty (Jud. vii. 13, 1 Cor. i. 27).

Barnabas = son of prophecy, or exhortation and consolation. The surname given by the apostles to Joseph or Joseph (as the Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS. read), a Levite, settled in Cyprus (Acts iv. 36). As a Christian, he brought the price of his field and laid it as a contribution at the apostles' feet. It was he who took Saul after his conversion, when the other disciples were afraid of him, and "brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way," etc., and had "preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27). The book of Acts does not tell us why B. knew Saul better than the rest. But the heathen writer Cicero (Epist. Familiar., i. 7) informs us that Cyprus (B.'s country) was generally annexed so as to form one province with Cilicia (Paul's country, of which Tarsus, his native city, was capital). Possibly they were educated together in Tarsus, famed for its learning, and but 70 miles distant from Cyprus; still more probably at Jerusalem, where Paul was brought up at Gamaliel's feet. As fellow countrymen, they would have mutual friends. Moreover, when Paul had withdrawn from Grecian assailants at Jerusalem to Tarsus, and when subsequently it was thought safe for him to return in the direction of Syria, B. was the one who sought him and brought him from Tarsus to Antioch (Acts xi. 25, 26). All this bears that impress of unstudied coincidence which marks the truth of the Scripture record.

When men of Cyprus preached at ANTIOCH [see] to Greeks (according to the Alex. MS. and Sin. corrected MS.; but "Grecians," i.e. Greek speaking Jews, according to the Vat. MS. The latter must be wrong; for there could be no difficulty about preaching to Greek speaking Jews), and the news reached Jerusalem, the church there sent B. to Antioch; "who when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad and exhorted [in consonance with his surname, "son of exhortation"] them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord" (Acts xi. 22-24).

The book of Acts here assigns no reason for the choice of B.; but incidentally it comes out elsewhere that B. was of Cyprus, and so was the fit person to deal with men of Cyprus; besides, his spiritual gift of exhortation and consolation qualified him for the office (comp. xv. 31). His being "a good man," i.e. beneficent and kind (comp. Rom. v. 7), would make him gentle and sympathetic in dealing with the new class of converts, viz., those gathered not from proselytes, as the eunuch and Cornelius, but from idolaters (an additional argument for reading "Greeks"). Instead of narrow Jewish jealousy at "God's grace" being extended to non-Judaized Gentiles, being "full of the Holy Ghost," he was "glad," and sought Saul as one specially commissioned to evangelize the Gentiles (xxvi. 17, xxii. 17-21). The two together, on Agabus' prophetic announcement of a coming famine, showed the Jewish brethren that they and the Gentile disciples were not forgetful of the love they owed the church in Jerusalem and Judea, by being bearers of contributions for the relief of the brethren in Judea (xi. 27-30). On their return to Antioch, they were marked by the Holy Ghost for missionary work, and were ordained by the church (xiii. 2), A.D. 45. With the title of APOSTLES [see], i.e. delegates of the church (xiv. 14), (Paul was also counted with the Lord's apostles by a special call: Gal. i. 1-17) they made their first missionary journey to Cyprus and Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, and back to Antioch, A.D. 47 (xiii, xiv.). Next (A.D. 50), as apostles of the uncircumcision they were sent to Jerusalem, to the council concerning the question raised by Judaizing Christians whether Gentile converts must be circumcised (xv.). Judas and Silas were sent "with our beloved B. and Paul, men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ," to bear back the epistle to Antioch, settling the question in the negative. After some stay in Antioch Paul proposed to revisit the brethren in the various cities where they had preached. But in consequence of B. desiring to take with them John Mark, his sister's son, and Paul opposing it because of Mark's desertion at Pamphylia in the previous journey, so sharp a contention arose that they separated; and whilst Paul, with Silas, "being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God" (which marks their approval of Paul's course) "went through Syria and Cilicia confirming the churches," B. took Mark with him to Cyprus, his native island. His prominent usefulness ceases at this point; Scripture is henceforth silent about him. In Gal. ii. 1, 9, 13, B. suffers himself to be carried away by Peter's and the Jews' dissimulation, in declining to eat with Gentile Christians, contrary to his previous course. Softness of character, and undue regard for relations, were his weak points, as compared with Paul. He was evidently a man of strong attachments to kindred and country; so that in both his missionary tours his native island and the Jewish synagogue took the first place. The so-called "Epistle of Barnabas" was probably written early in the 2d century. Its superficial views of the truth and blunders as to Jewish history and worship could never have emanated from the Levite B. The Clementine Homilies make him a disciple of our Lord, and to have preached in Rome and Alexandria, and converted Clement of Rome. Loving sympathy with others, freedom from narrowness and suspicion, and largeness of heart characterized him in his frank trustfulness towards the late persecutor but now converted Saul, and to wards those converted from heathenism without any transitional stage of Judaism. His not claiming maintenance as a minister (1 Cor. iv. 6), but preferring to work for his livelihood, flowed from the same sincere disinterestedness as led him at the first to sell his land and give the price to the church. He was probably soon removed by death after parting with Paul; for Mark is mentioned subsequently as in Paul's favour and ministering to Paul (Col. iv. 10, 2 Tim. iv. 11), which he would not be likely to be, but rather with B. his uncle, if B. were alive. Chrysostom justly infers that B. was of a commanding and dignified appearance, as the people of Lystra, on the cure of the impotent man, supposed that he was their national god, Jupiter, king of the gods, came down from heaven (Acts xv. 8-12).

Bartholomew = son of Tolmai or Tolmat, an O. T. name, Josh. xiv. 14. One of Christ's 12 apostles (Matt. x. 3, Mark iii. 18, Luke vi. 14, Acts i. 13). His own name probably was Nathanael (John i. 45-51), just as Joses or Joseph is called Bar-nabas. The three synoptical Gospels never mention Nathanael, John never mentions Bartholomew; the two names belong probably to the same person. Brought by Philip to Jesus. It is in undisputed accordance with this that Philip is coupled with Bartholomew in the first three lists, as Philip is coupled with Nathanael in John i. The place given him also in the fishing after the resurrection of the Lord (John xxi. 2) implies his being one of the twelve. Thomas is put before him and after Matthew in Acts i. 13 [see APOSTLES], perhaps because of his taking a more prominent position spiritually after his doubts were removed. Nathanael was of Cana in Galilee. India (i.e. Arabia Felix, as many think) is assigned to him as his subsequent sphere of missionary labours (Eusebius, H. E., v. 19).

His prominent characteristics: narrowness of prejudice in him ("Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?") immediately gave place to conviction, when the Saviour revealed Himself. Like Jacob, he wrestled all night with God in prayer under the fig-tree. But, unlike that cunning supplanter, he was "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile"; comp. Rev. xiv. 5. A Eve and Eve vainly cloaked their shame under fig-leaves. Nathanael bared his whole soul before God under the fig-tree in simplicity and sincerity. Fearless candour made him avow his convictions as promptly as he reached them, "Thou art the Son of God, Thou art the King of Israel." His reward was according to his faith: "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given." "Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these: hereafter [from this time forth, Gr.] ye [not merely thou alone, but all My disciples] shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man," the true ladder between earth and heaven, of which that in Jacob's dream was the type (Gen. xxviii. 12), and upon which angels delight to minister. The "ascending" stands first, because the Lord was now below on earth, not above, as when Jacob saw Him; and from Him as their centre they go up, and to Him they return: the communication between earth and heaven, closed by sin, is opened by Christ's making earth His home. His miracles and His teaching and His Divine manifestation, of which B. had just a taste, were a sample and instalment of a continually progressing opening of heaven to earth and earth to heaven (Rev. iv. 1; Acts vii. 56; Heb. ix. 8, x. 19, 20) wherein angels minister to and for Him (Luke ii. 9, 13, xxii. 43; Acts i. 10); to be consummated when "the tabernacle of God shall be with men," and "the holy Jerusalem shall descend out of heaven from God" (Rev. xxi., 1 Cor. xiii. 12).

Bartimæus = son of Timæus or Timai. A blind beggar of Jericho, who had his sight restored by Christ as He was going out of the town (Mark x. 46); Luke (xviii. 35, xix. 1, 5) describes the cure as Christ was entering Jericho the day before. Probably the beggar, with the persevering faith which characterized him, applied to Jesus first as He was entering Jericho, and renewed his petition the next day, as Jesus was leaving Jericho. Eliciting, as He was wont, first of all from the blind man the expression of his want, "What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee?" Christ next grants his prayer, and praises his faith: "Receive thy sight; thy faith hath saved thee." Matthew (xx. 29-31) describes it, as Jesus was going from Jericho; and mentions two blind men. Probably B., after applying on the day of Jesus' entry into Jericho, was joined by the second blind man whilst Jesus was passing the night with Zaccheus; so both shared in the cure on Christ's leaving Jericho. B., being the more prominent, is alone mentioned by Mark and Luke; just as they mention only the colt, Matthew both the ass (the mother) and the colt; Luke (xxiv. 4) the two angels, Matthew and Mark the one alone who spoke. Seeming discrepancies establish the independence of the witnesses and the absence of collusion. Substantial agreement of many witnesses, amidst circumstantial variety, is the strongest proof of truth. Modes of reconciling seeming discrepancies may not be the true ones, but they at least prove the discrepancies not to be irreconcilable and that they result only from our ignorance of all the facts of each case.

Baruch = blessed, Benedict, Neriah's son, Jeremiah's (xxiii. 12, xxxvi. 1-32) steadfast attendant and amanuensis; brother to Seraiah, of princely family (li. 59) and position. He was the friend to whom Jeremiah in prison entrusted the papers of the purchase of his uncle's field at Anathoth, the year before Jerusalem's destruction, to assure the Jews of the certainty of their return from Babylon. He wrote out Jeremiah's prophecies against the Jews and other nations, and, whilst the prophet was shut up, i.e. prevented coming forward, read them before the people; in consequence of which king Jehoiakim sought to kill him and Jeremiah, but the Lord hid them. Jehoiakim having destroyed the first roll, B. wrote again the same words with many additions. Azariah and Jehonah after the capture of the city, when Jeremiah warned them against going to Egypt, said: "B. setteth thee on against us for to deliver us into the hand of the Chaldeans." On the former occasion B. yielded to despondency; and as Paul subjoins epistles to individuals after epistles to churches, so Jeremiah subjoins a prophecy concerning B. after the prophecies and histories concerning the Jews and their kings: "Thus saith the Lord the God of Israel, unto thee, O Baruch. Thou didst say, Woe is me now, for the Lord hath added grief to my sorrow, I fainted in my sighing, and I find no rest." When a "whole land," the people of My "planting," are being plucked up, "seekest thou great things for thyself?" i.e., dost thou expect to be exempt from trial? A promise is added to the reproof: "thy life will I give unto thee for a prey." How striking, that Jeremiah (xii. 1-5, xv. 10-18, xlv.), who once was so desponding himself, is enabled to minister counsel to B. falling into the same error. God allows His servants to be tempted, in order to fit them for succouring others who are tempted. B. was carried with Jeremiah by Jehonah into Egypt (xliii. 6). The apocryphal book of Baruch is evidently one of later composition. 2. Son of Zababai (Neh. iii. 20). 3. Son of Colbozeb (Neh. xi. 5).

Barzillai = iron. A Gileadite chief, of Rogelim, whose friendship David probably made during his flight from Saul in that transjordanic region. He ministered disinterestedly, sympathizingly, and liberally, to David's wants during the whole time of his stay at Mahanaim in his flight from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 27-29, xix. 32-40). David in prosperity forgot not the friend of his adversity: "Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem." But B. was unmercenary, and sought his reward simply in having done his duty. Instead of grasping at honours and favours at court, he remembers his age, fourscore, "How long have I to live, that I should go?" and prefers to die among his own people, independent though in less grandeur. In the father's stead Chimham and other sons of his shared David's favour, and were commended by him to Solomon (1 Kings ii. 7). Chimham's name appears ages subsequently in Jeremiah's time, "the habitation of Chimham by Bethlehem" being the gift of David to him out of his own patrimony, and bearing that name to late generations: an undesigned coincidence and mark of truth (Jer. xli. 17). [See BETHLEHEM.]

Bashan=rich soil. The tract beyond Jordan (Deut. iii. 3, 10, 14; Josh. xii. 5; 1 Chron. v. 23), between mount Hermon on the N. and Gilead on the S., the Arabah or Jordan valley on the W., and Salkah and the Geshurites and Maacathites on the E. Fitted for pasture; so assigned with half Gilead from Mahanaim to the half tribe of Manassah, as the rest of Gilead was to Reuben and Gad, as those tribes abounded in flocks and herds (Josh. xiii. 29-32; Num. xxxii. 1-33). Famed for its forests of oaks (Isa. ii. 13). It was taken by Israel after conquering Sihon's land from Arnon to Jabbok. They "turned and went up by the way of Bashan," the route to Edrei on the W. border of the Lejah. Og, the giant king of B., "came out" from the rugged strongholds of ARGOB [see] to encounter them, and perished with all his people (Num. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-5, 12, 13). Argob and its 60 "fenced cities" formed the principal part of B., which had "beside unvalled towns a great many." Ashtaroth (Beesh-terah, Josh. xxi. 27, comp. 1 Chron. vi. 71), Golan (a city of refuge, assigned with Ashtaroth to the Geshomites [Levites], Edrei, Salkah, were the chief cities. Argob in B. [see B. HAVOTH-JAIR], with its 60 walled and barred cities still standing, was one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 13). Hazael devastated it subsequently (2 Kings x. 33). The wild cattle of its pastures, "strong bulls of B.," were proverbially famed (Ps. xxii. 12, Amos iv. 1); also its oaks (Ezek. xxvii. 6); and hills (Ps. lxxviii. 15); and pastures (Jer. i. 19, Mic. vii. 14). The name "Gilead," connected with the history of the patriarch Jacob (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48), supplanted "Bashan," including B. as well as the region originally called "Gilead." After the return from Babylon B. was divided into (1) Gaulanitis or Jaulan, the most western, on the sea of Galilee, and lake Merom, and rising to a tableland 3000 ft. above the water, clothed still in the N.W. with oaks, and having the ruins of 127 villages. (2) Auranitis, the Hauran (Ezek. xlvii. 16), the most fertile region in Syria, S.E. of the last, and S. of the Lejah, abounding in ruins of towns, as Bozrah, and houses with stone roofs and doors and massive walls, and having also inhabited villages. (3) Trachonitis = rugged: ARGOB, [see] now the Lejah, rocky and intricate, in contrast to the rich level of the Hauran and Jaulan. (4) Bata-ne'a (skin to Bashan), now Ar el-Bathanyeh, E. of the Lejah, N. of the Jebel Hauran range, of rich soil, abounding in evergreen oaks; with many towns deserted, but almost as perfect as the day they were built. E. of Jebel Hauran lies the desert El Harrah covered with black volcanic stones. The Safah E. of this is a natural fortress thickly strewn with shattered basalt, through which tortuous fissures are the only paths. On the eastern side of volcanic hills lie ruined villages of a very archaic structure. Traces appear of an ancient road with stones placed at intervals and inscribed with characters like the Sinaitic. N. of Hauran and Jaulan lies Jedur, the Hurea of the N. T.; the country of Jetur, son of Ishmael; possibly once part of Og's kingdom of Bashan.

Ps. lxxviii. 22, "I will bring again from Bashan, I will bring My people again from the depths of the sea," means, "I will restore Israel from all quarters, and from dangers as great as their conflict with Og of Bashan, and as the passage through the Red Sea." "Why leap ye, ye high hills?" viz., with envy. Or translate, "Why do ye look with suspicion and envy?" viz., at God's hill, Zion, which He hath raised to so high a spiritual elevation above you.

Bashan-Havoth-Jair. A name given to Argob after Jair's conquest of it. Reuben's and Gad's request to have the eastern Jordanic region followed immediately after Israel's conquest of Og and Sihon, and Jair immediately occupied Bashan. The events in Num. xxii., etc., occurred between the occupation of Bashan and Moses' parting address (Deut. iii. 4, 5, 13, 14). The name still adhering to it "unto this day," saith Moses, proves Jair's occupation of it in the face of so mighty a nation as Moab, and is a pledge of further conquests. Havoth means "dwelling places," from havah "life"; as the German leben, "life," is a termination of many towns, e.g. Eisleben. The "Jair's lives" or "dwellings" was the collective name given by Jair to all the 60 fortified towns of Argob (Num. xxxii. 41, 42; Josh. xiii. 30; 1 Kings iv. 13). The statement in 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23, "Jair had 23 cities in Gilead [i.e. the whole eastern Jordanic region] with Kenath and the towns thereof, even threescore cities," is not at variance but in harmony with the preceding passages. The 23 Havoth Jair, with Kenath and its dependent towns, 37, conquered by Nobah (a family of sons of Machir related to Jair), amounted to "threescore in all." Bashan or Argob was divided between two chief families of Machir the Manassite, viz., that of Nobah who conquered Kenath and her dependencies, and Jair who conquered and named the Havoth Jair. Jair being supreme, and Nobah a subordinate branch of the Jair family, Moses comprehends the whole 60 under the name Havoth Jair. The words "unto this day" do not imply a long interval between the naming and the time of Moses' address, but mark the wonderful change due to God's gift, that the giant Og's 60 fenced cities are now become Havoth Jair! In the time of the judges, 30 were in possession of the judge Jair (x. 4), so that the old name, Havoth Jair, was revived. In undesigned coincidence the name Jair-us recurs in the same quarter in the N. T., but W. of the sea of Galilee (Matt. ix. 18).

Bashemath=fragrant. 1. The Hittite Elon's daughter; wife of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34). Called ADAM [see] in the genealogy of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 3). B. is doubtless a name of praise conferred on her at marriage. 2. Ishmael's daughter; the last of Esau's three wives according to the Edomite genealogy inserted by Moses (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13). From her son Reuel four Edomite tribes descended. Called MAHALATH in the narrative, Gen. xxviii. 9. Esau's Scirite wife, called Judith daughter of Beeri in the narrative (Gen. xxvi. 34), is called ANOLIBAMAH [see] (the name of a district in Idumaea) in the genealogy (Gen. xxxvi. 41). 3. Solomon's daughter, married to Ahimaaz, one of his commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 15).

Basket. Gen. xl. 16: "I had three white [marg. 'full of holes,' i.e. of open work, or rather 'baskets of white bread'] baskets on my head." The Bible accurately represents Egyptian custom (Herodotus, ii. 35), whereby men carried burdens on the head, women on the shoulders. In the distinct miracles of feeding the 5000 and the 4000 the A. V. uses the same term "baskets" for distinct Gr. words. In Matt. xiv. 20, Mark vi. 43, Luke ix. 17, John vi. 13, the disciples took up twelve kophinai of fragments at the feeding of the 5000. In feeding the 4000 with seven loaves recorded by two evangelists, the disciples took up seven spurides (Matt. xv. 37, Mark viii. 8). Now kophinai is always used by the evangelists when the miracle of the 5000 is spoken of, spurides when that of the 4000 is spoken of. Thus also in referring back to the miracle (Matt. xvi. 9, 10) Jesus says: "Do ye not . . . remember the five loaves of the 5000, and how many kophinai ye took up? Neither the seven loaves of the 4000, and how many spurides ye took up?" That the spurides were of large size appears from Paul's having been let down in one from the wall (Acts ix. 25). The kophinai being twelve probably answers to the twelve disciples, a provision basket for each, and so are likely to have been smaller. The accurate distinction in the use of the terms so invariably made in the record of the miracles marks both events as real and distinct, not, as rationalists have guessed, different versions of ous miracle. The coincidence is so unassigned that it escaped our translators altogether; it therefore can only be the result of genuineness and truth in the different evangelists' accounts. In travelling through Samaria or Gentile regions the Jews used kaphnol, not to be defiled by eating Gentile unclean foods. Smith's Bible Diet. wrongly makes the kaphnol larger than the spuris.

Bastards: mamzer. Forbidden to enter the Lord's congregation to the tenth generation, i.e. for ever (Deut. xxiii. 2, 3). Yet Jephthah, son of a strange woman, and therefore driven out by the legitimate children, was called to be a judge to Israel (Jud. xi. 1, 2). The Talmud and the rabbins are probably therefore right in explaining mamzer, not illegitimate children in general, but those begotten in incest or a beltery: from matzer, "to be corrupt." The only other occurrence of mamzer is Zech. ix. 6: "a bastard (a vile alien) shall dwell in Ashdod." Arabs about that time occupied much of S. Palestine, and the prophet foretells Ashdod will be ruled by them. Bastards were not excluded from public worship ordinarily. They had no claim to the paternal inheritance, or to the standing privileges and filial discipline of children (Heb. xii. 7).

Bat (batallaph=the darkness bird). Delighting in dark holes and caverns. This is the point of Isa. ii. 20, "a man shall cast his idols to the bats," whilst the idolaters themselves shall vainly hid in the rock from the wrath of the Lamb (Rev. vi. 16). Unclean in the eye of the law (Deut. xiv. 18, 19; Lev. xi. 19, 20). Ranked among "all fowls that creep, going upon all four;" it has claws on its pinions, by which it attaches itself to a surface, and creeps along it. It is connected with quadrupeds: the bones of the arm (answering to a bird's wing) and fingers being elongated, and a membrane extended over them to the hind limbs.

Bath. Washing was required by the law for purification of uncleanness of any kind, as leprosy, etc. (Lev. xv. xvi. 28, xxii. 6; Num. xix. 7, 19; 2 Sam. vi. 2, 4; 2 Kings v. 10); mourning (Ruth iii. 3, 2 Sam. xii. 20). The highpriest on the day of atonement, before each act of expiation (Lev. xvi. 4, 24); also at his own consecration (viii. 6). Anointing with perfume was joined to the washing (Ezra ii. 12). The laver at the door of the tabernacle was for the priests to wash in before entering (Exod. xxx. 18, 20). The legal ritual prescribed washing, not bathing; also sprinkling. Baptism by immersion is not confirmed by legal types.

Bath. A measure for liquids, about seven gallons.

Bathrabbim gate. Belonging to Heshbon, close to which were two pools, which the bridegroom makes the image of his beloved's eyes (S. of Sol. vii. D. = Daughter of a multitude; a crowded thoroughfare of Heshbon. Her eyes are placed as a pool, even until the crowd (John xvi. 33).

Bathsheba, or Bath Shua (a Canaanite name, Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12; 1 Chron. ii. 3) [see ANTIHOPHEL, her grandfather]. Eliam or Amiel (1 Chron. iii. 5), one of David's officers, was her father. Uriah, being a brother officer, formed an intimacy which ended in his marrying Eliam's daughter. David committed adultery with her, and caused her husband's murder (2 Sam. xi., xxiii. 34, 39). Mother of Solomon, whose mind she helped much to mould; also of Shimet (or Shammua), Shobab, and Nathan (1 Chron. iii. 5). Nathan and Solomon were both ancestors of the Lord Jesus (Luke iii. 31, Matt. i. 6). Her strength of intellect, kindness and influence over David and her son, appear in 1 Kings i. 11-31, ii. 13-21. She is said by tradition to have composed Prov. xxxi. as an admonition to Solomon on his marriage to Pharaoh's daughter.

Battle. "Them that turn the battle to the gate" (Isa. xxviii. 6), "those defenders of their country who not only repel the foe, but drive him to the gate of his own city." "In battles of shaking" (xxx. 32), i.e. in shock of battles; xix. 16, "because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts"; a mere waive of His hand, the slightest display of His power, shall be enough to discomfit (xxxvii. 36).

Bavai. Neh. iii. 18.

Baytree. Ps. xxxvii. 35: Ezraeh. Rather "an indigenous tree," not transplanted yet, "flourishing" with the vigour of its native soil. An Israelite, with all the privileges temporal and spiritual of his birth, his possessions therefore inalienable; yet a "wicked" man. Farthest removed from hurt as he and his seemed, "yet he passed away, and lo! he was not," etc.

Bazlith. Children of. Neh. vii. 54.

Bazluth. Ezra ii. 52.

Bdelium. Betoluch (Gen. ii. 12), a production of Havilah. Num. xi. 7: "The colour of the manna was as the colour of B." A gum exuding from a tree (the Borassus flabelliformis) in Arabia, India, and Babylonia, white and transparent, according to some; but this is hardly precious enough to be ranked with the gold and precious stones of Havilah. Others, a precious stone, crystal or beryl. This hardly suits Gen. ii. 12, where "stone" is added to onyx, but not to it. Gresenius therefore takes it pearls, found abundant at the Persian gulf. This answers to the parallel comparison of manna to the white hoar frost on the ground (Exod. xvi. 14). Smith's Diet. Append. adheres to its being a gum.

Bealiah. Combining Baal and Jah (1 Chron. xii. 5).

Bealoth. A town on the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 21). Feminine plural of Baal.

Beans. Among the supplies brought to David at Mahanaim (2 Sam. xvii. 28). An ingredient in Ezekiel's (iv. 9) bread for 390 days, during his representative siege of Jerusalem. The food of the poor, and of horses. Our pulse is akin to the Heb. put.

Bear. The Ursus Syriacus is the particular species meant in Scripture. Akin to the polar bear. As large as the European brown bear, but lower on the legs. It has a high mane of bristling hair between the shoulders. Of a buff or yellow white colour. One is represented in an Egyptian picture of tribute brought to Thothmes III. by Phœnicians. The crusader Godfrey of Bouillon rescued a man from its attack, at the imminent risk of his own life, being unheeded and severely wounded by it. The she bear is peculiarly fierce when she has lost or is defending her cubs (2

Sam. xviii. 8, Prov. xvii. 12, Hos. xiii. 8). Almost as formidable as the lion (Amos v. 19). The instrument of punishing the 42 youths who mocked Elisha, in a wood between Jericho and Bethel, probably in winter when bears descend from the mountains to the lowlands (2 Kings ii. 24). It attacks flocks and cattle (1 Sam. xvii. 34-37, Isa. xi. 7). Its roaring, ranging widely for food, and lying in wait for its prey, are alluded to in Isa. lix. 11, where however translate, "We moan like (hungry) bears," growing for food (Prov. xxviii. 15, Lam. iii. 10). It was carnivorous. Dan. vii. 5: "it raised up itself on one side," lying on one of its fore feet and standing on the other; a figure still to be seen in Babylonian monuments, but see marg. Persia is meant. Media was the lower and passive side; Persia, the upper and active. It had three ribs in its month, viz., it seized on Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt. From a Heb. root, "to move by-creeing": dob, dabab. Bochart, fr. Arabic, "hairy."

Beard. With Asiatics a badge of manly dignity. The Egyptians mostly shaved the hair of the face and head, except in mourning. In consonance with this Egyptian usage, Scripture, with the undesignated propriety of truth, represents Joseph as having "shaved his beard," which he had allowed to grow in prison, before entering Pharaoh's presence (Gen. xli. 14). Many Egyptians wore a false beard of plaited hair, private individuals small ones, kings long ones square below, the gods one turning at the end. Their enemies are represented bearded on the monuments. The Jews were forbidden to "round the corners of their heads or mar [i.e. shave off] the corners of their beards" (Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5). Baal worshippers rounded the beard and hair to make their faces round, like the sun. The Arabs trimmed their beard round in sign of dedication to some idol. Possibly the Israelites retained the hair between the ear and eye, which the Arabs shaved away (Jer. ix. 26 marg., xlv. 23, xlix. 32; comp. Herodotus, iii. 8). The beard is sworn by in the E. as an object of veneration. Not to trim it marked affliction, as in Mephibosheth's case during Absalom's occupation of Jerusalem (2 Sam. xiv. 24). An insult to it was resented as a gross outrage, as David did when Haaun shaved off half the beards of his ambassadors (2 Sam. x. 4). Comp. God's threat of "shaving" away His people as "hair" with the Assyrian king as His "razor" (Isa. vii. 20). This was one gross indignity to which Jesus was subjected: "I gave My cheeks to them that plucked off the hair" (Isa. l. 6). It was shaved in mourning (Isa. xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5, xlviii. 37).

BEARDS.

Only the nearest friends were permitted to touch the beard, which marks the foul treachery of Joab in taking his cousin Amasa's beard to kiss him, or rather it (2 Sam. xx. 9). The precious ointment flowed from Aaron's head at his consecration, upon his beard (Ps. cxxiii. 2). The leper, at purification, had to shave his head and beard and eyebrows (Lev. xiv. 9).

Beast. Representing two distinct Heb. words, behemah and chai, "cattle" and "living creature," or "animal." Be'ir means either collectively all cattle (Exod. xxii. 4, Ps. lxxviii. 48) or specially beasts of burden (Gen. xlv. 17). The "behemah" answer to the hoofed animals. In Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv. some principal divisions of the animal kingdom are given; the cloven footed, chewing the cud, ruminantia. The aim of Scripture is not natural science, but religion. Where system is needful for this, it is given simple and effective for the purposes of religion. If Scripture had given scientific definitions, they would have been irrelevant and even marrying to the effect designed. The language is therefore phenomenal, i.e. according to appearances. Thus the hare and hyrax have not the four stomachs common to ruminant animals, but they move the jaw in nibbling like the ruminants. The hare chews over again undigested food brought up from the oesophagus though not a genuine ruminant. The teeth of the rodentia grow during life, so that they necessarily have to be kept down by frequent grinding with the jaws; this looks like rumination. The hare and the coney represent really the rodentia; (the CONEY [see], or HYRAX, though a pachyderm, is linked with the hare, because externally resembling the rodentia;) swine, pachydermata; "whatsoever goeth upon his paws," "all manner of beasts that go on all four," carnivora: only those of a limited district, and those at all possible to be used as food, are noticed. It is noteworthy that it is only "every animal of the field" that Jehovah brought to Adam to name, viz., animals in any way useful to man (Gen. ii. 19), mainly the herbivora. Dominion is not specified as given over the (wild, savage) "beasts of the earth" (mainly carnivora), but only "over all the earth." So in Ps. viii. 7 man's dominion is over "the beasts of the field." Noah is not said to take into the ark beasts of the earth; but in Gen. ix. 9, 10, "beasts of the earth" are distinguished from "all that go out of the ark." Next to fear of a deluge was their fear of the beasts of the earth; but God assures men "the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth" (ix. 2).

Symbolically, man severed from God and resting on his own physical or intellectual strength, or material resources, is beastly and brutish. He is only manly when Godly, for man was made in the image of God. So Asaph describes himself, when envying the prosperous wicked, "I was as a beast before Thee" (Ps. lxxiii. 22). "Man in honour [apart from God] abideth not, he is like the beasts that perish" (Ps. xlix. 12). The multitude opposing Messiah are but so many "bulls" and "calves" to be stilled by His "rebuke" (Ps. lxxviii. 30). Those "that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, as natural brute beasts, are made only to be taken and destroyed" (2 Pet. ii. 12). So persecutors of Christians, as Paul's opponents at Ephesus (1 Cor. xv. 32). The "beast" (Rev. xiii., xv., xvii., xix.) is the combination of all these sensual, lawless, God opposing features. The four successive world empires are represented as beasts coming up out of the sea whereon the winds of heaven strove (Dan. vii.). The kingdom of Messiah, on the contrary, is that of "the Son of MAN," supplanting utterly the former, and alone everlasting and world wide. In Rev. iv., v., the four cherubic forms are not "beasts" (as A. V.), but "living creatures" (zoa). The "beast" (therion) is literally the wild beast, untamed to the obedience of Christ and God (Rom. viii. 7). The "harlot" or apostate church (comp. Rev. xii. 1, etc., with xvii. 1, etc., Isa. i. 21) sits first on the beast, which again is explained as "seven mountains upon which she sitteth"; probably seven universal God-opposed empires (contrast Jer. li. 25 with Isa. ii. 2) of which the seven-hilled Rome is the prominent embodiment, viz., Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Medo Persia, Greece, Rome (including the modern Latin kingdoms), and the Germano-Slavonic empire. The woman sitting on them is the church conformed to the world; therefore the instrument of her sin is retributively made the instrument of her punishment (Ezek. xliii., Jer. ii. 19, Rev. xvii. 16). "The spirit of man," even as it normally ascends to God, whose image he bore, so at death "goeth upward"; and the spirit of the beast, even as its desires tend downward to merely temporal wants, "goeth downward" (Eccles. iii. 21). God warns against cruelty to the brute (Deut. xxi. 6, 7). He regarded the "much cattle" of Nineveh (Jonah iv. 11). He commanded that they should be given the sabbath rest. As to the creature's final deliverance, see Rom. viii. 20-23.

Bebai. Sons of (Ezra ii. 11, viii. 11, x. 23; Neh. vii. 16, x. 15).

Becher=first-born: Gesenius, young camel: BECHORATH. 1. Benjamin's second son (Gen. xli. 21, 1 Chron. vii. 6). In 1 Chron. viii.

1 the reading possibly ought to be "Bela, Becher, and [instead of 'his firstborn,' only one Hebrew letter is thus omitted] Ashbel." Then "the second," "the third," etc., were probably added, after the change in the original. Or vice versa, Becher in Gen. xli. 21 and 1 Chron. vii. 6 may be a corruption for [Bela] "his firstborn." In Num. xxvi. 38 Becher is not mentioned in enumerating the Benjamite families, but Bela's and Ashbel's sons. However, among the Ephraimites occur "the Bachrites of Becher" (Num. xxvi. 35). In a border raid on cattle (1 Chron. vii. 21) the Ephraimites had been slain by the men of Gath who invaded Goshen; thus Ephraimite heiresses, for lack of Ephraimite husbands, would marry into other tribes. Becher, or his heir, would marry one, and so be reckoned among the Ephraimites instead of in Benjamin. Abiah (Aphiah, 1 Sam. ix. 1), Becher's younger son, would remain in Benjamin. From him descended Bechorath, then Zeror, Abiel (Jebiel, 1 Chron. ix. 35), Ner, Kish, Saul. Abiel settled in Gibeon or Gibeah, afterwards described as "of Saul" (1 Sam. xi. 4, Isa. x. 29). From Becher came also Sheba, son of Bichri, the rebel against David (2 Sam. xx.). also Shimei, son of Gera of Bahurim (2 Sam. xvii. 5), "of the house of Saul." The non-appearance of Becher in 1 Chron. viii. 1 and Num. xxvi. 38 may be due to the difference of the principle of the genealogy and the failure of the lines of the older heads of houses, as compared with Gen. xli. 21, 1 Chron. vii. 6. Thus no change of reading may be needed. 2. Son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 35). Bered, in 1 Chron. vii. 20, same as BECHER above.

Bed. The outer garment worn by day sufficed the poor for bedstead, bed beneath, and covering above, whence it was forbidden to keep it in pledge after sunset, lest the poor man should be without covering (Deut. xxiv. 13). The bolster was often of plaited goat's hair (1 Sam. xix. 13). A quilt to wrap one's self in is the bed meant in the miracle of Jesus when He said "Take up thy bed and walk" (John v. 8-11). The cushion or seat at the stern was our Lord's "pillow" on the lake of Galilee (Mark iv. 38). Stones served as Jacob's "pillows" (Heb.) and afterwards the consecrated pillar to commemorate the Divine vision granted him (Gen. xxviii. 11). The divan or platform at the end or sides of a room often served as bedstead. In such a room the master of the house and his family lay, according to the parable (Luke xi. 7), "My children are with me in bed." The little chamber, bed, stool, table, and candlestick of Elijah (2 Kings iv. 10) were and are the usual furniture of a sleeping room. Some bed frame is implied in Esth. i. 6, 2 Sam. iii. 31, "bier," marg. bed. The giant Og had one of iron, a marvel in those days (one made of palm sticks is common in the present day), and required by his enormous weight and size (Deut. iii. 11). Og in seems exposition of his against Ammon may have left behind him his gigantic bed, to impress his enemy with his superhuman greatness, and the Ammonites may have preserved it in Rabbath, their capital; or Israel may have sent it to Ammon as a pledge of their friendly intentions (Jehovah having charged them not to disturb Ammon), and also a visible proof of their power in having conquered so mighty a prince as Og. Royal beds (S. of Sol. iii. 9, 10 marg.) had pillars of marble or silver, the bottom gold, the covering of purple and divers colours, hangings fastened to the pillar-supported canopy, the beds of gold upon a tessellated pavement (Esth. i. 6); comp. Amos vi. 4, "beds of ivory." Often used as couches in the day (Ezek. xxiii. 41, Esth. vii. 8). Watchers of vineyards had hammocks slung from trees (Isa. i. 8, xxiv. 20): Heb. melunah, "a lodge for the night." Arab watchers sleep in them to be secure from wild beasts; translate "the earth shall wave to and fro like a hammock," swung about by the wind. The "bedchamber" where Jotham was hidden was a storeroom for beds, and so well fitted for concealment (2 Kings xi. 2, 2 Chron. xxii. 11), not the usual reclining chamber. The bedroom was usually in the most retired part of the house (1 Kings xii. 25, Exod. xiii. 3, Eccles. x. 20). In Ezk. xiii. 18, "Woe to the women that sew pillows to all armholes" ("elbows") the allusion is to false prophetesses making their dupes rest on elbow cushions in fancied ecstasy, a symbol of the "peace" they falsely promised (ver. 16). Beds were placed at the end of the chamber, on an ascent approached by steps; hence "I will not go up into my bed" (Ps. cxxxii. 3).

Bedad. Gen. xxxvi. 35, 1 Chron. i. 46.
Bedan. A judge of Israel between Jerubbab and Jephthah, in 1 Sam. xii. 11. Seemingly not mentioned in Judges, but the name is probably identical with Abdon, which has the same radical consonants (Jud. xii. 13-15). No achievement of his for Israel's deliverance is recorded, but may it not be inferred from the record "he was buried . . . in the mount of the Amalekites," that he probably smote them and took the land which they had robbed Israel of? Comp. Jud. iii. 13, 27, v. 14. A Bedan is mentioned among Manasseh's descendants (1 Chron. vii. 17), whence some identify him with the Jair (Jud. x. 3), and suppose the surname B. was added to distinguish him from the other Jair (Num. xxxii. 41). The Chaldee paraphrase reads "Samson" for "B." in 1 Sam. xii. 11. Whence some guess B-dan Ben-Dan, or B-dan (Heb. in) Dan, to be an epithet of Samson, viz. the Destroyer; comp. Jud. xiii. 25. But the order of the names forbids it. The LXX., Syrian, and Arabic versions read "Barak," which also the order forbids; however, see Heb. xi. 32. Other and spiritual considerations, besides chronology, often rule the order.

Bedeiah. Ezra v. 25.

Bee = Deborah. Whence Rehekah's nurse (Gen. xxxv. 8) and the judge (Jud. iv.) were named; the bee's industry, fruitfulness, and sweetness suggesting the similitude. In Dent. i. 41 "the Amorites chased you as bees do"; Ps. cxviii. 12, Isa. vii. 18: the bold pertinacity with which bees in swarming hosts assail the object of their wrath is the point of comparison. "The Lord shall hiss for the bee that is in the land of Assyria"; i.e., He will call for the enemy to invade the Holy Land. Bees were drawn out of their hives by hissing or whistling. They were as numerous in Assyria as "the fly" in marshy Egypt. "They shall come and rest all of them in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes"; the bees, like bees, swarming and settling on all places. Hereafter He will "hiss for" His people, to "gather them, for He hath redeemed them" (Zech. x. 8). Wild honey, such as John Baptist ate (Matt. iii. 4), abounded in Palestine, often liquid, whence the land is described as "flowing with milk and honey" (Exod. iii. 8). Often found in the rocks (Ps. lxxxi. 16, Dent. xxvii. 13), or in a hollow tree (1 Sam. xiv. 25). Samson, having slain a young lion, found on his return within the dried carcase a swarm of bees and honeycomb, with which he refreshed himself and his father and mother, without telling them whence it came. (The heat in 24 hours often so dries up the moisture that, without decomposition, the bodies remain like mummies, free from odour.) Hence he made a riddle: "out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness" (Jud. xiv. 14). A type of the antitypical Samson, the stronger One, spoiling the strong and roaring lion, "dividing the spoils" among His friends, and bringing forth life and Divine nourishment out of death, and sweetness out of misery (Luke xi. 21, 22; Heb. ii. 14, 15). Samson's history, of which this incident is the epitome, sets forth Satan's lionlike violence and harlot-like subtlety, overruled by Divine might to his own destruction and fallen man's redemption.

The scarcity of honey (debash) in Egypt is implied in Jacob's thinking "a little honey" worth including in the present sent to conciliate the Egyptian viceroy (Gen. xliii. 11); but it was the boiled down, thickened juice of grapes, dates, etc., still called dibs, an article of commerce in the E., which Jacob sent Joseph, and which the Tyrians brought from Palestine (Ezek. xxvii. 17). The decoction of the grape, or must boiled down, is mixed with wine or milk, and looks like coarse honey. In Isa. vii. 15, 16, of Immanuel it is written, "butter and honey shall He eat," i.e. curdled milk (the acid of which is grateful in the hot East) and honey mixed together shall He eat, as the ordinary food of infants, marking His real humanity (Luke ii. 52). In the type, the prophetess' child, a state of distress is also implied; when, owing to invaders, milk and honey, things produced spontaneously, should be the only abundant articles of food. That distress and the invasion should cease before the child reached the age of consciousness to distinguish good and evil. The commonness of honey in Palestine as an article of diet appears in 2 Sam. xvii. 20, 2 Kings xiv. 3, Jer. xli. 8, Ezek. xvi. 13, 19.

Beeliada. 1 Chron. xiv. 7. El-iada (2 Sam. v. 16), with El (God) substituted for Baal.

Beelzebub. So it ought to be read in Matt. xii. 24, Mark iii. 22, Luke xi. 15, etc. The Jews, in ridicule, changed Baal-zebub, the Ekronite god of flies, into Beelzebub, "god of dung" (which however is zobel), as they changed Beth-el (house of God) into Beth-aven (house of vanity), when the golden calf was set up there. Zebul means "dwelling," lord of this lower world, "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2), and taking up his "dwelling" in human bodies (Matt. xii. 45). Thus "master of the house" and "master of the dwelling" (Beelzebub) stand in happy contrast (Matt. x. 25). As the Ekronite god was applied to by Ahaziah to cast out his disease, so the Jews taunted Jesus as using the same idol power to cast out demons. Idols and demons, moreover, had a close connection (1 Cor. x. 20, 21). Beelzebub was thought to be the foul prince of both.

Beer. 1. A dug well, whereas EN or AIN is a fountain or spring. Israel's last halting place was so called, from the well dug there, beyond the Arnon, by the princes and nobles. A poetical fragment celebrates the fact (Num. xxi. 16-18): "Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it. The princes digged the well; the nobles of the people digged it, by the direction of the lawgiver, with their staves." What a contrast was this Beer, digged amidst the people's joyous songs in honour of their princes, to the miraculous smiting of the rock amidst their murmurings against God and their leaders (Num. xx. 2). Perhaps the BEER-ELIM, "well of the princes," of Isa. xv. 8, on the border of Moab southwards. The howling (yillalathah: Beer-elim is chosen as similar in sound) shall reach even that remote point. Tradition made this the last appearance of the water that "followed" the people before their entrance into Canaan; comp. 1 Cor. x. 4. 2. A place whither Jotham, Gideon's son, fled from Abimelech (Jud. ix. 21).

Beera. 1 Chron. vii. 37.

Beerah. 1 Chron. v. 6.

Beeri. 1. The Hittite = ANAH. [See THE HORITE.] Father of Judith, Esau's wife = AHOLIBAMAH [see]. In the narrative where stress is laid on Esau's wife being a Canaanite, her father is called a Hittite; in the genealogy, where the stress is on Esau's marriage connection with the former holders of mount Seir, he is properly termed a Horite. [See BASHEMATI.] 2. Hóser's father.

Beer-la-hai-roi = the well of Him that liveth and seeth. Named by Hagar, because God looked after her with loving providence even in the wilderness (Gen. xvi. 14, xxii. 14:

comp. 2 Chron. xvi. 9, Ps. cxxxix.). Between Kadesh and Bered, in the S. country. Here Isaac lived before and after his father's death (Gen. xxiv. 62, xxv. 11). Identified with a well at Mollahi, a station on the road to Beersheba; near it is the cavern Beit-Hagar. Not to be confounded with the well whereby Ishmael was saved, in Gen. xxi. 19, subsequently.

Beeroth = wells. One of the four Hivite cities (the others being Gibeon, Chephirah, and Kirjath Jearim: Josh. ix. 17), which obtained peace with Joshua by false pretences. Allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 25). Ishbosheth's murderers Baanah and Rechab, and their father Rimmon, belonged to it. Its original occupants repaired to the Philistine Gittaim (Neh. xi. 33, 2 Sam. iv. 2, 3, 7). The men of B. were among those who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 25). Now El-bireh, on the road to Nablûs, ten miles N. of Jerusalem, below a ridge bounding the northward view. The traditional site of Jesus' parents not finding Him in their company (Luke ii. 43-45). The usual halt at the first day's close for caravans going N. from Jerusalem. Naharai, one of David's mighty men, was a Beerothite (1 Chron. xi. 39).

Beeroth of the children of Jaakan. (Deut. x. 6, Num. xxxiii. 31.) Israel's halting place next before Mosera, where Aaron died. The tribe took its name from Jaakan, son of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. i. 42 = Akan, Gen. xxxvi. 27).

Beersheba = well of the oath. The southern limit of the Holy Land, as Dan in the N.: "from Dan to B." (comp. in David's census, 1 Chron. xxi. 2, 2 Sam. xxiv. 2-7) comprehends the whole. Called so from the oath of peace between Abraham and Abimelech, king of the Philistines (Gen. xxi. 31), else from the seven (sheba) ewe lambs slain there: indeed sheba, an oath, is from the custom of binding one's self by seven things, as Abraham made the seven ewe lambs a pledge of his covenant with Abimelech. Again, from the like oath between Abimelech (with Phicol, his captain) and Isaac, it being not uncommon for an event to be recorded as occurring apparently for the first time, which has been recorded as occurring earlier before: so Bethel (Gen. xxvi. 31-33). The well dug by Abraham and secured to him by oath had been covered and lost. It is found by Isaac's servants just after the covenant made between him and Abimelech. The series of events recalls to Isaac's mind the original name and that which gave rise to the name; so he restores both the well itself and the name. Seven (sheba): which also may explain the name wells as at the place, so that a different one may have been named by Isaac from that named by Abraham. They all pour their streams into the wadyes Seba, and are called Bir es seba, the largest 12 ft. diameter, and masonry round reaching 28 ft. down, and 44 from bottom to surface of the water. The second, at a hundred yards distance, 5 in diameter, 42 in depth. The other five farther off.

The kerb stones round the mouth are worn into grooves by the action of ropes for so many ages. Around the large are nine stone troughs; around the smaller, five. The water is excellent, and grass with crocuses and lilies abounds. Abraham planted here a "grove" (eshel) (distinct from the idol grove, Ashterah, or Asarte [see BAAL]), or tree, the tamarisk, long living, of hard wood, with long, clustering, evergreen leaves, as a type of the ever enduring grace of the faithful, covenant-keeping God (Gen. xxi. 33), "and called on the name (the self-manifested character and person) of Jehovah, the everlasting God." Here it was that Isaac lived when Jacob stole from his father the blessing already forfeited by Esau's profane sale of his birthright (Gen. xxvii. 33, xxviii. 10). Long afterwards, on Jacob's descent to Egypt, he halted there, sacrificed unto the God of Isaac, and had a vision of God encouraging him to go down. The dispensation of the promise, which began with Abraham's call from Ur to Canaan, ended on the last night of the sojourn of his grandson Israel in Canaan. So God's promise was repeated for the last time (Gen. xlii. 1-5). Possibly the 430 years (Gal. iii. 17) dates from this, the end, not from the beginning, of the dispensation of the promise.

B. was given to Simeon, in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 1, 2, 1 Chron. iv. 28). Samuel's sons, Joel and Abiah, were judges there (1 Sam. viii. 2), its distance preventing his going in circuit to it, as he did to others yearly (1 Sam. vii. 16, 17). Here Elijah left his confidential servant (ad'aro) on his way to Horeb (1 Kings xix. 3, 4).

"From Geba to B." or "from B. to mount Ephraim" was the formula comprehending the southern kingdom of Judah after the severance of Israel's ten tribes (2 Kings xxiii. 8, 2 Chron. xix. 4), and on the return from Babylon still narrower, "from B. to the valley of Hinnom" (Neh. xi. 30). Abiah's wife, Zibiah, mother of Joash, was of B. (2 Kings xii. 1.) It became seat of an idolatry akin to that of Bethel or Gilgal, so that it was a formula of superstition, "the manner [cultus, or religion, as in Acts ix. 2] the new religion of Christ is designated "this way" of B. liveth" (Amos v. 5, viii. 14). It became in Christian times an episcopal city under the Bishop of Jerusalem.

Beeshtera. Bosra. [See ASHTAROTH.]

Beetle = chargal, only in Lev. xi. 21, 22; mentioned between the locust and grasshopper, and among "flying creeping things that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth." From an Arabic root, to leap. The LXX. translates it the "serpent killer," a kind of locust not having wings. A species of truxalis, some think, one of the orthoptera, like the locust, but with elongated, projecting, conical forehead; carnivorous. It keeps down the multiplication of noisome insects. The beetle was not an article of food, the Locust [see] was. A beetle cannot therefore be meant.

Behemoth. (Job xl. 15-24.) The Egyptian, Coptic, pehemont, "the water ox," Hebraised; our river horse, hippopotamus. "Behold I made him with thee." Yet how great the difference! "He catcheth grass as an ox;" a marvel in an animal so much in the water, and that such a monster is not carnivorous.

HIPPOPOTAMUS.

is in the navel (rather muscles) of his belly"; the elephant's skin there is thin, but the hippopotamus' thick. "He moveth his tail like a cedar," short indeed, but straight and rigid as the cedar. "The sinews of his thighs are twisted together," like a thick rope. "His bones are as strong tubes of copper... his spine like bars of iron." He that made him hath furnished him with his sword" (his sickle-like teeth). Though so armed, he lets "all the beasts of the field play" near him, for he is herbivorous. "He lieth under the lotus bushes," in the covert of the reed and fens (being amphibious). "The lotus bushes cover him with their shadow." "Behold (though) a river be overwhelming, he is not in hasty pause (for he can live in water as well as land); he is secure, though a Jordan swell up to his mouth." Job cannot have been a Hebrew, or he would not adduce Jordan, where there were no river horses. He alludes to it as a name known only by hearsay, and representing any river. "Before his eyes (i.e. openly) will any take him, or pierce his nose with cords?" Nay, he can only be taken by guile. Jehovah's first discourse (xxxviii. xxxix.) was limited to land animals and birds; this second discourse requires therefore the animal classed with the crocodile to be amphibious, as the river horse.

Bela = a swallowing up, called so from earthquakes having affected it. 1. One of the five cities of the plain, spared at Lot's intercession, and named Zoar, "a little one" (Gen. xiv. 2, xix. 22). S.E. of the Dead Sea, on the route to Egypt, not far from where Sodom and Gomorrah stood, according to Holland, arguing from the smoke of the burning cities having been seen by Abraham from the neighbourhood of Hebron, and also because if Sodom had been N. of the Dead Sea Lot would not have had time to escape to Zoar on the S.E. of the sea. But Grove places the cities of the plain N.W. of the Dead Sea, between Jericho and the sea, as the plain was seen by Lot from the neighbourhood of Bethel. From the hills between Bethel and Hai (Gen. xiii. 3, 10) it is impossible to see the S. of the Dead Sea. Bela is joined with Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, in Gen. xiv. 2, 8, forming a confederacy against the invading kings of Elam, Shinar, etc. Bela was probably the name of the king of Zoar, as his name alone of the five would otherwise not be given. Bela is also the name of an Edomite king (Gen. xxvi. 32). Robinson perhaps rightly identifies B. with a ruin on the N. side of Lisan, "the tongue" of land jutting out into the Dead Sea at the S.E., between the wady Beni Hamid and the wady el Dera'ali. It was a Moabite city (Isa. xv. 5, Jer. xlviii. 34); Deut. xxxiv. 3 does not prove that its site was farther S., but only that Moses' eye caught no more southward town than Zoar. 2. A king of Edom, son of Beor, a Chaldean probably by birth (like Balaam also descended from Beor, and originally residing in Pethor of Aram by the Euphrates: Num. xxii. 5, xxiii. 7), and reigning in Edom by conquest (Gen. xxxvi. 31-39, 1 Chron. i. 14-51). 3. Benjamin's eldest son (Gen. xvi. 21; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chron. vii. 6, viii. 1). From Gera (one house of his family) came Ehud, Israel's judge and deliverer from Eglon of Moab (Jud. iii. 14-30). As Hasham is like B. a king of Edom, so with B. son of Benjamin is connected a Benjamite family of Hashim, sprung from a foreign woman of Moab (1 Chron. vii. 12, viii. 8-11). 4. Azaz's son, a Benbenite (1 Chron. v. 8). He too was "in Arzer, even unto Nebo and Bael Meon, eastward unto the entering in of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (1 Chron. v. 8, 9).

Belial=worthlessness; recklessness, lawlessness. Not strictly a proper name, but used so by personification. Beli= "without" and yal "usefulness," i.e. good for nothing. "A man of B." is a worthless, lawless fellow (Deut. xiii. 13, Jud. xix. 22, 1 Sam. ii. 12). Latterly "Raka" ("vain fellows" (2 Sam. vi. 20, har-ockim), and Fool were used instead: Matt. v. 22. Nabal (=fool) is called "man of B." (1 Sam. xxv. 25). In the N. T. "Belial" is the form in some oldest MSS. (2 Cor. vi. 15). As Satan is opposed to God, Antichrist to Christ, so Belial standing here in contrast to Christ must denote all antichristian pollutions personified.

Bellows. Jer. vi. 29: "the bellows are burned," so intense a heat is made that the very bellows are almost set on fire; "the lead is consumed of the fire." Used in heating a furnace for smelting metals, not required for the wood fires which were the ancient fuel, and were commonly blown with a fan. The Egyptian bellows, as represented in paintings of the time of Thothmes III., contemporary with Moses, were worked by the feet alternately pressing upon two inflated skins sending the air through reed tubes tipped with iron into the furnace; as each skin became exhausted the blower raised it by a cord in the hand to admit a fresh supply of air.

Bells. No large ones like ours, for assembling congregations to worship, were anciently known. In Exod. xxviii. 33, 34, small golden bells are mentioned (72 according to the rabbins) as alternating with blue, purple, and scarlet pomegranates, on the hem of the highpriest's ephod. The object was "his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not." The pomegranates with pleasant odour, and refreshing juice, and delicious kernel, symbolised the word of God, the spiritual food refreshing the soul (Ps. xix. 8-11, Deut. viii. 3, Prov. xxv. 11). The bells symbolise the sounding forth of the word (Rom. x. 18). Through the robe, with this pendant attached, Aaron was represented as the receiver and transmitter of the word from heaven. No ordinary priest could enter Jehovah's immediate presence. The highpriest alone was admitted, as wearing the robe of God's word and bearing the Divine testimony, upon which the covenant fellowship was founded which ensured his not dying. The sounding bells also assured the people waiting outside that their interceding representative priest was not dead, though in God's immediate presence. So the sounding word assures Christ's waiting people here below that, though withdrawn from their eyes within the heavenly veil, "He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25).

The pa'anonee are strictly bells (Exod. xxviii. 33), from pa'am, "to strike." But in Zech. xiv. 20 metzilloth, from talal "to strike," means flat pieces or plates of brass, like cymbals, attached as ornaments to the horses' necks. By their tinkling they enliven the animal, and keep the party from wandering far from one another. Bells are represented attached to horses on the walls of Sennacherib's palace at Koyunlik. "Holiness unto the Lord," inscribed on even the horse bells, whereas formerly it was only on the plate of the highpriest's mitre (Exod. xxviii. 36), marks that sanctity shall, in the coming day of the Lord, invest even the common occupations and things of life.

In Isa. iii. 16, 18, 20, women are represented as wearing "tinkling ornaments" (probably with bells attached) about their feet, to attract admiration; ankle rings were worn on both feet joined by a chain, and the tinkling ornaments hanging therefrom.

Belshazzar. Contracted from Belshazzar: from Bel, the Babylonian idol, and shar, a king; zar is a common Babylonian termination, as in Nebuchadnezzar. His solemnly instructive history is graphically told in Dan. v. See BAULI, BABYLON, for the remarkable confirmation of the Scripture account of his death on the night of revelry in the siege of Babylon; which is also stated by Xenophon; whereas Berosus in Josephus calls the last king Nabonedus (Nabonahit, i.e. Nebo makes prosperous) and says that in the 17th year of his reign Cyrus took Babylon, the king having retired to Borsippa (the Chaldean sacred city of religion and science); and that having surrendered there, he had a principality assigned to him in Carmania by Cyrus. The inscription at Umqueer (Ur of the Chaldees), read by Sir H. Rawlinson, shows that Nabonedus admitted his son B. into a share of the kingdom, just as Nabopolassar admitted Nebuchadnezzar his son to share in the government, Xerxes admitted his son Artaxerxes, and Augustus his successor Tiberius; so that the discrepancy is cleared. Nabonedus, defeated by Cyrus in the field, fled to Borsippa, and survived. B. fell in the last assault of Babylon.

Xenophon calls the last king of Babylon "impious," and illustrates his cruelty by the fact that he killed a courtier for having struck down the game in hunting before him, and unmanned Gadates a courtier at a banquet, because one of the king's courtiers praised him as handsome. His reckless infatuation is marked by his making a feast when the enemy was thundering at his gates; comp. 1 Thess. v. 3-7 for the lesson to us. He set at naught eastern propriety by introducing women and even concubines at the feast. His crowning guilt, which made the cup overflow in vengeance, was his profaning the vessels of Jehovah's temple to be the instrument of revelry to himself, his princes, wives, and concubines, drinking out of them in honour of his idols. Security, sensuality, and profanity are the sure forerunners of the sinner's doom. Intoxicating drinks tempt men to daring profanity, which even they would shrink from when sober. To mark the inseparable connection of sin and punishment, "the same hour" that witnessed his impious insult to Jehovah witnessed the mysterious hand of the unseen One writing his doom in full view of his fellow transgressors on the same palace wall which had been covered with cuneiform inscriptions glorifying those Babylonian kings. Comp. Prov. xvi. 18. His daring bravado was in an instant changed into abject fear; conscience can turn the most foolhardy into a coward.

His promise that whosoever should read the writing should be "third ruler in the kingdom" is probably an undesigned coincidence with the historic truth now known that Nabonedus was the chief king, B. secondary, and so the ruler advanced to the next place would be THIRD (Dan. v. 7). Daniel having been summoned at the suggestion of Nitocris, the queen mother, probably wife of Evil Merodach, Nebuchadnezzar's son, faithfully reproved him for that though knowing how God had humbled his forefather Nebuchadnezzar for God-despising, self-magnifying pride, he yet "lifted himself against the Lord of heaven"; therefore MENE, God has numbered thy years of reign and the number is complete, comp. Ps. xc. 12. TEKEL, weighed in the balances of God's truth, thou art found wanting. UPHARSIN, or PERES, alluding to the similar word "Persians," thy kingdom is divided among the Medes and Persians. Cyrus diverted the Euphrates into a channel, and guided by Gobryas and Gatas, deserters, marched by the dry channel into Babylon, whilst the citizens were carousing at an annual feast to the idols (Isa. xxi. 5, xlv. 27; Jer. i. 29-35, 38, 39, li. 36, 57). B. was slain; comp. Isa. xiv. 18-20.

Ben=son. 1 Chron. xv. 18.

Benaiah=whom Jehovah builds up. Son of Jehoiada, the chief priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5), so of the tribe of Levi, though of Kabzeel in S. Judah (2 Sam. xxii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 22, 25, xxvii. 17, xxviii. 6); set over David's body guard, the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18, xx. 23, xxiii. 20, 22, 23; 1 Kings i. 38). Midway between the first three of "the mighty men" (gibborim), and the 30 "valiant men of the armies." "Mighty among the 30, and above the 30." He earned his position by slaying "two lion-like men of Moab," and "a lion in a pit in a snowy day," and "an Egyptian of great stature, a goodly man (2 Sam. xxii. 21), five cubits high," out of whose hand he plucked the spear like a weaver's beam, "and slew him with his own spear" (1 Chron. xi. 22, 23). Having remained faithful in Adonijah's rebellion (1 Kings i. 8, 10, 32, 38, 44), and having by Solomon's command slain him and Joab, he was promoted to the latter's post as commander in chief (ii. 25, 31, 35; iv. 4). Jehoiada, father of B., was next after Abiathophel in David's court (1 Chron. xxvii. 34).

Eight others of the name are mentioned.

1. One of David's 30 "valiant men of the armies," the Pirathouite, an Ephraimite, captain of the 11th monthly course (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chron. xi. 31, xxvii. 14). 2. A Levite of David's time who "played with a psaltery on alamoth" (1 Chron. xv. 18-20, xvi. 5). 3. A priest in David's time who blew the trumpet before the ark (1 Chron. xv. 24, xvi. 6). 4. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14). 5. A Levite overseer of offerings, under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13). 6. A prince in the family of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36). 7. Four who took strange wives (Ezra x. 25, 30, 35, 43). 8. Father of Pelatiah, a prince of the people, who gave presumptuous counsel against Ezekiel's inspired warnings, and was visited with death (Ezek. xi.).

Ben-Ammi=son of my people. Son of Lot's younger daughter; progenitor of Ammon (Gen. xix. 38).

Bene-Berak. A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 45). Now Ibn Abrah, an hour from Jelmud.

Ben-Hadad=son, i.e. worshipper, of Hadad, the Syrian sun-god. A name common to three kings of Damascus. Hadad-ezer (Hadad helps) is a similar Syrian name. David, having conquered him, put garrisons in Syria of Damascus; Rezon retook Damascus, and reigned there "an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon" (1 Kings xi. 23). B. I., grandson of Rezon (probably), as king in Damascus, which had absorbed by that time the petty kingdoms around, helped Baasha against ASA [see] king of Judah. But the latter, by a present of "all the silver and gold left in the treasures of the Lord's house and of the king's house," tempted B. to "break his league with Baasha" (1 Kings xv. 18, 19). He therefore "smote Ijon, Dan, Abel-beth-Maachah, Cinneroth, with all Naphtali" in the northern kingdom, viz., that of the ten tribes under Baasha, thus enabling Asa to take away the stones of Ramah, which Baasha had built to prevent any repairing from the northern to the southern kingdom, Judah.

B. II., son of B. I.; 32 vassal kings accompanied him in his first siege of Samaria (1 Kings xx. 1) [see ANAB]. After Ahab's death, Moab having revolted from Abaziah and Jehoram, successive kings of Israel (2 Kings i. i. vi. vii.). B. took advantage of Israel's consequent weakness, and after having been baffled several times by Elisha besieged Samaria a second time so straitly that mothers gave their own sons to be eaten, a horror similar to what occurred in later times in Titus' siege of Jerusalem. A sudden panic, owing to a divinely sent noise, caused the Syrians to flee from their camp, and leave its rich contents to be spoiled, under the impression that Israel had hired the Hittite and Egyptian kings. The consequent plenty had been foretold by Elisha. Shortly after B. fell sick, and sent Hazael with large presents to consult Elisha who was in Damascus (2 Kings viii. 7-15). The prophet replied, "Thou mayest certainly recover," i.e. the disease is not mortal; "howbeit the Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die." Hazael's latent cruelty and ambition were awakened by what ought to have awakened remorse, Elisha's tears at the horrors which the prophet foresaw he would perpetrate. His murder of B. with a wet cloth (the wetting solidifying the cloth, and making it impervious to air) was consonant to his subsequent bloodthirstiness. Hazael is evidently the subject of ver. 15; the introduction of his name at the end does not disprove this: it is introduced to emphasize Hazael's succession to the throne, in contrast to B.'s decease. Many fancy the wet cloth was put on to cool the fevered face, and by B. himself, and that death naturally resulted from the sudden chill. (?) So ended with B., after reigning about 30 years, the dynasty founded by Rezon.

B. III., Hazael's son and successor. Jehovah, moved by Jehoshaphat's repentance of his previous wickedness, and by his beseeching prayers, and by the oppression suffered by his people from Hazael, "who had made them like the dust by threshing," gave Israel a saviour from B. in Joash his son's days. Joash, visiting Elisha on his death-bed, by his direction shot arrows eastwards, the pledge of the Lord's deliverance from Syria. But instead of smiting the ground repeatedly he only smote thrice from want of faith; so, instead of destroying the Syrians as he might have done, he only was to smite them thrice, which he did in Aphek (2 Kings xiii. 14-19) in the Esdraelon plain, where Ahab had defeated B. I. (1 Kings xx. 26); comp. Amos i. 3, 4, which foretells B.'s overthrow. Jeroboam II. completed Israel's deliverance, according to Jonah's prophecy (2 Kings xiv. 25).

Benhail. 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

Ben-hanan. 1 Chron. iv. 20.

Beninu. Neh. x. 13.

Benjamin=son of my right hand, as Jacob named him; first called by his dying mother Rachel Benoni, son of my sorrow (comp. Jer. xxxi. 15, Matt. ii. 17, 18). Jesus the anti-type was first "a man of sorrows" (Isa. liii. 3), the mother's sorrows attending His birth also at Bethlehem; afterwards "the man of God's right hand," on whom God's hand was laid strengthening Him (Rev. i. 17; Ps. lxxx. 21, lxxxix. 21; Acts v. 31). 1. Rachel's second son, the only son of Jacob born in Palestine (Gen. xxxv. 16-19), on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem Ephrath, near the latter (Gen. xlviii. 7) (probably =the fertile, from parah, answering to the town's other name, Bethlehem, "bread-house"). The Arabic jamin means fortunate. And in the expression "sons of B." or a "man of B.," "land of B.," the first syllable is suppressed Beneh Hammini, Ish Jemini, Eretz Jemini, comp. xlv. 10. B. was his father's favourite after Joseph's supposed death (xlv. 30); as the youngest, the child of his old age, and the child of his beloved Rachel. Joseph's gifts to him exceeded far those to each of his elder brothers (xlviii. 34, xlv. 22). B. was only 23 or 24 years old when Jacob went down to Egypt. He clearly could not then have had ten sons already (xlv. 6-21), or eight sons and two grandsons (Num. xxvi. 38-40). It is plain that the list in Gen. xlv. includes those grandsons and great grandsons of Jacob born afterwards in Egypt, and who in the Israelite mode of thought came into Egypt "in the loins" of their fathers (comp. Heb. vii. 9, 10). Hence arises the correspondence in the main between the list given in connection with Jacob's descent to Egypt in Gen. xlv., and the list taken by Moses ages afterwards in Num. xxvi. B.'s sons, Becher, Gera, Rosh, are missing in Moses' list, because they either died childless, or did not leave a sufficient number of children to form independent families.

After the exodus the tribe was the smallest but one (Num. i. 1, 36, 37; 1 Sam. ix. 21; Ps. lxxvii. 27). On march it held the post between Manasseh and Ephraim, its brother tribes, W. of the tabernacle, which it followed (Ps. lxxx. 2) under its captain Abidan, son of Gideoni (Num. ii. 18-21). Palti, son of Rapha, was the spy representing it (xiii. 9). In the division of the land Elishah, son of Chislon, represented it (xxxix. 21). Its predominant characteristic of warlike tastes is foretold by Jacob

(Gen. xlv. 27); "B. shall ravin as a wolf, in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." How truly is attested by the war waged by them alone (and victoriously at first) against all the tribes, rather than give up the wicked men of Gibeah (Jud. xix., xx.; comp. Matt. xxvi. 52). Their number was reduced thereby to 600, who took refuge in the cliff Rimmon, and were provided with wives partly from Jabesh, partly from Shiloh (Jud. xxi.). The period of the judges must have been a long one to admit of the increase to B.'s subsequent large numbers (1 Chron. vii. 6-12, viii. xii. 1-8). The same determined spirit, but in a better cause, appears in their resisting Saul, their own kinsman's, appeal to them to betray David's movements (1 Sam. xxiii. 7-18). Moreover Ehud, judge and deliverer of Israel from Eglon of Moab, was of B.; also Saul and Jonathan, whose prowess was famed (3 Sam. i. 18, 19, 23). Also Baanah and Rechab, captains of marauding bands and murderers of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iv.). Archers and slingers, generally left handed (as also Ehud was), were the chief force of the "sons of Jacob's right hand" (Jud. iii. 15, etc., xx. 16; 1 Chron. xii. 2; 2 Chron. xiv. 8, xvii. 17). The "mornning" and "night" in Jacob's prophecy mark that B., as he was in the beginning, so he should continue to the end of the Jewish state. Similarly in Moses' prophecy (Deut. xxxiii. 12), "B., the beloved of the Lord (attached to David=beloved, after Saul's dynasty fell), shall dwell in safety by Him; the Lord shall cover him all the day long;" implying a longer continuance to B. than to the other tribes. So B. alone survived with Judah, after the deportation of the ten tribes to Assyria, and accompanied Judah to and from the Babylonian captivity, and lasted till Shiloh came and till Jerusalem was destroyed.

As on the march, so in the promised land, B.'s position was near that of Ephraim, between it on the N. and Judah on the S., a small but rich territory, advantageously placed in commanding the approach to the valley of the Jordan, and having Dan between it and the Philistines (Josh. xvii. 11, etc.); a parallelogram, 26 miles long, 12 broad, extending from the Jordan to the region of Kirjath Jearam, eight miles W. of Jerusalem, and from the valley of Hinnom S. to Bethel N.. When the Lord rejected the throne of Joseph at Shiloh, He chose mount Zion, Jerusalem, which chiefly belonged to B. (the city of the Jebusite, "Jebusi," which is Jerusalem) (Josh. xviii. 28), and all the land N. of the valley of Hinnom), and only in part to Judah, God's chosen tribe (Ps. lxxviii. 69, 67, 68). In this sense B. fulfilled Moses' prophecy in "dwelling between" Judah's (the Lord's representative) "shoulders," or ridges of the ravines which on the W., S., and E. environ the holy city. Primarily, however, the idea is, B. as "the beloved of Jehovah shall dwell in safety with him (lit. founded upon him), and he (Benjamin) shall dwell between His (Jehovah's) shoulders," as a son borne upon his father's back (Deut. i. 31, xxxvii. 11; Exod. xix. 4; Isa. xlv. 3, 4, lxiii. 9). This choice of Jerusalem as the seat of the ark and David's place of residence formed a strong tie between Judah and B. though Saul's connection with the latter had previously made the Benjaminites, as a tribe, slow to recognise David as king (1 Chron. xii. 20, 2 Sam. ii. 8, 9). Hence at the severance of the ten tribes B. remained with Judah (1 Kings xii. 23, 2 Chron. xi. 1). The two coalesced into one, under the common name Jews, whence they are called "one tribe" (1 Kings xi. 13, 32, xii. 20, 21). Moreover, a part of B. including Bethel, the seat of Jeroboam's calf worship, went with the ten tribes. Possibly Jeroboam's having appropriated it for the calf worship may have helped to alienate B. from him and attach B. to Judah. They two alone were the royal tribes. David was connected with Saul of B. by marriage with his daughter, and therefore, feeling the political importance of the connection, made it a preliminary of his league with Abner that Michal should be restored to him, though Phaltiel had her heart (2 Sam. iii. 13-16). Above all, what knit together B. and Judah most was the position fixed by God for the great national temple, which deprived Ephraim of its former glory (Ps. lxxviii. 60-68); not in Judah only, or in B. only, but on part of the confines of both, so that one text places it in Judah and the parallel text in B.; comp. Josh. xv. 63 with chap. xviii. 28. These elements of union between B. and Judah are not obviously put forward in the sacred writings, but are found in them on close observation, just such seeds as would produce the ultimate union which the history records. Such undesigned coincidences agree best with the belief that the narrative is minutely true, not forged.

B. occupied a plateau generally about 2000 feet above the Mediterranean plain, and 3000 above the valley of the Jordan. The hilly nature of the country is marked by the names

WATCHTOWER

Torrent beds and ravines are the only avenues from the Philistian and Sharon plains on the W., and from the deep Jordan valley on the E. These ravines were frequented once by many wild beasts, as the names of places testify: Zebham, "hyaenas" (1 Sam. xiii. 17, 18); Shual and Shualhim (Jud. i. 35), "foxes" or "jackals"; Ajalon, "gazelle." Up these western passes the Philistines advanced against Saul in the beginning of his reign, and drove him to Gilead in the Arabah, occupying from Michmash to Ajalon. Down them they were driven again by Saul and Jonathan. Joshua chased the Canaanites down the long slopes of Bethhoron. The regular road between Jericho and Jerusalem was another of these passes, the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan. Lod, Ono, Ajlun were westward extensions of B.'s bounds beyond the original limit (Neh. xi. 35).

The presence of the ark at Kirjath Jearim in B., the prophet Samuel's residence in the sanctuary Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17, ix. 12), the great assemblies of "all Israel" at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vi. 5), and the sanctuary attached of old to Bethel, "the great high place" at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 4, 2 Chron. i. 3), all tended to raise B. high in the nation, and to lead them to acquiesce in the choice of Saul as king, though belonging to "the smallest of the tribes of Israel" (1 Sam. ix. 21). After Saul's and then Ishbosheth's death, B. sent 3000 men to Hebron to confirm the kingdom to David (1 Chron. xii. 23, 29; 2 Sam. v. 3), Abner having declared for him. But the Benjamin's Shimei's curses and Sheba's rebellion indicate that Saul's party among the Benjamites, even after his dynasty had ceased, cherished the old grudge against David. Besides the causes mentioned before, which finally united B. and Judah, there was Jeroboam's setting up the calf worship in Bethel (a Benjamite city) in rivalry of the temple of Jehovah in the joint city of B. and Judah, Jerusalem (1 Kings xii. 29); also Rehoboam's wise policy in dispersing his children through all Judah and B., into every "fenced city" (2 Chron. xi. 12, 23); also Aza's covenant with Jehovah, in which B. took part (chap. xv.); also the advancement of Benjamites to high posts in the army (chap. xvi. 17). "The high gate of B." (Jer. xx. 2) marked the tribe's individuality even in the joint metropolis of B. and Judah; comp. Ezra ii. x, 9, Neh. viii., xi. 31-35 in proof of this individuality even after the return from Babylon. The genealogy of Kish and Saul, traced to a late date, brings us down to a Kish, father of Mordecai, the saviour of the Jewish nation from Haman's intended destruction (Esth. ii. 5). The royal name reappears in Saul of Tarsus, whose glory was that he belonged to "the tribe of B." (Rom. xi. 1, Phil. iii. 5.) His full sense of that honour appears in his reference to his forefather, "Saul the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of B." (Acts xxi. 21.) In his own person he realized some of the prominent characteristics of his tribe: fierce obstinacy when he was "exceedingly mad against Christians, and persecuted them even unto strange cities" (Acts xxvi. 11), equally persistent firmness when he declares, in spite of friends' entreaties, "I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi. 13). Thus B. had the distinction of producing one of Israel's first judges, her first king, and the great apostle of the uncircumcision.

2. A Benjamite, head of a family of valiant men; son of Bilhan (1 Chron.

- vii. 10). 3. One who married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 32).
- Beno. 1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27.
- Benzoheth. 1 Chron. iv. 20.
- Beon. Contracted from Baal Meon (Num. xxiii. 3, 33).
- Beor. 1. Father of BELA [see].
2. Father of BALAAM [see].
- Berachah. One of Saul's brethren, yet attached himself to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).
- Berachah (blessing), Valley of. Where Jehoshaphat and his people on the fourth day assembled to "bless" Jehovah for overthrowing the invading Ammonites, Moabites, Hagarenes, Edomites, and Amalekites who sought to "cut off Israel from being a nation" (Ps. lxxiii. 2, 2 Chron. xx. 26). Now Bereikith, in a valley between Tekua and the road from Bethlehem to Hebron. It is a broad, rich vale, watered with copious springs, affording space for a large multitude.
- Berachiah. 1 Chron. vi. 39. BERECHIAH (xv. 17).
- Beraiah. 1 Chron. viii. 21.
- Berea. A city of Macedonia, whither Paul withdrew, with Silas and Timothy, at his first visit to Europe, from Jewish persecution at Thessalonica, whence also, when the persecutors followed him from Thessalonica, he retired seawards to proceed to Athens (Acts xvii. 10-15). The Berean Jews were "more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word (preached) with all readiness of mind (not in a cavilling, critical spirit), and (yet not in a credulous spirit, for they) searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so." (See Isa. viii. 20, John v. 39, Gal. i. 8, 9.) The result was necessarily, "many believed; also of honorable women, which were Greeks, and of men not a few." Sopater, or Sosipater, one of them, became Paul's missionary companion (Acts xx. 4, Rom. xvi. 21) in returning to Asia from his second visit to Europe, where he had been with him at Corinth. Now Ferris, or Kara-verria, commanding a wide view of the plain of the Axios and Haliacmon; one of the most pleasant towns of Roumelia, with 20,000 inhabitants. One of the two roads from Thessalonica to B. passed by Pella. A road led from B. to Dium, whence probably Paul sailed to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind.
- Berechiah, Berechiahu (Heb.). 1. 1 Chron. iii. 20. 2. Neh. iii. 4, 30; vi. 18. 3. 1 Chron. ix. 16. 4. 1 Chron. xv. 23. 5. 2 Chron. xxviii. 12. 6. 2 Chron. i. 1. 7. Zech. i. 1, 7.
- Bered. 1. Near Beer-la-hai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14). Identified by some with Elusa. 2. Descendant of Ephraim, the same perhaps as BECHER [see] (Num. xxvi. 35, 1 Chron. vii. 20).
- Beri. 1 Chron. vii. 36.
- Beriah = in evil, or a gift. 1. Asher's son, from whom descended "the family of the Berites" (Gen. xlvii. 17, Num. xxvi. 44, 45).
2. A son of Ephraim, so called "because it went evil with Ephraim's house" at the time, the men of Gath "born in that land" (Goshen, or else the eastern part of Lower Egypt)

having slain his sons in a raid on cattle (1 Chron. vii. 20-23). If B. mean a "gift," he will be regarded as an extraordinary gift from God to Ephraim, now old, to stand "instead of" his sons whom he had lost; such was Seth (Gen. iv. 25 marg.). The incident perhaps belongs to the time, otherwise unnoticed, between Jacob's death and the Egyptian enslaving of his seed; for Ephraim's sons must, some of them, have been full grown and the Hebrews still free. The men of Gath were children of Philistine settlers in Goshen or the adjoining region. In Josh. xiii. 2, 3 the Sihor, or (Pelusiac branch of) the Nile, is the boundary between Egypt and Canaan; and in Gen. xli. 34 the pastoral population in Goshen being an "abomination to the Egyptians," Goshen must have been regarded as non-Egyptian, but a kind of border land between the two countries, Egypt and Canaan. The men of Gath may have been mercenaries in the Egyptian army, with lands allotted them in that quarter. The bloody attack of Simeon and Levi on Shechem (Gen. xxix. 25-29), and Pharaoh's fear lest in war the Israelites should join Egypt's foes and so get up out of the land (Exod. i.), show the possibility of their having been the aggressors, but as "come down" is more applicable to coming into than going from Egypt, probably the men of Gath were the aggressors. Translate therefore "when they came down." Keil thinks that "Ephraim" here is not the patriarch, but his descendant ages after bearing his name. Ezer and Elad his sons went down from mount Ephraim to Gath to carry off the Gittites' cattle and were slain in the attempt. Their father's sorrow for them was alleviated by the birth of B. This view is possible.

3. A Benjamite who, with Sbema, his brother, were ancestors of the inhabitants of Ajalon, and "drove away the inhabitants of Gath" (1 Chron. viii. 13). 4. A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11).

Berites, Berim. A clan mentioned with Abel and Beth-Maachah in N. Palestine, visited by Joab in pursuing Sheba, son of Bichri (2 Sam. xx. 14), "all the Berites." They followed him at his call.

Bernice, Berenice. Eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 1.) Married to her uncle Herod, king of Chaleis. Suspected after his death of intimacy with her own brother, Agrippa II., with whom she visited Festus, on his appointment as procurator of Judaea, and heard Paul's defence (Acts xxv. 13, 23; xxvi. 30). Next she was married to Polemon, king of Cilicia; but left him for her brother. Subsequently, she was mistress of Vespasian, then of Titus, who, when emperor, cast her off.

Berothah, Berothai. In Ezek. xlvii. 16 connected with Hamath and Damascus, as the northern boundary of the future inheritance of restored Israel. In 2 Sam. viii. 8 a city of Zobah, taken by David from Hadadezer. Possibly identical with Berytus, now the commercial mart Beyrût, called from the wells, Beeroth, still seen, bored in the rocks at Beyrût. In the parallel (1 Chron. xviii. 8. "Chun" is substituted. Near Beyrût are Assyrian tablets of a king (Shalmaneser), who overran Phœnicia. It is the traditional scene of the combat of St. George and the dragon.

Beryl. The first in the fourth row of precious stones in the highpriest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13), Heb. tarshish, the tartessus stone, found in Spain. Sea green, pale blue, yellow, and almost white, are its various colours. The colour of the cherubic wheels (Ezek. i. 16, x. 9). In Ezek. xxviii. 13 it is one of the Tyrian king's treasures, marg. chrysolite. Set in rings of gold (S. of Sol. v. 14); not as Smith's Bible Dictionary, "his wrists are circlets of gold full set with topazes," but the hands bent in are compared to beautiful rings in which beryl is set, as the nails are in the fingers. The body of the man seen in vision (Dan. x. 6) resembled it. In Rev. xxi. 19, 20, the city's eighth foundation, the chrysolite being the seventh. The aquamarine, according to Schleusner.

Besai. Ezra ii. 49, Neh. vii. 52.

Besodeiah. Neh. iii. 6.

Besor. THE BROOK = fresh, cool; a wady or torrent bed, S. of Ziklag, where David left 200 men so faint as not to be able to accompany him in pursuing the Amalekites into the desert whither they had withdrawn after burning Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21).

Betah. By inversion of letters, Tibhath (1 Chron. xviii. 8). Belonging to Hadadezer, king of Zobah. Spoiled by David of its "exceeding much brass" (2 Sam. viii. 8).

Beten. Josh. xix. 25. A city on the borders of Asher.

Beth: a fixed dwelling; as in Gen. xxxiii. 17, "Jacob built him an house," marking his settlement after wanderings (comp. 2 Sam. vii. 2-6). Then any dwelling, as a tent. Then a family. Also a temple.

"The garden house," Beth-haggan (2 Kings ix. 27), by way of which Abaziah fled; now Jenin, formerly EN-GANNIN, on the way from Samaria northward, overlooking the great plain.

Bethabara = house of a ford or passage (see Jud. vii. 24), where John was when he baptized Jesus (John i. 28; comp. 29, 30-35). The same as BETH-NIMRA [see], "the house of leopards," now Beyt-nemar. Thence Elijah ascended. The leopards having come back after their temporary ejection, during which the name Bethabara prevailed, the place resumed its original name. But perhaps the name means rather, "house of pure water." The Sm., Vat., and Alex., the three oldest MSS., read "Bethany," which also may mean "house of a ferryboat," i.e. a passage. Yet Origen prefers the reading Bethabara. Some explain Bethany = boathouse, virtually = Bethabara. Lieut. Conder places the B. of Judges at the traditional site, the pilgrims' bathing place near Kasr el Yahud, E. of Jericho, within easy reach of Jerusalem. But he shows there is an objection to placing B. so far S., for Christ's baptism. A site is required within 30 miles of Cana of Galilee; for (John i. 43) "the day following (the events at B., ver. 23-36) Jesus would go forth into Galilee," and on the third day (John ii) was in Cana. Now just one mile N. of wady Jalud, two days journey from Nazareth and Cana (25 miles), is Mukhadhet Abara, "the ford of crossing over." The great road on the N. side of wady Jalud to Gilead and S. Hauran passes over by it. The nearness to Galilee, and the openness of the sides of the river here, leaving a broader space for the crowd seeking baptism, favour the view. The name B. might probably belong to more points than one where Jordan is forded.

Bethanath. A fenced city of Naphthali (Josh. xix. 38), whence the Canaanites were not expelled (Jud. i. 33).

Beth-anoth. Josh. xv. 59. Now Hanin (Conder, Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., April, 1876).

Bethany = house of dates [see BETH-ANARA], though dates have long disappeared from the locality, and only olives and figs remain (whence Olivet and Bethphage are named).

BETHANY.

B. is not mentioned till the N. T. time, which agrees with the Chaldee hinee being the word used for "dates" in the composition of the name, Beth-any. Associated with the closing days of the Lord Jesus, the home of the family whom He loved, Mary, Martha, and Lazarus; where He raised Lazarus from the dead; whence He made His triumphal entry into Jerusalem; His nightly abode each of the six nights preceding His betrayal; where at the house of Simon the leper He was anointed by Mary (Mark xiv. 3); and where, most of all, we are introduced to the home circle of His private life. In John xi. 1 His arrival at B. is recorded, viz. in the evening. The sending of the two disciples for the colt was evidently on the following morning, to allow time for the many events of the day of His triumphal entry and visiting the temple, after which it was "eventide" (ver. 11), which coincides with John's (xii. 12) direct assertion, "the next day"; at the eventide of the day of triumphal entry He "went out unto B. with the twelve." His second day of lodging there. On the morrow, in coming from B. He cursed the figtree (ver. 12, 13), cast out the money changers from the temple, and at "even" "went out of the city" (ver. 19), looking at B. for the third time, according to Mark. "In the morning" they proceeded by the same route as before (as appears from their seeing the dried up fig-tree), and therefore from B. to Jerusalem (ver. 27, xii. 41) and the temple, where He spoke parables and answered cavils, and then "went out of the temple" (xiii. 1), to return again to B., as appears from His speaking with Peter, James, John, and Andrew privately "upon the mount of Olives" (ver. 3), on the S.E. slope of which B. lies, 15 stadia or less than two miles from Jerusalem (John xi. 18), the fourth day, according to Mark, who adds, "after two days was the feast of the passover" (xiv. 1). Thus Mark completes the six days, coinciding (with that absence of design which establishes truth) exactly with John, "Jesus six days before the passover came to B." (xii. 1.) Though John does not directly say that Jesus went in the evenings to B., yet he incidentally implies it, for he says, "they made Him a supper" at B., i.e. an evening meal (xii. 2).

The anointing by Mary, introduced by Mark, after mention of the chief priests' plot "two days" before the passover, is not in chronological order, for it was six days before the passover (John xii.), but stands here parenthetically, to account for Judas' spite against Jesus. Judas "promised and sought opportunity to betray Him unto them in the absence of the multitude" (Luke xxii. 6); Matthew (xxvi. 5) similarly represents the chief priests, in compassing His death, as saying, "Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people." Jesus therefore in the day could clear the temple of the moneychangers, but at night He was exposed to stratagem; so the very first night that He did not retire to B., but remained in Jerusalem, He was seized. It is striking how God's ordering brought about the offering of the true Paschal Lamb on the feast day, though the opposite was intended by the Jewish rulers. From the vicinity of B., on the wooded slopes beyond the ridge of Olivet, He ascended to heaven, still seen to the moment of His being parted from His disciples, and carried up from their "steadfast gaze," blessing them with uplifted hands (Luke xxiv. 50, 51; Acts i. 9-12).

B. was "at" the mount of Olives (Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 1, 20), near the usual road from Jericho to Jerusalem (Mark x. 46, xi. 1), close to Bethphage = the house of figs, frequently named with it. Now el-Azariyeh, named so from Lazarus; on the E. of the mount of Olives, a mile beyond the summit, near the point at which the road to Jericho makes a sudden descent towards the Jordan valley; a hollow, wooded with olives, almonds, pomegranates, oaks, and carobs; lying below a secondary ridge which shuts out the view of the summit of Olivet. The village is a miserable one, of some 20 families of thriftless inhabitants. The house and tomb of Lazarus, and the house of Simon the leper, exhibited here, are of very doubtful genuineness.

Beth-Arabah. Josh. xv. 6, 61. One of the six cities of Judah, situated in the Arabah or sunken valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; between Bethhoglah and the high land on the W. included in Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 22).

Betharam. A town of Gad, E. of Jordan (Josh. xiii. 27). Same as Betharan (Num. xxxii. 36); ages later named Libias or Livias, from the emperor Augustus' wife, Livia. In the wady Seir, which falls into the Ghor, opposite Jericho.

Betharbel = house of the snare (or ambush of God). Scene of the sack and massacre by Sialmaneser at his first invasion (2 Kings xvii. 3, Hos. x. 14). "As Sialman spoiled B. in the day of battle: the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children." Perhaps identical with the stronghold Arbela in Galilee. Jerome curiously refers "Sialman" to "Zalmunna," and B. = the house of him whom Judah judged Baal, i.e. Jerubbaal (Jud. viii.). Now Irbid, a ruin S.W. of the sea of Galilee, N. of Tiberias, remarkable for its caves, hard to approach and still more to storm. Hence the resort of robbers. When they turned Bethel (the house of God) into Bethaven (the house of vanity), then it became Betharbel (the house of ambush of God), the scene and occasion of their desolation (Pusey).

Bethaven = house of nothingness or vanity. On the mountains of Benjamin, E. of Bethel (Josh. vii. 2, xviii. 12), between it and Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 5, xiv. 23). Near it was the "wilderness," i.e. pasture land "of B." (Josh. xviii. 12.) In Hos. iv. 15, v. 1, x. 5 Bethel, "house of God," is called Bethaven, "house of vanity," because of Jeroboam's golden calf.

Bethazmaveth. Neh. vii. 28. [See AZMAVETH.] Possibly Hizmech, S.E. of Jesho, on the Benjaminite hills.

Beth Baal Meon. [See BAALMEON.] On the downs or "plain" E. of Jordan (Josh. xiii. 17), in Reuben. Contracted into Beon (Num. xxxii. 3, 38). Bethmeon in Jer. xlviii. 23. Now the ruin called "the fortress of Mian," S.W. of Hesbon, in the wady Zerka Ma'in.

Bethbarah = house of the passage (Jud. vii. 24). The point to which Ephraim took, before the Midianites, "the waters" (the streams wady Maleh, Fyadh, Jamel, Tubas, etc., descending from the E. side of the highlands of Ephraim towards the Jordan, and flowing through the Ghor to B.). Possibly, though not probably, identical with BETHABARA [see] where John baptized. Ephraim's intercepting of Midian was probably not so far S. as Bethabara, whether people flocked from Judaea, Jerusalem, and the "region round about." Grove supposes B. to be the ford Jacob crossed in returning from Mesopotamia, and at which Jephthah slew the Ephraimites.

Beth-birei. A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 31), answering to Bethlebaath in Josh. xix. 6, xv. 32, in the extreme S. of Judah.

Bethcar = house of lambs. The point W. from Mizpeh to which Israel pursued the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 11) "under B.," i.e. to the spot beneath, B. being on a height. Here the stone Ebenezer was set up, to mark how far the rout of the Philistines extended.

Beth Dagon. 1. A town in the plain (shephelah) of Judah. 2. A town on the border of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). The name, implying the presence of a house to Dagon, the Philistine idol, shows how this worship extended itself beyond the Philistine territory, probably during the time of the Philistine overrunning of the Israelites' land W. of the Jordan from Michmash on the S. to Gilboa on the N., the latter retiring to Gad and Gilead (1 Sam. xiii. 5-7, 17, 18; xxix. 1; xxxi. 1).

Beth-diblathaim = house of double cake of figs. Same as ALMON-DIBLATHAIM [see] (Jer. xlviii. 22).

Bethel = house of God. 1. Abram pitched his tent on a mountain E. of B., abounding in pasture (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3). The city, near the place, then bore the Canaanite name Luz. B. is the name given by anticipation to the place; appropriately so, as Abram virtually made it the "house of God." It was expressly so named by Jacob, when he had the vision of the heavenly ladder, on his way from his father at Beersheba to Haran (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxxi. 13). He set up a pillar, and anointed it with oil, to mark the place where God spake with him. B., the place, is expressly distinguished from Luz, the old Canaanite city. "Jacob called the name of that place B., but the name of that city was called Luz at the first" (Josh. xvi. 1, 2). The naming of B. by Jacob repeated more publicly on his return home, 20 years later, with his family purified of idols, when God again appeared to him, and confirmed his change of name to Israel (Gen. xxxv. 1-15, xxxii. 28). B. belonged by lot to Benjamin, but was taken by Ephraim (B. being on his southern border), through the treachery of an inhabitant (Jud. i. 22-26). It was about 12 miles N. of Jerusalem. In Jud. xx. 26 translate for "the house of God" B. During the civil war with Benjamin the tribes took the ark thither to consult God (comp. 1 Sam. x. 3). It was one of Samuel's towns of circuit for judging (1 Sam. vii. 16). One of Jeroboam's two sanctuaries for the calf worship, selected doubtless because of its religious associations (1 Kings xii. xiii.). There the prophet from Judah foretold the overthrow of the calf altar by Josiah. Abijah, king of Judah, took B. from Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 19), but it was soon recovered by Israel. Under Ahab the Baal worship at Samaria and Jezreel drew off attention from the calf worship at B. This accounts for a school of prophets of Jehovah being there in Elijah's time (2 Kings ii. 2, 3). The existence of "bears," two, near the town, implies that B. was then less frequented (ii. 23-25). Under Jehu, who restored the calf worship, and Jeroboam II. his great grandson, B. comes again into prominence (2 Kings x. 29). B. became "the king's chapel" (sanctuary) "the king's court" (house of the kingdom) (Amos vii. 13, iii. 14, 15). More altars, besides the original one, were erected. "Summer and winter houses" too, and "great houses" and "houses of ivory." After the overthrow of Israel, the king of Assyria sent one of the Israelite priests to settle at B., and teach the new settlers from Babylon, Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, "the manner of the god of the land," and "how they should fear Jezebel" (2 Kings xvii. 27, 28). Josiah, as foretold, defiled the altar with dead men's bones, but disturbed not the sepulchre of the prophet of Judah when he discerned its title. It was ordered by God that the votaries of the calf worship at B. never dared to violate the sepulchre and title of the prophet who denounced their idol. The worship of Jehovah and of the calves had been all along strangely blended [see BETHAVEN]. Among those returning from captivity were men of B. (Ezra ii. 28, Neh. vii. 32, xi. 31). The ruins, covering three or four acres, still bear a like name, Beitin, on a low hill, between two wadies, which unite in the main valley of es-Sureinit, toward the S.E. B. still abounds in stones such as Jacob used for his pillow, and afterwards for a sanctuary. On the round mount S.E. of B. Abram doubtless built the altar, and afterwards stood with Lot when giving him his choice of the land (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 10). E. of this mount stands the ruin Tel er Rijmah, "the mound of the heap," answering to Ai or Hai. Ritter makes Medinet Gai answer to Ai. 2. A town in southern Judah (Josh. xii. 16, 1 Sam. xxx. 27). B. in Josh. xix. 4 answers to Chesil in xv. 30. Bethuel, 1 Chron. iv. 30. Hiel of B. rebuilt Jericho under the curse (1 Kings xvi. 34).

Bethemek. Josh. xix. 27. On the border of Asher, S. of the valley of Jiphthahel.

Bether. S. of Sol. ii. 17. Perhaps Bithron, separated from the main part of Palestine by Jordan (2 Sam. ii. 29), a ravine district, through "all" of which Abner passed, on the N. of the Jabbok, between the Jordan and Mahanaim. It means a cutting. Spiritually "the mountains of Bether" mean mountains of division (marg.), or mountains intersected with deep valleys, separating the bride from the heavenly Bridegroom.

Bethesda = house of mercy. A water reservoir, or swimming pool (as John v. 2, kolumbethra, means), with five porches, or colonnades, close to the sheep gate (Neh. iii. 1) in Jerusalem. The porches accommodated those waiting for the troubling of the waters. The 4th ver., as to the angel troubling the water, is omitted in the Vat. and Sin. MSS., but is found in the Alex., and ver. 7 favours it. The angels, in a way unknown to us, doubtless act as God's ministers in the world of nature. Many curative agencies are directed by them (Ps. civ. 4). God maketh His angelic messengers the directing powers, acting by the winds and flaming lightning. The angelic actings, limited and fitful, attested at that time that God was visiting His people, throwing into the brighter prominence at the same time the actings of the Divine Son (comp. Heb. i.), who healed not merely one exceptionally but all who came to Him, whatever might be their disease, and instantaneously. Now Birket Israil, within the walls, close by St. Stephen's gate, under the N.E. wall of the Haram area. Eusebius, in the 3rd century, describes it as consisting of two pools and named Bezatha, answering to the N.E. suburb Bezetha in the gospel times. Robinson suggested that "the pool of the Virgin" may answer to "the pool of B.," "the king's pool" in Nehemiah. Ganneau identifies with the church of St. Anne, mother of Mary, Beit Hanna, really = B., "house of grace."

Bethazel = house of firmness. Situated probably in the shephelah or low hilly land of Judah, near Zaanan or Zenan (Josh. xv. 37). Though B. means the house on the side, i.e. near Zaanan, it got no comfort from Zaanan's inhabitants in its mourning (Mic. i. 11). There was an Azal near Jerusalem (Zech. xiv. 5) [see ZAAANAN].

Bethgader. A place (Josh. xii. 13, Geder), 1 Chron. ii. 51, occupied by Caleb's descendants.

Bethgamul = house of the weaned, else of the camel. A town of Moab, in the mishor or downs E. of Jordan (Jer. xlviii. 23, 21). Probably now Um el Jemal, "mother of a camel," one of the heretofore deserted cities of the Hauran [see BASHAN]. A good sample of an unwalled town, with large open spaces and broad streets, one 150 ft. wide, the houses of stone, the finest E. of Jordan.

Bethhaccerem = house of the vineyard (Jer. vi. 1). S. of Jerusalem, near Tekoa, on an eminence suitable for a fire signal. The ruler of the region round B. helped Nehemiah (iii. 14) in rebuilding the Jerusalem wall. The so called Frank mountain (Herodium) probably now corresponds to it. Herod's residence is supposed to have been here; its nearness to Bethlehem, the scene of his massacre of the innocents, well accords with this.

Beth-haran. A fenced city, E. of Jordan, built by the Gadites (Num. xxxii. 36). The same as Beth-aram (Josh. xiii. 27).

Beth-hoglah = house of partridge (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 19, 21). In Benjamin, on the border of Judah. The Ain Hagla, "font of Hoglah," on the road from Jericho, near the Jordan, marks the site.

Bethhoron = house of caverns. Two towns, the upper and the nether, separated half an hour's journey; now Beit ur tahta and Beit ur el foka. On the road from Gibeon (now el Jib) to Azekah and the Philistine plain (Josh. x. 10, 11; xvi. 3, 5; xviii. 13, 14), on the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim, but counted to the latter and given to the Kohathites (xvi. 22). Sherah, a granddaughter or descendant of Ephraim, built (i.e. enlarged and fortified) both the upper and nether B., and was of the family whence sprang Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 24, 27). [See SHERAH and UZZEN-SHERAH.] Here Joshua conquered the five kings of the Amorites. On the mountain S. of the nether village (Ajalon) over which the sun stood still there remains still the name Falo. From Gibeon to upper B. is a distance of four miles, partly descent, but mainly ascent; hence it is called the "going up" to B. (Josh. x. 10, 11), but in the second stage of Joshua's pursuit it is the "going down to B.," the descent beginning from the upper village toward the lower one. This has been for ages the road of communication for heavy baggage between Jerusalem and the Philistine sea coast; it goes W. to Gimzo (Jimzu) and Lydda (Lidd), where it parts into three, the N. to Capharsaba (Antipatris), the S. to Gaza, and the W. to Joppa (Jaffa). Hence, as the route is key to a large part of the country, Solomon fortified both villages (2 Chron. viii. 5). Still great foundation stones are visible.

Beth-jeshimoth = house of the wastes. A town E. of Jordan in the "deserts" of Moab; last but one of the stations in Israel's journeys in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 49). Originally belonging to Sihon's kingdom; assigned to Reuben (Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20); afterwards it became "the glory" of Moab (Ezek. xxv. 9). According to Eusebius, ten miles S. from opposite Jericho, on the Dead Sea.

Bethlebaath = house of loresses. A town in Simon's lot (Josh. xiv. 6, xv. 32) in the far S. of Judah. In 1 Chron. iv. 31 BETH-UREI.

Bethlehem = house of bread, i.e. in a fertile region. Two hours journey, in a southward or rather south-westerly direction from Jerusalem, by the Jaffa gate. Existing at the time of Jacob's return to Palestine; originally called Ephrath or Ephratah, i.e. fruitful (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xlviii. 7; Ps. cxxii. 6). Hur and Salma, Hur's son, both have the title "father of Bethlehem" (1 Chron. ii. 51, iv. 4). Hur is the father of Uri, father of Bezalel (ii. 20, Exod. xxxi. 2, 11). Tradition made Jesse "a weaver of the veils of the sanctuary"; and as trades are hereditary in the E. he may have inherited the embroidery skill of his grandfather when Moses employed for the tabernacle as being "filled with the spirit of God" (Exod. xxv. 35). Hence appears the appropriateness of the allusions to the "weaver's beam" in representing the spears of giants slain by David and his heroes. After the conquest of Canaan it bears the name Bethlehem Judah; distinguishing it from B. in Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15, 16; now Beth-lahm, six miles W. of Nazareth). It was occupied once by a Philistine garrison, when David desired a draught from the well by the gate, so familiar to his childhood (2 Sam. xxii. 11, 15; 1 Chron. xi. 15-19). The Levite Jonathan, son of Gershom, who became the Danites' priest at their northern settlement, and the Levite's concubine whose cruel death at Gibeah caused the destruction of Benjamin, came from H. (Jud. xvii. 7, xviii. 30, xix. 9.) The connection of B. with Moab appears in the book of Ruth. Hence the undesigned propriety appears of David, Ruth's descendant, choosing the king of Moab's house at Mizpah as the safest retreat for his parents, when he was outlawed by Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4). B. was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 6). In Jeremiah's time (xli. 17) the caravanserai of Chimham near B. (see 2 Sam. xix. 37-40) was the usual starting place for Egypt. The inn (kataluma) mentioned in Luke ii. was a similar one, and possibly the same. At the return from Babylon, 123 "children of B." accompanied Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 21, Neh. vii. 26).

B. is called the "city of David" (Luke ii. 4), but the "town (Gr. village) where David was" in John vii. 42. Now Beitlahm, "the house of flesh," Solomon's pools and "gardens" (Eccles. ii. 5) lay S. of B. Thekon, built (fortified) by Rehoboam, lay S.E., the place of Amos' (i. 1) birth (vii. 10-15). S.W. is the valley of Sennacherib's overthrow. N.E. is the traditional scene of the angels' vision to the shepherds; but the hills were more likely to have been the scene of the flocks being kept than the corn abounding valley. Dr. Clarke identified a well of pure water here with that which David thirsted for; but the traditional site is a group of three cisterns half a mile away on the other side of the wady on the N., and Robinson denies the existence of any well of living water in or near the town (2 Sam. xxiii. 15-18). B. is now a village with one chief street, and population (wholly Christian) of 3000.

BETHLEHEM.

The slopes outside abound in figs, vines, almonds and olives. The Church of the Nativity at the N. side was originally built by the empress Helena over the Lord's presumed birthplace; Justin Martyr in the 2nd century said that our Lord's birth took place in a cave close to the village. Justinian erected a more sumptuous church, with grey limestone columns and a lofty roof of cedar wood; but the present roof is of English oak, presented by Edward IV. The grotto of the nativity is beneath a crypt, 39 feet long, 11 broad, 9 high, hewn out of the rock and lined with marble. A rich altar is over the supposed site of the Saviour's birth, and a star of silver inlaid in white marble, with the inscription "Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est." A manger too is there of white marble (Luke ii. 12). Jerome's sepulchre is near; B. being where he lived for 30 years, and diligently studied the Hebrew Scriptures to prepare the Vulgate translation.

In Mic. v. 2, "Thou B. Ephratah, (though) thou be little among the thousands of Judah, (yet) out of thee shall He come forth unto Me (that is) to be ruler in Israel" seems to contradict Matt. ii. 6, "Thou art not the least among the princes of Juda." Really, Matthew by independent inspiration unfolds further Micah's prophecy. For "Ephratah," now become obsolete, he substitutes "in the land of Juda"; furthermore he implies, "though thou art little in a worldly point of view, thou art the reverse of least among Juda's princes, in the spiritual glory of being Messiah's birthplace" (1 Cor. i. 27, 28). The low state of David's line when Messiah was born is also implied in Micah (Isa. liii. 2).

Beth-Maachah. 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15. [See MAACHAH and MAACAH.] Bethmareaboth = house of the chariots. A town of Simeon, in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xix. 5, 1 Chron. iv. 31). Depots or stations of chariots were required in Solomon's reign, when a regular trade in them was carried on with Egypt (1 Kings ix. 19). As Madmannah appears instead of B. in the list Josh. xv. 30, 31, possibly B. was substituted for Madmannah in ix. 5, in Solomon's times.

Bethnimrah = house of sweet water, or of leopards [see BETHABARA]. A Gadite "fenced city" E. of Jordan, "in the valley" beside Bethanin (Num. xxxii. 3, 36; Josh. xiii. 27). The Arabs call the lower end of the wady Shoaib Nahr nimrin. The wady Shoaib (possibly the modern form of Hobaib) discharges its waters into the Jordan near a ford above Jericho. By tradition makes Israel to have descended to the Jordan. The LXX. reads Bethanabra, almost identical with Bethabara. That this is the scene of John i. 28, Mark i. 5, Matt. iii. 5, appears from there being abundant water, and its being near "the region round about Jordan," the CICCAR of the O. T., the oasis of Jericho, necessary to "Jerusalem and all Judaea." But see for Conder's view BETHABARA.

Bethpalet = house of flight. A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 27, Neh. xi. 26).

Bethpazzez. A town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21).

Bethpeor. A sanctuary of Baal Peor, E. of Jordan, over against Jericho; in Reuben's possession, Josh. xiii. 20. One of Israel's last halting places is called "the valley over against Baal-peor" (Deut. iii. 29, iv. 46). Here Moses was buried (xxxiv. 6).

Bethphage = house of unripe figs; testifying the former fertility which no longer remains; a village on the mount of Olives, on the road between Jericho and Jerusalem. Close to Bethany, E. of it, since B. stands first in describing a journey from E. to W. The traditional site is above Bethany, between it and the mountain's top. Schwarz places it W. of Bethany, on the S. shoulder of the mount, above Siloam. Here the colt for Jesus' triumphal entry was found (Matt. xxi. 1, etc.). The Talmud made B. a district extending from Olivet to the Jerusalem walls. Others allege the sacrificial victims were kept there; this would give significance to its being the point whence the antitypical sacrifice proceeded to Jerusalem.

Bethrapha. (1 Chron. iv. 12.) Son of Eshton in the genealogy of Judah.

Bethrehab=house of Rechob, or room. A place near the valley containing the town Laish or Dan (Jud. xviii. 28). The modern Hunin, a fortress commanding the plain Huleh in which the city of Dan (Tell el Kady) was. One of Aram's (Syria's) little kingdoms, like Zobah, Maacah, Ishtob; hired by Ammon against David (2 Sam. x. 6, 8). Shortened into Rechob (Num. xiii. 21). Being "far from Zidon," it is distinct from the Rehob in Asher, which is not very far from Zidon. Hadadezer king of Zobah was son of Rehob (2 Sam. vii.)

Bethsaida=house of fish. A city of Galilee, W. of and close to the sea of Tiberias, in the land of Gennesareth (Mark vi. 45-53; John vi. 16, 17, i. 44, xii. 21). Andrew, Peter, and Philip belonged to it. Near Capernaum and Chorazin (Matt. xi. 21, Luke x. 13). When Jesus fed the 5000 on the N.E. of the lake, they entered into a boat to cross to B. (Mark vi. 45), while John says "they went over the sea toward Capernaum." Being driven out of their course, Jesus came to them walking on the sea; they landed in Gennesareth and went to Capernaum; so that B. must have been near Capernaum. In Luke ix. 10-17 another Bethsaida, at the scene of feeding the 5000, is mentioned (though the Curetonian Syriac and later Sinaitic omit it), which must have been therefore N.E. of the lake; the same as Julius, called from the emperor's daughter Julia. The miracle was wrought in a lonely "desert place," on a rising ground at the back of the town, covered with much "green grass" (Mark vi. 39). In Mark viii. 10-22 a B. on the E. side of the lake in Gaulonitis (now Jaulan) is alluded to; for Jesus passed by ship from Dalmanutha on the W. side "to the other side," i.e. to the E. side. Thus Caesarea Philippi is mentioned presently after, B. being on the road to it; and the mount of the transfiguration, part of the Hermon range, above the source of the Jordan (chap. ix. 2, 3); the snow of Hermon suggested the image, "His raiment became white as snow."

Bethshean, Bethshan=house of quiet, now Beisan. A city of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 29), though within Issachar's boundary; 11 miles S. of the sea of Galilee, 4 miles W. of and on the height over the Ghor or valley of the Jordan, connected with the great plain of Jezreel, Esdraelon (Josh. xvii. 11). The Canaanites were not driven out thence (Jud. i. 27). One of Solomon's commissariat districts was named from it, extending thence to Abel-meholah (1 Kings iv. 12). Except its temporary subjection in his reign, it kept a kind of independence of Israel, holding close relations with the Phoenicians on the N. and the Philistines on the S. Hence the latter fastened Saul's body to the wall of B., and put his armour in the house of Asharoath (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12). The men of Jabesh Gilead stole the bones of Saul and Jonathan and Saul's other two sons from the wall in "the street" or open space before the gate of B. (2 Sam. xxi. 12.) In 1 Sam. xxxi. I translate "the Israelites pitched [before the fatal battle at Gilboa], by THE fountain in Jezreel." Close to B. is the water of Ain Jalud, of which "the fountain is in Jezreel." The abundant supply of water, and the level country favouring the use of chariots, were the secondary causes which enabled the Canaanites to keep hold of B. against Israel. Robinson places Jabesh Gilead at Ed Deir; so the distance to B. which "the valiant men of Jabesh Gilead" took "all night" to traverse was 20 miles. The ruins are of a heathen character, and occupy a space three miles in circumference.

Bethshemesh=house of the sun. 1. A town on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), itself low in situation. A "valley" of wheat fields is mentioned accordingly as high (1 Sam. vi. 13). Now Ain Sheas, on the N.W. slopes of the mountains of Judah, "a low plateau at the junction of two fine plains" (Robinson), two miles from the Philistian plain, and seven from Ekron. From the latter was the road to B., on which the Philistines sent back the ark to Israel after its fatal stay among them. In the field of Joshua the Bethshemite was "the great Abel" (the LXX. reads Aben "stone"; others retaining Abel explain it "the stone of mourning," comp. ver. 12) whereon the ark was set (1 Sam. vi. 18). Providence fitly arranged that B. being a priests' city (Josh. xxi. 16, 1 Chron. vi. 39) had Levites and priests ready on the spot duly to receive the ark and sacrifice before it. Curiosity tempted many to stare at (not necessarily "into") the ark beneath the cover; comp. Num. iv. 20, 2 Sam. vi. 6, 7. So God smote in the proportion of 50 out of the 1000, i.e. one twentieth instead of one tenth of the population, as sometimes; seventy men in all, out of the population of B., which amounted to 1100 in this view. The numbers in the English Bible are evidently a mistake (1 Sam. vi. 19). Josephus (Ant. vi. 4) makes it only 70. It was one of Solomon's commissariat districts under Beulekar (marg. 1 Kings iv. 9). Here Joash king of Israel encountered and made prisoner of Amaziah of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 11-13, 2 Chron. xxv. 21-23). In Abaz' reign the Philistines occupied B. (2 Chron. xxviii. 18.) Ir-shemesh was the older name (comp. Josh. xv. 10, xix. 41, 43; 1 Kings iv. 9). Harcheres, "mount of the sun," was another name for B. (Jud. i. 35)

2. A city on Issachar's border (Josh. xix. 22). 3. A fenced city of Naphthali (Josh. xix. 38, Jud. i. 33). The inhabitants were not expelled, but became Israel's tributaries. 4. An idol sanctuary in Egypt (Jer. xlii. 13), the Greek Heliopolis, Egyptian On, E. of the Nile, a few miles N. of Memphis (Gen. xli. 45). The statue in honour of the sun rose to 60 cubits, the base was 10, above there was a mitre a thousand pounds weight. These many towns of the name show how widespread the worship of the sun had been.

Bethshitta=house of the acacia: whither the Midianites fled after their overthrow by Gideon (Jud. vii. 22). Near to the Jordan in Zererah, probably Zerelath or Zartan.

Bethtappua=house of the citron or apple. A town in the hilly part of Judah (Josh. xv. 46, 53; 1 Chron. ii. 43, where Tappuah is the son of Hebron). Now Tefuh, five miles W. of Hebron. The terraces still are there, and olives, vines, and grain, but no apples or citrons.

Bethuel. "The Syrian" (Aramite). 1. Nahor's son by Milcay, nephew of Abraham, father of Rebekah (Gen. xxii. 22, 23; xxiv. 15, 24, 47; xxvii. 2). B. appears personally only in Gen. xxiv. 50, and then after his son. Blunt (Undesigned Coincidences) notices B.'s consistent insignificance in the whole affair of his daughter's marriage. When Abraham's servant at the well asks Rebekah, "Is there room in thy father's house for us?" she "ran and told them of her mother's house" (not of her father's, as Rachel did when Jacob introduced himself: Gen. xxix. 12). Laban her brother ran out and invited him in, not B., the natural person to do it. The servant makes presents of jewels and precious things to Rebekah, "and to her brother, and to her mother," but not to B. The brother and mother propose her abiding a few days before going. Finally, in the next generation, Rebekah's son, in inquiring after his kindred, asks, "Know ye Laban, the son of Nahor?" the father's name being omitted and the grandfather's substituted (Gen. xxix. 5). The consistency of omission is too marked to be accidental, and yet such as a forger would never have devised. B. was probably incapable, from age or imbecility, of managing his own affairs; but see LABAN. 2. A place [see BETHUL] (1 Chron. iv. 30).

Bethul. A town of Simeon in the S. (Josh. xix. 4) answering to CHESIL in xv. 30; also the southern Bethel (xii. 16), not the northern Bethel.

Bethzur=house of rock. One of Judah's strongest fortresses in the mountains of Judah, between Halhul and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). Maon, sprung from Hebron, was the father, i.e. founder, of B. It was fortified by Rehoboam as a stronghold of his new kingdom (2 Chron. xi. 7). The people of B. helped Nohemiah (iii. 16) to rebuild the wall of Jeruzalem. A district was attached to it, half of which Nehemiah, son of Azbuk, was ruler over. Now Betsar, commanding the road from Beer-sheva and Hebron, the main way to Jerusalem from the S. The adjoining spring traditions made the scene of the church's baptism by Philip. The fact of its not being near the road to Gaza makes this doubtful (Acts viii. 26, 36).

Betonim = pistachio nuts. A town on the N. boundary of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26).

Boulah = married. Israel's future name when restored to her Divine Husband, Protector, and Lord (Isa. xlii. 4, comp. lvi. 4-6).

Cozai. Ezra ii. 17; Neh. viii. 23, x. 18.

Bezaleel = under the shadow (i.e. protection) of God. 1. Son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, filled with the Spirit of God to work all manner of workmanship in metal, wood, and stone for the tabernacle (Exod. xxxi. 1-6), as Aholab wrought in textile fabrics. B. was the principal, Aholab the subordinate (xxvii. 1, 2, xxxviii. 22, xxxviii. xxxviii.). Hur was the offspring of Caleb and Ephraim, and one of his descendants was Salmon, or Salmah, figuratively "father of Bethlehem," actually father of Boaz, and progenitor of the royal house of David of Bethlehem (1 Chron. ii. 19, 50, 51, 54; Ruth iv. 20, 21). 2. Son of Paltiath Mosab, who took a foreign wife (Ezra x. 30).

Bezok. 1. ADONI-BEZOK'S [see] residence, in Judah's lot (Jud. i. 3-5). Now Bet-za, S. of Jerusalem, or else Bezik on the road from Nablus to Beisan. 2. Where Saul numbered the national forces before relieving Jabesh Gilead from Ammon (1 Sam. xi. 8); somewhere near the Jordan valley, within marching distance from Jabesh, 17 miles from Shechem, on the road to Bethshan.

Bezer in the wilderness. 1. A Reubenite city with suburbs, in the nishor or downs. One of the three cities of refuge E. of Jordan, allotted to the family of Merari (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xi. 8, xxi. 36). 2. 1 Chron. vii. 37.

Bible. THE Book by preeminence. "Next to God the Word," says Fuller (Pisgah Sight), "I love the word of God. I profess myself a pure low-dler, desiring that all human conceits, though built on specious bottoms, may be laid flat, if opposing the written word." The term "Bible," though dating only from the 5th century in its sacred and exclusive use, is virtually expressed in the designations occurring in itself: "The Scripture" (John x. 35, xx. 9; Rom. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 20); "the Book" (Ps. xl. 7, sepher); "the Scripture (kethub) of truth" (Dan. x. 21). The books composing it are not isolated, but form together an organic unity, one whole made up of mutually related parts, progressively advancing to the one grand end, the restoration of the fallen creature through the love and righteousness of our God. The Lord comprehends and stamps with Divine sanction the whole O. T., under the threefold division recognised by the Jews, "the law, the prophets, and the psalms" (including all the holy writings not included in the other two, viz. the hagiographa) (Luke xxiv. 44).

The Torah, or law, is mentioned as a book (including the five books of the Pentateuch) (Josh. i. 8, viii. 31-35, xxiv. 26). The Heb. names of the five books of the Pentateuch are taken from the initial words of the several books. The names we use are from the Gr. LXX.: "Genesis" (creation) answering to bereshith ("in the beginning"). And so the rest: Exodus (Israel's departure from Egypt) answering to veeleh shemoth ("and these are the names"), etc. "The prophets" comprise the former (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings), and the latter, comprising the greater (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) and the less (the twelve minor prophets). The including of histories among the prophets arose from the fact that they were the inspired productions of such prophetic men as Samuel, Gad the seer of David (1 Chron. xxix. 29), Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo (2 Chron. ix. 29). The schools of the prophets trained such men as Isaiah for the office of historian (2 Chron. xxvi. 22, xxvii. 32). Daniel is not included among the prophets, because he did not hold the prophet's office among the chosen people. The hagiographa, or "sacred writings" (kethubim, from kathab, to write), include (1) Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (2) The Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther; (3) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles. The first three, from their initial letters, were called Emeth, "truth." The second five were called "the five rolls" (chameesh megilloth), written for use in the synagogue on special feasts. Ecclesiastes (koholeth) means "The Preacher." Chronicles bear the Hebrew name meaning "words of days," i.e. records, the Greek paralipomena, "things omitted" in Kings and here supplied as a supplement. The apocryphal books are never found in the Heb. canon, and exist only in the Gr. LXX.

The Second Epistle of Peter (iii. 16) shows that the epistles of Paul were recognised as part of "Scripture" at the time when Peter wrote: "in all his epistles are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned . . . wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures;" comp. ver. 2: "be mindful of the words . . . spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour." Justin Martyr (Apology, i. 66) states that "the memoirs of the apostles" were read side by side with the scriptures of the prophets. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the N. T. making up with the O. T. "one knowledge." Tertullian terms them together "the whole instrument of both Testaments," "the complete-together Scripture." The Syrian version (Peshito) at the close of the 2nd century contains the N. T. with the O. T.

The eastern churches set the catholic epistles before the Pauline. The quotations, Luke xx. 37, "at the bush," i.e. the section concerning the flaming bush; Rom. xi. 2 marg.,

"in Elias," i.e. in the passage concerning Elias; Acts viii. 32, "the place of the Scripture"; show that some divisions of the O. T. existed, with titles from their subjects. A cycle of lessons is implied in Luke iv. 17, Acts xiii. 15, xv. 21, 2 Cor. iii. 14. The law was divided into 54 Parshioth or sections; a section for each sabbath in the year. Shorter Parshioth also existed, subdivided into open sections (Petuehoth) like our paragraphs, marking a change of subjects; and shut ones (Satmuth) or less divisions. The divisions of the prophets were called Haphtaroth, from patar, to "dismiss"; as Missa or "Mass" comes from the dismissal of the congregation on its completion. Verses (Pesukim) were marked by the Masoretic editors of the text in the 9th century A.D. Stephens adopted them in his Vulgate, 1555; the English translation in the Geneva Bible of 1560. Our arrangement has adopted Cardinal Hugo's chapters and the Masoretic verses. Tatian, in the 2nd century, formed the first harmony of the four Gospels, called the Diataxaron. The elder Stephens, in a riding journey from Paris to Lyons, subdivided the N. T. chapters into verses, and the first edition with this division appeared in 1551. In reading the Bible we should remember these divisions have no authority; and where they break the sense, or mar the flow of thought, they are to be disregarded.

The four Gospels stand first in the N. T., setting forth the Lord Jesus' ministry in the flesh; the Acts, His ministry in the Spirit, His church's (the temple of the Holy Ghost) foundation and extension, internally and externally. To the histories succeed the epistles of Paul the apostle of faith, Peter of hope, and John of love, unfolding the gospel facts and truths more in detail; just as in the O. T. the histories come first, then the inspired teachings based on and intimately connected with them, in Psalms, Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and the Prophets. Finally comes Revelation, answering to Daniel, the prophetic Apocalypse of the O. T. The first three Gospels are called "the synoptical Gospels," giving a synopsis of Christ's ministry in Galilee; John gives His ministry in Judaea. They dwell more on Christ's Spirit-filled humanity; He on His Divinity, from everlasting one with God.

The N. T. 27 books, emanating from nine different persons, and the O. T. 39 books, separated from each other by distances of time, space, and character, yet form a marvellously intertwined unity, tending all to the one end. Internal and external evidence disprove the possibility of their being written by several authors combining to palm an imposture on the world. How are we to account for the mutual connection and profound unity? The only answer that meets the exigencies of the case is, the word of God "came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i. 21). Rationalists try to disintegrate the parts of the sacred volume, but the more they do so the greater is the need for believing in one Divine superintending Mind to account for a unity which palpably exists, though the writers themselves did not design it (see 1 Pet. i. 10-12). If the parts of a watch be disconnected, it needs only for the maker to put them together again, to show their unity of design. However widely apart the makers of the several parts may live, the master mind used the makers as his workmen, and contrived and combined the parts into one. Infinite intelligence alone could combine into one the works of men of so various minds and of ages so wide apart as the sacred writers, beginning with Moses the legislator and ending with John the divine. Moreover, any one book cannot be taken from the canon without breaking a link in the complete chain. Inspiration was needed alike in producing each sacred book, and in guiding the church (whilst it was still possessing the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit) which to omit of even inspired books. Whatever was not necessary for all ages, though needed for the church's good for a time, were omitted (see Col. iv. 16). The credibility of the O. T. is established by establishing that of the N. T., for the Lord quotes the O. T. in its threefold parts, "the law, the prophets, and the psalms," as the word of God. The sacred CANON [see] of the O. T. was completed under Ezra. We find Daniel shortly before having in his hands the book of Jeremiah (ix. 2). Paul says that one grand preeminence of the Jews was that unto them were committed the oracles of God (Rom. iii. 2), and they are never accused of unfaithfulness in their trust. The monotheism of the O. T. is the very opposite to the tendencies of Gentile and Israelitish alike to idolatry. Again the B. inverts the relative importance of events as men commonly regard them. Its sole aim is the honour of God, contrary to man's inclination. The great events of ordinary history are untouched, except in so far as they bear upon the kingdom of God. Yet God is throughout represented as ruling in the kingdoms of men, Gentiles as well as Jews. (Dan. iv. 17.) Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, whilst doing their own will, appear in the Bible as God's instruments, overruled to carry out His purposes. It is no Jewish vanity which causes the B. to be silent about most of the great political events of the world and to dwell so much on Israel; for what the B. records redounds to Israel's shame as an apostate people, and its allusions to surrounding nations are often to record their being made God's instruments to chastise themselves. Yet it is to the B. alone we have owed for ages almost all that is most certain of the history of Moab (since confirmed by the Moabite stone), of the Amorites, and even of Nineveh and Babylon. The two latter were entombed for thousands of years until lately, and the discovery of their monuments has remarkably confirmed holy writ.

The analogies of nature and of history to B. truths powerfully confirm its emanation from the same God. The gradual development of the Divine plan of redemption answers to the gradual development of God's design in the formation and in the moral government of the world. The historic development of the B. scheme corresponds to God's working out His plans in the world by moral agents. And His revealing His will "in many portions" (polyméros, Heb. i. 1, one prophet or inspired person or writer receiving one portion of revelation, another another: to Noah the quarter of the world where Messiah should appear, to Abraham the nation, to Jacob the tribe, to David and Isaiah the family, to Micah the town, to Daniel the time), and "in divers manners," corresponds to His sending from time to time a Bacon, Newton, Shakspeare, etc., into the social world for the advancement of mankind in science and civilization.

As to natural science, the B. is so framed in language as to adapt itself (on being closely examined) to advancing intelligence, according as the ruder theories are superseded by the more accurate. The language being for all classes, not merely the so-called scientific, is phenomenal; it speaks by appearances, which even philosophers must often do, as in the phrase "sunrise," "sunset." The tongue through which the O. T. revelation of God speaks is the Hebrew, that of the chosen nation, except parts of Ezra and Daniel and Jeremiah. The tongue of the N. T. is the Greek, that best adapted of all languages for expressing most accurately the nicest and most delicate shades of thought and doctrine.

A very remarkable proof of the Divinity of the N. T. is the marked difference between it and the writings of even the apostolical fathers that immediately succeeded: Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Daillé remarked, "God has allowed a fosse to be drawn by human weakness round the sacred canon, to keep it from invasion."

How remarkably too God kept the Jews, our librarians of the O. T., from altering, to meet their prejudices, the sacred books that record their sins and national disgrace. Though they hated and killed the prophets, they never mutilated their prophecies. King Jehoiakim alone cut a roll of Jeremiah (xxxvi. 23, 24), and burnt it in the fire. But the act is recorded as one of exceptional profanity; and immediately the same words were written again, with added woes, to show man's impotence against the word of God. Also for 14 centuries the church, though in various sections of it falling into various unscriptural heresies, has never added to, nor taken from, the N. T. canon. How natural it would have been for the church of Rome to have added something favourable to her pretensions. She has burnt saints, with their writings hung round their neck. She has shown her will to add to Scripture itself by adding the Apocrypha to the O. T.

just where her addition cannot prejudice the cause of truth fatally, for the Jews witness against her in this. But in the N. T., where she might have done mischief, she has been Divinely constrained to maintain, without addition or subtraction, the canon which testifies against herself. The exact adaptation of the B. to man's complex being, body, soul, and spirit—reason, emotion, conscience—and to outward nature in its varied aspects, confirms its Divine authorship. It stands in marked contrast to all Gentile cosmogonies, in its majestic simplicity and evidently unmythical character. Of all other nations the oldest writings are poems, and they abound in poetic inventions. In the B., on the contrary, poetry is least found in the earliest books. Not until the broad midday light of David's reign does the first collection of poems, viz. his psalms, appear. The heathen ancient sacred stories, as those of the Hindoos, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, present scenes of the unseen world merely gratifying idle curiosity and a prurient imagination. The same is true of the Koran. The B., with its old law of the Ten Commandments, gives the most perfect manifestation of the Divine character and requirements from man, and this at a time when the human legislator, Moses, had just come from a nation sunk in the most debasing pollution and superstition.

Another striking fact is, Israel has left scarcely any remains of art, and certainly nothing comparable to the masterpieces of the heathen; but it has handed down the Book which infinitely excels all that the genius of the whole world beside has produced. Pantheism, and the worship of nature as an abstract entity, lay at the root of all heathen idolatries. The B. alone reveals the holy, just, loving, omnipotent, omniscient, personal, one and only God. Whenever their gods became personal, they ceased to be ONE; they were mere personifications of various powers of nature; fate, not the will of God, ruled all. But the word reflects the moral character of the perfectly holy God, and requires His worshippers to be what He is, holy. That such a book should originate among a small and rather perverse people, surrounded by idolatrous nations, and that it should receive additions in successive ages of the same people, harmonizing marvellously with the earliest books, in spite of frequent apostasy in the nation, can only be accounted for by believing its authorship to be Divine. The Koran's moral precepts are at variance with its picture of the sensual heaven which awaits its votaries. The heathen mythologies in their indecent histories of gods counteracted their moral precepts. The morality of the B. rests on the infinitely pure attributes of the God of the B. The B. faithfully portrays man's universal corruption, its origin, and at the same time the sure hope of redemption, thus meeting fully man's profoundest wants. It gives peace to the conscience, without lowering the holy strictness of God's justice, but, on the contrary, in Christ " magnifying the law and making it honourable." There is an entire correspondence between the gospel way of salvation and the soul's deep conviction of the need of atonement for guilt. The lovely character of Christ in the B., the perfect manhood and Godhead combined, above whatever uninspired man conceived, not to say attained, the adaptation of the B. to man's varied distresses (which occupy the larger part of it), and to his circumstances in all times and places, the completeness where-with the end corresponds to the beginning, the close presenting before us man enjoying God's presence and marriage-like union with Him, no curse, no sin, no pain, no death, and the tree of life and waters of life which the beginning represented him as possessing before the fall, all assure us that " the words of the Lord are pure, as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times " (Ps. xii. 6).

There is a break in revelation now, just as there was for 400 years between the O. T. and the N. T., after the outburst of them in connection with the rearing of the second temple. John the Baptist, at the close of the 400 years, ushered in the brightest light yet manifested. This period of N. T. revelations lasted for one century. Then have followed the 18 centuries which walk in the light of that last manifestation. The silence has been longer than before, but it will be succeeded by a more glorious revelation than all the past. The former 400 years' break directed the world's undivided attention to Messiah, so that His identity could not be mistaken. The Jews scattered providentially over the world by the captivity, and everywhere bearing the O. T., matured the universal expectancy during the silent centuries. Their present longer dispersion, and the diffusion of the whole B. in all lands, are preparing for Messiah's manifestation in glory.

Finally, the miracles wrought in connection with the B., and attested on infallible proofs, and the prophecies of the O. T. (proved to have been given when they profess to be, by the fact that the Jews who oppose Christianity attest their age, and fulfilled minutely in the N. T.) establish the inspired truth of the Bible. Bad men could never have written so holy a book, and good men would never have written it if it were an imposture. Its sobriety and freedom from fanaticism and mysticism preclude the idea of its being the production of self-deceiving fanatics. The national prejudices of all the N. T. writers, as Jews, were in behalf of an immediate temporal kingdom and an outwardly reigning Messiah, the very reverse of what His actual manifestation was. Nothing but superhuman inspiration could have turned them to write so spiritually and so at variance with all their early prejudices.

Reader, if thou wouldst know the Divinity of the Bible, experimentally taste and feed upon it. The best defence of the Bible is the Bible itself.

The best commentary on the Bible is the Bible itself. "Diamonds alone cut diamonds" (Fuller). "Have thou the palate of faith, that thou mayest taste the honey of God" (Augustine).

Biehri. Youthful; else firstborn; else son of Becher. (Sheba: 2 Sam. xx. 1.)

Bidkar. Jehu's captain, and formerly his fellow officer (2 Kings ix. 25). He executed the concluding doom pronounced by Jehovah on Ahab's son's son (1 Kings xxi. 29), Jehoram, by casting his body into Naboth's plat, after Jehu had pierced him with an arrow.

Bigha. Esth. i. 10.

Bighan. Persian and Sanskrit, Bagdana, "gift of fortune" (Esth. ii. 21, vi. 2). "Wroth," because degraded at the same time as queen Vashti, and a keeper of the door, B. with Teresh "sought to lay hands on Ahasuerus." Detected by Mordecai, he was hanged. The LXX. states that the conspirators' cause of wrath was Mordecai's advancement; but Mordecai was not advanced till subsequently, in reward for detecting the conspiracy (Esth. vi.).

Bigvai. 1. 2056 (Ezra ii. 14), 2067 (Neh. vii. 19), children of B. returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel; 72 subsequently with Ezra (viii. 14). The different circumstances under which the two registers were made account for the variation of numbers: Ezra's in Babylon, Nehemiah's in Judaea, after the walls had been built. Many, who intended to return and were so put down in the former list, were prevented by death, or changed their minds and stayed. Many, not entered in it, afterwards joined the caravan when starting. The variation is a plain proof of the absence of collusion between the two writers. 2. A chief of Zerubbabel's expedition, who subsequently signed the covenant (Ezra ii. 2, Neh. vii. 7).

Bildad: Enludad=son of contention, disputant. Second of Job's (ii. 11, viii., xiii., xxv.) three friends. The Shulite, i.e. sprung from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah, who was sent eastward by Abraham and founded an Arab tribe (Gen. xxv. 2)., Syceca, in Arabia Deserta, E. of Batanea, mentioned by Ptolemy, is identified by Gesenius with the Shulite country. B. is less violent than Zophar, though more so than Eliphaz.

Bileam. A town in the western half of Manasseh, given to the Kohathites (1 Chron. vi. 70). BLEAM is the same name by transposition of letters (Josh. xvii. 11); GATH-RIMMON in xxi. 24.

Bilgah. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 14. 2. Neh. xii. 5, 18; x. 8.

Bilhah. 1. Rachel's handmaid (Gen. xxix. 29). Rachel having no children gave B. to her husband Jacob, who by the latter had two sons, Dan and Naphtali (Gen. xxx. 1-8, xxxv. 25, xlv. 25; 1 Chron. vii. 13). Reuben, Jacob's firstborn, defiled her, and was therefore deprived of the birthright, which was given to the sons of Joseph (Gen. xxxv. 22, xlix. 4; 1 Chron. v. 1). Blunt says, so vivid was the desire for the promised Redeemer, that "the wife provoked, instead of resenting, the faithlessness of her husband, the mother taught her own child deceit, daughters deliberately worked their own and their fathers' shame, and the daughter in law courted the incestuous bed, and to be childless was a byword" (Gen. xvi. 2; xxx. 3, 9; xxv. 23; xxvii. 13; xix. 31; xxxvii. 14). 2. A Simeonite town (1 Chron. iv. 29), named also Baalah or Balah (Josh. ix. 3).

Bilhan. 1. Akin in etymology to Bilbah (Gen. xxxvi. 27, 1 Chron. i. 42). 2. 1 Chron. vii. 10. Sprung from Benjamin's son Bela; for Ehud, Bilhan's son, was sprung from Bela (viii. 3, 6).

Bilshan. Ezra ii. 2, Neh. vii. 7.

Bimhal. 1 Chron. vii. 33.

Binea. 1 Chron. vii. 37, ix. 43.

Binnui. 1. Ezra vii. 33. 2. Ezra x. 30. 3. Ezra x. 38. 4. Neh. iii. 24, x. 9, xii. 8.

Bird. Heb. 'oph, "a flying thing," in general; including even winged insects, though mostly used of birds. Ravenous birds are expressed by the Heb. ait; Gr. aetos, one that pounces on prey; smaller birds, as the sparrow, are called in Heb. tzip-por, the "tzip" imitating its note.

Snaring of birds by net and gin is the image used for the plots of bad men and Satan, to catch souls to their ruin (Ps. xci. 3, cxiv. 7; Jer. v. 26, 27). The "cage full of birds" is the trap with decoy birds to lure others, upon whom then the trap door was dropped. It is also the image for the awfully sudden and unexpected surprise with which Christ's second coming shall overtake the worldly in the midst of carnal security (Luke xxi. 35).

The lake of Galilee still abounds in wild duck. The swan and goose (supposed to be meant in 1 Kings iv. 23) also are found. Snaring and shooting with arrows were the usual modes of taking them. The youth seduced by the strange woman's fair speech, "till a dart strike through his liver," is like such a bird "hasting to the snare and not knowing that it is for his life" (Prov. vii. 23).

The Lord commanded Israel (Deut. xxii. 6), "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee, . . . whether they be young ones or eggs, . . . thou shalt not take the dam with the young." By this the extirpation of the species was prevented. God cares for even sparrows (Matt. x. 29), much more for His children. He would have us imitate His tenderness even towards the inarticulate brutes beneath us. Birds kept in cages for pleasure are not mentioned in Scripture; except there be an allusion to them in Job xli. 5, "Wilt thou play with him as with a bird?" Singing birds were rarer in Palestine than with us, still there were some (Ps. civ. 12, Eccles. xii. 4). Birds, as the turtle dove and pigeon, were allowed to be substituted in sacrifices for more costly animals by the poor (Lev. i. 14-17; xii. 2, 6, 8), but they were not to be divided as other victims (Gen. xv. 10). The Virgin Mary's poverty appears from her presenting the offering of the poor (Luke ii. 24). The abundance of birds in Palestine appears from their devouring the seed sown by the wayside in the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii. 4).

Ps. lxxiv. 3 is understood as if sparrows and swallows made their nests in the two "altars" (observe the plural) of the tabernacle. But such a position for a birds' nest would be neither enviable nor safe, indeed scarcely possible in the altar of incense in the holy place before the veil. Rather there is an abbreviated comparison: what the house is to the sparrow, and what her nest is to the swallow, that Thine altars are to my soul, and therefore my soul longs for them. Like a little bird, which after a long defenceless wandering has found a house (comp. Matt. viii. 20) in which it may dwell securely, a nest to which it may entrust confidently its dearest possession, its young, thus have I a homeless wanderer found in Thy house the true nest for my soul; otherwise I should have been like the lonely bird on the housetop (comp. Ps. cii. 6; lxxiv. 19). Our two great needs are: (I.) atonement for guilt, so as to be at peace with God; (II.) access to God, and acceptance for our imperfect prayers. The altar of burnt offering outside (I.) represented in type the former, viz. Christ's atonement for all guilt by His precious blood shedding; the altar of incense inside (II.) typified the latter, our prayers being perfumed by our great Intercessor's merits, and so becoming a sweet-smelling savour before God (comp. Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. vii. 3, 4).

The bird killed over running water, and the second bird dipped into the mixed water and blood and set free, for cleansing the leper, symbolise Christ slain to atone for our guilt, and living again and for ever by His resurrection for our justification (Lev. xiv.). As the "blood" represents our reconciliation to God by the atonement, so the "water" our cleansing (John xix. 34, 1 John v. 6).

In Isa. xxxi. 5 Jehovah's solicitous, affectionate care for His people is illustrated. "As birds flying (i.e. parent birds hovering over their young to defend them from the vulture), so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem."

Comp. the beautiful image of the parent eagle teaching the young the first flight (Deut. xxxii. 1, Ps. xci. 4). Men, like birds, are weak, soon ensnared, prone to wander from their true rest (Prov. vii. 23, xxvii. 8; Lam. iii. 52). Under Christ, in the gospel church, they find their rest lodging under the overshadowing branches of the true Vine (Ezek. xvii. 23, Matt. xiii. 32) a better protection than that of the world power (Ezek. xxxi. 6, Dan. ii. 35).

Jer. xii. 9: "Mine heritage is unto Me as a speckled bird," i.e., the Jewish nation had blended paganism with the altogether diverse Mosaic ritual; so the nations around, God's instruments of vengeance, as birds of prey like herself (through her assimilation to them) were ready to pounce upon her (comp. Rev. xviii. 2).

The birds' instinctive observance of their seasons of migration, returning every spring from their winter abodes (S. of Sol. ii. 12), is made a tacit proof of God's people not returning to Him now that the winter of His judicial wrath is past, and the spring of His gracious favour set in (Jer. viii. 7).

Translate Prov. xxvi. 2, "as the sparrow [is prone to] wandering, as the swallow [is prone to] flying [yet never lights upon us], so the curse causeless shall not come" (Deut. xxiii. 5, Balaam and Israel; 2 Sam. xvi. 5-12, Shimei and David; Ps. cix. 28).

Eccles. x. 20, "a bird of the air shall carry the matter." Proverbial: the fact will reach the king's knowledge in a marvellous way, as if a bird had carried it to him. The bird was regarded as the emblem of superhuman intelligence.

Birsha. King of Gomorrah, at Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gen. xiv. 2).

Birch, Child. Emblem of acute and sudden suffering, such as shall overtake those unprepared for the Lord's second coming (1 Thess. v. 3). The special suffering laid on woman as part of the curse from the fall is overruled to a blessing, if she shall faithfully do and suffer the part assigned by God to her, viz. childbearing and home duties, her sphere as distinguished from public teaching, which is man's (1 Tim. ii. 11-15), "she shall be saved [though] with childbearing"; i.e., though suffering her part of the primeval curse, in childbearing, just as man shall be saved, though having to bear his part, the sweat of the brow. The passage may further imply: her childbearing, though in sorrow, being the function of her sex whereby the Saviour was born, shall be the mean of her salvation. Bishop Ellicott translates, "through the childbearing" viz. that of Jesus (Gen. iii. 15, 16).

A special interposition mitigated the penalty to the Hebrew women, under the cruel edict of Pharaoh for the destruction of all Hebrew males born (Exod. i. 15-19). A woman was unclean under the Mosaic law for 40 days after giving birth to a male, and 80 days in the case of a female. Then she offered a burnt offering and a sin offering for her cleansing; less costly victims were required for the poor, as the Virgin Mary [see BIRD]. A child when born was washed, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling bands, as appears in the Lord's touching picture of His adopting and ultimately marrying Israel (Ezek. xvi. 4), where for "to supple thee" (i.e. to make the skin soft), translate, "to the (or my) sight," i.e. in order to be slightly for me to look upon [see marg.]. The salting was to make the skin dense and firm.

Natural birth unto life is the constant image in Scripture for spiritual quickening, the new birth of the soul by the Holy Spirit, who convicts of sin and also points the eye of faith to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world (John iii. 3-8, i. 13; Gal. vi. 15, Tit. iii. 5, Jas. i. 18, 1 Pet. i. 23, 1 John iii. 9, 2 Cor. v. 17; comp. Job xxxiii. 24-26).

Birthday was generally observed with rejoicings. So Pharaoh's (Gen. xl. 20); Job's (i. 4, etc.); Herod's (Matt. xiv. 6), though his day was perhaps rather that of his accession to the throne, comp. Hos. vii. 5, "the day of our king." The Jews latterly viewed birthday celebrations unfavourably, on account of the idolatrous rites and revelry associated with them. Josephus (Ant. xix. 7, §1) mentions that Herod, the brother of Herodias, who succeeded the Herod of Matt. xiv. 6, "made a feast on his birthday, when all under his command partook of his mirth." This is in coincidence with Matthew and Mark (vi. 21), for it proves that birthday feasts were observed in Herod's family, and that officers of the government customarily shared in them.

Birtheright. A double portion fell to the firstborn, comp. Dent. xxi. 15-17, whence Joseph's two sons, who received the birthright forfeited by Reuben the firstborn, were counted as heads of the tribes Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 5, 6, 22; xlix. 4; 1 Chron. v. 1). The "princes" of the congregation were so probably by primogeniture (Num. vii. 2, xxi. 18). The rebellion of the Reubenite leaders, Datban and Abiram, may have arisen through jealousy at the preeminence which others enjoyed above them, Reuben their first father having had originally the primogeniture; comp. Num. xvi. 1, 2, with xxvi. 5-9. Esau transferred his birthright to Jacob for a paltry mess of pottage, profanely setting at nought what was the spiritual privilege connected with it, the being progenitor of the promised Messiah (Gen. xxv. 33, Heb. xii. 16, 17).

It is striking how often God set aside the birthright, in order to show that the objects of His choice are "born not of bloods (Gr. natural descents), nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 13). Thus Isaac is preferred to Ishmael, Jacob to Esau, Joseph to Reuben, David to his elder brothers, Solomon to Adonijah the elder of the two (1 Kings i. 15). Ordinarily the firstborn inherited the throne (2 Chron. xxi. 3), typifying Messiah the "first begotten" of the Father, "the Firstborn among many brethren," and Heir of all things (Rom. viii. 29, Heb. i. 6). All the firstborn of Israel were claimed by Jehovah as His, He having saved them when Egypt's firstborn were slain (Exod. xxi. 29). He allowed them to be redeemed, and the tribe of Levi to serve Him in their stead (Num. iii. 12, 13). The whole nation was God's firstborn among all the peoples (Exod.

EAGLE AND YOUNG.

iv. 22). The spiritual Israel in a still higher sense is "the church of the firstborn written in heaven" (enrolled as its citizens in the book of life) (Heb. xii. 23, Jas. i. 18, Rev. xiv. 1-4).

Birzavith. In Asker's genealogies (1 Chron. vii. 31), a place. In the marginal or keri reading—"well of olives."

Bishop. Gr. episcopos, applied to the inspectors sent by Athens to her subject states, to inquire into their state, to rule and defend them. The Greek speaking Jews or Hellenists applied it in the LXX. to officers who had "the oversight of the tabernacle" (Num. iv. 16, xxi. 14), "the officers overseeing the host" (1s. cix. 8, "his charge of overseeing let another take," quoted in Acts i. 20 "his bishoprick"; Isa. lx. 17, "thine overseers righteousness." Presbyter or elder was the term in the Christian church at Jerusalem for the pastoral superintendent; episcopos or bishop was naturally adopted in Gentile-Christian churches, the word being already in use among the Greeks. The terms were originally equivalent; presbyter (whence "priest" comes by contraction) marking the age, rank, and respect due to him, episcopos marking his official duty. Bishops and deacons are the two orders alone mentioned in Phil. i. 1. The plural shows there was more than one bishop and more than one deacon there. Those called "elders" (presbyters) are also termed "overseers" (bishops, Gr.) as if the terms were interchangeable (Acts xx. 17, 28; Tit. i. 5, 7). The presbyters discharged episcopal functions, i.e. overseeing the flock (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2). So in the epistles of Clement of Rome the two terms are interchangeable. But in Ignatius' epistles the bishop is regarded as superior to the presbyter. However, in the genuine epistles, in the Syriac version edited by Cureton, the bishop is much less exalted. "Elder" is the correlative term to "younger men" (Gr. neoteroi), Acts v. 6. "Elders" are first mentioned in the church in Judea (xi. 30). Paul and Barnabas transplanted the same Jewish government to the Gentile churches (xiv. 23) by "ordaining elders in every church." "Bishops" are first mentioned in Paul's address at Miletus (xx. 28), describing the duty of the elders, viz. to be faithful "overseers." Then, during Paul's first imprisonment, in Phil. i. 1 "bishops" is the recognised term for "elders." Every Jewish synagogue had its council of "elders" (Luke vii. 3) presided over by one of themselves, "the chief ruler of the synagogue."

In their apostleship the apostles have no successors, for the signs of an apostle [see] have not been transmitted. But the presidents over the presbyters and deacons, whilst still continuing of the same order as the presbyters, have succeeded virtually, by whatever name designated, angel, bishop, moderator, to a superintendence analogous to that exercised by the apostles, and evidently derived from the synagogue; see Vittinga, Synag.

ii., chaps. 3, 7. The superintending pastor of each of the seven churches is in Revelation called its "angel," (the abuse of the term "apostle" by pretenders led to its restriction to the twelve and Paul, Rev. ii. 2) just as in O. T. the prophet Haggai (i. 13) is termed "the Lord's messenger (angel) in the Lord's message." In the larger churches, as Ephesus and Smyrna, there were many presbyters, but only one angel under the one "chief Shepherd and Bishop of Souls," the term "bishop" thus being applicable to the highest pastoral superintendence (1 Pet. ii. 25, v. 4). The enigmatic symbolism of Revelation transfers the term of office, angel, from Jehovah's heavenly to His earthly ministers; reminding them that, like angels above, they should do God's will lovingly and perfectly. The "legate (angel) of the church" (scheliach tsibbur) recited the prayers in the name of the assembled worshippers in the synagogue; the apostles, as Jews, naturally followed this pattern, under God's providential sanction: comp. Jas. ii. 2, "assembly," Gr. synagogue," 2 Cor. viii. 23.

Timothy either at his ordination as presbyter, or else consecration as temporary overseer or bishop over Ephesus, received a spiritual gift "by prophecy," i.e. by the Spirit speaking through the prophets (Acts xiii. 1-3; 1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14, 15), accompanied "with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." The laying on of hands symbolised the impartation of spiritual strength; as in Joshua's case (Num. xxvii. 18-20, Deut. xxxiv. 9). The "with" implies that the presbyters' laying on of hands accompanied the conferring of the gift. The "by" in 2 Tim. i. 6 implies that Paul was the more immediate instrument of conferring it: "stir up the gift of God which is in thee by the putting on of my hands." The Jewish council was composed of the elders (the presbytery, Luke xxii. 66, Acts xxii. 5), and a presiding rabbi; so the Christian church was composed of elders and a president (Acts xv. 19, 23). At the ordination of the president three presbyters were always present to lay on hands; so the early church canons required three bishops to be present at the consecration of a bishop. The president ordained in both cases as the representative, in the name of the presbytery. Ordination (comp. Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3) is meant in 1 Tim. v. 22, "lay hands suddenly (without careful inquiry into his character beforehand) on no man"; not, as Ellicott explains, "receive penitent backsliders into church fellowship by laying on hands."

The qualifications are stated in 1 Tim. iii. 1-7. "Husband of one wife" confutes the Romish celibacy. He who has a virtuous wife and family will more attractively teach those who have similar ties, not only by precept but by example. The Jews teach a priest should neither be unmarried nor childless, lest he be unmerciful. Yet as Jews and Gentiles regarded second marriages with prejudice (comp. Anna, Luke ii. 36, 37), and a bishop ought to stand well in the esteem of his flock, he should be married but once. That prohibition no longer holds good, now that no such prejudice exists, which might otherwise have required lawful liberty to yield to Christian expediency. The prohibition may also refer to a second marriage after a divorce. Of ruling (presiding, Gr.) presbyters there were two kinds, those who "laboured in the word and teaching," and those who did not. The former were to receive "double honour" and remuneration. Both had "government" (1 Cor. xii. 28). The "apostle" and "evangelist" preached to the heathen, but the bishop-presbyter's office was pastoral (Tit. i. 9, 1 Thess. v. 12), including ministration to the sick (Jas. v. 14). Timothy as vicar apostolic heard accusations against elders, and deposed the guilty, and ordained presbyters and deacons (1 Tim. v. 19, Tit. iii. 10). The presiding bishops in the next age naturally succeeded in a permanent and settled sphere to these duties, which were previously discharged in a less settled charge by the apostles and their deputies, who moved from place to place.

The sum of the arguments amounts to this, that episcopacy in the sense of superintendency, not in that of succession to the apostleship, has the apostolic precedent to recommend it; but no directions for the form of church government so positive and explicit as those in the O. T. concerning the Aaronic priesthood and Levitical ministry are laid down in the N. T. as to the Christian ministry. Various other orders and gifts are mentioned besides bishop-presbyters and deacons, with superintending apostles and apostolic vicars (as Timothy and Titus). These have not been permanent in all times and places (1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11, 12). The absence of literal, positive directions as to church government, and the statement of the broad principle, "Let all things be done unto edifying" (1 Cor. xiv. 26), and the continual presence of the Holy Spirit in the church to raise up fresh agencies for fresh needs of the church, whilst justifying episcopacy in its general following of the apostolical order, show us that it is not exclusively the Divine platform, but that in all churches holding the essential truths of Scripture "we ought to judge those ministers lawfully called and sent, who be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation, to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard." (Ch. of Eng. Art. xxiii.)

Bithiah=daughter, i.e. worshipper, of Jehovah. Pharaoh's daughter and wife of Nered, a descendant of Judah. Her name shows she was a convert from Egyptian idolatry to Jehovah's worship; and Nered's other wife is distinguished from her, as "Jehudijah" the Jezebel. This princess evidently, like Ruth, renounced home, country, and a royal court to take an Israelite husband and to have Israel's God for her

God. The marriage probably took place in the wilderness shortly after the exodus. Perhaps the disaster of Egypt at the Red Sea led some Egyptians to become proselytes. In Lepsius' Kings' Book, Amenophis II., (in his view) father of the Pharaoh drowned at the Red Sea, has among his children one with the hieroglyphic Amun P or B T H, i.e. beloved of Amun (god of Thebes). On conversion the jah added to her name would mark her new religion. [See EGYPT, where is stated Canon Cook's view that Thothmes II., much earlier, was the Pharaoh drowned; Amenophis III. had a wife not Egyptian in creed, and not of royal birth, named Tei, and her parents Juua and Tuua, names not unlike Bithia.]

Bithron: properly "the Bithron," i.e. divided place; "all the B." a district in the Arabah or Jordan valley E. of the river (2 Sam. ii. 29). The whole country in the Ghor on the other side of the river is broken and intersected. [See BETHK.]

Bithynia. Paul and Silas from Mysia "assayed to go into B., but the Spirit of Jesus (so the Sin., Vat., and Alex., the oldest MSS., read) suffered them not" (Acts xvi. 7). But afterwards the gospel reached B.; and Bithynians, both Jews and Gentiles [see PETER], became Christians; for Peter (1 Pet. i. 1) addresses them along with those of "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia." Delay is not denial of believing prayer; God's time, God's place, and God's way are the best. B. is the nearest point to Europe; bounded by Paphlagonia on the E., by the Euxine on the N., by the Propontis on the W., by Mysia, Phrygia, and Galatia on the S. B. was originally bequeathed to Rome by Nicomedes III., 74 B.C., the last of the kings, one of whom invited the Gauls; whence the central province was called Gallo-Græcia or Galatia. On the death of Mithridates king of Pontus, 63 B.C., the W. of Pontus including Paphlagonia was joined to B. The Roman province is sometimes called "Pontus and B." In Acts ii. 9 Pontus alone is mentioned, in 1 Pet. i. 1 both are mentioned. It is hilly, well wooded, and productive. The river Rhyndacus, and the snowy range of mount Olympus of Mysia, are marked features on the W. At Nicea in it met the famous council early in the 4th century. In the 2nd century Pliny the Younger, its governor, wrote the letter still extant to the emperor Trajan: "in the case of those Christians who were brought before me I adopted this method. I asked them, Were they Christians? On their confessing it, I asked them a second and third time, threatening punishment. When they persevered I ordered them to be led off for execution. For I did not doubt that inflexible obstinacy ought to be punished. Nothing can compel those who are real Christians to call on the gods, and supplicate thy image with frankincense and wine, and to curse Christ. Their error is this; they are wont to meet on a stated day before dawn and to repeat in turns among themselves a hymn to Christ as God; and to bind themselves by oath not to commit any wickedness, such as theft, robbery, or adultery, nor to break their word. When this is over, their custom is to depart and to meet again to take food, but ordinary and innocuous. Many of every age and rank, also of both sexes, are in question. For the contagion of that superstition has spread not only through cities, but even villages and the country. At least it is certain that our temples now are almost deserted, and the customary sacred rites for long omitted, and a purchaser of victims is very rarely found."

Bittern=quippod. The accompaniment of the desolation reigning in Babylon (Isa. xiv. 23). Idumea (xxxiv. 11), Nineveh (Zeph. iii. 14). An aquatic solitary bird, frequenting marshy pools, such as the plain of Babylonia abounded in: the Al-houbara of the Arabic version, the size of a large fowl. The Botaurus stellaris, of the heron kind. Gesenius translates "the hedgehog" (from its rolling itself together; quapad, "to contract oneself"), and Strabo says that enormous hedgehogs were found in the islands of the Euphrates. The Arabic kunful resembles somewhat quippod. But the hedgehog or porcupine would never "lodge" or perch "on the chapters of columns," as marg. Zeph. ii. 14 says of the quippod. Still the columns might be fallen on the ground within reach of the hedgehog, and Idumea is not a marshy region suited to an aquatic bird such as the bittern.

BITTERN

Bizjothjah. A town in southern Judah (Josh. xv. 28).

Biztha. Second of the seven eunuchs of king Ahasuerus' harem (Esth. i. 10). The Persian beste means eunuch.

Blains: aba' bu'oth. The sixth Egyptian plague, which followed after Moses' sprinkling of the furnace ashes towards heaven; "the botch of Egypt" (Deut. xxviii. 27, 35), black leprosy, a kind of elephantiasis, producing burning ulcerous pustules on the skin. The magicians, whose scrupulous cleanliness is noticed by Herodotus, could not stand before Moses because of the boils (Exod. ix. 9-11).

Blasphemy. Literally a "railing accusation" against any one (Jude 9). "Evil speaking" is probably meant by it in Col. iii. 8. But it is more often used in the sense of any speech directly dishonouring God (1 Kings xxi. 10, 2 Sam. xii. 14, Ps. lxxiv. 18, Isa. lii. 5, Rom. ii. 24). Stoning was the penalty, as upon the son of Shelomith, a woman of Dan, and of an Egyptian father (Lev. xxiv. 11); Stephen was so treated by a sudden outbreak of Jewish zeal (Acts vii. 57-60). The Saviour would have been stoned for the blasphemy alleged as the ground of His condemnation (Matt. xxvi. 65, Luke v. 21, John x. 36); but the Romans, to whom He was delivered, used crucifixion. So the fulfilment of the prophecy (contrary to what might have been expected, seeing that crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment) was brought about, "they pierced My hands and My feet" (Ps. xxii. 16; comp. John xviii. 31, 32, xix. 6, 7). The Jews, in spite of themselves, fulfilled the prophecies to the letter (John xi. 50-52). The hearer of the blasphemy rent his garment, which might never be mended, and laid his hand, putting the guilt wholly, on the offender's head.

The Jews, because of Lev. xxiv. 16, superstitiously shrank from even naming Jehovah. In Exod. xxii. 28, "thou shalt not curse the gods" (Elohim) refers to disrespectful language towards magistrates. From Exod. xxiii. 13, "make no mention of the name of other gods," they thought themselves bound to turn the idols' names into nicknames, as Baal into Bosheth, Beth-aven for Beth-el, Beel-zebul for Beel-zehub. When the Jewish rulers, who had such numerous proofs of Jesus' Messiahship, shut their hearts against conviction, and at last stifled conscience and the light so utterly as to attribute His miracles of love, as the casting out of unclean spirits, to the help of the prince of demons, Christ pronounced that they were either committing or on the verge of committing the sin against the Holy Ghost which is forgiven neither in this world nor in the world to come, though all sin against the Son of man can be forgiven (Matt. xii. 31, etc.; Mark iii. 28, etc.). None can now commit formally the same sin of attributing Jesus' miracles against Satan's kingdom to Satan's help, so evident a self-contradiction that nothing short of a seared conscience, and a hardened determination to resist every spiritual impression and even malign the Spirit's work before other men, could have given birth to such a sin. But a man may commit virtually the same sin by continued malignant resistance of the gracious Spirit in one's own heart, with, at the same time, blasphemous and Satanic misrepresentation of it to others. He who has committed it is so given over to a reprobate mind as to have no pang of conscience about it, and the very fear of any one that he has committed it is proof positive that he has not, for if he had he would have been "past feeling" (Heb. vi. 4-6, 1 John v. 16).

Blastus. Herod Agrippa I.'s chamberlain; mediator between him and the people of Tyre and Sidon, who made him their friend (Acts xii. 20).

Blessing. "The less is blessed of the better" (Heb. vii. 7). Aaron and the priests pronounced the benediction (Num. vi. 22-27, Deut. x. 8). Jacob and Moses gave dying blessings prophetic of the character and history of the several tribes (Gen. xlix., Deut. xxxiii.). The cup in the Lord's supper is called "the cup of blessing" from, the passover cup of wine called so because "blessing" was offered over it to God. 1 Cor. x. 15 Paul says, "the cup which we bless," viz. the minister and the congregation; not he alone by any priestly authority, but as representing the congregation who virtually through Him bless the cup. The celebrant is the church. The minister is the leader of the congregation. The consecration is the corporate act of the whole church. The joint blessing by him and them (not the cup itself, which in the Gr. is not nominative but accusative) and the consequent drinking together constitute the "communion," i.e. joint participation of the blood of Christ.

Blindness. Its cure is one of our Lord's most frequent miracles (Luke vii. 21, Matt. ix. 27, Mark viii. 23, John v. 3, ix. 1), as had been foretold (Isa. xxix. 18, xxxv. 5). In coincidence with this is the commonness of it in the E. In Lull (Lydda) the saying is, every one is either blind or has but one eye. Jaffa has 500 blind out of 5000 of a population. The dust and sand pulverized by the intense heat, the constant glare, and in the sandy districts the absence of the refreshing "green grass," (the presence of which Mark notices as noteworthy in the miracle of the feeding the multitudes,) the cold sea air on the coasts, the night dews affecting those sleeping on the roofs, all tend to produce blindness.

It is a constant image used of spiritual darkness, and Jesus' restoration of sight to the blind pointed to the analogous spiritual bestowal of sight on the soul. Paul, who had passed through both the physical and the spiritual transition from darkness to light (Acts ix. 8, 9), instinctively, by an obviously undesigned coincidence confirming authenticity, often uses the expressive image (Acts xxvi. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Eph. i. 18, iv. 18; Col. i. 13). Elymas was smitten with blindness at Paul's word (Acts xiii. 11, comp. Gen. xix. 11, 2 Kings vi. 18).

The blind were to be treated kindly (Lev. xix. 14, Deut. xxvii. 18). The heathen conquerors sometimes blinded captives (2 Kings xxv. 7, 1 Sam. xi. 2).

Blood. Forbid to be eaten (Gen. ix. 4) under the O. T., on the ground that "the life (soul) of the flesh (the soul which gives life to the flesh) is in the blood," and that "God gave it upon the altar to make atonement with for men's souls" (Lev. xvii. 11). Translate the next clause, "for the blood maketh atonement by virtue of the soul." The blood, not in itself, but as the vehicle of the soul, atones, because the animal soul was offered to God on the altar as a substitute for the human soul. Now that Christ's one, and only true, sacrifice has superseded animal sacrifices, the prohibition against eating blood ceases, the decree in Acts xv. being but temporary, not to offend existing Jewish prejudices needlessly. In Lev. iii. 17 the "fat" is forbidden as well as the blood. God reserved the blood to Himself, investing it with a sacramental sanctity, when allowing man animal food. Besides the atoning virtue it typically had, it brought a curse when not duly expiated, as by burial (Gen. ix. 4, Lev. xvii. 13). The blood of victims was caught by the priest in a bason, and sprinkled seven times (that of birds was squeezed out at once) on the altar, its four corners or horns, on its side above and below the line running round it, or on the mercy seat, according to the nature of the offering; the blood of the passover lamb on the lintel and doorposts (Exod. xii.; Lev. iv. 5-7, xvi. 14-19). A drain from the temple carried the blood into the brook Kedron. A land was regarded as polluted by blood shed on it, which was to be expiated only by the blood of the murderer, and not by any "satisfaction" (Gen. ix. 10, ix. 4-6; Heb. xii. 24; Num. xxxv. 31, 33; Ps. evi. 38). The guilt of bloodshed, if the shedder was not known, fell on the city nearest by measurement, until it exculpated itself, its elders washing their hands over an expiatory sacrifice, viz. a beheaded heifer in a rough, unploughed, and unsown valley (Deut. xxi. 1-9).

The blood and water from Jesus' side, when pierced after death, was something extraordinary; for in other corpses the blood coagulates, and the water does not flow clear. The "loud voice" just before death (Luke xxiii. 46) shows that He did not die from mere exhaustion. The psalmist, His typical forerunner, says (lxxx. 20), "reproach hath broken my heart." Crucifixion alone would not have killed Him in so short a time. Probably the truth is, if we may with reverence conjecture from hints in Scripture, that mental agony, when He hung under the Father's displeasure at our sins which He bore, caused rupture of the pericardium, or sac wherein the heart throbs. The extravasated blood separated into the crassamentum and serum, the blood and the water, and flowed out when the soldier's spear pierced the side. Hence appears the propriety of Heb. x. 19, 20, "having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which He hath consecrated for us through the veil (which was 'rent' at His death), that is to say His flesh." Also, "this is My body which is broken for you" (1 Cor. xi. 24) is explained by the breaking of the heart, though it was true "a bone of Him shall not be broken" (John xix. 32-37; comp. also 1 John v. 6, "this is He that came by water (at His baptism by John in Jordan) and blood" (by His bloody baptism, at Calvary).

THE AVENGING OF BLOOD by the nearest kinsman of the deceased was a usage from the earliest historical times (Gen. ix. 5, 6, xxxiv. 30; 2 Sam. xiv. 7). Among the Bedouin Arabs the thar, or law of blood, comes into effect if the offer of money satisfaction be refused. So among the Anglo-Saxons the wer-gild, or money satisfaction for homicide, varying in amount according to the rank, was customary. The Mosaic law mitigated the severity of the law of private revenge for blood, by providing six cities of refuge (among the 48 Levitical cities), three on one side of Jordan, three on the other, for the involuntary homicide to flee into. The avenger, or goel (derived from a Heb. root "pollution," implying that he was deemed polluted till the blood of his slain kinsman was expiated), was nearest of kin to the man slain, and was bound to take vengeance on the manslayer. If the latter reached one of the six cities, (Kedesh in Naphtali, Shechem in mount Ephraim, Hebron in the hill country of Judah, W. of Jordan; Bezer in Reuben, Ramoth in Gilead [Gad], Golan in Manasseh, E. of Jordan,) he was safe till the elders of the city, and then those of his own city, decided whether it was an involuntary act. In this case he was kept safe from the avenger in the city of refuge, so long as he did not go 2000 cubits beyond its precincts. After the highpriest's death he might return home in safety (Num. xxxv. 25, 28; Josh. xx. 4-6). The roads were to be kept clear, that nothing might retard the flight of the manslayer, to whom every moment was precious (Deut. xix. 3). Jewish tradition adds that posts inscribed "Refuge," "Refuge," were to be set up at the cross roads. All necessities of water, etc., were in the cities. No implements of war were allowed there. The law of retaliation in blood affected only the manslayer, and not also (as among heathen nations) his relatives (Deut. xxiv. 16). Blood revenge still prevails in Corsica.

The law of blood avenging by the nearest kinsman, though incompatible with our ideas in a more civilized age and nation, is the means of preventing much bloodshed among the Arabs; and its introduction into the law of Israel, a kindred race, accords with the provisional character of the whole Mosaic system which establishes not what is also lately best, supposing a state of optimism, but what was best under existing circumstances. Moreover, it contained an important typical lesson, hinted at in Heb. vi. 18, ii. 14, 15. The Son of man, as He to whom the Father hath committed all judgment, is the goel or avenger of blood on guilty man, involved by Satan the "murderer from the beginning" in murderous rebellion against God. He, in another sense, is the goel or redeemer of man, as the highpriest whose death sets the shut up captive free; He is also the priestly city of refuge (His priestly office being the mean of our salvation), by fleeing into which man is safe; but in this latter sense, as our Highpriest "ever liveth," we must not only enter the city, and moreover abide in Him, but also abide in Him for ever for eternal safety (John xv. 1-11). "The way" to Him is clearly pointed out by God Himself (Isa. xxx. 21). "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope" (Zech. ix. 12). Once in Christ, He can defy avenging justice (Rom. viii. 33, 34).

Boanerges. "Sons of thunder."

The Aramaic name given to James and John by Jesus. Heb. B'nee regesh. Their fiery zeal appears in (Luke ix. 54) their desiring the Lord's permission that they should command fire from heaven (like Elias) to consume the Samaritans who would not receive Him, "because His face was as though He would go to Jerusalem." Also in (Mark ix. 38) their forbidding one casting out demons in Christ's name, because he followed not with them. Comp. also their ambition for the highest place in Christ's kingdom, next Himself (Mark ix. 35-41). Grace subsequently corrected this zeal without knowledge, making James the willing martyr (Acts xii.) and John the apostle of gentleness and love. Still the old zeal against perverters of the truth as it is in Jesus appears in 2 John 10, 11, 3 John 10.

Boar. The flesh of "swine" (domestic) was forbidden food to Israel. Eating it was the token of apostasy under Antiochus Epiphanes' persecution, and is mentioned among Judah's provocations of Jehovah (Isa. lxx. 4, lxxi. 17). E. of the sea of Galilee, some Gadarenes are mentioned as having a herd of 2000. Probably they refrained themselves from the flesh, and compromised between conscience and covetousness by selling them to their neighbours the Gentiles. But they gained nothing by the compromise, for the whole herd perished in the waters, in judicial retribution. The Lord of the land, peculiarly set apart as the Holy Land, finds it defiled with demons and unclean beasts. The demons beg leave not to be sent to the abyss of torment, but into the swine. With His leave they do so, and the swine rush down the steep and perish in the waters. Instead of gratitude for the deliverance, the Gadarenes prefer their swine, though at the cost of the demons' presence, to the Saviour at the cost of sacrificing their swine; so they entreat Him to "depart out of their coasts," forgetting His word, "Woe to them when I depart from them" (Isos. ix. 12); a striking contrast to him who was delivered from the demons and who "prayed that he might be with Jesus" (Mark v. 15-18). The lowest point of the prodigal's degradation was when he was sent into the fields to feed swine (Luke xv. 15). The sensual professor's backsliding into "the pollutions of the world," after he has "escaped them through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour," is fitly compared to "the sow that was washed returning to her wallowing in the mire" (2 Pet. ii. 20-22). "As a jewel of gold (worn often by women as 'nose jewels,' Isa. iii. 21) in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion" (Heb. taste, i.e. without moral perception of what is pure and impure) (Prov. xi. 22). The brutish stolidity of those who appreciate only what gratifies their own foul appetites disqualifies them for appreciating heavenly mysteries; to present these holy truths to them would be as unwise as to cast pearls before swine, which would only trample them under foot (Matt. vii. 6).

The wild boar is mentioned once only (Ps. lxxx. 13). Its destroying a vineyard partly by eating the grapes, partly by trampling the vines under foot, is the image of the heathen world power's ravaging of Israel, Jehovah's choice vine, transplanted from Egypt into the Holy Land. Pooche saw large herds among the reeds of Jordan, where it flows into the sea of Galilee; and so it is sculptured on Assyrian monuments as among reeds. Its Heb. name, chazir, is from a root to roll in the mud.

Boaz. Explained in marg. 1 Kings vii. 15-21, "in it [is] strength." Others, floodness. 1. Of Bethlehem: Elimelech's (Naomi's husband's) kinsman. When the next of kin to Ruth, Naomi's daughter in law, declined to do the part of redeemer (goel) [see Broom] of the inheritance of her deceased husband Mahlon (comp. Deut. xxv. 5-10), B. did so by marrying her, though much her senior (Ruth iii. 10). Their son Obed was grandfather of David. There being no objection to an Israelite's marriage with a Moabite's marks an early date (contrast Ezra ix.). David's descent from Ruth the Moabitess accounts for the intimacy of David with the king of Moab, so that it was with him he left his father and mother in his flight from Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 3-5); an undesigned coincidence between the books of Samuel and Ruth, a mark of genuineness (comp. Ps. xxvii. 10). In the genealogy (Ruth iv. 18-22) several, at least three, generations must be inserted, as the list there only allows ten generations for 850 years, and only four for the 450 years between Salmon and David.

2. The name of one of the two brazen pillars in Solomon's temple porch, on the left, as Jachin was on the right. The difference of the height as given in 1 Kings vii. 15, 21, 2 Chron. iii. 15, arises from the height in one place including, in the other place excluding, the ornament which united the shaft to the chapter (comp. Jer. hi. 17-21). The pillars, which were hollow, were broken up and carried to Babylon at the fall of Jerusalem before Nebuchadnezzar.

Bocheru. 1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44. Son of Azel. But the LXX. reads Bochoru, "his firstborn." [See BECHER.]

Bochim=the weepers. A place W. of Jordan, above Gilgal (Jud. ii. 1, 5). "The [Heb.] angel of the Lord [the Second Person in the Trinity, "the Lord," Exod. xxiii. 20] came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you go up out of Egypt," etc. He identifies Himself with Jehovah, as no created angel would do. Their sacrificing to the Lord at Bochim, where there was no sanctuary, implies that the angel was Jehovah Himself, whose appearing at any place justified the offering of sacrifices there (Jud. vi. 20, 26, 28; 2 Sam. xxiv. 25). The mention of His coming up "from Gilgal to Bochim" is not so much a geographical as a spiritual intimation. The Angel Prince of Jehovah's host announced to Joshua at Gilgal the fall of Jericho, directly after their rolling away the reproach of Egypt by circumcision, whence the place got its name (Gilgal meaning "rolling") (Josh. v. 2-15). As there they entered into covenant with the Lord with the ritual act of self-consecration, and so were assured of victory from the Lord, so here at B. (unknown geographically) the Divine Angel makes known to them that by their making peace with the Canaanites, instead of rooting them out, they have broken the covenant and so must pay the penalty. It is implied that the same Angel who was Israel's champion at Gilgal is now manifesting Himself as Israel's punisher, by means of those very Canaanites whose residence permitted among them was their sin. Shiloh, not Gilgal, was the place of meeting for the nation at the tabernacle set up there (Josh. xviii. 1-10). Comp. the phrase, "O My people, remember now from Shittim unto Gilgal" (Mic. vi. 5): not so much a geographical notice as a reference to the people's spiritual and national obligations to God in connection with those places.

Bohan=the thumb. A son of Reuben (not mentioned in Exod. vi. 14, Num. xvi. 5, 1 Chron. v. 3), after whom a stone was named. Probably commemorating some achievement of his in the conquest of Palestine (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 17). It was a boundary mark between Judah and Benjamin, the exact point where the mountains W. of the Dead Sea change their direction to the eye. Now called "the stone of the finger," Hadjar el Asbah. Gannean observes that a rock on an isolated peak on the hill side resembles a fast closed with the thumb raised; the name of this peak probably was transferred to the fallen block close by, viz. Hadjar el Asbah.

Bolster. The pillow of goat's hair which Michal put for a bolster (1 Sam. xix. 13) was probably a curtain to protect the sleeper from mosquitoes, or a counterpane, with which sleepers in the East protect the head and face. Kebit means something woven, from kabar "to weave." The indefinite article implies it was one of the articles of regular use, as a counterpane or veil woven of goat's hair to cover the head and face while sleeping.

Bones. The framework of the body; so the breaking of them expresses overwhelming sorrow, which prostrates body and mind (Isa. xxxviii. 13). As the surgeon must sometimes break a bone to save a patient lameness for life, so God breaks that He may heal. Self will and self-righteousness must be broken, that we may run the way of God's commandments. When one has a "broken and contrite heart," "the bones which God has broken rejoice" (Ps. li. 8, 17). Not a bone of Jesus was broken, as antitype of the paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 46; John xix. 33, 36).

Book. "Eat . . . a roll of a book" (Ezek. ii. 8, 9), meaning, appropriate its contents in thy mind so entirely that it shall become part of thyself

(iii. 2). God's messenger must first inwardly possess as his own and himself digest the truth of God before he can speak it effectually to others, to their believing appropriation of it (Rev. x. 9). Jer. xv. 16 is the inspired explanation of the phrase: "Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and Thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of my heart."

ANCIENT SCROLLS.

A seal secured books anciently, when designed to be kept secret. A book was then a roll of paper, often written within and on the back (Rev. v. 1), so as not to be wholly readable till the seal was broken. The fragments readable outside would excite curiosity and the desire to read the whole. Precisely the nature of God's roll of inspired Scripture, the successive parts being unfolded as God's grand scheme of redemption develops itself; the parts revealed whetting the desire for more and more, until the whole stands forth in its finally consummated perfection. Unbelief seals up to many (however learned) even what is revealed. Docile, childlike receptivity is needed (Isa. xxix. 11; Matt. xiii. 10-17, xi. 25). Prophecy in the O. T. was comparatively a sealed volume till Jesus, who "alone is worthy," opened the seals" (Dan. xii. 4-9). John reveals what Daniel veils; therefore Daniel is told to "seal the book," John "not to seal the book" (Rev. xvii. 10). Daniel's book was sealed because referring to the then distant future; John's unsealed because the events foretold were immediately to begin their fulfilment.

"The book of the living" (Ps. lxxix. 28); Phil. iv. 3, "the book of life." All the Israelites who came up out of Egypt were entered in a muster roll of the living citizens, called "the writing of the house of Israel," "the book of life" (Ezek. xiii. 9). Those who died were erased each year. An image of God's book of predestination to eternal life (Ps. cxxxix. 16, lxxxvii. 6; Exod. xxxii. 32; Dan. xii. 1; Luke x. 20; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. xiii. 8, xvii. 8, xvi. 27). In man's point of view it has in it names of highly privileged professors who have but a name to live, but are dead spiritually, and therefore may be blotted out, as was Judas (Rev. iii. 5; Matt. xiii. 12, xxv. 29); but in God's point of view it contains those only who are never blotted out, but elected finally to life (John x. 28, 29; Acts xiii. 48; Rev. xx. 12, 15), "written among the living in (the heavenly) Jerusalem" (Isa. iv. 3).

Booths. [See Succoth, and FEAST OF TABERNACLES.]

Booty. Within Canaan no captives were to be made; all that breathed were to be destroyed (Deut. xx. 14, 16); but outside, if resistance were offered, the women and children were to be made captives the men slain.

Pictures and images, as temptations to idolatry, were to be destroyed (Num. xxxiii. 52). In the case of Amalek the very cattle Saul was commanded to destroy (1 Sam. xv. 2, 3). So also in the case of Arad (Num. xxi. 1-3) and Jericho, where everything was put under the cherem or curse and became the Lord's (Josh. vi. 19-21). Abraham devoted one tenth of the spoil of Sodom, rescued from Chedorlaomer, to Jehovah through Melchizedek, the king-priest (Gen. xiv. 19-21). David "made a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day" that the part of the army which guarded the families and baggage should share equally in the spoil with the troops actually engaged. The occasion of its enactment was upon the capture of immense spoil from Amalek, a part of it recovered property of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 25, etc.). He also sent presents of the spoil to those of the elders of Judah who were his friends. Indeed by the law (Num. xxxi. 26-47) booty was to be shared equally between the army engaged and Israel; only that of the former half only one fifth part was appropriated to the priests of God, of the latter one fifth to the Levites. The spoils dedicated by David and his chiefs to the temple were freewill offerings (2 Sam. viii. 11, 1 Chron. xvi. 27).

Borrow. In Exod. iii. 22, xii. 35, 36, not in the sense of taking on loan, which has given a handle for scoffers as if the Israelites borrowed what they did not return, and so perloined from the Egyptians. Shaal means only to ask: the Israelites asked, and "the Egyptians MADE THEM ASK," i.e. urged them to ask, so eager were they to get them away, through fear of the plagues, which Exod. xi. 8 confirms, also Ps. cv. 37, 38; they allowed them to ask (not "lent"), i.e. received favourably their asking, jewels of silver, gold, and raiment, yea, even urged them to ask for more than the Israelites at first asked. The Egyptians could not for a moment have expected the Israelites would return them; for Jehovah's demand, "Let My people go, that they may serve Me," enforced by the rapidly successive plagues, must have convinced the Egyptians that Israel had before them some far more momentous movement than a three days' march to a feast. The Egyptians' gifts, though outwardly seeming to flow from their goodwill, if viewed more deeply were the result of Jehovah's constraining power, which made them just and generous in spite of themselves. As they had spoiled Israel by the bondservice unremunerated, so Israel, Jehovah's host (Exod. xii. 41), marched forth "with an high hand" (xiv. 8), "by strength of Jehovah's hand" (xiii. 16), having "spoiled" their spoilers, an earnest of the saints' and Israel's final victory over the world powers and the prince of this world (Zech. xiv. 14). In 1 Sam. i. 28 the same Heb. verb ought not to be translated "I lent him to the Lord . . . he shall be lent to the Lord," but "I also (on my part in return for His favour) make him one asked of the Lord [and therefore returned to the Lord, see marg.]; . . . he shall be as one asked of (and therefore returned to) the Lord."

Bosom. The nearest friend reclining on a couch at a feast lay in the bosom of his friend, as John "on Jesus' bosom" (xiii. 23); Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, i.e. figuratively for in a high place at the heavenly banquet (Luke xvi. 23). It implies closest and secret intimacy (2 Sam. xii. 8); the Son in the bosom of the Father with whom He is One (John i. 18); the lambs carried in the bosom of the Good Shepherd (Isa. xl. 11).

Bosses. The projecting centre of a shield. Job xv. 26: "he (the rebel) runneth upon Him (God), even on (rather with) his neck (i.e. the rebel's haughtily uplifted neck, Ps. lxxv. 5); upon (rather with) the thick bosses of his (the rebel's, not God's) bucklers." The rebel and his fellows, as it were, join shield to shield as a compact covering against the Almighty's darts. What suicidal folly! for "the shields of the earth belong unto God" (Ps. xlvii. 9). The invading godless Gog and Magog's shields Israel shall "set on fire" (Ezek. xxxix. 9).

Bottle. Of two kinds: (1) Of skin or leather, used for carrying water, wine, and milk.

SKIN BOTTLES.

A goatskin whole, the apertures at the feet and tail being bound up, and when filled tied at the neck. They are tanned with acacia bark and left hairy at the outside. The Gibeonites' bottles were rent, as they pretended, with their distant journey (Josh. ix. 4, 13). New wines by fermenting would rend "old bottles" of skin (Matt. ix. 17). It is therefore put in new goatskin bottles, and without a vent to work off the fermentation strains even them. So Elihu, the young friend of Job, after the older ones had failed to comfort him, compares himself, filled with the spirit which inspired him so as to be full of words seeking for utterance, to new bottles of wine: "my belly is as wine which hath no vent, it is ready to burst like new bottles" (Job xxxii. 19). Hung in the smoke to dry, the skin bottles become parched and shrivelled; whence the psalmist (cxix. 83) says, "I am become like a bottle in the smoke." Skins for wine are still used in Spain, called borrachas. (2) Bottles of glass or "potters'" earthenware, easily "dashed in pieces": a frequent image of sinners, God's creatures (Rom. ix. 21-23; 2 Tim. ii. 20, 21) dashed in pieces by God their Maker at His righteous pleasure when they do not answer His end, namely His glory (Jer. xiii. 12-14, xix. 1-10; Ps. n. 9; Rev. ii. 27). The Egyptian monuments illustrate the pottery and glass work of that country fifteen hundred years B.C. The clouds pouring down water are figuratively "the bottles of heaven" (Job xxxviii. 37). "Who can stay (rather, incline, so as to empty out and pour) the bottles of heaven?" the rain filled clouds.

"Put Thon my tears (as a precious treasure in Thy sight) into Thy bottle" (the repository of precious objects, sealed up anciently), so as to reserve them for a manifold recompence of joy hereafter (Ps. cxxvi. 5, Isa. lxi. 7).

Bow: rainbow. God, after the flood, took the rainbow, previously but a natural object of sight, shining beautifully in the sky, when the sun's rays are refracted through falling rain at different angles and so produce different prismatic colours, and elevated it to spiritual significance, to be to Noah and the world the sign of His love and pledge of His sparing mercy, that He would no more destroy the earth with waters. The language in Genesis gives no reason for supposing the writer ignorant of the natural cause of the rainbow, as if he made God then for the first time setting it in the sky. So nathan, "give," means appoint in Num. xiv. 4, 1 Sam. xii. 13, 1 Kings ii. 35. It is the pledge of "the world's covenant, not the church's, a charter of natural blessings." "Set" means simply, "I do appoint My bow in the cloud" (Gen. ix. 13-16). In Ezek. i. 28 and Rev. iv. 3 the rainbow round about the throne of Jehorah is the symbol of mercy to God's children amidst coming judgments on the wicked. Though the Divine righteousness requires a deluge of wrath on the faithless, God's faithfulness will only shine forth on the elect remnant the brighter for the tribulation that necessarily precedes (comp. Isa. liv. 8-10). The complete circle typifies God's perfection and eternity, not broken into a half, as the earthly rainbow. As the various prismatic colours unite to form one pure ray, so God's varied providences combine in one harmonious whole. As the rainbow was reflected on the waters of the world's ruin, and is seen only when a cloud is over the earth, so another deluge of fire shall precede the "new heavens and earth" granted to redeemed man, as the earth after the flood was restored to Noah. The cloud was the token of God's presence in Israel's wilderness journey and in the holiest place of the temple; and on mount Sinai at the giving of the law; and at the Lord's ascension (Acts i. 9), and at His coming again (Rev. i. 7). The bow represents calm sunshine after the world's shipwreck through sin. It is the emblem of God's loving faithfulness to His covenant with His people, and the pledge of sure hope to them.

Bowels: including the heart, the seat of the affections and emotions. "My bowels are troubled for him," viz. with tender yearnings of compassionate love (Jer. xxxi. 20, Isa. lxiii. 15, Hos. xi. 8, Phil. ii. 1).

Bowls. Round and hollow. Babylonian bowls are to be seen in the British Museum, with Chaldean inscriptions, probably designed as charms against evil and sickness (comp. Joseph's "divining cup," Gen. xlv. 5). The writing is of a Heb. type, and may have belonged to the descendants of the Jewish captives in Babylon.

Box. Isa. xli. 19, lx. 13: rather the scherbini, a cedar remarkable for its small cones and upright branches; boasshur from ashur, to be upright. Some read this in Ezek. xxvii. 6, instead of "the Ashurites." Maurer trans.: "they have made thy benches of ivory inlaid in the daughter of cedars," or the best boxwood. The box when not trimmed grows often 25 feet high. The wood, hard and firm, so as to be the only European wood that sinks in water, is used now especially for inlaying and wood engraving, and takes a fine polish.

Bozez=shining. The name of one of two "sharp rocks" (Heb. "tooth of the cliff"), on the N. side "over against Michmash," "between the passages" whereby Jonathan entered the Philistines' garrison (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5).

Bozkath. A city of the shephelah or low land of Judah (Josh. xv. 39, 2 Kings xxii. 1), to which Josiah's grandmother belonged.

Bozrah: from a root "restrain," a sheepfold, LXX. version of Jer. xlii. 22. Jobab is styled "of B." (Gen. xxxvi. 33) among the kings of Edom (1 Chron. i. 44). 1. Now El-busaireh, containing about 50 houses and a castle on a hill, in the mountain district S.E. of the Dead Sea, half way between Petra and the Dead Sea. Berekhardt saw goats in large numbers there, just as Isaiah (xxxiv. 6) describes; comp. lxiii. 1, Amos i. 12, Mic. ii. 12.

2. Another B. in Moab, in "the plain country," i.e. the high level downs E. of the Dead Sea (Jer. xlviii. 21, 24), enumerated among the cities of Moab. The B. of Edom on the mountains (xlix. 13) and Edom's other cities are to be "perpetual wastes"; but the B. of Moab "in the plain" is to be restored "in the latter days" (Jer. xlviii. 47). Though not mentioned elsewhere, this B. of Moab, where kings were "sheepmasters" (2 Kings iii. 4), would be a name (meaning "sheepfold") of probable occurrence. Others identify this B. with the Roman Bostra in Bashan, 60 miles from Heshbon, containing magnificent remains; Jeremiah's including the cities "far and near" may favour this view; but ver. 21, "in the plain," seems to mark it among the other Moabite cities.

Bracelet. [See ARMLET, which encircled the arm, as BRACELETS the wrist.] In Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, instead of "bracelets" translate (pat-hib) "the ribbon" or guard by which Judah's signet was suspended to his neck. In Isa. iii. 19 wreathed chainwork bracelets are meant, as the root of sheerah implies. Bracelets of fine twisted gold are still common in Egypt. Men wore them as well as women. The Assyrian kings had "in the centre of their stars and rosettes, probably inlaid with precious stones" (Layard). In Exod. xxxv. 22, for "bracelets" (chach) translate clasp or ring (lit. "a hook"). The "bracelet on Sam's arm," i.e. armlet, was one of the insignia of royalty found after his death (2 Sam. i. 10).

Bramble (otad). Not our English trailing blackberries; but the Paliurus rhamnus aculeatus, a lowly stunted tree with drooping jagged branches, from which project sharp stiff thorns, affording no shade, but only scratching those who touched it; fit emblem of the self-important, petty, but mischievous speaker (answering to Abimelech) in Jotham's parable (Jud. ix. 8-20), the oldest fable extant. The "bramble bush" (Luke vi. 44) is probably the same as Christ's thorn (Zizyphus spina Christi) supposed to be the kind of which Christ's crown of thorns was platted; a shrub about six feet high, producing an acid fruit as large as the sloe; the prickles grow in pairs, the one straight, the other curved back. The neck of the Arabs, common everywhere, easily procurable, and pliable for plating, the leaves a deep green like the ivy; so suited to be a mock crown in imitation of the garlands or crowns with which emperors and generals used to be crowned.

Branch. "The branch of Jehovah" (Isa. iv. 2), the sprout of Jehovah, Messiah (Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12; Luke i. 78 marg.). Fruit bearing, so as to "fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6). He is at once a "branch" and a "root" (Isa. xi. 1, liii. 2). "The root and offspring (offshoot) of David" (Rev. xxii. 16), the Brother of man and the Source of manhood. Luke ii. 7 shows the depressed state of David's royal line, represented by Joseph and Mary, at the time when Jesus was born "out of the stem of Jesse" (the stump cut close to the roots at that time); "a root out of a dry ground." Perfect purity and grace were wrapt up under the root's seemingly unattractive scales. Sin had dried up the life of the humanity out of which He sprang. Degenerate human nature, even Judaism, could never have produced Him. Though rooted in the dry ground of earth, He had a heavenly and self-derived life. Believers being such "as He is in this world" (1 John iv. 17) are also "branches" in Him the living vine, yielding fruit instinctively, spontaneously, naturally, their love corresponding to His (John xv.), "the branch of My planting" (Isa. ix. 21). "An abominable branch," a useless sucker cut away by the husbandman; else the tree's branch on which a malefactor was hung, and which was buried with him. "They put the branch to their nose" (Ezek. viii. 17), expressing insolent security; they turn up their nose with scorn, or rather they held up a branch of tamarisk to their nose at daybreak, whilst singing hymns to the rising sun.

Brass. With us a mixed metal, consisting of copper and zinc; but the brass of the Bible is one dug simple out of the earth (Deut. viii. 9, Job xxviii. 2), probably copper. Bronze, a composition of copper and tin, extensively known in ancient times, may in some passages be meant. In Dent. xxxiii. 25, "thy shoes shall be iron and brass," it is implied Asher should have a mine abounding territory. Keil and Delitzsch translate, "iron and brass shall be thy castle" (min'al); Asher's dwellings were to be impregnable as if of iron and brass. Copper was used earlier than iron, its ductility being its recommendation for general use. Tubalcain is termed "the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron" (Gen. iv. 22). "Brass" is used in a good sense for strength (Is. cvii. 16, Jer. i. 18). In a bad sense, for impudent stubbornness (Isa. xlviii. 4, Jer. vi. 28). For money, Matt. x. 9. In Lev. xxvi. 19, "I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass," i.e. hard, yielding no rain, and producing no fruit. "Flesh of brass," i.e. invulnerable (Job vi. 12). The thighs of brass in Nebuchadnezzar's image (Dan. ii. 32) represent the brave armed Greeks. In Rev. i. 15, "His feet like unto fine brass," rather, "glowing brass, as if they had been made red hot in a furnace."

Bread. First undoubtedly mentioned in Gen. xviii. 6. The best being made of wheat; the inferior of barley, used by the poor, and in scarcity (John vi. 9, 13; Rev. iv. 6; 2 Kings iv. 38, 42). An ephah or "three measures" was the amount of meal required for a single baking, answering to the size of the oven (Matt. xiii. 33). The mistress of the house and even a king's daughter did not think baking beneath them (2 Sam. xiii. 8). Besides there were public bakers (Hos. vii. 4), and in Jerusalem a street tenanted by bakers (Jer. xxxvii. 21); Nehemiah mentions "the tower of the furnaces," or ovens (iii. 11, xii. 38). Their loaf was thinner in shape and crisper than ours, whence comes the phrase, not cutting, but breaking bread (Matt. xiv. 19; Acts xx. 7, 11). Exod. xii. 34 implies the small size of their kneading troughs, for they were "bound up in their clothes (the outer garment, a large square cloth) upon their shoulders." As bread was made in thin cakes it soon became dry, as the Gibeonites alleged as to their bread (Josh. ix. 12), and so fresh bread was usually baked every day, which usage gives point to "give us day by day our daily bread" (Luke xi. 3). When the kneading was completed leaven was added; but when time was short unleavened cakes were hastily baked, as is the present Bedouin usage; termed in Exod. xii. 8-20 matzoth, i.e. pure loaves, having no leaven, which ferments the dough and so produces corruption, and is therefore symbol of mortal corruption (1 Cor. v. 8); therefore excluded from the passover, as also to commemorate the haste of Israel's departure. Leaven was similarly excluded from sacrifices (Lev. ii. 11).

BAKERS BREAD

The leavened dough was sometimes exposed to a moderate heat all night whilst the baker slept: Hos. vii. 4-6; "as an oven heated by the baker who ceaseth from raising (rather, heating) after he hath kneaded the dough, until it be leavened; for they have made ready their heart like an oven, whilst they lie in wait . . . their baker sleepeth all the night; in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire." Their heart was like an oven first heated by Satan, then left to burn with the pent up fire of their corrupt passions. Like the baker sleeping at night, Satan rests secure that at the first opportunity the hidden fires will break forth, ready to execute whatever evil he suggests. The bread was divided into round cakes, or "loaves," three of which sufficed for one person's meal (Luke xi. 5). "Bread of affliction" or "adversity" would be a quantity less than this (1 Kings xxii. 27, Isa. xxx. 20). Oil was sometimes mixed with the flour. There were also cakes of finer flour, called "heart cakes" (as our "cordial" is derived from cor, "the heart"), a heart strengthening pastry (2 Sam. xiii. 8-10 marg.), a pancake, possibly with stimulant seeds in it, quickly made; such as Tamar prepared and shook out (not "poured" as a liquid) from the pan, for Amnon. The loaves used to be taken to the oven in a basket upon the head (Gen. xl. 16), which exactly accords with Egyptian usage, men carrying burdens on their heads, women on their shoulders. The variety of Egyptian confectionery is evident from the monuments still extant. The "white baskets" may mean "baskets of white bread." The oven of each house was a stone or metal jar, heated inwardly, often with dried "grass" (illustrating Matt. vi. 30). When the fire burned down the cakes were applied inwardly or outwardly. Cakes were sometimes baked on heated stones, or between layers of dung, the slow burning of which adapts it for baking (Ezek. iv. 15). They needed to be turned in baking, like Scotch oateakes. Hos. vii. 8, "Ephraim is a cake not turned": burnt on one side, unbaked on the other, the fire spoiling, not penetrating it; so religious professors, outwardly warm, inwardly cold; on one side overdone, on the other not vitally influenced at all; Jesus professing great "zeal for the Lord," really zealous for themselves.

Brick. The earliest were those used in building Babel, of clay burned in the fire. Gen. xi. 3, "Let us make brick, and burn them thoroughly (marg. burn them to a burning). And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar." So Herodotus states that in building Babylon's walls the clay dug out of the ditch was made into bricks, being burnt in kilns. The bricks were cemented with hot bitumen (asphalte), and at every thirtieth row reeds were staked in. The materials were ready to their hands, clay and bitumen bubbling up from the ground. But in Assyria and Egypt the bricks are sundried, not fireburnt, though in Jer. xliii. 9 a brickkiln is mentioned in Egypt. The Babylonian are larger than English bricks, being about 13 in. square, and 3½ in. thick; more like our tiles, and often enamelled with patterns (comp. Ezek. iv. 1); such have been found at Nimrud. The Babylonians used to record astronomical observations on tiles. Nebuchadnezzar's buildings superseded those of his predecessors; hence most of the Babylonian bricks bear his name in cuneiform character. The Egyptian are from 15 to 20 in. long, 7 wide, 5 thick. Those of clay from the torrent beds near the desert need no straw, and are as solid now as when put up in the reigns of the Egyptian kings before the exodus. Those made of Nile mud need straw to prevent cracking; and frequently a layer of reeds at intervals acted as binders. In the paintings on the tomb of Rekhshara, an officer of Thothmes III. (1400 B.C.), captives, distinguished from the natives by colour, are represented as forced by taskmasters to make brick; the latter armed with sticks are receiving "the tale of bricks." This may be a picture of the Israelites in their Egyptian bondage; at least it strikingly illustrates it.

In Assyria artificial mounds, encased with limestone blocks, raised the superstructure 30 or 40 feet above the level of the plain. The walls of crude brick were cased with gypsum slabs to the height of 10 feet; kiln-burned bricks cased the crude bricks from the slabs to the top of the wall. The brickkiln is mentioned in David's time as in use in Israel (2 Sam. xii. 31); they in Isaiah's time (lxv. 3) substituted altars of brick for the unhewn stone which God commanded.

Bridge. The only hint of bridges in Scripture is the proper name Geshur, in Bashan, N.E. of the sea of Galilee. The Israelites forded their rivers, but had no bridges to cross over them. A bridge of planks on stone piers was constructed by Nitoeiris, 600 B.C., to connect the parts of Babylon together (Jer. li. 31, 32; 1. 38). The arch was known in Egypt 15 centuries B.C., yet the Romans were the first to construct arched bridges. Remains of their bridges over the Jordan and the Syrian rivers, notably at Beyrût, still exist. The most remarkable one is Jacob's Bridge over the upper Jordan near lake Hoolah.

Bridle. Isa. xxxvii. 29, "I will put My hook in thy nose and My bridle in thy lips," is illustrated in the Assyrian monuments, which represent captives with bridles attached to rings inserted in their under lip, and held in the hand of the king; some of the captives with short beards, tasselled caps, long tunics, and bosen or boots (Dan. iii. 21), seem in physiognomy Jews, or Israelites of the ten tribes. The king in one representation is thrusting out the captive's eye with a spear, as Zedekiah was treated by Nebuchadnezzar.

Brier. Jud. viii. 7, 16: "Gideon said, I will tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness and with briers." Gesenius for "briers" translates "with threshing machines with stones or flints underneath," barquan being iron pyrites. But the A. V. is supported by the old versions; prickly plants such as grow on stony ground. In Ezek. ii. 6 Gesenius translates as marg., "rebels"; "though rebellious men like thorns be with thee." But "briers" answers better to "thorns" which follows: sarabim from saraph, "to sting." The wicked are often so called (2 Sam. xxiii. 6, S. of Sol. ii. 2). In Isa. lv. 13 "instead of the brier (sirpad) shall come up the myrtle tree." The sirpad, from saraph "to sting," and sophad "to prick," is the nettle.

Brigandine. Jer. xli. 4, lv. 3: sirion, a coat of mail, or scale armour, worn by the light troops called brigands.

Brimstone: gaphrith, akin to gopher wood, and so expressing any inflammable substance, as sulphur, which burns with a suffocating smell. It is a mineral found in quantities on the shores of the Dead Sea. It was the instrument used in destroying Sodom and Gomorrah, the adjoining cities of the plain (Gen. xix. 24), for Divine miracle does not supersede the use of God's existing natural agents, but moves in connection with them. An image of every visitation of God's vengeance on the ungodly, especially of the final one (Dent. xxix. 23; Job xviii. 15; Ps. xi. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 9; Ezek. xxxviii. 22; Rev. xix. 20, xx. 10, xxi. 8).

Brook: aphiq. A torrent sweeping through a mountain gorge, in the poetical books alone. Yeor, the Nile canals, Isa. xix. 6-8, xxiii. 3, 10, but general in Dan. xii. 5-7. Mitch, a rivulet (2 Sam. xvii. 20). Nachal, the torrent bed, and the torrent itself (Num. xxi. 12, 1 Kings xvii. 3); the Arabic wady; Indian nullah; Greek cheimarrhos.

Brother. Includes, besides sons of the same parents, cousins and near relatives, as a nephew (Gen. xiii. 8, xiv. 16; Deut. xxv. 5, 6 marg.). One of the same tribe (2 Sam. xix. 12). Of the same or a kindred people (Exod. ii. 11, Num. xx. 14). A friend (Job vi. 15). A fellow man (Lev. xix. 17). "A brother to (i.e. a fellow on a level with) the dragons" or "jackals" (Job xxx. 29).

As the outer pagan world knew believers by the name "Christian," so they knew one another by the name "brethren" (Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; comp. Matt. xxv. 40, Acts xi. 29). The Jews distinguished a "brother" as an Israelite by birth, and a "neighbour" as a proselyte, and allowed neither title to the Gentiles. But Christ applied "brother" to all Christians, and "neighbour" to all the world (1 Cor. v. 11; Luke x. 29, 30).

The arguments for the "brethren" of Jesus (James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas) mentioned in Matt. xiii. 56 being literally His brothers, born of Joseph and Mary, are: (1) their names are always connected with Mary, "His brethren" is the phrase found nine times in the Gospels, once in Acts (i. 14); (2) nothing is said to imply that the phrase is not to be taken literally. But: (1) "My brethren" is found in the wide sense (Matt. xxviii. 10, John xx. 17). (2) If Joseph had been their father, they would have been some one time at least designated in the usual mode "sons of Joseph." The statement that His "brethren did not believe in Him" (John vii. 5) may refer to His near relations generally, excepting the two apostles James (who is expressly called "the Lord's brother," Gal. i. 19) and Jude (Jude 1). In Acts i. 14 His "brethren," as distinct from the apostles, may refer to Simon and Joseph and other near relatives. It is not likely there would be two pairs of brothers named alike, of such eminence; James and Jude His brethren are, most probably, the writers of the epistles. (3) It is expressly stated that Mary, wife of Cleophas and sister of the Virgin Mary (John xix. 25), had sons, of whom James and Joseph are named (Matt. xxvii. 56, Mark xv. 40). How unlikely that two mothers of the same name, Mary the Virgin and her sister, should have sons also bearing the same names. (4) If the Virgin had had sons of her own, Jesus would not have given her in charge to John (xix. 26), who was not a relative. (5) It is a fitting thing that in Jesus the line of David should have its final consummation. The naming of Jesus' brethren with His virgin mother so often may be because Jesus and she took up their abode at the home of Mary, the Virgin's sister, after Joseph's death; for that he soon died appears from his name being never mentioned after Luke ii. Hence the cousins would grow up as brothers. The very difficulty implies the absence of collusion or mythical origin in the gospel narrative. "Firstborn son" (Matt. i. 25) does not imply that any sons were born of the Virgin afterwards, but that none were born before Him. Exod. xiii. 2 defines "the firstborn" "whatsoever openeth the womb"; whether other children followed or not. "Knew her not until" does not necessarily imply he even then knew her; comp. Gen. xxviii. 15, "I will not leave thee until I have done," not meaning He would leave Jacob even then. The main truth asserted is the virginity of Mary up to Jesus' birth. What was afterwards is not clearly revealed, being of less consequence to us.

Bukki. 1. Abishua's son; father of Uzzi; fifth in the highpriestly line through Eleazar from Aaron (1 Chron. vi. 5, 51). Abishua seems to have had the highpriesthood; but it, not so, the office having passed to the house of Ithamar, until Zadok, of the family of Eleazar, was made highpriest in David's reign. 2. Son of Jozhi, and prince of Dan, one of the ten chosen to divide Canaan among the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 22).

Bukkiath (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 13). Leader of the sixth course of musicians in the temple service; "of the sons of Heman, the king's seer in the words of God."

Bull. Used as synonymous with ox in the A. V. Baqqar is the Heb. for horned cattle fit for the plough. Tor is one head of horned cattle, akin to our steer. Egel, a calf, properly of the first year; especially one offered in sacrifice. Hos. xiv. 2: "so shall we render the calves of our lips;" instead of sacrifices of calves, which we cannot offer to Thee in exile, we present the praises of our lips. The exile, by its enforced cessation of sacrifices during Israel's separation from the temple, the only lawful place of offering them, prepared the people for the superseding of all sacrifices by the one great antitypical sacrifice; henceforth "the sacrifice of praise continually, the fruit of our lips," is what God requires (Heb. xiii. 15). The abrim express "strong bulls" (Ps. xxii. 12, 13, lxviii. 30). Caesar describes wild bulls of the Heremyian forest, strong and swift, almost as large as elephants, and savage. The Assyrian remains depict similarly the wild urus. The ancient forest round London was infested with them. The wild bull (toh) in Isa. li. 20, "thy sons lie at the head of all the streets as a wild bull in a net," seems to be of the antelope kind. Antelope bubalis, the "wild ox" of the Arabs; often depicted in Egyptian remains as chased not for slaughter, but for capture, it being easily domesticated.

Bulrush. Agmon, from agam, a marsh. "The head or tail, branch or rush," i.e. high or low; the lofty palm branch, or the humble reed (Isa. ix. 14, 15; xix. 15). It used to be platted into rope; Job xli. 2, "canst thou put an hook (rather a rope of rushes) into his nose?" Moses' ark was woven of it (gomeh): Exod. ii. 3, Isa. xviii. 2. "Vessels of bulrushes," light canoes of papyrus of the Nile, dandled over with pitch; derived from gamah, "to absorb." The Egyptians used it for making also garments, shoes, and baskets. In Exod. ii. 3, Isa. xviii. 2, it means the papyrus of which the Egyptians made light boats for the Nile; the same Heb. (gomeh) is trans. rush (Job viii. 11, Isa. xxxv. 7). The Egyptian ham is akin. This papyrus is no longer found below Nubia. It is a strong bamboo-like rush, as thick as a finger, three cornered, from 10 to 15 feet high. It is represented on the tomb of Tei, of the sixth dynasty, and other oldest Egyptian monuments.

Bunah. 1 Chron. ii. 25.

Bunni. 1. Neh. ix. 4, x. 15. 2. Neh. xi. 15. 3. The alleged Jewish name of Nicodemus (John iii. 1).

Burial. The Jews entombed if possible, or else interred, their dead; the rabbins alleging as a reason "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii. 19). Even enemies received burial (1 Kings xi. 15). The law ordained the same treatment of the malefactor (Deut. xxi. 23). Nothing but extreme profanity on the part of the deceased during life was deemed a warrant for disturbing their remains (2 Kings xxii. 16, 17; Jer.

viii. 1, 2). A cave was the usual tomb, as Palestine abounds in caves. The funeral rites were much less elaborate than those of the Egyptians. Jacob and Joseph dying in Egypt were embalmed; the Egyptians, through lack of a better hope, endeavouring to avert or delay corruption. Kings and prophets alone were buried within the walls of towns. A strong family feeling led the Israelites to desire burial in the same tomb as their forefathers. So Jacob (Gen. xlix. 29-32). The burial place of Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob, in the field of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii.), bought by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, and the field bought by Jacob from Shechem's father, Hamor, where Joseph's bones were buried (Josh. xxiv. 32), were the only fixed possessions the patriarchs had in Canaan, and the sole purchases they made there. They felt their bodies belonged to the Lord. To be excluded from the family burying place, as Uzziah and Manasseh were, was deemed an indignity. 2 Chron. xxvi. 23, xxxiii. 20; comp. 1 Kings xiii. 22, 31, which shows it was a mark of great respect to one not of one's family to desire burial with him (comp. Ruth i. 17). The greatest indignity was to be denied burial (2 Kings ix. 10; Isa. xiv. 20; Jer. xxii. 18, 19; 2 Sam. xxi. 12-14). David's magnanimity appears in his care to restore his enemy Saul's remains to the paternal tomb. To give a place in one's own sepulchre was a special honour; as the children of Beth offered Abraham, and as Jehoiada was buried among the kings (Gen. xxiii. 6, 2 Chron. xxiv. 16). So Joseph of Arimathea could not have had a greater honour to our crucified Lord's body than giving it a place in his own new tomb, fulfilling the prophecy Isa. liii. 9 (John xix. 31-42). A common tomb for all the kindred, with galleries, is not uncommon in the East.

Burning was only practised in peculiar circumstances, as in the case of Saul's and his sons' mutilated headless bodies, where regular burial was impossible and there was a possibility of the Philistines coming and mutilating them still more. However, the bones were not burned but buried (1 Sam. xxxi. 11-13). Also in a plague, to prevent contagion (Amos vi. 9, 10). Costly spices were wrapped up in the linen swathes round the corpse, and also were burnt at the funeral (2 Chron. xvi. 14); so Nicodemus honoured Jesus with 100 pounds weight of "myrrh and aloes." The rapidity of decomposition in the hot East, and the legal uncleanness of association with a dead body, caused immediate interment; as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v. 1, Num. xix. 11-14). Hired mourners with shrill pipes increased the sound of wailings for the dead (Matt. ix. 23, Jer. ix. 17, 2 Chron. xxv. 25). The body without any coffin was carried to burial on a bier (Luke vii. 12). A napkin was bound round the head, and linen bandages wound round the body (John xi. 41, xiv. 40). The whole of the preparations are included in the Gr. word entaphiasmos which Jesus uses (Mark xiv. 8). After burial the funeral feast followed (Jer. xvi. 6-8). Ezek. xxiv. 17, "Eat not the bread of men," i.e. the bread or viands, as well as "the cup of consolation," which men usually bring mourners in token of sympathy. The law (Lev. xix. 28) forbade cuttings in the flesh for the dead, usual among the heathen. Families often reduced their means by lavish expenditure in gifts at funerals, to which there may be reference in Deut. xxvi. 14. By the law also nothing ought to be carried into a mourning house (as being unclean) of that which was sanctified, as for instance tithes.

Samuel was buried in his own house at Ramah; and the sepulchres of Judah's kings were in the city of David (2 Chron. xvi. 14). Fine ranges of tombs, said to be of the kings, judges, and prophets, still remain near Jerusalem; but these, many think, are the tomb of Helena, the widow of the king of Adiabene, who settled at Jerusalem and relieved poor Jews in the famine foretold by Agabus under Claudius Caesar. The "graves of the children of the people" were and are in the valley of Kedron or Jehoshaphat (2 Kings xxiii. 6); and on the graves of them that had sacrificed to the idols and groves Josiah strawed the dust of their idols (2 Chron. xxxiv. 4): "the graves of the common people" outside the city (Jer. xxvi. 23). Tophet, the valley E. of the city, was once the haunt of Moloch worship, but was doomed to defilement by burials there (Jer. vii. 32, xix. 11). "The potters' field," with its holes dug out for clay, afforded graves ready made "to bury strangers in." Tombs were often cut out of the living rock.

One of the kings' tombs near Jerusalem has a large circular stone set on its edge. A deep recess is cut in the solid rock at the left of the door, into which the stone might be rolled aside, when the tomb was opened; when closed, the stone would be rolled back to its proper place. The disk is large enough, not only to cover the entrance, but also to fit into another recess at the right of the door, and thus completely shut it in. There is an incline to its proper place, so that to roll it back is much harder than to roll it into it. The women going to Jesus' tomb might well say, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" (Mark xvi. 3.) Mary stooped to look in, because the door was low; the angel sat on the stone rolled aside into its recess, as the women drew near (Matt. xxviii. 2, John xx. 11; comp. Isa. xxii. 16, Luke xxii. 53).

Demones and outcasts would haunt such tombs for shelter, when open (Isa. lx. 4, Mark v. 5). Sepulchres used to be whitened, after the rains, before the passover, each year, to guard against any defiling himself by touching them. This explains Jesus' comparison of hypocrites to "whited sepulchres" (Matt. xxiii. 27). To repair the prophets' tombs was regarded as an act of great piety (ver. 29).

Burnt offering. 'olah, "what ascends" in smoke to God, being wholly consumed to ashes. Also kathil, "perfect." Part of every offering was burnt in the sacred fire, the symbol of God's presence; but this was wholly burnt, as a "whole burnt offering." In Gen. viii. 20 is the first mention of it. Throughout Genesis it is seemingly the only sacrifice (xv. 9, 17; xxii. 2, 7, 8, 13). It was the highest of gifts to God (eucharistic, prosphorai, "offerings," Heb. minchah), representing entire, unreserved dedication of the offerer, body, soul, spirit, will, to God (Ps. xl. 8, 9; Heb. x. 5, 6). The other kind of "sacrifices," viz. propitiatory (thysiai) and sin offerings, are distinct (Heb. x. 8, 9; comp. Exod. x. 25, 1 Sam. xv. 22). Other "gifts" to God were of a lower kind, only a part being given; as the meat (not flesh, but flour, etc.) offering, which was unbloody, and the peace offering, a thank offering (1 Kings iii. 15, viii. 64; Ps. li. 17, 19).

The most perfect surrender of human will to God's is that of Jesus in the temptation, and agony, and on Calvary; the antitype to the whole burnt offering (Heb. v. 1-8). This could only be offered by one free from sin; therefore the sin offering always came first (Exod. xxix. 36-38; Lev. viii. 14, 18, ix. 8, 12, xvi. 3, 5). So, only when we are first reconciled by Christ's atonement for our sin to God, can we "present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God" (Rom. xii. 1). A "meat offering" (flour and oil, fruits of the earth) accompanied the burnt offering; for when men dedicated themselves wholly to God they also dedicated the earthly gifts which He had given them (Lev. ix. 16, 17). It was to be brought of the offerer's own free will, and slain by himself, after he had laid his hands on its head, to mark it as his representative; a young bullock, or he goat, or a turtle dove, or pigeon (if the person was poor), not to be divided in offering it. The skin alone was reserved. There was a daily burnt offering, a lamb of the first year, every morning and evening (Exod. xxix. 38-42); that for the sabbath double the daily one; the offering at the new moon of the three great feasts, passover, pentecost, and tabernacles; also on the great day of atonement and the feast of trumpets; private burnt offerings at the consecration of a priest, etc., etc. (Exod. xxix. 15.) They were offered in vast numbers at Solomon's dedication of the temple; but ordinarily were restricted in extent by God, to preclude the idea of man's buying His favour by costly gifts. Jephthah's vow was without Divine warrant, and due to the half heathenism of his early life (Jud. xi. 4).

Bush. Exod. iii. 2; lit. "out of the midst of the bush," viz., that bush of which Moses often spoke to Israel. "The thorny acacia," a pure Egyptian term, sen'eh, Coptic sheno.

Butter: chemeh'ah, from an Arabic root meaning "coagulated." Curdled milk, curds, butter, and cheese

ROLLING STONE.

(Jud. v. 25, 2 Sam. xvii. 29). But the butter in the East is more fluid and less solid than ours. The milk is put in a whole goatskin bag, sewed up, and hung on a frame so as to swing to and fro. The fluidity explains Job xx. 17, "brooks of honey and butter"; xxix. 6, "I washed my steps with butter"; Isa. vii. 15, 22, "butter and honey shall he eat"; besides these being the usual food for children, and so in the case of the prophetess' child typifying the reality of Christ's humanity, which stooped to the ordinary food of infants, a state of distress over the land is implied, when through the invaders milk and honey, things produced spontaneously, should be the only abundant food. In Ps. lv. 21 the present reading is properly "smooth are the butter-masses (i.e. sweetesses) of his mouth." The Chaldee version trans. as A.V. Gesenius explains Prov. xxx. 33, "the pressure (not 'churning') of milk bringeth forth cheese."

Buz = contempt. 1. Second son of Meleah and Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 21). Kemuel was the father of Aram, i.e. Syria. Elihu (Job xxxii. 2) is called "the son of Barachal the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram" (i.e. Aram); he therefore probably was descended from Buz. The family settled in Arabia Deserta, for Jeremiah (xxv. 23), in denouncing judgments against Buz, associates the tribe with Tema and Dedan. 2. The name also occurs in Gad's genealogy (1 Chron. v. 14).

Cabbon (Josh. xv. 40). A town in the shephelah (low hilly region) of Judah.

Cabul. On the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). Solomon gave to Hiram a district containing 20 cities, Cabul included. Not liking the district, Hiram said, "What kind of cities are these?" and called the whole from the one city Cabul, which in Phœnician means displeasing (1 Kings ix. 13). From 2 Chron. viii. 2 it seems that Hiram restored the 20 cities. The district was "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Isa. ix. 1), i.e. the N. part of Galilee, only in part occupied by Israel, more completely so after Hiram restored the cities. Tiglath Pileser carried the inhabitants captive to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29). The cities were occupied chiefly by Canaanite heathens (2 Sam. xxiv. 7), and were in a bad condition. Gesenius explains C. "the pawned land." Solomon borrowed sixscore talents of gold from Hiram for his extensive buildings, and gave the 20 cities as an equivalent. But on Hiram expressing dissatisfaction with them, he took them back, and doubtless in course of time repaid the gold.

Cæsar. The common title of the successive Roman emperors, taken from Julius Cæsar. In the N. T. Augustus in Luke ii. 1, Tiberius in Luke iii. 1, Claudius in Acts xi. 28, Nero in Acts xxv. 11, etc. Roman citizens as Paul had the right of "appeal to C.," and in criminal cases were sent for judgment to Rome, where was the emperor's court (Phil. iv. 22, comp. i. 13); Nero is the emperor meant. John's exile to Patmos (Rev. i. 9) was probably in Domitian's reign.

The current coin bore C.'s image, the argument which Jesus used to show C. could claim tribute (Matt. xxii. 17, etc.). Though C. did not call himself "king," the Jews did (John xix. 15), in which respect Josephus (B. J. v. 2, § 2) confirms the gospel undesignedly.

Cæsarea. 1. Named also Sebaste (i.e. of Augustus, in whose honour Herod the Great built it in ten years with a lavish expenditure, so that Tacitus calls it "the head of Judea"). Also Stratonis, from Strato's tower, and Palestine, and Maritime. The residence of Philip the deacon and his four prophesying daughters (Acts viii. 40; xxi. 8, 16). Also the scene of the Gentile centurion Cornelius' conversion (x. xi. 11). Herod Agrippa I. died there (xii. 19-23). Paul sailed thence to Tarsus (ix. 30); and arrived there from his second missionary journey (xviii. 22), also from his third (xxi. 8); and was a prisoner there for two years before his voyage to Italy (xxiv. 27; xxv. 1, 4, 6, 13). It was on the high road between Tyre and Egypt; a little more than a day's journey from Joppa on the S. (x. 24), less than a day from Ptolemais on the N. (xxi. 8). About 70 miles from Jerusalem, from which the soldiers brought Paul in two days (xxiii. 31, 32) by way of Antipatris. It had a harbour 300 yards across, and vast breakwater, (the mole still remains,) and a temple with colossal statues sacred to Cæsar and to Rome. Joppa and Dora had been previously the only harbours of Palestine. It was the Roman procurators' (Felix, Festus, etc.) official residence; the Herodian kings also kept court there. The military head quarters of the province were fixed there. Gentiles outnumbered Jews in it; and in the synagogue accordingly the O. T. was read in Greek. An outbreak between Jews and Greeks was one of the first movements in the great Jewish war. Vespasian was declared emperor there; he made it a Roman colony, with the Italian rights. It was the home of Eusebius, the scene of some of Origen's labours, and the birth-place of Procopius. Now a desolate ruin, called Kaisariyeh; S. of the mediæval town is the great earthwork with its surrounding ditch, and a stone theatre within, which Josephus alludes to as an amphitheatre.

2. Cæsarea Philippi. Anciently Panæas or Panum (from the sylvan god Pan, whose worship seemed appropriate to the verdant situation, with groves of olives and Hermon's lovely slopes near); the modern Banias. At the eastern of the two sources of the Jordan, the other being at Tel-el-Kadi (Dan or Laish, the most northerly city of Israel). The streams which flow from beneath a limestone rock unite in one stream near C. P. There was a deep cavity full of still water there. Identified with the BAAL GAD [see] of O. T. Herod erected here a temple of white marble to Augustus. Herod's son Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, enlarged and called it from himself, as well as Cæsar, C. P. Agrippa II. called it Neronias; but the old name prevailed. It was the seat of a Greek and a Latin bishopric in succession. The great castle (Shubeibeh) built partly in the earliest ages still remains the most striking fortress in Palestine. The transfiguration probably took place on mount Hermon, which rears its majestic head 7000 feet above C. P. The allusion to "snow" agrees with this, and the mention of C. P. in the context (Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27, ix. 3). The remoteness and privacy of C. P. fitted it for being the place whither Jesus retired to prepare His disciples for His approaching death of shame and His subsequent resurrection; there it was that Peter received the Lord's praise, and afterwards censure. The transfiguration gave them a foretaste of the future glory, in order to prepare them for the intermediate shame and suffering.

Cage (Jer. v. 27), rather "a trap"

EGYPTIAN ROWERS.

with decoy birds in it. In Rev. xviii. 2 a prison, guardhouse. [See BIRD.] Caiaphas, Joseph. Appointed highpriest (after Simon ben Camith) by the procurator Valerius Gratus, under Tiberius. He continued in office from A.D. 26 to 37, when the proconsul Vitellius deposed him. The president of the Jewish council (Sanhedrim) which condemned the Lord Jesus, C. declaring Him guilty of blasphemy. ANNAS [see], his father in law, and father of five highpriests, besides having been highpriest himself, wielded a power equal to that of C., whose deputy (sagan) he probably was. Hence he and C. are named as highpriests together (Luke iii. 2); and the band led away the Lord to him first, then to C. (John xviii. 13-24). Annas is called the highpriest Acts iv. 6, perhaps because he presided over the council (Sanhedrim). The priesthood at the time no longer comprehended the end of their own calling. Providence therefore, whilst employing him as the last of the sacerdotal order (for it ceased before God at the death of Messiah, the true and everlasting Priest, whose typical forerunner it was) to prophesy Christ's death for the people, left him to judicial blindness as to the deep significance of his words: "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John xi. 50-52). A proof that the Holy Spirit, not merely man's spirit, is the inspirer of the sacred writers (1 Pet. i. 10-12). Balaam similarly was a bad man, yet uttered under the Spirit true and holy prophecies. Unscrupulous vigour, combined with political shrewdness, characterizes him in the N. T., as it also kept him in office longer than any of his predecessors. See Matt. xxvi. 3, 57-65.

Cain = acquired. For Eve said, "I have gotten a man from (or with the help of) Jehovah." She recognised this gift of Jehovah, though accompanied with the foretold "sorrow" of conception, as a first step towards fulfilling the promise of the Redeemer, "the seed of the woman" (Gen. iii. 15). C., her supposed acquisition, proved a deadly loss. Parents' expectations are very different from after realities. C. was of that wicked one (1 John iii. 12), not associated with Jehovah, except as incurring His curse. Augustine (City of God, xv. 1) says: "C., the author of the city of the world, is born first, and is called an acquisition because he buildeth a city, is given to the cares and pomp of the world, and persecutes his brother that was chosen out of the world. But ABEL [see], the beginner of the city of God, is born second, called 'vanity' because he saw the world's vanity, and is therefore driven out of the world by an untimely death. So early came martyrdom into the world; the first man that died died for religion." Jealousy was C.'s motive, "because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." His "offering of the fruit of the ground," not "the firstlings of the flock," seems to have been an unhumiliated self-will setting aside of God's will (to be inferred from the "coats of skin," Gen. iii. 21, involving animal sacrifices) that the death which man's sin incurred should be acknowledged as due by the sinner offering penitently a stain victim, and a substitution of his own act of will worship ("the error of C.," Jude 11), a mere thank-offering. Jehovah "had not respect to C. and his offering," but had to Abel and his offering; probably God gave the visible token of acceptance, fire from heaven consuming the sacrifice. So Theodotus; comp. Gen. xv. 17; Lev. ix. 24; Jud. vi. 21, xiii. 19, 20; 1 Kings xviii. 33. Abel, according to Heb. xi. 4, "by faith offered a more excellent sacrifice than C.," lit. a fuller sacrifice, partaking more largely of the nature of a sacrifice. "Faith" presupposes a revelation of God's will concerning sacrifice, otherwise it would have been an act of presumptuous will worship (Col. ii. 23), and taking of a life which man had no right to before the flood (Gen. ix. 2-4). E. of Eden before the cherubim symbols of God was probably the appointed place of offering. "In process of time," lit. "at the end of days," viz. at some fixed sacred season, as the sabbath. C.'s "countenance fell" at the rejection of his sacrifice, which possibly involved the loss of his privileges of primogeniture. Jehovah, who still vouchsafed intercourse to man though fallen, argues with C. as a wayward child, "If thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted?" (or "have the excellency," viz. that belonging to the elder born [comp. Gen. xlix. 3]). Lit., will there not be lifting up? alluding by contrast to C.'s fallen countenance.) "But if thou doest not well (which is thy real case, and thy not confessing it, but offering a mere thank offering, leaves thee still under guilt), a sin offering (so 'sin' is used Hos. iv. 8; Lev. vi. 26, x. 17; 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. ix. 28) lieth at the door," i.e. is within thy reach (comp. Matt. xxiv. 33), you have only to go to the appointed place (probably E. of Eden where the cherubim were), and offering it in faith thou shalt be accepted and may have lifting up of countenance again (Job xi. 15, xxii. 26). The explanation, "if thou doest not well (i.e. sinnest), sin lieth at the door ready to assail you as a serpent" is tautology. The "sin" feminine joined with the masculine verb in the Heb. implies that a male victim is meant by "sin" or sin offering. "And unto thee shall be his desire" as that of a younger brother subordinate in rank to the elder. You need not in jealousy fear losing your priority of birth, if you do well. C. talked with Abel, proposing probably that they should go to the field, and when there away from man's eye, rose up and slew him. Adam's sin now bears fratricide among its first and terrible fruits; and the seed of the serpent stands forth thenceforwards throughout man's history, as distinguished from the seed of the woman (Gen. iii. 15). Adam hid in the trees and then confessed his sin; but C. stoutly denies it, showing himself the child of him who is the father of lying and the murderer from the beginning (John viii. 44). But God convicted him, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto Me from the ground." Herein God shows He takes cognisance of man's sin, though there be no other accuser; next, that innocent blood is too precious to be shed with impunity; thirdly, that not only He cares for the godly in life but "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints" (Ps. cxvi. 15) (Calvin). Exile from the original seat of the human family and the scene of God's manifestations was the sentence, a mild one, in consonance with the mild administration of the Divine government before the flood. "My punishment is greater than I can bear" marks C.'s unhumiliated spirit, regretting only the punishment not the sin. "It shall come to pass that every one that findeth me shall slay me," words implying that the human race had even then multiplied since Adam's expulsion from Eden, a fact also appearing from C. having a wife, doubtless one of Adam's descendants; the sacred historian only giving one or two prominent links of the genealogy, not the sons, much less the daughters, all in full. God "set a mark upon," or set a sign for, "C." (what it was we know not) to assure him of safety from the blood avenger (Jud. vi. 17, Isa. vii. 14). C., the second head of the race, viz. of the ungodly seed, must live, as the tares among the wheat, until the harvest, God reserving judgment to His own time and not allowing man to take avenging into his own hands. But after the flood God delegated in part the avenging of blood to man (Gen. ix. 6).

In Nod (= erile) he built a city and named it from his son Enoch (high dedication); the first step in the founding of the spiritual world city upon which the carnal fix their affections as their lasting home, instead of seeking the heavenly city and continuing pilgrims on earth (Ps. xlix. 11, Heb. xi. 10-16). To make up for his loss of unity in the fellowship of God and His people, C. creates for himself and his an earthly centre of unity. Thero civilization, but without God, developed itself, whilst the Sethites continued in godly pastoral simplicity (Gen. iv. 26). Lamech began polygamy; Jabal, nomadic life; Jubal, musical instruments; Tubalcain, working in brass and iron. Lamech made his man-slaughters an occasion for composing poetry in parallelism. The names of the women, Naamah (pleasant), Zillah (shadow), Adah (ornament), all imply refinement. But all this allied to godlessness, violence, and luxurious self-indulgence, only prepared the world for the consummated corruption which brought down judgment, as it soon shall again in the last days (Rev. xvii., xviii., xix.; Luke xvii. 26-37).

The traditions of the Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Greeks, refer the invention of agriculture and breeding of cattle to prehistoric times, also the preparation of metals; whereas in the historic period these arts have made comparatively small advances. But ethnologists from the art-formed flints in the gravel and drift formations on the earth's surface infer three successive ages, the flint, the bronze, the iron; also from the lower type of older skulls they infer that civilization was a slow growth from original barbarism. But Scripture does not represent man as possessed of superior intellectual power and refined knowledge. Adam was placed in Eden to till it, and his power of knowledge and speech was exercised in naming the beasts. China has been in a state of mental cultivation and art far beyond Adam, yet for ages has made no progress. All that Scripture states is man's original innocence, and that his state was not savagery but rudimentary civilization. High art in the valley of Ohio is proved by the dug up remains to have preceded the forests which the Red Indians tenanted. Cereals have been found among very early remains of man's industry, whether C. cultivated them, or knew only roots, fruits, and vegetables. The oldest skulls are by no means all of low type.

Cain = the lance, or else the nest. A city in the low hilly country (shephelah) of Judah (Josh. xv. 57).

Cainan = possessor, or weapon maker, as Tubalcain comes from the Arabic "to forge" (Gen. iv. 22). Son of Enos; aged 70 when he begat Mahalaleel; he lived 810 years more, and died at 910 (Gen. v. 9-14, 1 Chron. i. 2). In Luke iii. 36, 37, a second C. is introduced in the genealogy of Shem after the flood, a son of C. A transcriber seems to have inserted it from the marg., where it was noted down from the LXX. version of Gen. x. 24, xi. 12; 1 Chron. i. 18, but not 24. For no Heb. MS. has it, nor the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and Vulg. versions from the Heb. Nor had even the LXX. originally, according to Berossus, Polyhistor, Josephus, Philo, Theophilus of Antioch, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome. Beza's MS. D, of Luke, omits it. Ephrem Syrus says the Chaldees in the time of Terah and Abraham worshipped a graven god, C. The rabbins represented him as the introducer of idol worship and astrology.

Calah. A most ancient Assyrian city founded by Asshur (Gen. x. 11), or rather by Nimrod; for the right trans. is, "out of that city (viz. Babel in Shinar) he (Nimrod) went forth to Asshur (Assyria E. of the Tigris) and built Nineveh and Rehoboth-ir (i.e. city markets), and C. and Resen, . . . the same is a great city." The four formed one "great" composite city, to which Nineveh, the name of one of the four in the restricted sense, was given; answering now to the ruins E. of the Tigris, Nebi Yunus, Koyunjik, Khorsabad, Nimrud. If C. answer to Nimrud it was between 900 and 700 B.C. capital of the empire. The warlike Sardanapalus I. and his successors resided here, down to Sargon, who built a new city and called it from his own name (now Khorsabad). Esarhaddon built there a grand palace. The district Calachene afterwards took its name from it.

Calamus (Exod. xxx. 23). An ingredient in the holy anointing oil (S. of Sol. iv. 14, Ezek. xxvii. 19), an import to Tyre. Aromatic cane: an Indian and Arabian plant. The Acorus C. (Isa. xliii. 24, Jer. vi. 20), "sweet cane." A scented cane is said to have been found in a valley of Lebanon, reedlike, much jointed, and very fragrant when bruised.

SWEET CANE.

Calcol. A man of Judah, descended from Zerah (1 Chron. ii. 6). Probably identical with Chalcol or C., the same in the Heb., one of the four wise men whom Solomon exceeded (1 Kings iv. 31). He and Darda or Dara are called "the sons of Mahol," i.e. of the choir; they were the famous musicians, two of whom are named in the titles of Ps. lxxxviii. and lxxxix. If however Mahol be a proper name, he is their immediate father, Zerah their ancestor, of the great family of Pharez of Judah.

Caldron. A vessel for boiling flesh (2 Chron. xxxv. 13).

Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 9, 18, 19, 42, 50). Son of Hezron, son of Pharez, son of Judah; father of Hur by Ephrath; grandfather of C. the son of Hur, the firstborn of Ephrath. In chap. iv. 15 C. the spy is called "son of Jephunneh," and in chap. ii. 49 the elder C. seemingly is father of the daughter Achsa. In Josh. xv. 17 C. the spy is father of Achsa. Possibly, after all, the C. of 1 Chron. ii. is the same as C. the spy; his adoption into Hezron's family accounting for his appearing in the public Israelite record as his son. In this case the different families assigned to him he must have had by different wives, having their lots in different localities. This genealogy (1 Chron. ii.), drawn up in Hezekiah's reign, alone mentions the supposed elder C.

C., the illustrious spy, is also called "the Kenazite," or "son of Kenaz" (Num. xxxii. 12). C. was "head" (Num. xiii. 3) of the Hezronite family in Judah; whilst Nahshon son of Amminadab was head or prince of the whole tribe (Num. i. 7). He and Oshai or Joshua, alone of the twelve, on returning from Canaan to Kadesh Barnea, encouraged the people when dispirited by the other spies: "Let us go up at once, and possess the land [he does not for a moment doubt Israel's ability; not Let us try; success is certain, the Lord being on our side], for we are well able to overcome it" (Num. xiii. 30). His character answers to his name, all heart.

His reward was according to his faith (xiv. 24). "My servant C., because he had another spirit, and hath followed Me fully, him will I bring into the land whereto he went, and his seed shall possess it." Forty-five years afterwards C. reminded Moses of God's promise, adding that now at 85 he was as strong as then. "Hebron therefore [the land he had trodden upon in faith as a spy, Deut. i. 36] became the inheritance of C., . . . because that he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel" (Josh. xiv. 8, 9, 14). He dislodged the three sons of ANAK [see], xv. 14, and gave ACHSAH [see] his daughter to Othniel, son of Kenaz his brother, for taking DEBIR [see]. In xv. 13, "unto C. Joshua gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord. . . . even the city of Arba, father of Anak-Hebron," it is implied that he was not by birth of Judah, but was given his portion in that tribe by the special command of the "God of Israel." By marriage and submission to the bond of Jehovah's covenant with Israel he became a true Israelite by adoption; a specimen of God's mercy to the Gentiles even in O. T. times, and a pledge of the opening of the door of faith to them widely in the N. T. So Jethro, Rahab, Ruth, Naaman. Kenaz his ancestor was a duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15). The names Shobal and Maanath are other Edomite (Gen. xxxvi. 20-23) names which appear among the sons of the C. in 1 Chron. ii. 50, 52. Jephunneh, his father's name, is probably the same as Pinon (1 Chron. i. 52, Gen. xxxvi. 41). Temanites too are among the children of Ashur, Hezron's son (1 Chron. iv. 6). This consideration helps to account for the large numbers of Israelites at the exodus; proselytes and marriage connections from other races swelled the number of Israelites of pure blood.

Hebron was afterwards a priests' city, belonging to the Kohathites; but the territory about continued in C.'s family (from which sprang the churl Nabal, for faith does not always come by blood descent) at the time of David (1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxx. 14).

Caleb Ephrath. A place where Hezron died. But no such place is named elsewhere; and Hezron died in Egypt, and could hardly have named a place there, nor his son either, both being in bondage there (1 Chron. ii. 24). Therefore the reading in Jerome's Heb. Bible and in the LXX. is probably correct, "Caleb came in unto Ephrath" (comp. ver. 19, 50). Hezron had two wives, the mother of Jeremiah, Ram, and Caleb or Chelubai; and Abiah, Machir's daughter, whom he married when 60 years old, and who bore him Segub, and posthumously (according to A. V.) Ashur. Caleb had two wives, Azubah mother of Jerioth (according to Jerome's reading), and Ephrath mother of Hur, this second marriage of Caleb not taking place till after Hezron's death. Others suppose C. E. named jointly from husband and wife, and identify it with Bethlehem Ephrath. In A. V. reading, Hezron must be supposed to have died in the place afterwards called C. E.

Calf Worship. [See AARON.] The Israelites "in Egypt" had served the Egyptian idols (Josh. xxiv. 14), including the sacred living bulls Apis, Basis, and Mnevis, and sacred cows Isis and Athor; worshipped for their utility to man, and made symbols of the sun and Osiris. In fact Nature, not the personal Creator, God, was symbolised by the calf and worshipped.

ATHOR.

But Aaron's golden calf he expressly calls, "thy Elohim which brought thee up out of Egypt"; and the feast to it "a feast to Jehovah" (Exod. xxxii. 4-8, 17-19). Israel too had just seen that "upon Egypt's gods Jehovah executed judgments" (Num. xxxiii. 4). What they yearned for therefore was not the vanquished Egyptian idols, but some visible symbol of the unseen Jehovah; the cherubic emblem, the calf or ox, furnished this. So Ps. cvi. 20, "they changed their glory (i.e. God) into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass"; indeed the Egyptians used to offer a bottle of hay to Apis. The rites of Mnevis' feast at Heliopolis, boisterous revelry, dancing, offerings, etc., which the Israelites were familiar with in Egypt, they transferred to Jehovah's calf image. Acts vii. 40, 41 marks this first stage of idolatry. The second more glaring stage surely followed: "God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven" (42, 43). Jeroboam's calves, which his exile in Egypt familiarised him with, and which he subsequently set up at Dan and Bethel similarly, were not set up to oppose Jehovah's worship, but to oppose His worship by Jeroboam's subjects at Jerusalem, lest they should thereby be alienated from him (1 Kings xii. 26-29). It was notorious that it was Jehovah who delivered Israel out of Egypt; and, like Aaron, Jeroboam says of the calves, thereby identifying them with Jehovah, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt."

Jehu's worship of the calves is markedly distinguished from the Baal worship of Ahab which he overthrew (2 Kings x. 18-29). Baal worship breaks the first commandment by having other gods besides Jehovah. The calf worship breaks the second by worshipping Jehovah with an image or symbol; Rome's sin in our days. Moreover there was only one Apis, there were two calves answering to the two cherubim. Hence this was the only idolatry into which Judah never fell. As having the original cherubim in the temple at Jerusalem, she did not need the copies at Dan and Bethel. The prophets of the calves regarded themselves as "prophets of Jehovah" (1 Kings xxii. 5, 6). Hosea denounces the calf worship, and calls Bethel Bethaven, the house of vanity, instead of the house of God (viii. 5, 6; x. 5, 6). Kissing them was one mode of adoration (xiii. 2); contrast God's command, "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry and ye perish" (Ps. ii. 12). Tiglath Pileser carried away the calf at Dan. Shalmaneser, 10 years later, carried away that at Bethel (2 Kings xv. 23, xvii. 6). In Hos. xiv. 2 we read "calves of our lips": instead of calves which we can no longer offer in our exile, we present praises of our lips; so Heb. xiii. 15.

Calneh, or Calno (Gen. x. 10). One of Nimrod's original seats—the fort of the god Anu (worshipped afterwards at Babylon) in the land of Shinar, i.e. Babylonia proper, extending to the Persian gulf, now Niffer. The place where the tower of Babel was built, according to the LXX. and Arab tradition, taken by Assyria in the eighth century B.C. (Amos vi. 2). "Is not Calno as Carcembish?" i.e., it was no more able to withstand than Carcembish. Isa. x. 9: 60 miles S.E. of Babylon, in the marshes on the left bank of the Euphrates, towards the Tigris. Elsewhere CANNEN (Ezek. xxvii. 23).

Calvary (Luke xxiii. 33). The Latin trans. of the Heb. GOLGOTHA, "the place of a skull," a place of executions. A fit place; in death's stronghold the Lord of life gave death his deathblow through death (Heb. ii. 14). There is no "mount," such as popular phraseology associates with C. It was simply "a low, rounded barehill" outside the N. gate of Jerusalem. (Ewald, Gesch. Chr., 434, quoted in Ellicott's Life of our Lord.)

Camel—gamal. A ruminant animal, the chief means of communication between places separated by sandy deserts in Asia, owing to its amazing powers of endurance. The ship of the wilderness, able to go without food and water for days, the cellular stomach containing a reservoir for water, and its fatty hump a supply of nourishment; and content with such coarse, prickly shrubs as the desert yields and its incisive teeth enable it to divide. Their natural posture of rest is lying down on the breast; on which, as well as on the joints of the legs, are callosities. Thus Providence by their formation adapts them for carriers; and their broad cushioned elastic foot enables them to tread surefootedly the sinking sands and gravel. They can close their nostrils against the drift sand of the parching simoom. Their habitat is Arabia, Syria, Asia Minor, S. Tartary, and part of India; in Africa from the Mediterranean to Senegal, and from Egypt and Abyssinia to Algiers and Morocco. The dromedary (beeker) is of better breed, and swifter; from the Gr. dromas, a runner; going often at a pace of nine miles an hour (Esth. viii. 10, 14). The Bactrian two humped camel is a variety. Used in Abraham's time for riding and burdens (Gen. xxiv. 64, xxxvii. 25); also in war (1 Sam. xxx. 17, Isa. xxi. 7). Camel's hair was woven into coarse cloth, such as John the Baptist wore (Matt. iii. 4). The Heb. gamal is from a root "to revenge," because of its remembrance of injuries and vindictiveness, or else "to carry." In Isa. lx. 6 and Jer. ii. 23 beeker should be trans. not "dromedary," but young camel. In Isa. lvi. 20 kirkaroth, from karar to bound, "swift beasts," i.e. dromedaries. Its milk is used for drink, as that of the goats and sheep for butter.

Camon. Jair's burial place (Jud. x. 5); probably E. of Jordan.

Camphire. S. of Sol. i. 14: "My beloved is unto Me as a cluster of camphire" (iv. 13). The shrub Lawsonia inermis of Linnaeus, or alba, a kind of privet, having bunches of scented, small, lilac and yellowish white flowers, the bark dark, the foliage light green. Heb. kopher, from kaphar to paint, because its dry leaves were and are still made to yield a red unguent for staining women's nails. Indeed the nails of female mummies show traces of staining. Comp. Deut. xxi. 12. The Arabs call it henna. Still women in the East place in their bosom its sweet bunches of flowers.

Caná. Of Galilee. A town where Jesus performed His first miracle, turning the water into wine, and a second one, healing the nobleman's or courtier's son at Capernaum, by a word spoken at a distance (John ii. iv. 46, 54). Natbanael belonged to C. (xxi. 2); it was more elevated than Capernaum, as Jesus "went down" from it thither (ii. 12). The traditional site is Kefr Kana, 5 miles N.W. of Nazareth. Another site has been proposed by Dr. Robinson, viz. Khirbet Kana or Kana el Jelil, but the balance of evidence supports the traditional spot. [See WINE.]

Canaan. From Ham came four main races; Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), Phut (Nubia), and C. (originally before Abraham extending from Hamath in the N. to Gaza in the S.), comprising six chief tribes, the Hittites, Hivites, Amorites, Jebusites, Perizzites, and Girgashites; to which the Canaanites (in the narrow sense) being added make up the mystic number seven. Ten are specified in Gen. xv. 19-21, including some on E. of Jordan and S. of Palestine. The four Hamitic races occupied a continuous tract comprising the Nile valley, Palestine, S. Arabia, Babylonia, and Kissa. The Phœnicians were Semitic (from Shem), but the Canaanites preceded them in Palestine and Lower Syria. Sidon, Arca, Arvad, and Zemar or Simra (Gen. xv. 19-21) originally were Canaanite; afterwards they fell under the Phœnicians, who were immigrants into Syria from the shores of the Persian gulf, peaceable traffickers, skilful in navigation and the arts, and unwelcome except by sea. With these the Israelites were on friendly terms; but with the Canaanites fierce and warlike, having chariots of iron, Israel was commanded never to be at peace, but utterly to root them out; not however the Arvadite, Arkite, Sinite, Zemarite, and Hamathite. The Semite names Melebizadek, Hamor, Sisera, Salem, Eprath are doubtless not the original Canaanite names, but their Hebraised forms.

Ham, disliking his father's piety, exposed Noah's nakedness (when overtaken in the fault of intoxication) to his brethren. Contrast Shem and Japheth's conduct (comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 6 and 1 Pet. iv. 8). Noah's prophetic curse was therefore to reach him in the person of C. his son (the sorest point to a parent), on whom the curse is thrice pronounced. His sin was to be his punishment; C. should be as undutiful to him as he had been to his father Noah. In Ham's sin lies the stain of the whole Hamitic race, sexual profligacy, of which Sodom and Gomorrah furnish an awful example. C. probably shared in and prompted his father's guilt towards Noah; for Noah's "younger son" probably means his "grandson" (Gen. ix. 24), and the curse being pronounced upon C., not Ham, implies C.'s leading guilt, being the first to expose to Ham Noah's shame. C.'s name also suggested his doom, from kanah, "to stoop." Ham named his son from the abject obedience which he required, though he did not render it himself (Hengstenberg). So C. was to be "servant of servants," i.e. the most abject slave; such his race became to Israel (1 Kings ix. 20, 21). C. more than any other of Ham's race came in contact with and obstructed Shem and Japheth in respect to the blessings foretold to them.

The Hamitic descent of C. was formerly questioned, but is now proved by the monuments. The ancients represent the Canaanites as having moved from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean. Mythology connects the Phœnicians' ancestors Agenor and Phoenix with Belus and Baby-

Ion, also with Egyptas, Danaus (the Ethiop.) and Libya. The Canaanites acquired the Semitic tongue through Semitic and Hamitic races intermingling. Their civilization and worship was Hamitic. The Shemites were pastoral nomads, like Seth's race; the Hamites, like Cain's race, were city builders, mercantile, and progressive in a civilization of a corrupt kind. Contrast Israel and the Ishmaelite Arabs with the Hamitic Egypt, Babylon, Sidon, etc. The Canaanites were Scythic or Hamite. Inscriptions represent the Khatta or Hittites as the dominant Scythic race, which gave way slowly before the Aramaean Jews and the Phœnician immigrants. Some think C. = lowland, from Heb. kana, "to depress." In Ezek. xvii. 4, Isa. xxiii. 8, Hos. xii. 7, C. is taken in the secondary sense, "merchant," because the Heb. bears that sense; but that was not the original sense. The iniquity of the Amorites was great in Abraham's time, but was "not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16). In spite of the awful warning given by the doom of Sodom and Gomorrah, Canaanite profligacy at last became a reproach to humanity; and the righteous Ruler of the world required that the land originally set apart for Shem, and where Jehovah was to be blessed as the God of Shem (Gen. ix. 26), should be wrested from "the families of the Canaanites spread abroad," and encroaching beyond their divinely assigned limits (x. 18). The Hamite races, originally the most brilliant and enlightened (Egypt, Babylon, C.), had the greatest tendency to degenerate, because the most disinclined to true religion, the great preserver of men. The races of Japheth tend to expand and improve, those of Shem to remain stationary. Procopius, Belisarius' secretary, confirms the Scripture account of the expulsion of the Canaanites, for he mentions a monument in Tigittina (Taughers) with the inscription, "We are exiles from before the face of Joshua the robber." Rabbi Samuel ben Nachman says: "Joshua sent three letters to the Canaanites, before the Israelites invaded it, proposing three things: Let those who choose to fly, fly; let those who choose peace, enter into treaty; let those who choose war, take up arms. In consequence, the Girgashites, fearing the power of God, fled away into Africa; the Gibeonites entered into league, and continued inhabitants of Israel; the 31 kings made war and fell." So the Talmud states, says Selden, the Africans claimed part of Israel's land from Alexander the Great, as part of their paternal possession. It is an undesigned coincidence that the Girgashites are never named (except in Josh. xxiv. 11, the recapitulation) as having fought against Israel in the detailed account of the wars. They are enumerated in Josh. xxiv. 11 in the general list, probably as having been originally arrayed against Israel (and some may have in the beginning joined those who actually "fought"), but they withdrew early from the conflict; hence elsewhere always the expression is "the Lord cast out the Girgash-ite," "He will drive out the Girgashite" (Deut. vii. 1, Josh. iii. 10; comp. Gen. xv. 21, Neh. ix. 8). The warnings given to Israel against defiling themselves with the abominations of the previous occupiers of C. show that the Israelites were not ruthless invaders, but the divinely appointed instruments to purge the land of transgressors hopelessly depraved. Lev. xviii. 24: "Defile not yourselves in any of these things, for in all these the nations are defiled that I cast out before you, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants." The Canaanites had the respite of centuries, the awful example of the cities of the plain, and the godly example of Abraham, Melchizedek, and others; but all failed to lead them to repentance.

The Israelites, in approaching the cities of the seven doomed nations, were to offer peace on condition of their emigrating for ever from their own country, or else renouncing idolatry, embracing the Noachian patriarchal religion, resigning their land and nationality, and becoming slaves. But "there was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel save the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon; all other they took in battle. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts that they might come against Israel in battle, that He might destroy them utterly and that they might have no favour, but that He might destroy them" (Josh. xi. 18-20). All admit that the execution of the law's sentence on a condemned criminal is a duty, not a crime. That God may permit the innocent to suffer with the guilty is credible, because He does constantly in fact and daily experience permit it. The guilty parent often entails on the innocent offspring shame, disease, and suffering. A future life and the completion of the whole moral scheme at the righteous judgment will clear up all such seeming anomalies. The Israelites with reluctance executed the Divine justice. So far was the extermination from being the effect of bloodthirstiness, that as soon as the terror of immediate punishment was withdrawn they neglected God's command by sparing the remnant of the Canaanites. The extermination of idolatry and its attendant pollutions was God's object. Thus even a Hebrew city that apostatized to idolatry was to be exterminated (Deut. xii.). The Israelites by being made the instruments of exterminating the idolatrous Canaanites were made to feel Jehovah's power to make man the instrument of punishing idolatry, and so were impressed with a salutary terror, preparing them for being governed without further miraculous interposition. Their constitution, encouraging agriculture, prohibiting horses, and requiring their attendance at the one house of God thrice a year, checked the spirit of conquest which otherwise the subjugation of C. might have engendered. Humanity and mercy breathe through the Mosaic law (Exod. xxiii. 4, 5, 9, 11; xxii. 22-24). (See Graves, Pentateuch.)

in the region of Tyre and Sidon; thence they spread throughout the land. A great branch of the Hittites in the valley of the Orontes is mentioned in inscriptions concerning the wars of Egypt [see] with Assyria. In Gen. xii. 6 "the Canaanite was then in the land" is no gloss (as if it meant the Canaanite was STILL in the land), nor proof of the Pentateuch's composition after Israel had driven them out, but implies that the aboriginal peoples (comp. xiv. 5-7) were by this time dispossessed, and the Canaanite settlers ALREADY in the land (comp. xiii. 7). C. is in Scripture made the type of the heavenly land of rest and inheritance (Heb. iv. 1-11). We must win it only under the heavenly Joshua, Jesus the Captain of our salvation, and by faith, the victory that overcomes the world and extirpates sin, self, and Satan (1 John iv. 4, 5; v. 4, 5). The whole heaven and earth, purged of all them that offend, shall be the portion of those who, like Caleb and Joshua, have previously in faith trodden the earth occupied by the ungodly, of whom the Canaanites are the type.

The lowland especially was the country of the Canaanites; the plains between the Mediterranean on one side, and the hills of Benjamin, Judah, and Ephraim on the other; the shephelah, or low hills of Philistia, on the S.; the plain of Sharon and seashore between Jaffa and Carmel; that of Esdraelon, or Jezreel, behind the bay of Acca; that of Phœnicia containing Tyre and Sidon (Num. xiii. 29). The Jordan valley, Arabah, now the Ghor, reaches from the sea of Chinneroth, or Galilee, to the S. of the Dead Sea, 120 miles, with a breadth from eight to 14; this, the most sunken region in Palestine, also was occupied by the Canaanite; Amalek occupied the S. region between Egypt and Palestine. So too, Gen. x. 18-20, the border of the Canaanites was the seashore from Sidon on the N. to Gaza on the S., and on the E. the Jordan valley to Sodom, Gomorrah, and Lasha (Callirhoe) by the Dead Sea. The Amorites occupied the mountainous country between (Josh. xi. 3, xiii. 2-4). The chariots of iron could be used in the Canaanites' plains, but not in the mountains. So we find them in the upper Jordan valley at Bethshean, Esdraelon (Jezreel), Taanach, Ibleam, Megiddo, the Sharon plain, Dor, the Phœnician Aecho and Sidon (Josh. xvii. 16; Jud. i. 19, iv. 3).

C. in the larger sense is used for the whole country. The Arabah, reaching from the foot of mount Hermon to the gulf of Akabah, is the most remarkable depression on the earth. The Jordan, rising in the slopes of Hermon, spreads out in the waters of Merom 126 feet above the level of the ocean; after ten miles' swift descent it enters the sea of Chinneroth, 650 feet below the ocean. From this the gorge holds the average breadth of ten miles, the river at last losing itself in the Dead Sea, the surface of which is 1312 feet below the sea level, and the depth 1300 feet below the surface. The ascent of Akrabbin (scorpions, Josh. xv. 3) or else mount Halak, a range of low cliffs, crosses the valley eight miles S. of the Dead Sea; thence the valley at a greater height gradually leads to Akabah. The plain or circle of Jordan on which Solomon and Gomorrah stood was probably, according to Grove, at the N. end of the Dead Sea, but see GOMORRAH. Grove states there are no clear traces of volcanic action there, nor in the Holy Land or near it, except in the Leja, or Argob. God's promise to Abraham was, "Unto thy seed have I given this land from the river of Egypt unto the great river the river Euphrates, the Kenites, the Kenezites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaims, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites" (Gen. xv. 18-21). "The river (nahar) of Egypt" is the Nile, or Sihor, here representing (according to Grove) Egypt in general, as "Euphrates" represents Assyria (comp. Isa. viii. 7, 8). The Israelite kingdom even in Solomon's time did not literally reach to the Nile. The truth seems to be, his kingdom is but the type of the Israelite kingdom to come (Acts i. 6), when Messiah her Prince shall be manifested (1 Kings iv. 21, 2 Chron. ix. 26; comp. Ezek. xlviii., Ps. lxxii. 8, Num. xxxiv. 5). "The border shall fetch a compass from Azmon unto the river (nachal) of Egypt." The nachal, or brook, here is distinct from nahar above. The brook is generally thought to be the wady el Arish, the S.W. bound of the Holy Land. So also Josh. xv. 4. But Josh. xiii. 3 expressly mentions Sihor, "the black turbid river," Nile, as the ultimately appointed border; this extended dominion twice foretold (for the simple language in histories as Genesis and Joshua hardly sanctions Grove's view that the river represents merely Egypt in general), and so accurately defining the limits, awaits Israel in the last days (Isa. ii. xi.; Zech. ix. 3, 10). In Exod. xxiii. 31, "I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines (the Mediterranean), and from the desert (Paran and Shur) to the river" (Euphrates), the immediate territory of Israel in the O. T. is assigned. So Deut. xi. 24, Josh. i. 4. Solomon accordingly possessed Tiphshah, the old ford of Euphrates on the N., and on the S. Ezion Geber and Elath, the Edomite ports of the Red Sea.

In Num. xxiv. 1-12 the bounds of C. W. of Jordan are given from "the entrance of Hamath" between Lebanon and Antilebanon on the N., to Edom on the S. In Deut. i. 7 the natural divisions are given, THE PLAIN, THE HILLS, THE VALE, THE SOUTH, THE SEASIDE; THE WILDERNESS also is mentioned (Josh. xii. 8), and the SPRINGS OF PISGAH (Deut. iii. 17). Thus there are in all seven physical divisions. THE SOUTH, or THE NEGER, containing 29 cities (Josh. xv. 21-32), extended from mount Halak to a line from N.E. to S.W., a dry and thirsty land (Ps. cxxvi. 4), liable to whirlwinds (Isa. xxi. 1, xxx. 6). THE WILDERNESS (el ilbar) of Judah, N.W. of the Dead Sea, had but six cities (Josh. xv. 61, 62). THE HILLS (har), from the WILDERNESS to the S. of Lebanon, were once the home of the Hittites, Jebusites, and Amorites (Num. xiii. 29); the cities are enumerated in Josh. xv. 48-60. The hill country abounds in traces of terraces which once kept up the soil on the side of the grey limestone, for tillage and vines. Also marks of forests, which must have caused there to be then much more of fertilising rain than now. The fertility improves continually as one goes northward, and the valleys and uplands of Galilee are beautiful, and the slopes of Carmel parklike. THE VALLEY, or LOW HILLS (shephelah), is the fertile region between the HIGHER HILLS and the coast, from Carmel to Gaza; including Philistia on the S. and the beautiful plain of Sharon from Joppa to Carmel on the N. Part of the shephelah was called Goshen, from its resembling in fertility the old Goshen at the mouth of the Nile (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16); it perhaps contained Beersheba. THE SEA COAST is that N. of Carmel between Lebanon and the sea. The portion N. of Acco Israel never gained, but S. of Acco David gained by the conquest of the Philistines (Jud. i. 31). THE PLAIN or CHAMPAIGN (the Arabah, Josh. xviii. 18, i.e. "the sterile place") originally (Deut. ii. 8, where "the plain" is the ARABAH; comp. i. 1) comprehended the whole valley from Lebanon to the gulf of Akabah. The Arabs call its N. part the Jordan valley, the Ghor, and the part S. of the Holy Land wady el Arabah. The SPRINGS OF (ASHDOTH) PISGAH may represent the peculiarly fertile circle round the head of the Dead Sea, on both sides of the Jordan (comp. Josh. x. 40, xii. 3, 8; Deut. iii. 17, iv. 9).

The land, as receiving its blessings so evidently by the gift of God, not as Egypt by the labour of man, and as being so continually by its narrowness within view of the desert, was well calculated to raise Israel's heart in gratitude to her Divine Benefactor. It lay midway between the oldest world kingdoms, on one side Egypt and Ethiopia, on the other Babylon, Assyria, and India; then it had close by the Phœnicians, the great traffickers by sea, and the Ishmaelites the chief inland traders. So that though separated as a people dwelling alone, (Num. xxiii. 9) on the N. by mountains, by the desert on one hand, and by an almost harbourless sea on the other, from too close intercourse with idolatrous neighbours, it yet could act with a powerful influence, through many openings, on the whole world, if only it was faithful to its high calling. "Instead of casting the seed of godliness on the swamps, God took in a little ground to be His seed plot. When His gracious purpose was answered, He broke down the wall of separation, and the field is now the world (Matt. xiii. 38)." The long valley between the ranges of Lebanon, the valley of El Bukaa, leading to "the entering in of (i.e. to Palestine by) Hamath," opened out Palestine on the N. Roman roads, and the harbour made at Caesarea, at the exact time when it was required, made avenues for the gospel to go forth from Judæa into all lands.

Tristram remarks, What has been observed of the physical geography of Palestine holds equally true of its fauna and flora. No spot on earth could have been selected which could have better supplied the writers of the book, intended to instruct the men of every climate, with illustrations familiar one or other of them to dwellers in every region.

Ganneau derives the modern fellaheen from the Canaanites, arguing from their language, manners, customs, and superstitions, and the analogy which there is between Joshua's invasion and that of Caliph Omar. This view explains those prophecies which speak of these ancient nations existing in the last days and being then destroyed by God (Isa. xi. 14; Jer. xlviii., xlix.; Dan. xi. 41). The Israelite invaders as shepherds could not at once have become agriculturists, but would compel the subject Canaanites to till for them the land. The "places" (maqom) which God commanded Israel to destroy, where the Canaanites "served their gods upon the high mountains, and hills, and under every green tree" (Deut. xii. 2), exactly answer to the fellaheen's Arabic makam (the same word as in Deut.) in Palestine, or Mussulman *kubbeh*s with little white topped cupolas dotted over the hills. Their fetishism also for certain isolated trees marks the site of the Canaanite worship which God forbade; an oath on their local sanctuary is far more binding to them than on the name of God.

Candace. Queen of Ethiopia (the island of Merde, in upper Nubia, between the Nile on one side and the Atbara on the other). The name of the dynasty, not merely the individual. Her eunuch or treasurer was converted to Christ by Philip the evangelist, through the power of the word (Isa. liii.), and the Holy Spirit (Acts viii. 27, etc.); named Judich in Ethiopian tradition, which represents him as having propagated the gospel in Arabia Felix and Ethiopia, and brought C. herself to the faith. Pliny (vi. 35) and Strabo (xvii. 820), heathen authors, confirm Scripture as to C. being the name of the Ethiopian queens, as Pharaoh was common to the Egyptian kings. Ethiopian monuments singularly confirm the prominence given to females as queens and armed warriors; the more singular as not an instance of the kind occurs in the Egyptian remains.

Candle. Lamp more accurately represents the original than candle. Image of conscience, "the candle of the Lord, searching the inward man" (Prov. xx. 27). Of prosperity; the sinner's short candle soon goes out, the righteous shall shine as the sun for ever (Job xxi. 17, xviii. 5; Prov. xiii. 9; Matt. xiii. 43). Of believers' bright example leading others to spiritual light (Matt. v. 14).

FELLAHEEN

Of the gladdening influence of a ruler (2 Sam. xxi. 17). Of the all-seeing accuracy with which Jehovah will search out sinners, so that in no dark corner can they escape punishment (Zeph. i. 12, Amos ix. 3). In beautiful contrast, as the woman in the parable "lit the candle, swept the house, and sought diligently till she found" the lost piece of silver, so God (Luke xv. 8) searches out His elect so that not one is lost, and takes each out of the darkness of this world, and restores the Divine image, with a view to their salvation.

Candlestick. Lampstand; menorah. Exclusively that of the tabernacle, made of a talent of pure gold, symbolising preciousness and sacredness and incorruptibility (Exod. xxv. 31-39); of beaten work, 5 feet high and 3½ between the outside branches, according to the rabbins.

THE SEVEN-BRANCHED CANDLESTICK.

An upright central stem, with three branches on one side and three on the other, still to be seen represented on the arch of Titus at Rome, erected after his triumph over Jerusalem. On the central shaft were four almond-shaped bowls, four round knobs, and four flowers, i.e. 12 in all; on each of the six branches three bowls, three knobs, and three flowers, i.e. 54 on the six, and adding the 12 of the shaft, 66 in all. Josephus counts 70, a mystical number, as was the seven, the number of branches, implying Divine perfection. Aaron lit it each evening; in the morning it was allowed to go out, as 1 Sam. iii. 3 proves; comp. also 2 Chron. xiii. 11, Lev. xxiv. 2, 3, "from the evening unto the morning before the Lord continually." It stood in the tabernacle "without the veil" that shut in the holiest. It illumined the table of shewbread obliquely (Josephus, Ant. iii. 6, § 7). "To burn always" is explained by "from evening to morning" (Exod. xxvii. 20, 21; xxx. 8). Aaron or his successor was "always" at the appointed time to light the lamp every evening, and dress it every morning with the golden snuffers, removing the snuff in golden dishes. The artificial light had to give place each morning to the light of the sun which rendered it needless, as the light of O. T. ordinances gives place to the Sun of righteousness (Mal. iv. 2). Under the N. T. of the True Light, Christ Jesus, the seven separate candlesticks represent the churches or the church in its entirety (Rev. i. 12, 13, 20); no longer as the one Jewish church (represented by the one sevenfold candlestick), restricted to one outward unity and locality. The several churches are mutually independent as to external ceremonies and government (provided all things are done to edification, and needless schisms are avoided), yet one in the unity of the Spirit and headship of Christ. The Gentile churches will not realize their unity till the Jewish church, as the stem, unites all the lamps in one candlestick (Rom. xi. 16-24). Zechariah's candlestick (iv.) is prophetic of that final church which shall join in one all the earth under Messiah the King, reigning in Jerusalem as the spiritual centre and rallying point of all (comp. Zeph. iii. 9; Zech. xiv. 9, 16, 17; Jer. iii. 17). The candlestick is not the light, but bears it for the enlightening of all (Matt. v. 16). The light is the Lord's (Phil. ii. 15, 16). The candlestick stands in the outer sanctuary, the type of the present dispensation on earth; but not in the inner holiest place, the type of the heavenly world wherein the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are both the temple and the light (Rev. xxi. 22, 23). In Rev. ii. 5 "remove thy candlestick" threatens not extinction of the candle, but removal of the seat of the light elsewhere. In xi. 4 "the two candlesticks" are connected with "the two witnesses," which Wordsworth identifies with the two Testaments; so they would represent the O. T. and the N. T. churches. The olive oil represents the grace of the Holy Spirit flowing in God's appointed channels. In Solomon's temple there were ten golden candlesticks (1 Kings vii. 49, 2 Chron. iv. 7). These were taken to Babylon (Jer. lii. 19). In the second temple, viz. Zerubbabel's, a single candlestick was again placed (Zech. iv. 2-6, 11), taken by Titus from the temple as restored by Herod, and carried in his triumph at Rome and deposited in the Temple of Peace. Genseric 400 years later transferred it to Carthage. Belisarius recovered it, and carried it to Constantinople, and then deposited it in the church of Jerusalem, A.D. 533. It has never since been heard of.

BAS-RELIEF FROM ARCH OF TITUS.

In John viii. 12, "I am the light of the world," there is allusion to the two colossal golden candlesticks lighted at the feast of tabernacles (which was then being held: vii. 2, 37) after the evening sacrifice in one of the temple courts, and casting their beams on mount Olivet and on Jerusalem. Jesus coming to the temple at daybreak (viii. 1, 2), as they were extinguishing the artificial lights in the face of the superior light of the rising sun, virtually says, Your typical light is passing away, I am the Sun of righteousness, the True Light (i. 9).

Cankerworm: ylegen, "the licking locust"; the locust when it emerges from the caterpillar state, and takes wing. Nah. iii. 16: "spoileth," rather "the cankerworm puts off (the envelope of its wings) and fleeth away," so shall thy merchants flee. The small wings enable them to leap better, but not to fly; so, till their wings are matured, they continue devouring all vegetation before them.

Canon of Scripture. [See BIBLE.] The collection of sacred books constituting the Christian church's authoritative RULE (Gr. canon) of faith and practice. The word occurs in Gal. vi. 16, 2 Cor. x. 13-16. The law, i.e. the Pentateuch or five books of Moses, is the groundwork of the whole. The after written sacred books rest on it. The Psalms, divided into five books to correspond with it, begin, "Blessed is the man" whose "delight is in the law of the Lord; and in His law will he meditate day and night." In Joshua (i. 8) similarly the Lord saith, "this book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night." Moses directed the Levites, "Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God" (Deut. xxxi. 25, 26). "The testimony," or decalogue written by God's finger on the tables of stone, was put into the ark (Exod. xxv. 16, xl. 20; 1 Kings viii. 9). Hilkiah "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord," where it had lain neglected during the reigns that preceded godly Josiah's reign (2 Kings xxii. 8, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14), "the law of the Lord by [the hand of] Moses." Joshua under inspiration added his record, "writing these words in the book of the law of God" (xxiv. 26). Samuel further wrote "the manner of the kingdom in a book" (1 Sam. x. 25). Isaiah (viii. 20) as representative of the prophets makes the law the standard of appeal: "to the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." The earlier sacred writings by his time seem to have been gathered into one whole, called "the book of the Lord": "seek ye out of the book of the Lord" (xxxiii. 16, xxxix. 18). Just as our Lord saith "Search the Scriptures" (John v. 39).

Canon of the O. T. The spirit of prophecy continued in the Israelite church, with intervals of intermission, down to Malachi. If any uninspired writing had been put forward as inspired it would have been immediately tested and rejected. Comp. the instances, 1 Kings xxii. 5-28, Jer. xxviii. and xxxix. 8-22. At the same time the presence of the living prophets in the church caused the exact definition of the completed canon to be less needful, till the spirit of prophecy had departed. Accordingly (as the rabbins allege, comp. 2 Esdras) it was at the return from the Babylonian captivity that Ezra and "the great synagogue" (a college of 120 scholars) collected and promulgated all the O. T. Scriptures in connection with their reconstruction of the Jewish church. Nehemiah, according to 2 Mace. ii. 13, "gathered together the acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David." Zechariah (vii. 12) speaks of "the law" and "the former prophets" upon which the later prophets rested; the succeeding sacred writers, under inspiration, setting their seal to their predecessors by quotations from them as Scripture. Nehemiah (ix. 30) saith, "Thou testifiedst by Thy Spirit in Thy prophets." Daniel (ix. 2) "understood by THE books (so the Heb.) the number of the years whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem"; probably Jeremiah's letter to the captives in Babylon (xxix. 1-10), others explain it the books of the O. T. or of the prophets. "The book of the law of the Lord" (2 Chron. xvii. 9) was what the Levites under Jehoshaphat taught throughout all Judah.

An increased attention to the law, the sanctified result of affliction during the captivity, was the probable cause under God of the complete abandonment of idolatry on their return (Ps. cxix. 67, 71). The 119th Psalm, one continued glorification of the law or word of God, was probably the composition of Ezra "the priest and ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra vii. 6, Neh. viii. 9). The restorer of the national polity based it on the law, the Magna Charta of the theocracy. Israel is the real speaker throughout; and the features of the psalm suit the Jews' position just after their return from Babylon. Their keenness to return to the law appears in Neh. viii. 1-8; Ezra the priest read to "all the people gathered as one man into the street before the water gate . . . from the morning until the midday." The arrangement and completion of the canon accounts for Ezra's honourable title "priest" becoming merged in that of "scribe." "The synagogue of scribes" (1 Mace. vii. 12) was a continuation probably of that founded by Ezra. Nehemiah and Malachi added their own writings as the seal to the canon.

The translator of Ecclesiasticus (131 B.C.) mentions the three integral parts, "the law, the prophets, and the remainder of the books," as constituting a completed whole; just as the Lord Jesus refers to the whole O. T.: "the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms" (answering to the hagiographa or chetubim), Luke xxiv. 44, comp. Acts xviii. 23; and comprehends all the instances of innocent blood shedding in the formula "from Abel to Zacharias," i.e. from Genesis the first book to 2 Chronicles, the last of the Heb. Bible (Matt. xxiii. 35). So Philo, our Lord's contemporary, refers to "the laws, . . . the prophets, . . . and the other books." The law is the basis of the whole, the prophets apply the law to the national life, the hagiographa apply it to the individual. [See BIBLE.]

Josephus refers to the 22 books of Scripture, viz. 5 of Moses, 13 of the prophets extending to the reign of Artaxerxes (the time of Nehemiah), 4 containing hymns and directions for life (e. Apoc. i. 5): i.e. the FIVE of Moses; THIRTEEN prophetic books, viz. (1) Joshua, (2) Judges and Ruth, (3) the two of Samuel, (4) the two of Kings, (5) the two of Chronicles, (6) Ezra and Nehemiah, (7) Esther, (8) Isaiah, (9) Jeremiah and Lamentations, (10) Ezekiel, (11) Daniel, (12) the twelve minor prophets, (13) Job; and four remaining, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon: the 22 thus being made to answer to the 22 letters of the Heb. alphabet. Joshua, Judges, Job, etc., are reckoned, in the Jewish use of the term "prophet" for inspired historian or writer, among "the former prophets." These sacred 22 are distinct from other Heb. writings such as Eccles. xii. 12. Josephus says: "it is an innate principle with every Jew to regard them as announcements of the Divine will, perseveringly to adhere to them, and if necessary willingly to die for them." "The faith with which we receive our Scriptures is manifest; for though so long a period has elapsed, no one has dared to add to, detract from, or alter them in any respect." The warnings: "add thou not to His words, lest He reprove thee and thou be found a liar" (Prov. xxx. 6), "neither shall ye diminish ought from it" (Deut. iv. 2, xii. 32), fenced in the O. T. canon as Rev. xxii. 18, 19 fences in the N. T. The Lord and His apostles quote all the books of the O. T. except Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, the Song of Solomon, Lamentations, and Ezekiel. Josephus denies the Apocrypha the same authority: "from the time of Artaxerxes to our own everything has been recorded; but these accounts are not worthy of the same credit, owing to the absence of the regular succession of prophets."

The Apocrypha was never in the Heb. canon. The cessation of the prophetic gift marks the point of time in both Testaments when the canon was complete. Antiochus Epiphanes (168 B.C.) in persecuting the Jews sought out "the books of the law" and burnt them (1 Mace. i. 56). To possess a book of the covenant was made a capital offence. Just so the persecution of Diocletian in N. T. times was especially directed against those possessing the Christian Scriptures. The N. T. writers have not one authoritative quotation from the Apocrypha. Some quotations in the N. T. are not directly found in the canonical books; thus Jude 17 takes a portion of the uninspired book of Enoch, and by inspiration stamps that portion as true; St. Paul also refers to facts unrecorded in O. T. (2 Tim. iii. 8, Eph. v. 14, Heb. xi. 24); see also John vii. 38, Jas. iv. 5, 6, 2 Tim. iii. 8.

Melito of Sardis (A.D. 179), after an exact inquiry in the East gives the O. T. books substantially the same as ours, including under "Esdras" Nehemiah, Ezra, and Esther. Origen excludes expressly 1 Maccabees from the canon though written in Heb. Jerome gives our canon exactly, which is also the Heb. one, and designates all others apocryphal. "Whatever is not included in the enumeration here made is to be placed among the Apocrypha." He puts Daniel in the hagiographa. The Alexandrine Jews, though more lax in their views, had at the beginning of the Christian era the same canon as the Hebrews of Palestine. But by admitting into the LXX. Gr. version of O. T. the Apocrypha they insensibly influenced those Christian fathers who depended on that version for their knowledge of O. T., so that the latter lost sight of the gulf that separates the Heb. canon from the Apocrypha. To the Jews, saith Scripture, "we were committed the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 2). It never accuses them of altering the Scriptures. Their testimony condemns the decree of Rome's council of Trent that the apocryphal books deserve "equal veneration" as Scripture, and that all are "accursed" who do "not receive the entire books with all their parts as sacred and canonical." [See APOCRYPHA.]

Canon of the N. T. "The prophets" in the Christian church, speaking themselves under inspiration, and those having the Spirit's gift, "the discerning of spirits," acted as checks on the transmission of error orally before the completion of the written word. Secondly it was under their inspired superintendence that the N. T. Scriptures were put forth as they were successively written. 1 Cor. xiv. 37: "if any man . . . be a prophet or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write . . . are the commandments of the Lord." Thus by the twofold sanction of inspiration, that of the authors and that of the judges, the canonicity of each book is established. By God's gracious providence most of the books of the N. T. were in the church's possession years before the death of leading apostles, all of them before the death of John. If spurious books had crept into the cycle of professedly inspired books, they would have been at once removed by apostolic authority. The history of the N. T. canon in its collected form is not so clear as the evidence for the inspiration of its separate books. Probably each leading church made for itself a collection of those books which were proved on good testimony to have been written by inspired men, and sanctioned as such originally by men having the "discerning of spirits," as well as by uninspired men in the several churches. See 1 Cor. xii. 10, 1 John iv. 1. Thus many collections would be made. Their mutual accordance in the main, as that of independent witnesses, is the strongest proof of the correctness of our canon, especially when we consider the jealous care with which the early churches discriminated between spurious and authentic compositions. This view is confirmed by the doubts of some churches at first concerning certain N. T. books, proving that each church claimed the right to judge for itself; whilst their mutual love led to the freest communication of the inspired writings to one another. At last, when the evidence for the inspiration of the few doubted ones was fully sifted, all agreed. And the third council of Carthage (A.D. 397) declared that agreement by ratifying the canon of the N. T. as it is now universally accepted. The earliest notice of a collection is in 2 Pet. iii. 16, which speaks of "all the epistles" of Paul as if some collection of them then existed and was received in the churches as on a par with "the other Scriptures." The earliest uninspired notice is that of the anonymous fragment of "the canon of the N. T." attributed to Cains, a Roman presbyter, published by Muratori (Ant. Ital., iii. 854). It recognises all the books except Epp. Hebrews, James, the 2 Epp. Peter, and perhaps 3 John. It condemns as spurious "the Shepherd, written very recently in our own times at Rome by Hermas, while his brother Pius was bishop of the see of Rome," i.e. between A.D. 140 and 150. Thus the canon in far the greater part is proved as received in the first half of the 2nd century, whilst some of John's contemporaries were still living. In the same age the Peshito or Syriac version remarkably complements the Muratorian fragment's canon, by including also Hebrews and James. In the latter part of the 2nd century Clement of Alexandria refers to "the gospel" collection and that of all the epistles of "the apostles." The anonymous epistle to Diognetus still earlier speaks of "the law, the prophets, the gospels, and the apostles." Ignatius of Antioch, a hearer of John (Ep. ad Philad., § 5), terms the written gospel "the flesh of Jesus," and the apostles, i.e. their epistles, "the presbytery of the church." Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autolyceum, iii. 11) and Irenaeus (Adv. Har., ii. 27) term the N. T. writings "the Holy Scriptures." Tertullian (Adv. Marc., iv. 2) uses for the first time the term "N. T.," and calls the whole Bible "the whole instrument of both Testaments." Thus there is a continuous chain of evidence from the apostles down to the 3rd century. The quotations by the fathers (of whom Origen quotes at least two thirds of N. T.), and the oldest versions, the Syriac, Latin, and Egyptian, prove that their Scriptures were the same as ours. Eusebius the ecclesiastical historian (A.D. 330) mentions (iii. 25) all the 27 books of the N. T., dividing them into the universally acknowledged and the debated; the latter the Epp. James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Apocalypse, "received by the majority," and at last received by all the churches when the evidence had been more fully tested. A third class he calls "the spurious," as "the Shepherd of Hermas," "the Epistle of Barnabas," "the Acts of Paul," which all rejected. Moreover all our oldest Gr. MSS. of the epistles contain those epistles once doubted by some; so do all the versions except the Syriac; see above.

The church of Rome was certainly not infallible when it once rejected the Epistle to the Hebrews. Afterwards it acknowledged its error and accepted it. Rome says we received the canon from the church (meaning herself), and that therefore we are bound to receive her authority as infallible in interpreting it. But we did not receive her original view of the spuriousness of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Nor have we received most of our MSS., testimonies of fathers, and versions, from Rome, but from the Greek, Syrian, and African churches. Further, even if the premises were true the conclusion is false. Because a body of men witness to and transmit a work deriving all its authority from God, it does not follow they are its infallible interpreters. If the argument were true the Jews could use it with tenfold power against all Christians, for the Jews unquestionably are the witnesses and transmitters of the O.T. to us (Rom. iii. 2); and on Rome's principle we should be bound to accept the Jews' interpretation of it, renounce Christianity and become Jews. Nothing but almighty Providence could have constrained both the Jews (in the case of the O. T.) and the Roman and Greek apostate churches (in the case of the N. T.) to witness for the very Scriptures which condemn them. It utterly disproves the infidel allegation of collusion and corruption of the Scriptures.

Again Rome argues, since the rule of faith must be known, and since some books of Scripture were not universally received till the 4th century, Scripture cannot be the rule of faith. The answer is: those portions of Scripture are not the rule of faith to those to whom they are not given with full means of knowing them as such. But all Scripture is the rule of faith to all to whom it is given, and who may, if they will, know it. That could not become a portion of inspired Scripture in the 4th century which was not so before. Man can never make that inspired which God has not; nor can the doubts of some divest of inspiration that which God has inspired. The council of Carthage did not make aught part of Scripture which was not so before. It merely sealed by declaration the decision which the churches previously came to by carefully sifting the testimony for each book's inspiration. Even at the council of Nice (A.D. 325) Constantine appeals to "the books of the evangelists, apostles, and prophets" as "the divinely inspired books for deciding their controversies." Accordingly in the Nicene Creed, "according to the Scriptures," quoted from 1 Cor. xv. 4, implies their being recognised as the standard. The Diocletian persecution (A.D. 303) was directed against the Christian Scriptures; whoever delivered them were stigmatized as "traitors" (traditores), so that they must have then existed as a definite collection. They were publicly read in the churches (Col. iv. 16) as an essential part of worship, just as the law and the prophets were in the synagogue (Justin Martyr, Apol., i. 66). Practically, as soon as they were severally thus read and accepted in the apostolic age by men in the churches having the discernment of spirits, they were canonized, i.e. immediately after having been written.

The transition from oral to written teaching was gradual. Catechizing, i.e. instructing by word of mouth, was the mode at first, and "faith" then "came by hearing" (Luke i. 4, Rom. x. 17), in which however there was always an appeal to O. T. Scripture (Acts xvii. 11). But that the orally taught might know more fully "the (unerring) certainty (ἐκασφαλὴν) of those things wherein they had been instructed," and to guard against the dangers of oral tradition

(illustrated in John xxi. 23, 24), the word was committed to writing by apostles and evangelists, and was accredited publicly by the churches in the lifetime of the writers. The approach of their death, their departure to foreign lands, their imprisonment, and the need of a touchstone to test heretical writings and teachings in their absence, all made a written record needful. The cessation of miracles and personal inspiration was about the same time as the written inspired word was completed. Bishop Kaye (Eccles. Hist., 98-100) observes that Justin Martyr, Theophilus, etc., only make general assertions of miracles still continuing, being loath to see what seemingly weakened their cause, the cessation of miracles; but they give no specific instance. The cessation was so gradual as hardly to be perceived at first. The power probably did not extend beyond those younger disciples on whom the apostles conferred it by laying on hands (Acts viii. 17, 19). Thus miracles would cease early in the 2nd century, shortly after St. John's death and the completion of the canon.

The scantiness of direct quotations from Scripture in the apostolic fathers arises from their being so full of all they had seen and heard, and so dwelling less on the written word. But they take it for granted, and imitate the tone and salutations of the apostolic epistles. All four make some express references to N. T. Scripture. With much that is good in the apostolic fathers, their works "remind us what the apostles would have been, had they not been inspired, and what we ourselves should be, if we had not the written word" (Wordsworth, Canon Scr., p. 137). So far from there being a gradual waning of inspiration from the writings of the apostles and evangelists to those of succeeding Christian writers, there is so wide a chasm (the more remarkable as the early fathers had the apostolic writings to guide them) that this alone is a strong proof that the Scripture writers were guided by an extraordinary Divine power. Their previous habits (as being some of them illiterate, and all bigoted Jews) prove that nothing but Divine power could have so changed them from their former selves as to be the founders of a spiritual and worldwide dispensation (see Luke xxiv. 25, 49), utterly alien to their Jewish prejudices. Their style accords with their supposed position, simple and unlearned (except Paul's), yet free from aught offensive to the polished.

If it be asked why we do not receive the epistles of Barnabas and of Clement, the Acts of Paul and Thecla (one of the earliest apocryphal writings), etc., we answer not because (as Rome would have us say) the churches could not err in judgment in rejecting them, but because as a matter of evidence we believe they did not err. These works were not received by contemporary Christians who had the best opportunity of knowing evidences of authenticity and inspiration. If one or two cite them it is the exception, not invalidating the otherwise uniform testimony against them. The internal evidence of their style is fatal to their pretensions. So "The Acts of Paul"; Tertullian (De Bapt., 17) testifies its author was deceived by John from the office of presbyter for having written it.

The N. T. is a complete organic whole, so that even one book could not be omitted without loss to the completeness of the Christian cycle of truth. As the O. T. is made up of the law, and the doctrinal, historical, and prophetic books; so in the N. T. the four Gospels are the fundamental law, based, as in the Pentateuch, on the included history; the Acts unfold the continued history; the Epistles are the doctrinal, the Apocalyptic revelations the prophetic, elements.

Canonical is sometimes used in the Christian fathers, not in the sense divinely authoritative, but proper for public reading in church. Thus Gregory of Nazianzum calls the Apocalypse the last work of grace, and yet apocryphal, i.e. fit for private not public reading in church.

Canticles: the Song of Solomon. "The song of songs," i.e. the most excellent of songs; even as the antitypical Solomon, its subject and its author (by His Spirit), is King of kings, i.e. the greatest of kings (so the heaven of heavens means the highest heaven, Deut. x. 11). The fourth of the hagiographa (chethubim, "writings") or the third division of the O. T. [See CANTON and BIBLE.] Its Divine canonicity and authority are certain, as it is found in all Heb. MSS. of Scripture; also in the Gr. LXX. version; in the catalogues of Melito, bishop of Sardis A.D. 170 (Eusebius, II. E., iv. 26), and others.

The literalists explain it as displaying "the victory of humble and constant love over the temptations of wealth and royalty": Solomon tempting a Shulamite shepherdess, who, in spite of the fascinations of his splendid court, pines for her shepherd lover from whom she has been severed. But had it been a representation of merely human love, it would have been positively indecent and never would have been inserted in the holy canon (see chap. v. 2-6, vii. 2, 3). The sudden transitions from the court to the grove are inexplicable on the literal interpretation. Nor is the other literal interpretation tenable, viz. that the love of Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter is the subject. "Pharaoh's chariots" (chap. i. 9) allude not to this, but to the O. T. church's miraculous deliverance from Pharaoh's hosts at the Red Sea. A shepherdess (chap. i. 7) would have been an abomination to the Egyptians; nor do chap. i. 6, iii. 4, iv. 8, v. 7 suit this view. Origen and Theodoret compare Solomon's teaching to a ladder with three steps; Ecclesiastes, natural (sensible things naturally vain); Proverbs, moral; Canticles, mystical, figuring the union of Christ and the church. Proverbs, said the rabbins, are the outer court of Solomon's temple; Ecclesiastes, the holy place; Canticles, the holy of holies. See the treatise Yadain in the Mishna: "all the chethubim are holy, but the Canticles are holy of holies." Shulamith (chap. vi. 13), i.e. the daughter of peace, is fitly the bride of Solomon, "the prince of peace." Taken allegorically there is nothing incongruous in what would be, if literally taken, inexplicable; she by turns being a vine-dresser, shepherdess, midnight inquirer, prince's consort, and at the same time daughter; just as under the same image in Ps. xlv. 9, 10, 13, 14, the church is at once the Lord's bride and daughter; as Ps. xlv., "a song of loves," answers to Canticles, so Ps. xxxvii. to Proverbs, and xxxix. and lxxiii. to Job. As Ecclesiastes sets forth the vanity of the love of the creature, so Canticles the all satisfying love which unites the church and her Lord. Love in man was created as the transcript of the Divine love. This song portrays the latter in imagery from the former. The union of Christ and His church was the original fact in the mind of God, on which human marriage is based (Eph. v. 23-32). This idea pervades all Scripture, from the original Eden (Gen. ii. 21-24) down to the restored paradise (Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2, 9, 10; xxi. 17). Israel was the O. T. wife of Jehovah (Isa. liv. 5, lxii. 5; Jer. iii. 1, etc.; Hos. i. ii., iii.; Ezek. xvi., xxiii.). To her as His destined earthly bride the song primarily refers; secondarily to the spiritual and heavenly bride, the elect church, of all ages and countries (Matt. ix. 15, xxi. 2, xxv. 1; John iii. 29; 2 Cor. xi. 2). "The experiential knowledge of Christ's loveliness, and the believer's love, is the best commentary on this allegorical song" (Leighton). The name of God does not occur, because throughout the allegory, to the exclusion of everything literal, is maintained, and Solomon throughout represents Messiah JEHOVAH, whose love is the grand theme. Love to Christ is the most intense, as it is the purest, of human passions, and therefore is expressed in the most intensely ardent language. The details of the imagery are not to be strained in the interpretation. Many lovely natural objects, not always mutually congruous if pressed literally, are combined, to bring out the varied, and often seemingly opposite, beauties which meet in the Lord Jesus.

The significance of the name Solomon, "the peace giver," appears at the outset (chap. i. 3), "thy name is as cinnamon poured forth," diffusing peace and love (John xiv. 27); the same image as in Ps. cxxxiii. Not till towards the close does the bride receive her name Shulamith (vi. 13), "the peace receiver," and so the "prince's daughter" (vii. 1; comp. Matt. v. 9). She explains her name (viii. 10) as expressing "one that found peace" (viii. 10 marg.). Not till her union with Solomon had been effected did she find peace, and received her name accordingly (Rom. v. 1). Shulamith is passive in meaning, the reconciled one (Eph. ii. 14, 2 Cor. v. 19, 20). Her becoming sensible of His being the king, in whose presence is peace and fulness of joy (chap. i. 2, 4, 7) leads her to seek in Him peace, and finally to find it. Driven from the vineyard of paradise which was once her own into the wilderness (chap. iii. 6), and to keep very different vineyards (Satan's and the world's), she became black with affliction, though still beautiful (chap. i. 5, 6; comp. Lam. iv. 7, 8, Ps. cxx. 5, 6); in contrast to His countenance, "white and ruddy" (chap. v. 10). But He at the close brings her up from the wilderness of affliction (iii. 6, vii. 5; Rev. xii. 6), and restores her her own vineyard (viii. 12), where He desires to hear her voice.

If we view the bride as Israel (the primary sense), Hos. ii. 14-16 is exactly parallel to the whole song. Five parts are to be traced: i. 1 to ii. 7, ii. 8 to iii. 5, both parts ending "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem," etc.; iii. 6 to vi. 9, vi. 10 to viii. 4, viii. 5 to 14, these three parts beginning severally with "Who is this?" etc. In the song's Israelite aspect the third or central part probably refers to the sealing of the union between Jehovah and the O. T. church by Solomon's erection of the temple (iii. 6-11). "The daughter of Zion was at that time openly married to Jehovah; for it is therefore that the prophets in reproving Israel's sin speak of it as a breach of her marriage covenant. The songs heretofore sung by her were the preparatory hymns of her childhood; the last and crowning 'song of songs' was prepared for the now mature maiden against the day of her marriage to the King of kings" (Origen; see Moody Stuart's admirable commentary). Her wilderness state then gave place to peaceful and prosperous settlement in manifested union with her God; "the day of Solomon's espousals" (iii. 11).

But a further marriage is intended, that of the individual soul to the Lord, for Christ "loves one, as if that one were all"; and finally the yet future marriage of the whole elect church (Rev. xix. 7, 8, xxi. 2, 9). In the individual soul we have (1) its longing for Christ's manifestation to it, and the various alternations in its experience of His manifestation (i. 2-4, ii. 8, iii. 1, 4, 6, 7); (2) the abundant enjoyment of His sensible consolations, which is withdrawn through the bride's carelessness (v. 1-3), and her longings after Him and reconciliation (v. 8-16, vi. 3, etc., vii. 1, etc.); (3) effects of Christ's manifestation on the believer,—assurance, labours of love, anxiety for the salvation of the impenitent, eagerness for His second coming.

In the church aspect her longing for His first advent appears in the beginning (i. 2); joyful anticipation of His advent (ii. 5-13, 17); His stay with her during the one only whole day in the allegory (there are but two nights, ii. 17, iv. 6), answering to His sojourn here with His disciples, the last supper, the pledge of His return to her (iii. 6-iv. 5); His death in figurative language, and ascension to the heavenly mount where still He is to be met with spiritually in prayer until the everlasting daybreak when we shall see face to face (iv. 6, 8, 15).

"My sister, . . . My spouse," excludes carnal ideas of love. As Eve was formed from Adam, so Christ took our flesh to be brother and also husband (comp. Heb. ii. 11, Mark iii. 35). In chap. v. 1 "I am come into My garden" is the central point of the whole, the bridegroom and bride are one; the Spirit, answering to the awakening N. wind and the softly blowing S. wind, having been shed on the church at Pentecost, to make the spiritual union complete (iv. 16). "Eat, O friends," etc., follows immediately (Isa. lv. 1), the gospel being thenceforth preached in all its grace to all (Acts ii. 38, iii. 19). Then succeeds the period of dejection, and the consequent withdrawing of the grieved Spirit (chap. v. 2-6). Then her earnest search for Him and praises of Him to others, wherein she regains her own assurance, "I am my Beloved's" (vi. 3).

Here Israel's sighing after Messiah, and finding Him hereafter as one united nation, combining "Tirzah" the northern capital and "Jerusalem" the southern capital, is hinted at (vi. 4); she the queen, and the attendant Gentile churches "threescore queens and fourscore concubines" (S. Ps. xlv. 9-15). Then Shulamith having found Solomon, i.e. Israel, "made like the chariots of Amminadib" (My willing people) instead of as heretofore "Lo-ammi," not My people (Hos. i. 9, 10), shall "look forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners" (Dan. xii. 1-3; Rev. xii. 1, xix. 14). The nations shall then admire and flow unto her (chap. vi. 13, vii. 1, etc., answering to Isa. lii. 7-10). The "return, return, O Shulamite" answers to "when the Lord shall bring again Zion" through the instrumentality of the nations who shall then long to "look upon" her as the source of spiritual blessing to them (Mic. v. 7, Zech. viii. 13). The daughters of Jerusalem, i.e. the nations (a phrase drawn by Jesus from the song, Luke xxiii. 28, Galilean women standing in the same relation to the Jews as Gentiles afterwards did), become united to Christ through the instrumentality of the bride, and they also appropriate her words, "I am my Beloved's," etc. (vii. 10). At the close of this part (viii. 4) is restored Israel's charge to the Gentile converted nations not to interrupt the millennial rest of Christ with His worldwide church, "I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up . . . My love," for an apostasy succeeds, as one precedes, the millennium (Rev. xx. 4-9).

Then the elect church from Jews and Gentiles, now being gathered, is described, vii. 5-14, which is chronologically before the millennial church just described, but fitly brought in as the closing subject ("make haste, My beloved," etc.) to remind us our position is to be "hasting unto the coming of the day of God" (2 Pet. iii. 12, Rev. xxii. 20). The "little sister" having "no breasts" (neither faith nor love, the springs of spiritual nourishment, 1 Thess. v. 8; comp. in connection with breasts, Luke xi. 27, 28) answers to the Gentile church admitted to be a "wall" in Zion founded on Christ; "spoken for," i.e. sought in marriage by Him. No "stubble" of Jewish rites is to be built on her (1 Cor. iii. 11, 12), but a "palace of silver," i.e. the highest privileges of church fellowship (Gal. ii. 11-18, Eph. ii. 11-22). The "door" is that of faith opened to the Gentiles, implying catholic accessibility (1 Cor. xvi. 9), but safely enclosed with fragrant enduring "cedar," lest it should be corrupted by latitudinarianism.

The bride's joyous anticipations and desires at the beginning (i. 6, 12, etc.) are thus realized in the spiritual church, now in part (iv. 12-15, v. 1), and in the hereafter restored Israel (vi. 4-12, vii. 7), in the Gentile nations converted through her (viii. 10, etc.), and in the hereafter to be completed election church from Jews and Gentiles (viii. 5-13). The vineyard she had lost (i. 6) is regained, and presented by her, who now is in peace and favour, to her Lord (viii. 10-12). She is addressed, "thou that dwellest (permanently) in the gardens" (the paradise of God) (13).

Words of the Syriac and Arabic tongues found nowhere else in Heb. occur, which leads to the inference that Solomon composed it among his "one thousand and five songs" (perhaps referring to this one song in five cantos) whilst staying in his Lebanon "buildings" (distinct from "the house of the forest of Lebanon" at Jerusalem: 1 Kings vii. 2, ix. 19, 2 Chron. viii. 6; his country seat for hot summer: comp. Song iv. 8), and enriched this idyllic poem with words of an archaic and rural stamp. Robinson found there remains of massive buildings.

Capernaum = the village of Nachum. N.W. of sea of Tiberias, in the land of Gennesaret (now El Ghuweir; comp. Matt. xiv. 34 with John vi. 17, 21, 24), a most populous and prosperous region. By some identified now with the mound at Khan Minyeh; by others with Tell Hum. Visited by Jesus for a few days (John ii. 12); afterwards "His own city" and home, to which He retired from Nazareth (where He was reared, as in Bethlehem He was born), when He heard that Herod Antipas, who often resided at Sepphoris, or Diospolis, near Nazareth, had imprisoned John the Baptist. C. was less conspicuous, and more suited to be the centre of the unobtrusive but energetic ministry of Jesus in Galilee. Remains of ancient potteries, tanneries, etc., still are seen at Tabiga, the manufacturing suburb of C. The prophet Isaiah (ix. 2) had foretold that this region, viz. Zabulon and Nephthali, the one most bordering on Gentile darkness, was to be the first to see the great light (Matt. iv. 12-16). Designated "His own city" (Matt. ix. 1; Mark ii. 1, "at home," A. V. "in the house"). The scene of most of His mighty works, and therefore the most guilty in its impenitence. Matt. xi. 20-24: "exalted unto heaven" in privileges, it was doomed for neglect of them to be "brought down to hell."

Josephus mentions a fountain in Gennesaret, "Capharnaum," identified by some with Ain et Tin (the spring of the fig tree) near Khan Minyeh. The "round fountain" is three miles southward. Tell Hum is three or four miles more to the N. than Khan Minyeh, and so more convenient for the people to run round the N. end of the lake afoot to the E. side while Jesus crossed thither by water (Mark vi. 32, 33). Hum is the last syllable of Kefer na hum, and was used as an abbreviation. Tell Hum is the site, according to Arab and Jewish tradition. It is on a point of the shore running into the lake, and backed by rising ground, three miles from where the Jordan enters the lake. Ruins of walls and foundations cover a space half a mile long by a quarter wide.

Josephus says: "Gennesaret plain is watered by a most fertile fountain, which the people call Capharnaum. Some have thought this fountain a vein of the Nile, since it produces a fish like the coracinus in the lake near Alexandria." The round fountain at Tabiga, two miles S. of Tell Hum, meets the requirements of Josephus' description. Tristram (Land of Israel) fixes on the round fountain Ain Mudawarah as the fount meant by Josephus (and the site of C.); for he found in it the silurid catfish or coracine, identical with that of the ponds of Lower Egypt. But this site is too far S., and the catfish is found in the lake also, and was probably in Tabiga. The recent discovery of the aqueduct which once led Tabiga's waters into the plain of Gennesaret, watering the plain as Josephus describes, decides the question. And the city's site needs not to be put close to the fountain bearing its name in the time of Josephus.

The synagogue called "the White Synagogue," is 74 ft. 9 in. long, and 56 ft. 9 in. broad, built N. and S., with three entrances at the S. end. Luke vii. 5: the centurion (probably of the detachment quartered there, for it was large enough to be called a "city" "hath built as a (Gr. the, i.e. our) synagogue." the only one in the place. Jairus was its "ruler."

Vine leaves, and the pot of manna, are still to be seen among the rich carvings of the ruins of the lintel at Tell Hum.

RUINS OF SYNAGOGUE AT TELL HUM.

If Jesus' discourse at C. (John vi. 31, 32) was delivered in the synagogue of what is now Tell Hum, how appropriate is the Jews' reference to the manna, and His reply, "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven." C. was lower than Nazareth and Cana, whence He "went down" to it (John ii. 12, Luke iv. 31); the "exalted" in Matt. xi. 23 is not in respect to physical but spiritual elevation. There was a receipt of customs there of the commerce both of the lake and of the caravans passing by land by "the way of the sea" southwards. Here Levi, or Matthew, was called (ix. 9, xvii. 24). Simon Peter and Andrew belonged to C. (Mark i. 21, 29), and perhaps received Jesus' call at the adjoining sea beach (16, 17). He healed the centurion's servant there, and Simon's wife's mother (Matt. viii. 5, 14), the paralytic (ix. 1), the unclean demon-possessed man (Luke iv. 33). The nobleman's son at C. was healed by Jesus at Cana (John iv. 46). Jesus' teaching humility by a child occurred here (Mark ix. 33-36). The utter uncertainty of the site shows the exact fulfilment of its doom foretold by the Lord.

Caphar. From a root "to cover," denoting "a village," smaller than ir, "a city." Appearing in Capharnam. Arabic Kefr.

Caphtor: CAPHTORIM. The original seat of the Philistines (Deut. ii. 23). Sprang from Mizraim (Gen. x. 14), akin to the Philistines who proceeded from the Casulhim, who sprang from Mizraim (Gen. x. 13, 14). In Jer. xliii. 4 "the isle [marg. i.e. the maritime or even the river bordering coast] of Caphtor" is mentioned, implying their neighbourhood to either the sea (the Philistines' position) or to the Nile (whose waters are called "the sea," Nah. iii. 8). The Egyptian names Copt (Kebtu, Keb-her in the hieroglyphs, the modern Coptic Kopt) and Egypt, i.e. Es (the isle or coast of) C., are evidently the source of C. Capht-ar, i.e. the Great Capht, probably the northern delta from which the Phœnicians emigrated into Asia, whence Capht was the Egyptian name for the oldest Phœnicians in Asia or in Africa. The time of migration must have been very early, as the Philistines were settled in Palestine in Abraham's time (Gen. xxi. 32, 34). A seafaring race related to the Egyptians spread abroad at an ancient date. For at Medinet Haboo the monuments of Rameses III. state that the Egyptians were at war with the Philistines, the Tok-karn (the Carians) and the Shayratana (the Cherethim or Cretans) of the sea. ("The isle of C." in its later sense may mean Crete.) All three resemble the Egyptians. In Amos ix. 7, "Have I not caused the Philistines to go up from C.?" (i.e. from subjection to C., previous to their migration, as the context proves) Philistim means immigrants, from the Ethiopic fallasa. The Cherethim are seemingly identified with or formed a part of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxx. 14, 16). Pusey suggests there were different immigrations of the same tribe into Palestine, which afterwards merged in one name: the Casulhim first; a second from the Caphtorim; a third the Cherethim or Cretans, Crete being an intermediate resting place in their migrations, whence some passed into Philistia. The Philistines were first a Casulhian colony between Gaza and Pelusium, which was afterwards strengthened by immigrants from C., and extended its territory by pressing out the Avvim (Deut. ii. 23, Josh. xiii. 3). Tacitus (Hist., v. 2) says "the inhabitants of Palestine came from Crete"; perhaps many of the Cherethim settlers in Crete from Egypt, when disturbed by Minoes and the Hellenes, withdrew from Crete to Philistia, where their kinsmen were settled.

Cappadocia. The most eastern province of Asia Minor. Jews resident in it were among Peter's hearers at his memorable pentecostal sermon (Acts ii. 9). To them accordingly, among others, he addressed his First Epistle (1 Pet. i. 1). Judaism there paved the way for Christianity. Seleucus first introduced Jewish colonists into Asia Minor (Josephus, Ant. xii. 3, § 4). Rome, by the civilization and improved roads which it carried with it everywhere, facilitated the spread first of Judaism, then of Christianity. The approach to C. from Palestine and Syria was by the pass called "the Cilician gates," leading up through the Taurus range from the low region of Cilicia. Once C. reached to the Euxine Sea; but Rome made two provinces of the ancient C., Pontus on the N. along the sea, and C. on the S. Tiberius it was who reduced the Cappadocian Archelaus' kingdom to a province (A.D. 17), of which Caesarea was the capital, afterwards the birthplace and see of Basil. Its cities, Nyssa, Nazianzus, Samosata, and Tyana, were noted in church history.

Captain. OF THE TEMPLE (Luke xxii. 4; Acts iv. 1, v. 24): not military, but over the guard of the temple, consisting of priests and Levites (2 Kings xii. 9), "the priests that kept the door" (xxv. 18); they visited the posts by night, and saw that the sentries were on the alert. In Heb. ii. 10, (Gr. "Prince leader of their salvation.") the antitypical Joshua who leads us into the heavenly Canaan. The same Gr. in xii. 2, "the Author," rather "Prince leader of our faith." Acts iii. 15, "Prince of life."

Captivity. Used in Scripture for compulsory exile. Besides minor captivities six under the judges, viz. that by Chushan-rishathaim, Eglon, the Philistines, Jabin of Canaan, Midian, Ammon (iii. iv., vi., x.), and that by Hazael of Syria (2 Kings x. 32), there were three great captivities. First in the reign of Pekah of Israel, when Tiglath Pileser, king of Assyria, carried away the people of Gilead, Galilee, and all Naphtali (2 Kings xv. 29, Isa. ix. 1). As Pul his predecessor is named with Tiglath Pileser as having carried away Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh to Halah, Habor, Ilara, and the river Gozan (1 Chron. v. 25, 26), probably Tiglath Pileser carried (740 B.C.) out what Pul had intended but was diverted from by Menahem's bribe (771 or 762 B.C., Rawlinson) (2 Kings xv. 19, 20). Secondly, in the reign of Hoshea of Israel, Shalmaneser king of Assyria, after letting him remain as a tributary prince for a time, at last when Hoshea omitted to send his yearly "present," and made a league with So or Sabacho II. of Egypt (of which the record still exists on clay cylindrical seals found at Koyunlik), put Hoshea in prison and besieged Samaria three years, and in the ninth year of Hoshea's reign (721 B.C.) took it, and "carried Israel away to Halah and Habor by the river Gozan, and to the cities of the Medes" (2 Kings xvii. 1-6). Sargon (Isa. xx. 1), according to the Assyrian monuments, completed the capture of Samaria which Shalmaneser began. In striking minute coincidence with Scripture, he was the first Assyrian monarch who conquered Media. In the monuments he expressly says that, in order to complete the subjugation of Media, he founded in it cities which he planted with colonists from other parts of his dominions. Sennacherib (713 B.C.) carried into Assyria 200,000 from the Jewish cities he captured (2 Kings xviii. 13). Thirdly, Nebuchadnezzar carried away Judah under Zedekiah to Babylon, 588 B.C. (2 Kings xxiv., xxv.) A previous deportation of Jewish captives (including Ezekiel, i. 1-3, and Mordecai, Esther's uncle, Esth. ii. 6) was that of King Jehoiachin, his princes, men of valour, and the craftsmen, 599 B.C. From Jer. lii. 12, 15, 28, 29, 30 we learn Nebuchadnezzar in his seventh (or eighth, according to the month with which the counting of the year begins) year carried away 3023; but in 2 Kings xxiv. 14, 16, 10,000, and 7000 men of might, and 1000 craftsmen; the 3023 were probably of Judah, the remaining 7000 were of the other tribes of Israel, of whom some still had been left after the Assyrian deportation; the 1000 craftsmen were exclusive of the 10,000. Or else the 3023 were removed in the seventh year, the 7000 and 1000 craftsmen in the eighth year. In the 18th or 19th year of Nebuchadnezzar 832 of the most illustrious persons were carried away. In the 23rd year of Nebuchadnezzar, 745 persons, besides the general multitude of the poor, and the residue of the people in the city, and the deserters, were carried away by Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard. In Dan. i. 1, 2, we find that in the third year of Jehoiakim Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem and carried away part of the temple vessels of Jehovah to the land of Shinar, to the house of his god Bel. (Subsequently he took all away; they were restored under Cyrus: Ezra i. 7, 2 Kings xxiv. 13, Jer. lii. 19.) Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, of the blood royal of Judah, were among the captives. With this first deportation in the third year of Jehoiakim (607 or 606 B.C.) the foretold (Jer. xxv. and xxix. 10) 70 years' "captivity" (i.e. subjection of Judah to Babylon) begins. Nebuchadnezzar had intended to carry Jehoiakim to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7); but Jehoiakim died before Nebuchadnezzar's intention could be effected (Jer. xxii. 18, 19, xxxvi. 30), and his dead body was dragged out of the gates by the Chaldean besiegers and left unburied. This was eight years before the deportation under Jehoiachin.

In the first year of Darius (Dan. ix. 2-19) the 70 years were nearly run out. Now Jehoiachin's third year was one year before Nebuchadnezzar's accession (2 Kings xxiii. 36, xxiv. 12). 67 years elapsed from that time to the taking of Babylon (Ptolemy's canon). So it would be in the 68th year of the captivity that Daniel prayed pardon for Jerusalem. Cyrus' decree, granting liberty and encouragement to the Jews to return to their own land, was one or two years after taking Babylon, 536 B.C. (Ezra i. 2). The captivity ecclesiastically began with the destruction of the temple, 586 B.C. The restoration was 70 years afterwards, in the sixth year of Darius, 515 or 516 B.C. (Ezra vi. 15). The political aim of the deportation was to separate them from local associations, and from proximity to Egypt, their ally in every revolt, and so fuse them into the general population of the empire (Isa. xxxvi. 16, Gen. xlvii. 21). The captives were treated as colonists. Daniel (ii. vi.) and his three friends and Nehemiah (i.) subsequently held high offices near the king. Jeremiah had recommended the Jews to settle quietly in the land of their exile. They did so, and increased in numbers and wealth. They observed the law (Esth. iii. 8), and distinctions of rank (Ezek. xx. 1). The synagogues for prayer and reading the law publicly began during the captivity, and afterwards were set up in every city (Acts xv. 21). The apocryphal Tobit pictures the inner life of a Nabthalite family among Shalmaneser's captives at Nineveh. Jeremiah, Ezekiel (who died after 27 years' exile at least, xxix. 17), and Daniel, and some of the Psalms (e.g. cxxxvii.) give a general view of the state of the whole people in their exile.

A portion of the people returned under Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel, 535 B.C., who set up the altar and began the temple. Then, after a long interruption of the building of the temple through Samaritan opposition, the work was completed in the second year of Darius, through Haggai and Zechariah (515 B.C., Ezra v.) the prophets, Joshua the highpriest, and Zerubbabel. A further portion returned under Ezra 458 B.C., and under Nehemiah 445 B.C. (Ezra vii. 6, 7, Neh. ii.) In 536, besides servants, 42,360 returned; 30,000 belonging to Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, the remainder probably belonging to the Israelite tribes. Ezra vi. 17 recognises, in the sacrifices, the twelve tribes (comp. 1 Chron. ix.). Of the 24 courses of priests but four returned, so that seemingly only one sixth returned of the people, five sixths remained behind (Ezra ii. 36-39, comp. 1 Chron. xxiv. 4, 18). The latter who kept up their national distinctions were termed "the dispersion" (Esth. viii. 9, 11; John vii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 1; Jas. i. 1).

The Affghans, the black Jews of Malabar, and the Nestorians, have been severally conjectured to represent the lost tribes. All we know is, some blended with the Jews, as Anna of Asher (Luke ii. 36), Saul or Paul of Benjamin (Phil. iii. 5); some with the Samaritans (Ezra vi. 21, John iv. 12); many, staying in their land of exile, founded colonies in the E. and were known as "the dispersion" (Acts ii. 9-11, xxvii. 7). The prayer, the 10th of the Shemoneh Esre, is still offered by the Jews: "Sound the great trumpet for our deliverance, lift up a banner for the gathering of our exiles, and unite us all together from the four ends of the earth!" evidently alluding to Isa. xi. 12, xxvii. 13; Ps. cvi. 47. Those who apostatized to Assyrian and Babylonian idolatry were absorbed among the heathen. The Jews' language became then much affected by Chaldaisms (Neh. viii. 7, 8), so that they could no longer understand, without interpretation, the pure Hebrew of the law. A Chaldee targum or paraphrase became necessary. An increased reverence for the law (the 119th Psalm witnesses to this), and an abhorrence thenceforth of idolatry to which they once had been so prone, were among the beneficial effects of affliction on their national character.

The prophets foretell the restoration, spiritually and also nationally in their own land, of Israel and Judah distinct, and hereafter to be combined (Isa. xi. 12, 13), to be miraculously "gathered one by one" (xxvii. 12; Jer. iii. 18, xvi. 15, 16, xxxi. 7-20; Ezek. xxxvii. 16-23; Hos. i. 10, 11, iii. 4, 5; Zech. ix. 13, x. 6, 10). Their return under Messiah (then to be manifested) and their spiritual glory shall be the appointed instrumentality of the conversion of all nations (Isa. ii. 1, lx.; Mic. v. 7; Zech. viii. 13).

The Lord Jesus foretold the Jews' dispersion, in that very generation, under Titus and the Romans, 37 years before the event (A.D. 70), and the treading under foot of Jerusalem by all nations "until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 20-24, 32). In the siege 1,100,000 Jews perished, according to the contemporary witness Josephus; but not one Christian, for the Christians obeyed the Lord's warning by fleeing to Pella, when Cestius Gaius first advanced against Jerusalem, and then providentially, without seeming reason, withdrew (Matt. xxiv. 15, 16). The market was glutted with Jewish slaves, and Moses' words were fulfilled: "Ye shall be sold unto your enemies . . . and no man shall buy you." Again returning they revolted under Bar-Cochaba "the son of a star" (Num. xxiv. 17); but Adrian destroyed them, and built a heathen city, Ælia, where Jerusalem had stood.

"Captivity of the land" (Jud. xviii. 30) refers to the capture of the ark. So in Ps. xiv. 7 "bring back the captivity" means restore from depression; Job xlii. 10, "the Lord turned the captivity of Job," i.e. amply indemnified him for all he lost: which passages prove the error of those who refer to the times after the Babylonian captivity any passage which mentions "the captivity," as if it were the only one in the Bible. Christ Jesus, the antitypical David (who took captive His foes), "when He ascended on high led captivity captive," i.e. led in triumphal procession as captives for destruction those who once had led men captive, viz. Satan, death, hell, the curse, sin (Eph. iv. 8, Ps. lxxviii. 18, Col. ii. 15, 2 Pet. ii. 4). Rev. xx. 10, 14, thus: "he that leatheth into captivity shall go into captivity" (xiii. 10); Satan who "brings into captivity to the law of sin and death" (Rom. vii. 23) is brought into captivity (2 Cor. x. 5, Isa. xlix. 24, Hos. xiii. 14).

Carbuncle (in English meaning a little coal, a bright red gem); equedich, barequeth, the former in Isa. liv. 12 from quadach "to burn," the latter from baraqu "to flash." A brightly flashing stone. A smaragd (LXX.) or corundum, of green glass colour, transparent, and doubly refractive; the emerald (Exod. xxviii. 17); third stone in the first row in the highpriest's breastplate (Ezek. xxviii. 13).

Carchemish = the fort of Chemosh, the Moabite idol. The Assyrian monuments show it to be a city of the Hittites who held all Syria (between 1100 and 550 B.C.) from Damascus to the Euphrates at Br; 200 miles higher up on the Euphrates than the classical Ciresium. It stood where Hierapolis (Mabog) was subsequently. Important in position as commanding a passage of the Euphrates, whence its possession was a matter of contest between Babylon and Egypt (2 Chron. xxxv. 20). Taken by Pharaoh Necho after the battle of Megiddo in which King Josiah, Babylon's ally, fell 610 B.C. Retaken by Nebuchadnezzar three years later, 607 B.C. (Jer. xli. 2.) Assyria had originally taken it from the Hittites (Isa. x. 9).

Carmel. Generally with the article, "the park," derived from Kerem-El, "the vineyard of God." Sometimes not a proper name: Isa. xxxii. 15, "a fruitful field," Heb. carmel; a characteristic feature of the Holy Land. 1. A mountain promontory in Asher, 12 miles long, jutting out into the Mediterranean, a few miles S. of Ptolemais or Acre; towards its eastern extremity 1600 feet above the level of the sea, at the W. end 600. Now Mar Elias (Elijah), rarely Kur-nul. The only bold headland of Palestine. It separates the plain of MOUNT CARMEL.

Sharon on the S. from the more inland plain of Esdraelon or Jezreel on the N., by which the river Kishon flows into the sea in a direction parallel to the mountain range. The stone is mostly soft white limestone, with nodules of flint; at the W. chalk; on the N.E. plutonic rocks. "Elijah's melons," or lapides Judaici, is the name applied to stones of light brown flint outside, hollow inside, and lined with quartz crystals or chalcodony, the geological "geodes." Fossil spines of echinus are called "olives." The "apples" are the shells of the Cidaris glandifera.

C.'s characteristic shrubberies are still to be seen, with rocky dells amidst jungles of copse oaks, evergreens, and numerous caves. The forests have disappeared. Flowering and fragrant herbs abound, hollyhocks, jasmine, and various vegetable creepers, "the excellency (i.e. the beauty) of C." (Isa. xxxv. 2.) Hence it is the image of the bride's head with luxuriant tresses (S. of Sol. vii. 5), "thine head upon thee is like C., and the hair of thine head like purple (Heb. the pendulous hair is of glossy black, like purple), the king is held captivated with the flowing ringlets" (not galleries).

The scene of Elijah's conflict with, and execution of, Baal's prophets was at the N.E. of the range, beside a spring said to be perennial. But Blinn (Undesigned Coincidences) thinks that sea water was used, as water would not have been otherwise so wasted in a drought. The distance of the sea forbids this view; the sea is far W. of the scene. The spring is 250 feet below the steep rocky altar plateau. It is in the form of a vaulted tank, with steps leading down to it. C. was so covered with thicket and forest as to be difficult of access, so that the fountain was not so available in the drought as otherwise it would have been. The shade of the trees and the vaulting (if it then existed) would check evaporation.

The site of Elijah's sacrifice is still marked by the Arab name El-Maharrakah, "the burning." The spring still flowing amidst the drought is close by. Josephus says the water was obtained from the neighbouring spring (Ant. viii. 13, § 5). The distance from Jezreel agrees with the narrative. A knoll between the ridge and the plain is called Tell Asis,

"the hill of the priests;" the Kishon below is named Nahr el Mukattia, "the river of slaughter." From it Ahab "went up" to the sides of C. to take part in the sacrificial feast; Elijah went up to "the top" of the mountain to pray for rain; whilst Gehazi seven times climbed the highest point whence the Mediterranean is to be fully seen over the W. shoulder of the ridge, and at last saw the little cloud rising out of the sea "like a man's hand," the sure forerunner of rain. An altar of Jehovah had existed on C. before that Baal worship was introduced; Jezebel had cast it down (1 Kings xviii. 30); this Elijah repaired and used as the altar for his sacrifice. Hence, as being a sacred spot, he had convened Israel and Ahab there. They and the 850 prophets of Baal stood close beneath the high place of the altar, near the spring, in full view of Jezreel and Ahab's palace and Jezebel's temple in the distance. Subsequently it was the place of resort for worship on new moons and sabbaths (2 Kings iv. 23). Here too the successive fifties of king Ahaziah, at Elijah's call, were consumed by fire from heaven. (2 Kings i. 9, where it ought to be "he sat on the top of the hill," i.e. C.) Elisha repaired thither, after Elijah's ascension (2 Kings ii. 25). Here too Elisha was visited by the bereaved mother, with a view to his restoring to life her deceased son (2 Kings iv. 25).

Tacitus mentions that ages afterwards Vespasian went thither to consult the oracle which was without image or temple, and with "only an altar and reverential sanctity" attached to the place. On C. is the convent, the seat of the barefooted Carmelite monks, whose establishments spread over Europe from the 13th century. Berthold, a Calabrian, and a crusader in the 12th century, had founded the order, and St. Louis of France the convent, in the 13th century, at the traditional site of Elijah's abode. The Latin traditions as to Elijah being connected with the origin of that order of monks are purely mythical. Edward I. of England was a brother of the order; Simon Stokes of Kent was one of its famous generals.

2. A city in the hilly country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55). The abode of the churl Nabal and Abigail "the Carmelitess" (1 Sam. xxv. xxvii. 3). Saul set up a "place," i.e. a memorial, there after his victory over Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 12). Here Uzziah had his vineyards (2 Chron. xxvi. 10). Ten miles S.E. of Hebron. In A.D. 1172 King Amalric held it against Saladin. The ruins of the castle (Kasr el Birkeh) are still visible, of great strength, with the large bevelled masonry characteristic of Jewish architecture. To the E. is a glaring white desert, without shrub or water, inhabited by the partridge and ibex alone, the very two noticed in the narrative (1 Sam. xxvi. 20): "the king of Israel doth hunt a partridge"; "David upon the rocks of the wild goats" (xxiv. 2).

Carmi. 1. Descendant (as "son" must mean in 1 Chron. iv. 1) of Judah; father of Achan, the "troubler of Israel" (Josh. vii. 1, 18; 1 Chron. ii. 7); son of Zabdi or Zimri. 2. Reuben's fourth son; forefather of "the Carmites" (Gen. xli. 9, Num. xvi. 6).

Carpus. A Christian at Troas, with whom Paul left his cloak (2 Tim. iv. 13) on his last hurried journey previous to his second captivity and martyrdom at Rome. Bishop of Berytus in Thirace subsequently, according to Hippolytus. He must have been a trustworthy friend to have had Paul's "books" (on papyrus), and "especially" his "parchments" (perhaps containing some of his inspired epistles) committed to him.

Carriages. In our sense vehicles. Only in 1 Sam. xvii. 20 and xxvi. 5, 7, marg. "place of carriages," i.e. "the trench," alluding to the circle of wagons round the encampment. Elsewhere the things carried, baggage (1 Sam. xvii. 22, Isa. x. 28, Jud. xviii. 21), lit. heavy things, i.e. the precious goods which the Danites had just seized on.

Isa. xli. 1: "your carriages were heavy loaden," rather "the images which used to be carried by you (in solemn procession) are become heavy burdens"; instead of carrying you as Jehovah does His people (ver. 3, 4), they have to be carried as heavy burdens by you. Acts xxi. 15: "we took up our carriages," i.e. our baggage.

Carshena. Esth. i. 14.

Carts. Drawn by cattle (2 Sam. vi. 6). Open or covered (Num. xx. 3). The CHARIOT was drawn by horses. There are scarcely any roads in Syria and Palestine, so that horse carriages are almost unknown. The cart wheels are often of solid wood. WAGGONS: Gen. xlv. 19. Goods are mostly conveyed on the backs of camels, asses, oxen. The Assyrian wagon is seen represented in bas-relief on the monuments at Nimrud and Kouyunjik.

Casiphia. On the road between Babylon and Jerusalem (Esth. viii. 17).

Casluhim. Of Mizraite (Egyptian) origin (Gen. x. 14, 1 Chron. i. 12). Herodotus (ii. 104) says the Colchians were of Egyptian origin; so Bochart identifies the C. with the Colchians. Out of them proceeded the Philistines. Forster (Ep. ad Michael, 16, etc.) conjectures Casiotis, a region between Gaza and Pelusium, called from mount Casius. Knobel says the name in Coptic means burning, i.e. a dry desert region. The Colchians were probably a colony from Casiotis.

Cassia. An ingredient in the holy oil used in anointing the highpriest (Exod. xxx. 24). An article of Tyre's merchandise (Ezek. xxvii. 19). The inner bark of an aromatic plant, like cinnamon. QUIDDIAN, from quadda "to split" viz. the stalks. Also Quetziboth from quatzah, to "scrape off" bark. Used in scenting garments (Ps. xlv. 8).

Castor and Pollux. The Diocuri, or two mythical sons of the chief idol of Rome and Greece, Jupiter. The tutelary gods of sailors, identified with the phosphoric lights which play about masts and sails. The constellation Gemini, "the Twins." At Cyrene in the region of Africa, adjoining Alexandria, they were especially worshipped. This accords with the Alexandrian vessel that Paul sailed in (Acts xviii. 11), having as the figure head or painting on the bow these deities, as they may be seen on coins of Rhegium (where the ship touched); two youths on horseback, with conical caps, and stars above their heads.

Caterpillar. Chasil, from chasal to consume. As gazan is the gnawing locust, arbel the swarming locust, yalak the licking locust, so chasil is the consuming, i.e. the most destructive, locust. Yelegu is also translated "caterpillar" (Ps. cv. 31), in other places "cankerworm." The chasil or consuming locust is the climax. The real foe meant in Joel i. 4 is the Assyrian Babylonian power, the Medo-Persian, the Græco-Macedonian and Antiochus Epiphanes, Rome the fourth and most consuming foe of the four which successively ravaged Judea.

Cauls. Headresses, or ornaments of Hebrew headresses, of checker or network (Isa. iii. 18). Shebistim.

Caves. The chalky limestone prevalent in Syria and Palestine abounds in caves, clefts, and fissures, which are so frequently alluded to in Scripture under a variety of names. From hor, "a cavern," the Horites take their name, who originally occupied mount Seir, and were driven thence by the Edomites. Hence also comes the name Beth-horon, "the house of caverns," and HORONAIM, "the two caverns;" and HAURAN, "the land of caverns" (Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18). The caverns were the resort of the people in times of danger; (Jud. vi. 2) when Midian oppressed them; (1 Sam. xiii. 6, xiv. 11) when the Philistines oppressed them. Michmash, the scene of Jonathan's enterprise, implies the same. Still the shepherds dwell in caves during summer to be nearer their flocks and fields; at Gadara the dwellings are almost all caves. For particular caves see ENGEDI, ADULLAM, MACHPELAH, MAK-KEDAH. Lot dwelt in a cave such as are still to be seen near the Dead Sea, after Sodom's overthrow (Gen. xix. 30). Obadiah hid the Lord's prophets by fifties in a cave (1 Kings xviii. 4). Elijah at Horeb was in a cave when the Lord revealed Himself (ix. 9). The custom of fleeing to caves in time of earthquakes illustrates Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21. They were also the resort of marauders [see BETHARBEL] and the final refuges of the Jewish leaders in their war with the Romans. Josephus relates his own hiding in the caves of Jotapata.

Rock caverns abound along the shore of the sea of Tiberias, and were often used as tombs, the bodies being laid in excavated shelves at the sides. Here accordingly the demoniac had his dwelling continually (Mark v. 3, 5). The cave of Machpelah, Abraham's burying place, Aaron's tomb on mount Hor, Joseph's, and Rachel's are with strong probability identified. The rock tombs near Jerusalem are assigned to kings and prophets with less certainty. Owing to the abundance of grottoes in the valley of Jehoshaphat, tradition assigns to them the sites of such unlikely events to occur in them as the birth of the Virgin, the annunciation, the salutation, the Baptist's and our Lord's birth, the agony, Peter's denial, the composition of the Apostles' Creed, and the transfiguration.

Cedar. Erez, from araz, "coiled" or "compressed," a deeply rooted tree. According to Scripture, tall

CEDAR TREE

(Isa. ii. 13), spreading (Ezek. xxxi. 3), fit for beams, boards, and pillars (1 Kings vi. 10, 15, vii. 2), masts (Ezek. xxvii. 5), and carved work as images (Isa. xlv. 14). The timber for the second temple, as for Solomon's, was cedar (Ezra iii. 7). As our modern cedar is hardly fit for masts, and is of a worse quality than inferior deal, probably by the "cedar" of Scripture is meant Scotch fir (Pinus sylvestris). In Ezek. xxvii. 3 the LXX. translate "masts of fir," and by "fir" is meant cypress. Moreover the deodara cedar (the tree of God, Ps. civ. 16, the sacred tree of the Hindoos, of which they construct their temples) has the durability wanting in our modern cedar of Lebanon. The Nineveh inscriptions state that the palaces were in part constructed of cedar; this proves on microscopic examination to be yew; so that by "cedar of Lebanon" the wood of more than one tree is meant, the pine cedar, Scotch fir, yew, deodara. Cedar was also used in purification, probably the oxycedrus abounding in Egypt, Arabia, and the wady Mousa; indeed, the greater cedar not being found there, the tree meant in the laws of purification must have been a distinct one (Lev. xiv. 4, Num. xix. 6). It was anciently burnt as a perfume at funerals.

In a hollow of Lebanon, where no other trees are near, about 400 cedars of Lebanon stand alone, 3000 feet below the summit and 6400 above the sea. Only eleven or twelve are very large and old. This forest is regarded by the neighbouring people with superstitious reverence. Sennacherib had desired to "go up to the sides of Lebanon and cut down the tall cedars thereof" (2 Kings xix. 23), but was baffled by the interposition of Jehovah. Another Assyrian king accomplished it, as an inscription at Nimrud states in recording his conquests in N. Syria. But God in retributive justice "consumed the glory of the Assyrian's forest" figuratively; fulfilling His threat, "the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few that a child may write them" (Isa. x. 18, 19). Solomon's 80,000 hewers must have inflicted such havoc that the cedar forest never recovered it completely. The cedar of Lebanon is an evergreen, its leaves remaining on for two years, and every spring contributing a fresh supply.

Cedron, or Kedron. "The black torrent," in the ravine below the E. wall of Jerusalem (John xviii. 1). Gethsemane was beyond it.

Ceilings. (1 Kings vi. 9, marg. 15, vii. 3; Jer. xxii. 14; 2 Chron. iii. 5, 9.) Cedar planks were applied to the beams crossing from wall to wall, with sunk panels edged with gold and carved or painted in patterns. The vermilion painting of the ceiling in Jehoiakim's palace was probably borrowed from Egypt.

Cenchrea, or Cenchreæ. Now kikries; from Gr. kenchri, "the millet," a grain abounding there. The harbour of Corinth on the Saronic gulf, and its channel of trade with Asia Minor, as Lechaum, on the Corinthian gulf, was with Italy and the W. Corinth was joined by walls to Lechaum; so that the pass between Corinth and C. (nine miles apart from one another) was the only one into the Morea from Greece. Paul sailed from C., returning to Syria from his second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 18), after having shorn his head there in fulfilment of a vow. He wrote to the Romans in his third journey, and alludes to the church at C., of which Phoebe was "deaconess" (Gr. Rom. xvi. 1).

Censer. An instrument to seize or hold burning coals. Latterly the portable metal vessel for receiving from the altar burning coals, on which the priest sprinkled the incense for burning (2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 18, 19; Luke i. 9). Korah and his company were told to take censers, with which they had furnished themselves as aspiring to share in Aaron's priesthood, so Uzziah. So Ezek. viii. 11. But Aaron was told to take "the censer" (Heb.), viz. that of the sanctuary or of the high priest, and make atonement to stay the plague (Num. xvi. 46). On the day of atonement the high priest was to carry the censer of the golden altar within the most holy place, and put the incense on the fire in the censer "before the Lord" (Lev. xvi. 12, 13). Solomon made censers of pure gold, probably to take fire from the brazen altar, and to convey incense to the golden altar on which it was to be offered morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 7, 8; 1 Kings vii. 50).

In Rev. xiii. 3, 4 the "angel" is not Christ, who always has His own title in Revelation, but a ministering spirit. The incense, i.e. Christ's meritorious obedience and death, is given to the angel that he may give it to (so the Gr.) the prayers of all saints, to render them a sweet smelling savour to God. "The golden altar," moreover, is Christ Himself (Heb. xiii. 10), resting on whom alone prayer is accepted before God. How the angels' ministry exactly is exercised we know not, but we do know they are not to be prayed to (Rev. xix. 10). If we send an offering to the King, the King's messenger is not to appropriate what is due to the King alone. In Heb. ix. 4 "the holiest . . . had the golden censor" does not mean it was deposited there, for then the highpriest would have had to go in and bring it out before burning incense in it, but that the golden censor was one of the articles belonging to the yearly service in the holiest place; it was taken into the holiest on that anniversary by the highpriest. Its shape was probably that of a pan with a baulde. Census. Miphqat i., "numbering combined with lustration" or "purification." By the law (Exod. xxx. 12, 13) half a shekel was to be paid by every man above 20 years as a ransom for his soul, that there should be no plague whenever a numbering of the people took place. The number at the census in the third or fourth month after the exodus was 603,550 above 20 years (Exod. xxxviii. 26); in Exod. xii. 37 the round number 600,000. There were besides 22,000 male Levites of a month old and upwards (Num. iii. 39). Adding the wives and children we should have about 2,000,000. Of the 70 that went down to Egypt, after deducting Jacob, his 12 sons, Dinah, Zerah (Asher's daughter), Levi's three sons, the four grandsons of Judah and Benjamin, and those grandsons of Jacob who died without posterity, there remain at least 41 grandsons of Jacob who founded families, besides the Levites. Reckoning 40 years as a generation, there would be ten generations passed in the 400th year of the sojourn in Egypt. Comp. 1 Chron. vii. 20-27, where ten or eleven generations elapse between Ephraim and Joshua. Assuming three sons and three daughters to each married couple of the first six generations, and two sons and two daughters in the last four, there would be 478,224 sons about the 400th year of the sojourn, besides 125,326 of the ninth generation, still living; in all 603,550 men coming out of Egypt upwards of 20 years old. Besides, the Israelites were under a special dispensation of fruitfulness from God, and preservation from plague and from serious diminution even by Pharaoh's repressive measures.

In Num. iii. 43 all the firstborn males for whom the Levites were accepted as a substitute are stated to be 22,273, which, if it were the sum of the first-born sons in the entire nation, would require there to be 40 males begotten of each father in each family to make up 603,550 men of 20 years and upwards, or a population of more than 1,000,000 males. But Exod.

xiii. 2, 11, 12 shows that the law does not apply retrospectively, but only to the sanctification to God of all the firstborn of men and cattle that should be born from that time forward. It appears from Num. iii. 13, viii. 17, God had actually sanctified already all the firstborn to Himself by having protected His people from the destroyer on the paschal night (Exod. xii. 22, 23; iv. 22), and had adopted the whole nation in instituting the passover. The presentation of their firstborn to the Lord thenceforth was to be the practical manifestation of their sonship. The number of Levites (Num. iii. 39, 51), 22,000, does not agree with the numbers assigned to the three families, 7500 + 8600 + 6200 = 22,300. But the total is correct; for it is written, the number of the firstborn, 22,273, exceeded that of the Levites by 273. Probably there is a copyist's error in the number of one of the Levitical families, perhaps in ver. 28 read 8300 for 8600. For the surplus 273 each was to pay five shekels, 1365 in all.

The earlier numbering for collecting atonement money from every male of 20 or upwards (Exod. xxx. 11-16, xxxviii. 25, 26) gave the same number, 603,550, as that nine months later (Num. i. 1-3, 46; Exod. xl. 17), in the second month of the second year, four weeks after the rearing of the tabernacle. The reason is, because the former census for gathering the atonement head money was taken as the basis for mustering all fit for war nine months later. This latter mustering merely consisted in registering those already numbered in the public records according to their families and fathers' houses; probably according to Jethro's suggestion of classification for administering justice, viz. in thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens (Exod. xviii. 25). Each tribe was placed under a special leader, head of the tribe, as is usual among the Arabs to this day. The supernumerary units would be used to balance the changes that had taken place in the actual condition of the families and fathers' houses between the earlier provisional numbering and the subsequent preparation of the muster rolls, so that the few changes that had taken place during the nine months' interval among those fit for war was made no account of, but the number was left the same.

A new census was taken 38 years afterwards in the plains of Moab (Num. xxvi.) for the division of Canaan among the tribes according to their families (xxxiii. 54). The number then was 601,730, of 20 years and upwards, of whom Joshua and Caleb alone were in the former census, the whole generation having died in the wilderness. The tribe of Simeon especially suffered a diminution of its numbers; probably owing to the plague which followed Zimri's sin with Cozbi the Midianite woman (Num. xxv. 9-15, xxvi. 51, 63-65; comp. xi. 21). The history does not detail the events of the intervening 38 years, but only of the beginning and the close of the 40 years. The total of Israel, including the 23,000

Levite males from a month old upwards, would be thus about 2,000,000 (xxvi. 62). The objection of rationalists that the peninsula of Sinai could not have sustained such a number is answered by the consideration (1) that Israel was sustained by a miracle, (2) the peninsula yielded much more anciently than at present. The destruction of the trees diminishes the rainfall; in the monumental period of ancient Egypt it is evident that the land was more cultivated; and the water in the wadies and the rain might, by artificial means, be made available to increase the fertility. The inscriptions of Sinai,

ENSCRIBED ROCKS IN WADY MURATTEH.

Serbal, and the wady Mokatteb, and other valleys prove that formerly a numerous population lived there.

The next numbering was that by David, contrary to Joab's advice (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-9; 1 Chron. xxi. 1, 5, xxvii. 24). "Satan stood up against Israel and provoked David to number Israel." Pride is peculiarly of Satan (Isa. xiv. 12), and proud presumption actuated David. It was not so much the act which was faultworthy (for indeed the taking of the census was recognised in the pentateuch: Exod. xxx. 12) as the motive, trust in the arm of flesh instead of in Jehovah (Jer. xvii. 5). Ps. xxx. (see its authoritative heading, which ought to be read "A Psalm of David at the dedication of the house," viz. of God) commemorates "the dedication," or consecration, of the site whereon subsequently Solomon's temple was built. When David, after the plague sent for numbering the people, sacrificed upon an altar of burnt offering on the threshingfloor of Araunah on mount Moriah, Jehovah by fire from heaven consecrated the place as "the house of God," even before the actual building of the temple (comp. 1 Chron. xxii. 1, 2 with Gen. xxviii. 17-19). Pride through prosperity, and a sudden, severe, but temporary, reverse appear in the psalm as in the history. The deliverance was the answer to David's prayer, Jehovah at the same time interceding; for whilst we pray below our Intercessor is pleading above (comp. Ps. xxx. 8-10 with 1 Chron. xxi. 15-18). Apparently David had neglected to have the half shekel apiece payment made to God in recognition of His sovereignty (Exod. xxx. 12, 13); in which respect the people shared the guilt and therefore the punishment. Probably he sought popularity by omitting it.

The number in 1 Chron. xxi. 5 is 1,100,000 of Israel and 470,000 of Judah. But in 2 Sam. xxiv. 9 of Israel 800,000, of Judah 500,000. The census was not completed, through the reluctance of Joab to proceed, and through David's revoking the order before it was finished. The number was never put "in the account of the chronicles of King David" (1 Chron. xxvii. 24). Levi was omitted, as it was for men fit for war that the census was taken. Benjamin, which came last in order on the return home to Jerusalem, had not been numbered when the census was interrupted (1 Chron. xxi. 6). The 30,000 difference in the number of Judah, as given in Chronicles and according to Samuel, was perhaps due to Benjamin being given in Samuel but not in Chronicles. Or, possibly, Chronicles omits the 30,000 army of observation stationed on the Philistine frontier (2 Sam. vi. 1). The 300,000 more in Israel according to Chronicles probably included the standing army in 24 courses of 21,000 each, i.e. 288,000 in all (1 Chron. xxvii.), besides 12 captains with 1000 each as the king's own guard, in all 300,000, not counted in 2 Sam. xxiv. These were in actual service; the larger numbers in the census are those capable of service. At best, oral tradition was the basis of the numbers here, seeing that it was not recorded in the chronicles of David. The whole population would thus amount to about 5,000,000; a number not too large for the well attested fertility of the land then to sustain. Even profane writers noticed Palestine's fertility, of which its present neglected state affords no test. God had promised a populous race. In A.D. 66, just before the Roman siege of Jerusalem, a census taken by the priests at the passover gave the approximate number 2,700,000, independently of foreigners and those ceremonially defiled. 1,100,000 perished in the siege; 97,000 were taken captives. These facts give us a glimpse of the populousness of the Holy Land.

Solomon completed David's census by causing the resident foreigners to be numbered and employed on his great works, viz. 153,600 (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18; comp. Josh. ix. 27). Jehoshaphat's army was one of the largest, 1,160,000 (2 Chron. xvii. 14-18); this probably included subject foreigners.

The object of the census on the return from Babylon was to settle against the year of jubilee the inheritances of the Holy Land (Lev. xxv. 10), which had been disarranged by the captivity, and to ascertain the family genealogies and ensure purity of Jewish blood. This accounts for differences appearing between the total and the details (Ezra ii. 59, 64) of the 42,360 who returned with Zerubbabel, 12,512 belonging to other tribes than Judah and Benjamin (x. 2, 8, 18, 44; Neh. vii. 1-67). [See CAPTIVITY.] The second caravan (458 B.C.) numbered 1496, exclusive of women and children (Ezra viii. 1-14). The genealogies (1 Chron. i.-ix.) were compiled for a similar object. The LXX. and Josephus confirm in the main the correctness of the Scripture numbers.

A "taxing" under Cyrenius, governor of Syria, is recorded Luke ii. 1; a disturbance caused by one Judas of Galilee "in the days of the taxing" is referred to in Acts v. 37. God's providence overruled Augustus' order for the provincial enrolment of all persons and estates under Roman sway, to effect His foretold purpose that Bethlehem should be the scene of Jesus' nativity (Mic. v. 2) 4 B.C.; His parents going up thither to be registered for the taxation, a plain proof that the foretold time for Shiloh's appearing was come, for "the sceptre was departed from Judah" to Rome (Gen. xlix. 10). Quirinus did not, according to history, become president of Syria till 9 or 10 years afterwards, A.D. 6. But Justin Martyr thrice (Apol., i. 34, 46; Trypho, 78) asserts Quirinus was president when Luke says he was. Zumpt moreover has recently brought to light the interesting fact that, owing to Cilicia when separated from Cyprus being joined to Syria, Quirinus as governor of Cilicia was also governor of Syria; his subsequent special connection with Syria caused his earlier and briefer one to be thus specified.

The word "first" too is to be noticed: "this taxing," ordered by Augustus just before Jesus' birth, was interrupted by the Jews' bitter opposition, and "was first carried into effect" when Cyrenius was governor of Syria; grammatically the Gr. expresses, "this taxing took place as a first one whilst Cyrenius was governor of Syria" (Ellicott). The omission, however, of the Gr. article in one oldest MS. (Vatican) would thus modify the trans., "this first taxation was carried into effect when Cyrenius," etc.

Centurion. It is a propriety in the N. T. that centurions are so often favourably noticed. Good conduct was generally the cause of their promotion to the command of a century (properly 100 men). Truthful straightforwardness would make them open to conviction. For instance, the one whose faith Jesus so commends in Matt. viii.; Cornelius, whom Peter was by vision sent to, and who is described as "devout, fearing God with all his house, giving much alms to the people, and praying to God alway" (Acts x.); Julius, the centurion of Augustus' band, who entreated Paul courteously and saved his life when threatened by the soldiers (xxvii. 1, 3, 42, 43). In xxiv. 23 translate "the centurion," viz. the commander of the horse who had conveyed Paul to Caesarea after the other of the two centurions had come back with the infantry (comp. xxiii. 23, 32). The centurion at the Lord's crucifixion uttered the testimony so remarkable from a Gentile: "certainly this was a righteous man"; St. Luke's explanation (xxiii. 47) of what a Gentile would mean by saying, "Truly this was the Son of God" (Matt. xxvii. 54).

Chaff. All refuse of threshed and winnowed grain, not merely the outer covering, as with us. Image of all worthless doctrine, and vain counsels, and hollow professors, about to perish utterly. Jer. xxiii. 28: "What is the chaff to the wheat?" God answers the objection, What must we do when lies are spoken as truths and prophets oppose prophets? Do as you would with wheat mixed with chaff; do not reject the wheat, because of the chaff mixed with it, but bring both to the test of "My word" (ver. 27, 29); so discriminate as to what to reject, and what to keep. My word, which is wheat or food to the true prophet and his hearers, is a consuming "fire" to the "chaff," i.e. false prophets, their followers and doctrine. (Ps. i. 4; Isa. xxxiii. 11, xlv. 13; Hos. xiii. 3; Matt. iii. 12.) Chaff is separated from the grain, after having been threshed, on high threshingfloors on hills, to catch the wind. So the final doom of the world powers before the coming manifested kingdom of Messiah (Dan. ii. 35). "(Before) the day pass as the chaff" in Zeph. ii. 2 means, Before the day of repentance pass, and with it you, ungodly, pass away as the chaff.

Chain. Of gold on Joseph's neck (Gen. xli. 42). Was the badge of a judge, and a prime minister, in Egypt. Judges wore the image of Thinel, or truth, attached from their neck (comp. Prov. i. 9). Daniel was given by Belshazzar a chain of gold about his neck, a token of investiture as "the third ruler in the kingdom" of Babylon (v. 7, 29). Secondly, chains, besides the necklace, were used for ornament, hanging down to the waist (Ezek. xvi. 11, Isa. iii. 19). "Chains," hanneti-photh, from nataph, to drop; pendants about the neck, dropping on the breast. Some had ornamental miniature lunettes attached (18), "round tires like the moon," such as the Midianites adorned their camels' necks with (Jud. viii. 21, 26; comp. Num. xxxi. 50); the chumarah or crescent is still worn in front of the headdress in western Asia; (20) "tablets" or scentbottles, lit. houses of the breath or soul, were often suspended by chains. "Tinkling ornaments," i.e. step chains attached to ankle rings, shortened the step so as to give a tripping (marg.) gait (16, 18).

Prisoners were chained to one or even two gnards, by a chain from each hand, as Peter (Acts xii. 6, 7). Paul's right hand was chained to the soldier's left (xxviii. 20). Originally he was bound with two chains (xxi. 33). Joseph's "feet they hurt with fetters, he was laid in (marg. his soul came into) iron," i.e. his soul suffered more pain than even the fetters caused to his body. As the Heb. verb is feminine, and "the iron" masculine, the Prayer-Book version:

"the iron entered into his soul," is wrong (Ps. cv. 18).

Chalcedony. Rev. xxi. 19. With it the third foundation of the wall of New Jerusalem is adorned. An agate-like quartz in modern mineralogy, of pearly lustre and transparent, found in the Trivassus mine in Cornwall. Cups, plates, knife handles, etc., are formed of it in India. Pliny makes it resemble turquoise; others make it of a light brown. The chalcedony of Theophrastus is called from Chalcedon in ancient Thrace, and was the copper emerald obtained from the mines there.

Chaldaea. [See BABEL.] Properly the S. part of Babylonia, chiefly on the right bank of the Euphrates, but used to designate the whole country. Ur or Uruk, more toward the mouth of the Euphrates, was the original chief city of C.; here inscriptions of the 22nd century B.C., deciphered lately, prove that the early seat of the Babylonian empire was there rather than higher up the Euphrates. In Isa. xxiii. 13 the prophet reminds Tyre of the fact so humbling to her pride, that the upstart Chaldees should destroy her: "Behold the land of the Chaldeans; this people was not, till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness;" i.e., their latter empire started into importance only after Assyria, in whose armies they had previously been mercenaries. The mountains of Armenia are thought by some to be their original seat (the Carduchian mountains, according to Xenophon, Cyrop. iii. 2, 3), whence they proceeded S. in wandering "bands" (Job i. 17) before they became a settled empire. But their Cushite language disproves this. Rawlinson distinguishes three periods. 1. When their empire was in the S., towards the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates; this is the Chaldean period (from 2340 to 1500 B.C.) in which CHEDORLAOMER [see] of Elam conquered Syria (Gen. xiv.), as the inscriptions show. 2. From 1500 to 625 B.C., the Assyrian period. 3. From 625 to 538 B.C., the Babylonian period. The Heb. name is Chasdim, akin to Chesed, Abraham's nephew apparently (Gen. xxii. 22). But their existence was centuries earlier (Gen. xi. 28). Chesed's name implies simply that Abraham's family had a connection with them. The Kurds still in Kurdistan between Nineveh and Media may be akin to the ancient Chasdim. But G. Rawlinson considers the Chasdim to be more probably one of the Cushite (Ethiopian) tribes that crossed over the Persian gulf and settled in Babylonia. Their name ultimately prevailed over that of the other tribes in the country. The remains found of their language correspond to that of the modern Galla of Abyssinia, the ancient language of Ethiopia. Scripture is thus confirmed, that Babel came from Cush and Ham, not from Shem (Gen. x. 6-10). Some interpret l = the moon goddess; the Chaldees being moon or rshippers or Subseans, from saba "the heavenly hosts," worshipped Bel, the planet Jupiter, Nebo, Mercury, etc. (Job xxxi. 26, 27.)

C. lies between the Tigris and Euphrates, and comprises also an average of 30 miles along the W. of the Euphrates; a vast alluvial plain, running N.E. and S.W. 400 miles, with the Persian gulf on the S., and a line from Hitt on the Euphrates to Tekrit on the Tigris forming its N. boundary. Elam, or Susiana, lies on the E. An arid waste, with great mounds of rubbish and brick here and there, all that is left of that "glory of kingdoms," now extends where once, by a perfect network of canals for irrigation, a teeming population was supplied abundantly from the rich soil with corn and wine. Scripture is to the letter fulfilled: "a drought is upon her waters" (Jer. l. 38). It was once said to be the only country where wheat grew wild. Berosus states also that barley, sesame, palms, apples, and many shelled fruit, grew wild. Herodotus (i. 193) stated that grain yielded the sower from two to three hundred fold. Strabo says it yielded bread, wine, honey, reposes, and fuel equal to charcoal. Now, whilst dry in some parts, it is a stagnant marsh in others, owing to neglect of the canals; as Scripture also foretells: "the sea is come up upon Babylon," etc. (Jer. li. 42); "she is a possession for the bitter, and pools of water" (Isa. xiv. 23).

The Chaldean cities are celebrated in Scripture: "Babel, Erech (now Warka), Accad, Calneh (Niffer)" (Gen. x. 10). Borsippa is Birs-Nimrud now; Sepharvaim or Sippara, Mosaib; Cutha, Ibrahim; Chilmad, Calcuttha; Larancha, Senkereh; Is, Hit, where the canal leaving the Euphrates at the point where the alluvial plain begins passed along the whole edge of the plain, and fell into the Persian gulf. There is one large inland fresh water sea, Nedjef, 40 miles long by 35 wide, surrounded by red sandstone cliffs; about 20 miles from the right bank of the Euphrates. Above and below this sea are the Chaldean marshes in which Alexander was almost lost.

In another sense the "CHALDEANS" are a priest caste, with a peculiar tongue and learning, skilled in divination. In the ethnic sense we saw it was applied first to a particular Cushite tribe, then to the whole nation from the time of Nabopassar. The Semitic language prevailed over the Cushite in Assyrian and later Babylonian times, and was used for all civil purposes; but for sacred and mystic lore the Cushite language was retained as a learned language. This is "the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans" (Dan. i. 4), in which the four Jewish youths were instructed, and which is quite distinct from the Aramaean, or Chaldee so called (allied to Heb.), of those parts of the book of Daniel which are not Heb., as not being so connected with the Jews as with the Babylonians. The Cushite Chaldee had become a dead language to the mass of the people who had become Semitized by the Assyrians. All who studied it were called "Chaldeans," whatever might be their nation; so Daniel is called "master of the Chaldeans" (v. 11). Their seats of learning were Borsippa, Ur, Babylon, and Sepharvaim. The serene sky and clear atmosphere favoured their astronomical studies; Callisthenes sent Aristotle from Babylon their observations for 1903 years. Afterwards their name became synonymous with diviners and fortunetellers. They wore a peculiar dress, like that seen on the gods and deified men in Assyrian sculptures. At the time of the Arab invasion the Chaldeans chiefly still preserved the learning of the East. We owe to them the preservation of many fragments of Greek learning, as the Greeks had previously owed much of their eastern learning to the Chaldees.

The Aramaean and the Heb. are sister languages. The former is less developed and cultivated than either Heb. or Arabic. Of its two dialects, Chaldee and Syriac, the former prevailed in the E., the latter in the W. of Aram. To express the article it employs an affix instead of a prefix as the Heb. The dual number and the purely passive conjugations are wanting. The Chaldee of parts of the Bible (Dan. ii. 4-vii. 28; Ezra iv. 8-vi. 18, vii. 12-26; Jer. x. 11) more closely approaches the Heb. idiom than the Chaldee of the Targum of Onkelos. Some think the seeming Hebraisms in it are remnants of an older form of the language than that found in the targums.

Chamberlain. Rom. xvi. 23: Erastus, oikonomos, steward or public treasurer of the city, who kept account of the revenues. Latinarcarius. So in inscriptions in Marm. Oxon., 85, Neilos is called oikonomos of Asia. On the other hand Blastus was chamberlain (epi tou koitōnos tou basileos) in a different sense, viz. over the king's bedchamber, a post of honour and intimacy (Acts xii. 20).

Chambers of Imagery. Ezek. viii. 7, 10, 12. The vision is not of an actual scene, but an ideal pictorial representation of the Egyptian idolatries into which the covenant people had relapsed; having light enough to be ashamed of their idolatries, and therefore practising them in secret, but not decision enough to renounce them, casting away their superstitious fears and self-willed devices to allay them. Idolatry tends more and more to degrade its votaries, so that in Egypt they sank so low as to worship abominable creeping things. Their own perverse imaginations answer to the priests' chambers in the vision, whereon the pictures were portrayed. If "in the wall" of most men's religious profession "a hole" were opened whereby the inner heart might be seen, what awful pictures would be seen in "the chambers of imagery"! (See John iii. 20.)

Chameleon. A kind of large lizard, called koach from its great strength (Lev. xi. 30). Knobel makes it "the croaking frog." Gesenius, "the Nile lizard." The word translated "the mole," tinshemeth, is rather the chameleon, lit. "the inflating animal," as it inflates its body when excited. The koach answers well to the gecko lizard, small, clumsy, hiding by day in holes, and at night coming forth to prey upon insects. They can crawl like flies on the under side of ceilings by the lamellated structure of the under surface of their toes.

Chamois. Zemer, from zamar to leap. Allowed as clean food (Dent. xiv. 5). The giraffe according to Gosse, (from the Arabic version and the LXX.). The objection is, the giraffe is not a native of Palestine; but it is of Nubia, and may have been of the Arabian peninsula at the exodus. Clearly it is not the chamois found only on high peaks of the Alps, Taurus, and Caucasus. It may be some other species of antelope. Col. Smith suggests the oudad mountain sheep. The Syrian has "the mountain goat."

Changers of money. Matt. xxi. 12, John ii. 14. They set up their tables in the court of the Gentiles, to exchange at a price the foreign coin of Jews and proselytes coming from distant lands for the Heb. half shekel, (which was required from every adult from 20 years old and upwards: Exod. xxviii. 26) in presenting themselves to worship at the tabernacle or temple. At the beginning of His ministry, and at its close, Christ marked His mission as the foretold Purifier of the temple (Mal. iii. 1-5), for the presence of Jehovah, of which His own divinely formed body was the type. The court of the Gentiles, as distinguished from that of Israel and that of the priests, was designed not only for an unclean Jew, but also for the uncircumcised Gentile proselytes. The Jewish traffic here was an insult to the Gentiles. It made what God designed to be "a house of prayer for all people" (Isa. lvi. 7) to become "a house of merchandise." The bustle around rendered prayer almost impossible. The priests let the court to the moneychangers, making godliness into a source of gain. Christ's clearing them out with so puny a weapon as "a whip of small cords" is a warrant of His having "all power given" to Him by the Father, and of His future purging out of His kingdom "all things which offend, and them which do iniquity" (Matt. xiii. 41). Then and then only shall the temple be made "a house of prayer for all people" (Isa. ii. 2-4).

Chapter. The capital of a pillar; also a moulding at the top of a work of art, as the lavers (Exod. xxxviii. 17; 1 Kings vii. 27, 31, 38).

Charashim, Valley of, i.e., of craftsmen. Joab, of Othniel's family, of Judah, founded the settlement there (1 Chron. iv. 14, Neh. xi. 35). E. of Jaffa, at the rising ground behind the plain of Sharon, near Lod or Lydda.

Charger = what bore any weight. A hollow plate for presenting offerings of fine flour and oil (Num. vii. 79). Among the vessels of the temple taken by Nebuchadnezzar and restored by Cyrus, and brought back by Sheshbazzar (Ezra i. 9). In such a "charger" John's head was presented to the cruel Herodias (Matt. xiv. 8).

Chariot: sometimes including the horses (2 Sam. viii. 4, x. 18). Mentioned first in Gen. xli. 43, where Joseph rides in Pharaoh's second chariot; also xvi. 29. In the Egyptian monuments they occur to the number of 27,000 in records of the reign of Rameses II., 1300 B.C., and even earlier in the 18th dynasty 1530 B.C., when Amosis I. used them against the shepherd kings. A leading purpose of chariots was war. Pharaoh followed Israel with 600 chosen chariots (Exod. xiv. 7). The Canaanites of the valleys armed theirs apparently with iron scythes (Josh. xvii. 18, Jud. i. 19). Jabin had 900, which enabled him to "oppress the children of Israel mightily," because of their sins (Jud. iv. 3). The Philistines in Saul's time had 30,000 (1 Sam. xiii. 5). David took from Hadarezer of Zobah 1000, and from the Syrians 700; these to retrieve their loss gathered 32,000 (1 Chron. xix. 7).

God forbade His people their use, lest they should depend on human help rather than on Him (Dent. xvii. 16, xx. 1; Ps. xx. 7), also lest there should be a turning of the elect nation's heart back to Egypt and its corrupt ways. Solomon from carnal state policy allied himself to Egypt, and disregarded God's prohibition, as Samuel foretold would be the case if Israel, not content with God, should set up a human king (1 Sam. viii. 11, 12). Solomon had 1400 chariots, and bought each out of Egypt at 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150; and taxed certain cities for the cost, according to eastern usage (1 Kings ix. 19, x. 26, 29).

In Exod. xiv. 7 translate "captains (lit. men of the king's council of 30) over the whole of them." Not as some thought, "thief men in every one of them." For the Egyptian chariots only carried two, the driver and the warrior. The Assyrian chariots (Nah. ii. 3, 4) depicted on the monuments often contain a third, viz. the warrior's shieldbearer.

In Exod. xiv. 9 "horsemen" are mentioned. Hengstenberg thinks rekeb does not mean cavalry, as they are not depicted in the Egyptian monuments, but merely "riders in chariots." But Diodorus Siculus states that Rameses II. had 24,000 cavalry. Egyptian art seems even in later times, when certainly cavalry were employed, to have avoided depicting horsemen. The language of Exod. xv. 1, Isa. xxxi. 1, can be reconciled with either view. Ancient papyri allude to mounting on horseback (Cook, in Speaker's Commentary).

The men in the chariot always stood. The Egyptian chariot consisted of a semicircular frame of wood with straight sides, resting on the axle-tree of a pair of wheels; and on the frame a rail attached by leathern thongs; one wooden upright in front; open at the back for mounting. On the right side the bowcase and the quiver and spearcase crossed diagonally. The horses were only breast-band and girths attached to the saddle, and a bearing rein fastened to a ring in front of it.

In N. T. the only chariots mentioned are that of the Ethiopian eunuch of Candace (Acts viii. 28, 29, 38), and Rev. ix. 9.

The Persians sacrificed horses to the sun; so the Jews under the idolatrous Manasseh dedicated chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxii. 11). Josiah burned these chariots with fire, thus making the object of their superstition, fire, to consume their instruments of worship.

Charity. The Gr. "love," "loving esteem"; Latin caritas. The outward beneficence, or alms, is a mere manifestation of the inward and true charity of Scripture (1 Cor. xiii. 3): "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, . . . and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."

Chebar. A river of Chaldaea, where Ezekiel saw his earlier visions (Ezek. i. 1, 3; iii. 15, 23). Nebuchadnezzar had planted many of the captives taken with Jehoiachin there (2 Kings xxiv. 15). The Harbar or river of Gozan, where the Assyrians planted the Israelites (2 Kings xvii. 6), is conjectured to be the same. The Gr. Chaboras. It flows into the Euphrates at Ciresium. But the name Chaldaea does not reach so far N. More probably the C. is the nahr Malcha, Nebuchadnezzar's royal canal, the greatest (chabeer means great) in Mesopotamia. The captives may have been made to excavate the channel. Tradition places Ezekiel's tomb at K'heil, which favours our placing C. in Chaldaea, rather than upper Mesopotamia.

Chedorlaomer. Gen. xiv. King of Elam, who for twelve years had in subjection to him the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zebonim, and Bela, or Zoar. In the 13th they revolted, whereupon he, with his subordinate allies, the kings of Shinar (Babylonia), and Ellasar, and Tidal, "king of nations" (Median Scyths, belonging to the old population) smote the Rephaims in Ashteroth Karnaim, the Zuzims in Hami, the Emims in Shaveh Kirithaim, the Horites in mount Seir, the Amalekites, and the Amorites in Hazekun Tamar; and finally encountered and defeated the five allied kings in the vale of Siddim. Among the captive whom he took was Lot. Abraham with 318 armed servants however defeated him in turn, and rescued Lot, and pursued the invader to Hobah on the left of Damascus. A recently deciphered record states that an Elam-the king, Kudur-Nakhunta, conquered Babylon about 2290 B.C. Assurbanipal, king of Assyria 668 B.C., recovered an image of Nana captured by the Elamites from Uruk—Erech 1635 years previously, i.e. 2286. Babylonian documents of the age 2200-2100 B.C. also allude to an interruption in the native dynasty about this date by a king from Elam or Susiana between the Tigris and Persia. There is mentioned among the Babylonian kings one who held his court at Ur in Lower Chaldea, an Elamite prince, Kudur-Mabuk (= Chedor-laomer; Lagomer being an Elamite goddess of which Mabuk is the Elamitic name). Kudur is thought to mean mother, i.e. attendant or worshipper of Lagomer. Kudur the king bears in the inscriptions the surname Apda Martu, "the ravager of the West." He did not establish a lasting empire over Syria, as his Assyrian and Babylonian successors, but was simply its "ravager," exactly as the Bible represents him. He was Semitic, and had made himself lord paramount over the Hamite kings of Shinar and Ellasar.

Cheese. Job x. 10, 1 Sam. xvii. 18, 2 Sam. xvii. 29. The modern Arabs use either butter, or coagulated butter-milk dried so as to be hard. Our "butter" means in derivation "cheese of kine." In ancient Palestine probably by "cheese" is meant milk compressed in cakes, salted, soft when new, but soon becoming hard and dry.

Chelal. Ezra x. 30.

Chelub. 1. 1 Chron. xxvii. 23. 2. Written Cheleb; Heb. Chelub (1 Chron. iv. 11).

Chelubai. 1 Chron. ii. 9; same as Caleb (18, 42). Brother of Jerahmeel; the Jerahmeelites' position was S. of Judah, where also was the inheritance of Caleb's house (Jud. i. 15; 1 Sam. xxv. 3, xxvii. 10, xxx. 14).

Chemarim. In Zeph. i. 4 distinct from "the priests," from chamar "to burn" or "blacken," the black-attired ministers of the idol priests, who felled the victim at the altar. Or they were named from branding idol marks on their foreheads, idol fanatics. Others derive it from chamar "to resound," viz. their howlings during the rites. Josiah put them down (2 Kings xxiii. 5 marg., Hos. x. 5). The root in Syriac is "to be sad": an ascetic priest.

Chemosh. The "abomination" (i.e. idol, in Scripture's contemptuous phrase) of Moab (Num. xxi. 29, Jer. xlviii. 7, 13, 46). Depicted on coins with sword, lance, and shield, and two torches at his side. Ammon, from its close connection with Moab, also worshipped C., but Moab (king) was their peculiar deity (Jud. xi. 24). Solomon introduced, and Josiah overthrew, C. worship in Jerusalem. A black star, according to Jewish tradition, was his symbol, whether as identical with Mars or Saturn. Jerome states that Dibon was his chief seat of worship. A black stone was the Arab symbol of him. The inscribed black stone set up at Dibon, lately discovered, is full of the Moabite king Mesha's praises of C. as the giver of his martial successes against Israel. [See MOAB and DIBON.] Derived from kabash, to vanquish. Idolatry originated in appropriating to separate deities the attributes combined in the one true God. "Ashtar Chemosh," mentioned on the Moabite stone, connects the Moabite and the Phœnician worship. Ashtar is the masculine of Astarte, an androgynous god, combining the active and passive powers of nature. C. required human sacrifices as god of war; Mesha, after taking Ataroth, offered all the warriors in sacrifice.

Chenaanah. Feminine of Canaan. 1. Among Benjamin's descendants; son of Bilhan (1 Chron. vii. 10). 2. The false prophet Zedekiah's father or ancestor (1 Kings xxii. 11, 24).

Chenani. Neh. ix. 4.

Chenaniah = the favour of Jehovah. 1 Chron. xv. 22, xxvi. 29.

Chephar-haammonai = hamlet of the Ammonites. Among Benjamin's towns (Josh. xviii. 24). The name alludes to some Ammonite inroad up the ravines from the Jordan valley to the Benjamite highlands.

Chephirah. One of Gibeon's four cities (Josh. ix. 17), afterwards belonging to Benjamin (xviii. 26). The men of C. returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 25, Neh. vii. 29). Now Kejra, on the W. of Benjamin, near Ajalon (Jaba).

Cheran. Gen. xxxvi. 26.

Cherethims, or Cherethites. David's body guard, along with the PELETHITES [see] (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7, 23; 1 Kings i. 38, 44; 1 Chron. xvii. 17). Saul had "footmen" (runners) as his guard (1 Sam. xiii. 17); so Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 27, 28). Couriers afterwards took their place. The Cherethites and Pelethites were called out from attending the king's person only on extraordinary emergencies, as the rebellion of Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 6, 7). Benaiah was their commander (2 Sam. xxiii. 23). The name is a national name; a tribe of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxx. 14, comp. 16; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5).

Crete seems a kindred name to C.; it was famed for archery, as were they; for which David chose a number of them as his body guard. Some of them probably joined him during his sojourn among the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii. xxix.). Others he may have afterwards enrolled on his conquest of the Philistines (2 Sam. viii. 1). Some of the Philistine C. probably colonised Crete originally, whilst others remained in Philistia, whither they had migrated from Africa. Gittites of the Philistine Gath, to the number of 600, under Ittai, similarly followed David (2 Sam. xv. 18, 19). The name Pelethites may be another form of Philistines, or possibly be from Pelestin, (political) "refugees" from Philistia. Ewald supports the former. It is probably an ethnic name, as Cherethim. [See CAPTOR.]

Cherith = separation. The brook or torrent channel (wady) by which Elijah sojourned in the early part of the three years drought (1 Kings xvii. 3, 5). Probably running into the Jordan from the E. side, Elijah's native region, where he would be beyond Ahab's reach. Possibly now the W. Fasail, farther N.

Cherub, Cherubim. Composite animal forms, always spoken of as familiar to the Hebrews: fourfold, consisting of man, lion, ox, and eagle; ideal representatives of redeemed creaturely life, in which man is prominent (Ezek. i. 5, Rev. iv. 7). Distinct from the Assyrian and Egyptian winged forms still existing (almost always a beast form with human head) in having the fourfold composite animal aspect, with the characteristics of manhood as the basis and body of the whole. "At the E. of Eden [after Adam's fall] God placed (yashkeen, 'set as the dwelling place of His Shekinah glory') the C., and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the way of life" (Gen. iii. 24). As the flaming sword proclaimed God's just wrath against sin, so the C. mercy in store for lost man. They were "the provisional occupants of man's lost inheritance" (Fairbairn), the pledge of the restoration of man and the creaturely world closely allied with and subject to him (Ps. viii.; Isa. xi. 6-9; Rom. viii. 17-24; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; Hos. ii. 18); the symbolical prophecy of the recovery of the tree of life; for they guard it, not against but for man, against the time when man shall be fit to enjoy it and never to lose it. Rev. ii. 7, xii. 14: they, with the flaming sword, were the forerunners of the sanctuary, where the C. on either side of the bright Shekinah cloud (from which, as on Sinai, the flame might at any moment dart) looked down on the blood-sprinkled mercy seat of the ark, God's meeting place in reconciliation with sinners by the atoning blood; mercy and justice meeting together in man's redemption. Hence it was before God's manifested presence, between the C. at the E. of Eden, the first sacrifices were offered (Gen. iv. 3, 4, 16; ii. 21). Whereas heathen sacrificed to appease their God, Bible sacrifices were brought before God expressing the propitiation which He had already in His gracious purpose made by His Son (Rev. xiii. 8).

The placing of the man-like C. on the inheritance once man's suggested the truth that man and the creatures involved in his fall have still by some gracious mystery, of which the C. are the pledge, an interest in Eden. The appearance of the C. in the holiest place afterwards suggested to man the same assurance of a common meeting ground with God at peace and in holiness. Finally, their appearance in Revelation, round God's throne as the redeemed, crowned that hope with joyful certainty. As the glory of God was last seen on the E., so shall "the glory of the God of Israel come from the way of the E." (Gen. iii. 24; Ezek. xi. 23, xliii. 2.)

As the redeemed will hereafter be one with Christ in His executing vengeance on the ungodly (Rev. xix. 11-16), so the C. (xv. 7, Ezek. x. 7). In Ezek. i. the four living creatures of the C. stand in contrast with the four world monarchies (Dan. vii.), termed "beasts." The four answers to the four quarters of the world, implying worldwide extension, true catholicity, which the world powers sought vainly to attain by ambitious selfishness. The Mosaic C. were formed out of the same mass of pure gold as the mercy seat (Exod. xxv. 19, 20).

The wings express rapidity in fulfilling God's will. The eyes all over (Ezek. x. 12) express manifold and ubiquitous wisdom. The ox form represents tame animals, of which he is chief; the lion, wild animals; the eagle, birds; man, head of all, in his ideal realized by the Son of man, combines all animal excellences. The redeemed shall be the ruling powers, through whom, as now by the angels, God shall administer the government of the world, and proclaim His manifold wisdom (Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 2; Eph. iii. 10; Rev. iii. 21, iv. 6-8). In Ezek. x. 13 "it was cried unto the wheels . . . O wheel," i.e. "Roll on." Jehovah by His word in connection with His ministering powers sets the whole "wheel of nature" (Gr. Jas. iii. 6) and providence in motion.

In Rev. v. 9-12 the four living creatures (zoa, not theria, "beasts") identify themselves as the redeemed. (All creation is summed up in man its lord; whence Christ's command, "preach the gospel to every creature," for man's redemption involves the restoration of the creature now subject to vanity: Rom. viii.) "Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred and tongue . . . and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." Whereas in Ezekiel (i. 6) each living creature has all four faces, in Rev. iv. 6-9 the four faces are distributed, one to each.

The Christian fathers identify them with the four Gospels: Matthew, the lion, the kingly aspect of Christ's manifestation; Mark, the ox, Christ's laborious endurance; Luke, the man, Christ's brotherly sympathy with our whole race; John, the eagle, the soaring majesty of the Divine Word made flesh. The grain of truth in this view is that the church of the redeemed, like Christ her Head and His gospel, is one under a fourfold aspect answering to the several characteristics represented by the four heads of animal life. In and with Christ she shall realize the ideal of man combining fourfold creaturely perfections: (1) kingly righteousness with hatred of evil, as "the lion springing terribly on the victim"; (2) laborious diligence in duty, as the "ox bound to the soil"; (3) human sympathy, as "the man"; (4) sublime contemplation of heavenly things, as "the eagle." In Revelation the four living creatures represent the elect redeemed, as they shall be when perfected, ministering as king-priests unto God, and media of blessing to the redeemed earth with its nations and its animal creation.

The four standards under which Israel encamped in the wilderness were a lion for Judah on the E., an eagle for Dan on the N., an ox for Ephraim on the W., and a man for Reuben on the S. In the midst was the tabernacle with the Shekinah cloud symbolising God's presence, "the picture of the blessed period when the earth being fitted for the kingdom of the Father . . . heaven's court will be transferred hither (Rev. xxi. 3), and the world be subject to a never ending theocracy" (De Burgh). The cherubic four stand always in nearest relationship to God in His holiness and life-imparting presence; comp. Exod. xxv. 22, Ps. lxxx. 1. Whereas angels are "round about the throne," the living creatures occupy the innermost circle next it and Him who is in their midst (Rev. v. 6, 11). Thirty times they are called "the living creatures," full of the life of God everlastingly flowing into them. [See ADAM.]

The griffins of northern fable and the winged beasts of Assyria and Egypt seem a relic of primeval tradition corrupted. The Gr. grups, glupho, and the Syriac and Arabic words for "carve" and griffin, seem kindred words to cherub; cherob is the rabbinical term for an image; cherub, the Coptic. Gesenius takes the root charab "to consecrate a shrine." Colossal figures of compound living creatures are still found "guarding the portals of the Assyrian temples" (Layard). The heathen knowledge of the C. of revelation is implied in Ezek. xxviii. 13, 14, where the king of Tyre is represented as having been "in Eden the garden of God," and as boasting that he is "the anointed cherub that covereth," i.e. the cherub of the temple anointed by the consecrating oil, and defending Tyre as the C. "covered" or overshadowed the mercy seat; the type of Antichrist who shall usurp the attributes of the true Anointed One, who "covers" His church, the beau ideal of humanity. The clearness of the type as symbolising the redeemed increases as the revelation of the scheme of redemption becomes fuller. At Eden the C. are mysteriously indefinite. In the tabernacle they are lifeless carved figures, with faces ever turned to the mercy seat, the pledge of redemption. In Solomon's temple they are of colossal size, symbolising the future grandeur of the church, reigning with the antitypical Solomon over the earth. In Ezekiel, for the first time, instinct with life, zeal, and ceaseless untiring motion. In Revelation they reveal who and what they are, and sing the song of praise for their redemption (v. 8, 9). As the mercy seat (typifying Christ as our propitiation) interposed between the law inside the ark and the C. outside, so Christ interposes between the Divine justice and the redeemed. As the C. were of one piece with the ark, so the redeemed are one with Christ, and one with Him as their propitiation (2 Pet. i. 4, Heb. ii. 11; Exod. xxix. 42-46, xxv. 22; 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; Gal. ii. 20). Archdeacon Freeman suggests that the C. were the archetype in heaven upon which God moulded all the various genera and species of the animal kingdom on earth; hence arises the strange similarity in difference; it is the token of a universal pattern, though not of a common parentage, a mutual relation between them, but not a development of one out of the other by natural selection, as Darwin thinks.

Cherub. In the low salt region near the Persian gulf. Chiripha in Ptolemy. [See TEL MELAH.]

Chesalon. "The side of mount Jearim (forests) which is C." (Josh. xv. 10.) A landmark N.W. of Judah. Now the village Kesla, eight miles W. of Jerusalem.

Chesed. Nahor's fourth son (Gen. xxii. 22).

Chesil. S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 30). Perhaps the same as Bethul, of Simeon, within Judah's inheritance, or Bethuel (Josh. xix. 4, 1 Chron. iv. 30, 1 Sam. xxx. 27), "Bethel" among the cities of the extreme S.

Chest. 1. Aron, always, except twice (Joseph's coffin and Jehoiahi's alms chest, Gen. i. 26, 2 Kings xii. 9, 10), used for the ark of the covenant; the "ark" (teebah) of Noah, and that of bulrushes in which Moses was put, is quite distinct. 2. Genazim, "chests of rich apparel" (Ezek. xxvii. 24), from ganaz "to board."

Chestnut tree (armon). Gen. xxx. 37, from which Jacob pulled rods to set before the flock. Ezek. xxxi. 7, 8, to which the Assyrian empire is compared in beauty and strength. A tree, stately and wide spreading and growing near water, must be meant.

CHESTNUT TREE.

The eastern plane tree (not ours, which is a maple, Acer pseudoplatanus) fulfils the conditions; its root, aram "to be naked," "to strip off the bark," corresponds; for it yearly sheds its bark. The groves of the Academy at Athens, where Plato and Aristotle taught, were of eastern plane.

Chesulloth. In Issachar (Josh. xix. 18). The Xaloth of Josephus. Meaning "the loins," probably therefore on a hill slope.

Chezib. Gen. xxxviii. 5. Same as Achzib and Chozoba.

Chidon=javelin: 1 Chron. xiii. 9. Elsewhere Nachon's (= firm) threshing-floor (2 Sam. vi.), where Uzza touched the shaking ark.

Children. Ben, "son;" bath, "daughter;" both from banah, to build. Regarded as consecrated to God, in the same covenant relation as the parents; therefore sons on the eighth day were circumcised (Gen. xvii. 12). So as to the Christian covenant of which baptism is the initiatory seal (1 Cor. vii. 14). Hence flowed parents' responsibility to rear children in the way of the Lord (Gen. xviii. 19; Deut. vi. 7, xi. 19); also children's responsibility to obey parents, as a preparatory discipline for the higher relationship to God. At five the boy passed under the father's training. At 12 he became "son of (i.e. subject to) the law," and was advanced to a fuller instruction in it. Smiting, or even cursing, a parent was punishable with death (Exod. xxi. 15, 17; also contumacy (Deut. xvi. 18 21; comp. xxvii. 16). The child might be sold to bondage until the jubilee year for a parent's debt (2 Kings iv. 1, Neh. v. 5).

Children were often nursed till three years old. They were carried on the mother's hip or shoulder (Isa. xlix. 22, lxvi. 12). Governors or tutors watched them in nonage (Num. xi. 12; 2 Kings x. 1, 5; Isa. xlix. 23; Gal. iii. 24, paidagogos, the guardian slave who led the child to school). The mother's example and authority were weighty over sons and daughters alike (Prov. x. 1, xv. 20), even with a royal son (1 Kings ii. 19). Daughters had no right of inheritance; but if a man had no son the daughters received the inheritance, only they must marry in their own tribe.

Metaphorically: CHILDREN OF LIGHT (Luke xvi. 8, 1 Thess. vi. 5), of obedience (1 Pet. i. 14, "as children of obedience" Gr.), of this world, of BELIAL [see], of wisdom (Matt. xi. 19), of faith. As children resemble their parent, so those in whom these several qualities, good or bad, predominate, are children of them severally (2 Sam. xxiii. 6). So Barnabas is termed "son of consolation," expressing his predominant grace (Acts iv. 36); John and James "sons of thunder," characterized by fiery zeal (Mark iii. 17). S; "sons of might," "daughters of song" (comp. Isa. v. 1, "a very fruitful hill," Heb. "the horn (i.e. peak) of the son of oil," "children of the bridechamber" (Matt. ix. 15), the heavenly Bridegroom's best men who go and fetch the bride, the apostles and evangelists who seek to bring sinners to Jesus and to heaven (Matt. xxv.).

Chileab. David's son by Abigail (2 Sam. iii. 3). Elsewhere called Daniel (1 Chron. iii. 1).

Chilion. Orpah's husband, son of Elimelech and Naomi (Ruth i. 2-5, iv. 9). An Ephraimite of Bethlehem Judah (formerly Ephrath, Gen. xxxv. 19).

Chilmad. Named with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. xxvii. 23). Ptolemy mentions a Gaia of Media, which compounded forms Chil-mad. The Chaldee version has "Media," others "Carnanda," a large city beyond the Euphrates (Xenophon).

Chilham. 2 Sam. xix. 34, 37-40. Taken by David to court, instead of Barzillai the Gileadite, his father, to whom the king owed a debt of gratitude for help in his flight from Absalom. In Jer. xli. 17, ages after, the Jewish refugees from the Babylonians "dwelt in the habitation of C., which is by Bethlehem, to go to enter into Egypt." David's patrimony was at Bethlehem; and this incidental notice leads to the inference that, having undertaken to provide for C., he conferred on him his personal patrimony, subject to the reversion to David's heirs at the year of jubilee; hence it was called "the habitation of C."

Chinnereth, Sea of, or Chinneroth. 1. Afterwards the lake of Gennesaret, a corruption of C. (Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 27). The district of C. is called "all C." (1 Kings xv. 20). 2. A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35); probably the same as Tiberias, from which similarly the lake or sea was named (Num. xxxiv. 11, John vi. 1).

Chios. Acts xx. 14, 15; xxi. Now Seio, an island of the Archipelago, near which Paul passed going from Mitylene, in Lesbos, to Samos, between which two islands it lay, 32 miles long, from 8 to 18 broad; mountainous, beautiful, and fertile. Its modern inhabitants suffered severely in the war of independence.

Chislon. Father of Elidad, prince of Benjamin, chosen to help in dividing Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 21).

Chisloth Tabor. On the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12) (perhaps Iksul, W. of mount Tabor), meaning "confidences of Tabor," i.e. fort of Tabor (comp. 1 Chron. vi. 77).

Chittim. A race sprung from Javan, i.e. of Ionian or Greek origin (Gen. x. 4, 1 Chron. i. 7). Balaam foretold that a fleet from C. should "afflict Asshur" (Num. xxiv. 24). Thither Tyre's fleets resorted (Isa. xxiii. 2, 12). The name C. is applied by the Hebrews to Cyprus, of which the cities, including Citium, its capital, were mostly Phœnician. Thence the Tyrians procured the boxwood which they inlaid with ivory (Ezek. xxvii. 6). (Heb., instead of "the company of the Ashurites," "they have made thy (rowing) benches of ivory inlaid in the daughter of cedars," i.e. the best boxwood, which came from Cyprus and Macedonia. "C." was applied subsequently to the other islands of the Ægean, and to the maritime mainlands of Greece and Italy. The Assyrians in an inscription 710 B.C. designate Cyprus as "the land of Yarnan," as the Scripture traces it to Javan. The Ionian stream of migration proceeding from Asia to Greece would leave some of the race in Cyprus or C. on its way, as it did in Magnesia under Sipylus. When Cyprus first comes before us in history it is predominantly a Greek island (G. Rawlinson). The Phœnicians also colonised it. C. = Hittin, the Hittites, a Canaanite race. The "ships of C." in Dan. xi. 30 are the Macedonian-Greek or even Italian vessels, in which the Roman ambassador Popilius Lænas arrived to check Antiochus Epiphanes. As Kedar expresses generally the East, so C. the West (Jer. ii. 10).

Chiun. [See REMPHAN.]

Chloe. 1 Cor. i. 11. A matron at Corinth, some of whose household informed Paul of the divisions in the Corinthian church. The Corinthians had "written" to Paul consulting him about marriage, things offered to idols, decorum in church assemblies, but not a syllable about the disorders that had crept in. That information reached him from other quarters: comp. v. 1, 2. "It hath been declared unto me," "it is reported." All this he says before he notices their letter, which shows it gave him no intimation of these evils. An undesigned proof of genuineness (Paley). He names the family, to show he has authority for his allegation, but not individuals, to avoid exciting odium against them. He tacitly implies that the information ought to have come from their presbyters, who consulted him about matters of less moment.

Chorashan. 1 Sam. xxx. 30. Probably Ashan of Simeon, one of David's haunts. To its citizens among the cities of the S. he sent presents of the Amalekite spoils.

Chorazin. With Capernaum and Bethsaida doomed to "woe," because of neglected spiritual privileges. The scene of many of Jesus' mighty works, which failed to bring its people to repentance and faith (Matt. xi. 21, Luke x. 13). No work of Jesus in it is recorded, a proof of how much more He did than is written (John xxi. 25). Probably at Kerazeh, near Tell Ham.

Chozeba. [See CHEZIB.] The descendants of Shelah, Judah's son, are called "the men of C., . . . and these are ancient things" (1 Chron. iv. 22). Identified by Conder (Pal. Expl., Jan. 1875) with Khirbet Kueizibah. The houses are standing to the height of eight or ten feet. The indications on the hill imply great antiquity. How accurate is Scripture in its names and topography! The Talmud mentions that a plain is in front of C.; so Kneizibah has before it the valley of Berachoth (ready Arrub).

Christian. The name given first at Antioch to Christ's followers. In the N. T. it only occurs in 1 Pet. iv. 16, Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 27, 28. Their name among themselves was "brethren," "disciples," "those of the way" (Acts vi. 1, 3; ix. 2), "saints" (Rom. i. 7). The Jews, as they denied that Jesus is the Christ, would never originate the name "Christians," but called them "Nazarenes" (Acts xxiv. 5). The Gentiles communicated them with the Jews, and thought them a Jewish sect. But a new epoch arose in the church's development when, at Antioch, idolatrous Gentiles (not merely Jewish proselytes from the Gentiles, as the eunuch, a circumcised proselyte, and Cornelius, an uncircumcised proselyte of the gate) were converted. Then the Gentiles needed a new name to designate men who were Jews neither by birth nor religion. And the people of Antioch were famed for readiness in giving names: Partisans of Christ, Christiani, as Cæsariani, partisans of Cæsar; a Latin name, as Antioch had become a Latin city. But the name was divinely ordered (as chrematizo always expresses, xi. 26), as the new name to mark the new era, viz. that of the church's gospel missions to the Gentiles. The rarity of its use in the N. T. marks its early date, when as yet it was a name of reproach and hardly much recognised among the disciples. So in our age "Methndist," a term originally given in reproach, has gradually come to be adopted by Wesley's disciples themselves. Blunt well says: "if the Acts were a fiction, is it possible that this unobtrusive evidence of the progress of a name would have been found in it?"

Christianity. [See JESUS CHRIST.]

The law and Mosaic system, though distinct from the gospel, yet clearly contemplates the new dispensation as that for which itself was the preparation. The original promise to Abraham, "in thee . . . and thy seed . . . shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 3, xxii. 16), still awaited its fulfilment, and the law came in as the parenthesis between the promise of grace and its fulfilment in Christ the promised "seed." Rom. v. 20: "the law entered (as a parenthesis, incidentally, Gr.) that the offence might abound." Gal. iii. 8-25: "the law was our school-master to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith; but after that faith is come we are no longer under a school-master." Jacob's prophecy contemplated the theocratic sceptre passing from Judah, when Shiloh should come as the gatherer of the peoples to Himself (Gen. xlix. 10). Many psalms (as ii., lxxii., xxii., lxxvii.) and all the prophets (comp. Isa. ii., liii.) look forward to Messiah as about to introduce a new and worldwide dispensation. Nay, even Moses himself (Deut. xviii. 15, etc.) announces the coming of another lawgiver like him, about to promulgate God's new law; for to be like Moses He must be a lawgiver, and to be so He must have a new law, a fuller development of God's will, than Moses' law, its germ. The 110th Psalm declared His priesthood should be one "for ever, after the order of Melchizedek" (the king of righteousness and king of peace), to which the Levitical priesthood did homage in the person of Abraham their ancestor, paying tithes to Melchizedek (comp. Heb. vi., vii.).

The law was the type, the gospel the antitype (Heb. x. 1-10). Christ came not to destroy it (i.e. its essence) but to fulfil (Matt. v. 17). The letter gives place to the spirit which realizes the end of the letter (2 Cor. iii. 3-18). As also Jeremiah foretells (xxxi. 31-34; comp. Heb. vii. 4-13, x. 15-18). If Christianity had not been of God, it could never have prevailed, without human might or learning, to supersede the system of the mightiest and most civilized nations (1 Cor. i., ii.). Its miracles, its fulfilment of all prophecy, and its complete adaptation to meet man's deep spiritual needs, pardon, peace, holiness, life, immortality for soul and body, are the only reasonable account to be given of its success.

Chronicles, I., II. Heb. "Words" or "Acts of days." In the LXX. Paralipomena, i.e. "Supplements" to Kings I., II. Probably compiled by Ezra. One genealogy, indeed, of a later date, viz. Zerubbabel's, was doubtless added by a more recent hand (1 Chron. iii. 22-24), as was Neh. xii. 10, 11, 22, 23. The book of Ezra forms a continuation to C. The chief difficulty at the return from Babylon was to maintain the genealogical distribution of lands, which was essential in the Jewish polity. Ezra and Nehemiah therefore, as restorers of that polity, gave primary attention to this. Again, the temple service, the religious bond of the nation, could only be maintained by the Levites' residence in Jerusalem, for which end the payment of tithes and firstfruits was indispensable. Moreover, the Levitical genealogies needed to be arranged, to settle the order of the temple courses, and who were entitled to allowances as priests, porters, and singers. The people too needed to have their inheritances assigned according to their families, to be able to pay tithes. Hence, genealogies occupy a prominent place in the C., just as we should expect in a book compiled by Ezra under such circumstances. Zerubbabel, and subsequently Ezra and Nehemiah, not only strove in the face of difficulties (Ezra ii., iii., v., vi., viii.; Neh. vii., viii.) to restore the temple service to its state under the kings of Judah, but also to infuse into the people a national spirit. For this end the C. give a summary history of David, introduced by the closing scene of Saul's life, and of the succeeding kings, especially of some of the greatest and best kings who built or restored the temple, abolished corruptions, and established the services in due order, as Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah, etc.

As the northern kingdom of Israel had passed away, and Samaria its only remaining representative was among Judah's bitterest foes, Israel's history occupies a subordinate place. Accordingly the first eight chapters give the genealogies and settlements; chap. ix. 1-24 their disturbance by the captivity, and partial restoration at the return; this portion is reinserted in Neh. xi. 3-22 with additional matter from the archives, as to times succeeding the return from Babylon, down to xii. 27, where Nehemiah's narrative is resumed from xi. 2. At 1 Chron. ix. 35 begins Saul's genealogy, taken from the tables drawn up in Hezekiah's reign (for 14 generations from Jonathan to Azel correspond to the 14 from David to Hezekiah); then the history of (mainly) Judah's kings follows, and of the events down to the end of the book of Ezra, which suit the patriotic purpose of the compiler. 1 Chron. xv.-xvii., xxii.-xxix., 2 Chron. xiii.-xv., xvii.-xx., xxiv., xxvi., xxix.-xxxi., xxxv., are mainly peculiar to C., and manifestly are calculated to awaken by the glorious, as well as the sad, memories of the past a desire in the people to restrain the corruptions which had led to the captivity, and to restore the national polity in church and state.

The conclusion of C. and beginning of Ezra are similar, the one ending with Cyrus' decree for the restoration, the other telling how that decree was obtained and was carried out. If this connection of the two books were rejected, it would be hard to account for the breaking off of the narrative in C.'s close, in Ezra's lifetime, and the abruptness with which the book of Ezra opens (i. 1). The style of both, tinged with Chaldaisms, accords with this view. The mention in both 1 Chron. xxix. 7 and Ezra ii. 69 of the Persian coin, daries (as it ought to be translated instead of "dram"), is another proof. The law is often quoted in both, and in a similar formula, "according to the law of Moses" (1 Chron. xxiii. 31, Ezra iii. 4). The sacrifices, the passover celebration, the Levitical order, are similarly described in both. The highpriests' genealogy is given in the descending line ending with the captivity, in 1 Chron. vi. 1-15; in Ezra vi. 1-5 in the ascending line from Ezra himself to Aaron, abridged by the omission of many links, as the writer had in C. already given a complete register.

The writer's sources of information are genealogies drawn up in different ages, and accordingly terminating in the particular reign when they were severally drawn up. Thus Sheshan's (1 Chron. ii. 34-41) ends with a generation contemporary with Hezekiah. That of the highpriests (1 Chron. vi. 1-15) must have been drawn up during the captivity; that in 50-53, and those of Heman and Asaph (33-39, etc.) in David's or Solomon's time; that of the sons of Azel (1 Chron. viii. 38) in Hezekiah's time; that of the sons of Zerubbabel in Ezra's time (1 Chron. iii. 19-24). The sources must have been very ancient from which the compiler drew the account of the kings of Edom before Saul's reign, the slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the Gittites (vii. 21, viii. 13), the notice of the sons of Shelah, and their dominion in Moab (iv. 21, 22). The genealogical records of Jotham and Jeroboam probably embodied from contemporary documents the details as to the Reubenites and Gadites (v. 1-22). The account in ix. 1-34 is drawn from records subsequent to the return from captivity; also 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20. In Ezra (ii., iv.) the documents used were still later, viz. the time of Pseudo-Smerdis or Artaxerxes.

Thus it appears the books of C. and Ezra are compiled by one writer from records of various dates, extant when the compilation was made. The books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29), furnished information for David's reign; "the book of Nathan," and "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and "the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chron. ix. 29), for Solomon's reign; "the story (midrash, 'interpretation') of the prophet Iddo," for king Abijah's "acts, ways, and sayings" (xin. 22). Iddo's "book concerning genealogies and the prophet Shemaiah's words," for Rehoboam's acts (xii. 15); "the book of the kings of Israel and Judah" (xxv. 26, xxvii. 7, xxxii. 32, xxxiii. 18), "the sayings of the seers" (xxxiii. 19, chazai), for many subsequent reigns; "the words of Jehu the son of Hanani" (xx. 34), for Jehoshaphat's reign; "the vision of the prophet Isaiah" (xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32), for Uzziah's and Hezekiah's reigns. There were besides the national records, "the book of the chronicles" (Neh. xii. 23), which began as early as David (1 Chron. xxvii. 24), "the chronicles of king David," probably the same as Samuel's, Nathan's and Gad's books above noticed. So there was "the book of the acts of Solomon" (1 Kings xi. 41). From "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah," or "of Israel" (1 Kings xiv. 25, xv. 7), continued down to the end of Jehoiakim's reign (2 Kings xxiv. 5, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8), the compilers of C. and Kings drew the passages which are identical in both. Genealogical registers (Neh. vii. 5) furnished many of the materials.

The writer of the closing chapters of Kings lived in Judah, and died under Nebuchadnezzar; the writer of the close of C. lived at Babylon and survived till the Persian dynasty began. Comp. 2 Chron. xxvi. 9-23 and Ezra i. with 2 Kings xxiv., xxv. For the writer of C. and Ezra gives no details of Jehoiachin or Zedekiah, or what occurred in Judah after the temple was burnt; but only dwells on the spiritual lessons which Jerusalem's overthrow teaches, and proceeds at once to the return from Babylon. One in Babylon would be the most likely to know all about Cyrus' decree, the presents to the captives, the bringing out of the temple vessels, their weight, the Chaldee treasurer Mithredath, and Zerubbabel's Chaldee name Sheshbazzar. Lord A. Hervey conjectures that Daniel at Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, and afterwards under the Persian kings, vividly remembering Jeremiah's prophecies and bewailing the nation's perversity, wrote the close of C. and Ezra i., just as Jeremiah wrote the close of Kings. Comp. with these passages Dan. v. 2, 23, ix. 2, 5-8, i. 3, 7, 11. The close of 2 Chron. and Ezra i. supplies the gap between Dan. ix. and x. Ezra, by the help of this portion, carried forward the history from the point where the C. closed.

The division of C. into two books is due to the LXX. Much is omitted that was unsuitable to the compiler's patriotic design, e.g. Amnon's defilement of Tamar, David's adultery with Bathsheba and Absalom's rebellion, Sheba's revolt, the delivery of Saul's sons to the Gibeonites, etc.

Peculiar to C. are the lists of heroes who came to David at Ziklag, and those hosts who came to Hebron to make him king (1 Chron. xii.). David's preparation for building the temple (xxii.). The order of the Levites and priests (xxiii.-xxvi.), of the army and captains (xxvii.). David's public directions (xxviii., xxix.). Rehoboam's fortifications, reception of priests and Levites from Israel (2 Chron. xi.). Abijah's successful war with Jeroboam (xiii.). Asa's fortifying his kingdom and overcoming Zerah the Ethiopian's vast host (xiv.); his suppression of idolatry with the help of Azariah's prophecy (xv.); Hanani's reproof of Asa's reliance on Syria instead of on Jehovah (xvi.). Jehoshaphat's garrisoning the cities of Judah and of Ephraim; removal of high places and groves; sending his princes and Levites throughout the land to teach the people in "the book of the law of the Lord" (xvii., xviii.); reproof by Jehu, son of Hanani the seer, and by Eliezer, son of Dodavah of Marashah, for his alliance with the ungodly kings of Israel; instructions to the judges; victory over the vast allied forces of Ammon and Moab (xix., xx.). Jehoram's idolatry and punishment (xxi.). Apostasy of Joash, and murder of Zechariah his reprove, on the death of Jehoiaha, Zechariah's father (xxiv.). Amaziah's warlike preparations; idolatry (xxv.). Uzziah's victory and forces (xxvi.). Jotham's success against Ammon, "because he prepared his ways before the Lord his God" (xxvii.). Hezekiah's reformation and passover; riches (xxix.-xxxi.). Manasseh's captivity, repentance, and restoration (xxxiii.). All these instances were just what suited the purpose of one seeking the restoration of the religious and civil polity of the Jews on their return from the captivity, as we know was Ezra's great mission. C., with Ezra and Nehemiah, form the last link of the O.T. genealogical chain which is resumed in the N. T. (Matt. i.). Messianic prophetic hints occur (1 Chron. xvii. 17): "Then hast regarded me according to the order (law) of the man from above"; and in the genealogy (v. 2), "Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief ruler," referring to the Messianic prophecy (Gen. xlix. 8-10, comp. 1 Chron. xxviii. 4).

The accuracy of the book appears from such incidental touches as 1 Chron. ii. 13-17, where Abigail is not styled daughter of Jesse, but only sister of David; she was the daughter of Nahash, not of Jesse, and so only half sister to David. Also from its giving the very words of the documents used, even when inappropriate in the compiler's time, "unto this day" (1 Chron. iv. 42, 43; 2 Chron. v. 9). Also other scriptures confirm statements in C.; comp. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-6 with Isa. xxii. 8-11, 2 Chron. xx. with Ps. xlviii., lxxxiii., Joel iii. The names of the scribes before the restoration express the national hope at the time (1 Chron. iii. 19, 20): Hananiah (Jehovah's grace); Berechiah (Jehovah's blessing); Hasadiah (Jehovah's mercy); Jushabbesed (mercy returns). Akkub and Talmon, mentioned in 1 Chron. ix. 17, 18, are stated in Neh. xii. 25, 26 to have been Levitical porters "in the days of Nehemiah and of Ezra, the priest, the scribe." Thus every hint accords with the date and the author presumed above.

Chronology. There are three principal systems, the Long, the Short, and the Rabbinical. The nature of the evidence hardly admits of certainty as to all details. The dates of the flood, etc., are thus differently given in the LXX., the Heb., and the Samaritan pentateuch:

	LXX.	Heb.	Sam.
Flood after Creation	2262	1653	1307
Peleg's birth	491	101	491
Abram's departure from Haran	616	266	616
	3279	2023	2321

Hales takes the long system mainly from the LXX. account of the patriarchal generations. He rightly rejects the number 480 years assigned in 1 Kings vi. 1 as having elapsed from the exodus to the foundation of the temple in the fourth year of Solomon's reign. It must be an ancient error of transcribers; for 40 years elapsed from the exodus to the death of Moses, Joshua was for more than seven years Israel's leader in Canaan, Israel's servitude and the rule of the judges to Eli's death occupied 430 years, thence to Saul's accession was more than 20 years, Saul's reign was 40 years, David's 40, Solomon's, before the temple's foundation, 3; i.e. 580 in all; besides the unknown intervals between Joshua's leadership of seven years and his death; and again between his death and the first servitude; also the unknown period, above 20 years, between Eli's death and Saul's accession. These unknown times are approximately estimated at 6, 32, and 20 years respectively, i.e. 58 in all; which, added to the 580, will give 638. The O.T. never dates events from an era, which makes 1 Kings vi. 1 suspicious. Origen, Comm. (John ii. 20), quotes 1 Kings vi. 1 without the words "in the 480th year." See also Jud. xi. 26. But see EGYPT below as to Thothmes III. and the inscription favouring 1 Kings vi. 1. Ussher is the representative of the short system, following the Heb. in the patriarchal generations, and taking the 480 years as given in 1 Kings vi. 1 between the exodus and the foundation of the temple. The rabbinical system is partly accepted in Germany; it takes the biblical numbers, but makes arbitrary corrections.

	Hales.	Ussher.
	B.C.	B.C.
Creation	5111	4004
Flood	3155	2318
Abram leaving Haran	2078	1921
Exodus	1643	1491
Foundation of temple	1027	1012
Destruction of temple	586	688

The differences between the Heb. and the LXX. consist in the periods assigned by them respectively to the patriarchs before and after the births of their eldest sons. Thus Adam lives 130 years before the birth of his eldest son in Heb., but 230 in LXX. Seth 105 in Heb., but 205 in LXX., etc. After the births of their eldest sons, Adam 800, Seth 807, in Heb., but 706 and 707 in LXX.; thus the totals come to the same, Adam 930, Seth 912, in both Heb. and LXX. Similarly in the case of Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel. This proves that the change, whether by shortening if the LXX. be the true reading, or by lengthening if the Heb. be the true reading, is not accidental but was made on system. The LXX. and Luke iii. 36, 37 have a second Cainan, who is omitted in the Heb. Philo and Josephus also know nothing of him.

In genealogies (e.g. Matt. i. 8) names are often passed over, a man being called the son of a remote ancestor, his father and grandfather and great grandfather being omitted; as Joram is followed by Ozias, Abaziah, Joash, and Amaziah being omitted. For some Divine purpose connected with the mystical sense of numbers the generations are condensed into fourteen (the double of the sacred seven) in each of the three periods, from Abraham to David, from David to the captivity, and thence to Christ. Comp. Ezra vii. 1-5, 1 Chron. xxvi. 24. So Jehu is "son of Nimshi," also "of Jehoshaphat son of Nimshi" (2 Kings ix. 2, 14, 20; 1 Kings xix. 16). Again, the length of generations varies: Abraham, at a time when life was so much longer than now, implies a generation was about 100 years (Gen. xv. 16, comp. 13), "the fourth generation" answering to "four hundred years." The Heb. text was preserved with much more scrupulous care than the LXX. On the other hand, the civilization and history of Egypt, Babylonian, and Assyria reach farther back than accords with the Heb., and so favour the LXX.

"The sojourning of Israel who dwell in Egypt was 430 years" (Exod. xii. 40, 41). Paul, in Gal. iii. 16, 17, dates this period from God's promise to Abraham. In Gen. xv. 13, 14, comp. Acts vii. 6, 7: "thy seed shall be a stranger in a land not theirs . . . and they shall afflict them 400 years"; by putting the comma after "afflict them," the "400 years" refers to the whole time of their being "a stranger in a land not theirs," comp. Heb. xi. 9. It would not be literally true that the Israelites were afflicted for the whole 400 years by the Egyptians, even if the 400 be applied to the sojourn in Egypt alone. Therefore there is no greater strain put on the words by supposing the 400 includes the sojourn in Canaan. Abraham probably means (Gen. xv. 16), "in the fourth generation they (i.e. some of the fourth generation, allowing 100 years for each generation) shall come hither again." There were more than four in fact; thus, in Ruth iv. 18, etc., 1 Chron. ii. 5, 6, there are six from Judah to Nabshon the tribe prince in Moses' time; nine from Joseph to Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 20, etc.). Abram was 75 on leaving Haran; 100 at Isaac's birth; Isaac was 60 at Jacob's; and Jacob 130 on entering Egypt: in all 215 years. Again, Joseph was about 45 on entering Egypt, 92 occupied the rest of his life; then followed, after all Joseph's brethren and that generation were dead (Exod. i. 6, etc.), the oppression; Moses was 80 at the exodus. Thus there will be 172 years, besides the interval between Joseph's generation dying and the oppression, and between the beginning of the oppression and the birth of Moses; which may be reasonably set down as 215 in all; which, added to the 215 in Canaan, will give the 430.

The increase from 70, at Jacob's going down to Egypt, to 600,000 at the exodus is accountable when we remember the special fruitfulness promised by God. There were at the exodus 51 pairs at least bearing children, for there were 67 men, viz. Jacob's 12 sons, 51 grandsons, and four great grandsons, besides one daughter and one granddaughter (Gen. xvi. 8-27). These 51 must have taken foreign wives. Then, besides, polygamy prevailed. All these causes together fully account for the great increase in 215 years.

Another note of time is furnished by Paul (Acts xiii. 19-21): "after that (the division of Canaan) He gave judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel"; or rather, as the three oldest MSS., Sin., Vat., Alex., "He distributed their land to them for an inheritance, about 450 years. And after that He gave unto them judges until Samuel." The dativus in the Gr. marks, not duration of time, as A. V., but a point of time. The point of time backwards to which the 450 refers is implied in ver. 19, "when He had destroyed seven nations"; i.e., about 450 or 462 elapse between God's promise to drive out those nations in 400 years from that time (Gen. xv. 13-21), and God's commencing the fulfilment of it under Joshua; the former date is about 1913, the latter 1451 (Josh. i.). Jephthah makes 300 years elapse between his time and Joshua's division of Canaan (Jud. xi. 26). Theophilus of Antioch (Antol. iii. 22) states that the Tyrian archives of Iiram, David's contemporary, prove that the building of the temple took place 506 years after the exodus from Egypt.

The whole period between the foundation and the destruction of the temple is about 425 years; that of the undivided kingdom 120, that of Judah 388, that of Israel 255. The Median, Heb., Babylonian, and Assyrian chronicles, according to J. W. Bosanquet, coincide in making Nebuchadnezzar's reign begin 581 B.C. He makes Jotham's 16 years' reign begin in 731 B.C.; Ahaz's 16 years begin 718; Hezekiah's 29 begin 702; Manasseh's 55 begin 673; Amon's two begin 618; Josiah's 31 begin 616; Jehoiakim's 11 begin 585.

Two periods of 70 years are specified by Jeremiah; that during which Babylon's dominion over Palestine and the East was to last (xxv.), and that of the captivity (xxix. 10, Dan. ix. 2), probably identical. The former begins the 1st of Nebuchadnezzar and the 4th of Jehoiakim (606 or 607 B.C.), and ends with Babylon's fall (xxv. 26), 536 B.C., when Cyrus decreed the return of the Jewish captives (Jer. xxix. 10). Ptolemy's famous canon counts it 66 years; but if the Jewish years meant be the prophetic ones of 360 days each, as in Dan. xii. 7, the sum will be about 69 tropical years. [See CAPTIVITY.] Ecclesiastically, the 70 years began with the destruction of the temple 586 B.C., and ended with its restoration in the sixth year of Darius, 516 B.C.

The Apis tablets of Egypt prove the synchronism of Josiah and Pharaoh Necho; also they demonstrate that of Hezekiah and Tirhakah. An inscription on the quarries of Silsilis in Upper Egypt records the cutting of stone in the 22nd year of Sheshonk I., or Shishak, for the chief temple of Thebes, where still is to be seen a record of his conquest of Judah; thus confirming the Scriptural account of his synchronism with Rehoboam whom he conquered.

INSCRIPTION AT THEBES.

The Bible puts Rehoboam 219 years before Hezekiah, i.e. 973 B.C.; and Shishak's invasion in his fifth year, i.e. 969; 22 before that would make Shishak's accession 990 B.C., which closely agrees with Manetho's list.

R. P. Stewart (Smith's Bible Dict.) mentions the coincidence, in their commencements, of the vague year of the Egyptians and the Heb. year at the first passover; i.e., the 14th of Abib, the full moon of the passover exodus, corresponded to the 14th day of a Phamenoth in a vague year commencing at the autumnal equinox; this took place, it is computed, on Thursday, April 21st, 1652 B.C. This date for the exodus is but four years earlier than Hale's, and the interval to Solomon's temple foundation is 642, only four more than the 638 obtained above by Bible calculations.

Thus 430 back to the promise to Abraham (Gen. xv.) will bring the promise to 2082 B.C. But see above on the 450 years in Acts xiii. 20. Stewart takes Peleg's birth, 2698 or (correcting Terah's age at Abraham's birth) 2758. Abraham was perhaps youngest son of Terah; for Terah was 70 when he began having sons, and died at 205 years old (Gen. xi. 26, 32), and Abraham was 75 when he left Haran (xii. 4). This would make Terah survive Abraham's migration 60 years, if Abraham were eldest (Gen. xi. 26). But Acts vii. 4 says Terah died before it. Terah therefore was probably 130 years old when Abraham was born, and died when Abraham was 75, at his migration from Haran. Haran the elder brother of Abraham was father of Isciah = Sarah (xi. 27-29). As Mileah married her uncle Nahor, so Isciah = Sarah, her uncle Abraham; hence he calls her his sister, as granddaughter of (i.e. sprung from) his father, though not sprung from his mother (xx. 12). She was only ten years younger than Abraham (xvii. 17), which shows Abraham was Terah's youngest son. The flood he assigns to 3099 or 3159. The Egyptian monuments do not carry us back for the foundation of its first kingdom earlier than the latter end of the 28th century B.C. Adam's creation he makes 5361 or 5421. G. Rawlinson truly says: "nothing in ancient MSS. is so liable to corruption from mistakes of copyists as numbers, it is quite possible that we may not possess Moses' real scheme in any of the three extant versions of his words."

The traditions of Greece, Babylon, and Egypt confirm the Scripture account of the longevity of the patriarchs Sprung from a pair originally immortal, living a simple even course of life, they retained some of the original vitality of Adam's state in paradise. This longevity favoured the multiplication of mankind, and the formation of marked character for good or evil in the different races. The geological arguments for man's great antiquity are relics of man, flints, etc., in recent formations, along with bones of the mammoth and extinct animals; it is argued that, at the present rate of deposition, the beds that overlie these remains must have taken a vast time to form. But probably causes were at work at the time of their formation which made the rate much speedier than it is now. A mammoth was found in the Siberian ice, with skin, hair, and flesh; and it is hardly likely that it was dead more than 6000 years. Many animals have become extinct within the human period. The present population is about that which would spring from a single pair in 6000 years. The historical arguments for man's great antiquity, from Egyptian lists of dynasties, are set aside by the strong probability that many of these are contemporary dynasties. Another argument is drawn from the slowness of growth of languages; e.g., 1500 years have been taken in forming from Latin the French, Italian, and Spanish languages. But it is only the languages with a literature that change slowly; a few years suffice to change completely a language without a literature, wild tribes in a single generation cannot comprehend one another. The 3000 years between the flood and the Christian era in the LXX. allow 1800 years before the Vedas for the Sanskrit tongue to have reached the perfection apparent in that poem. Besides, the Babel-confounding of tongues miraculously is to be taken into account. The ethnological objection from the fixity of type in the negro as represented under Sethos I. on the monuments is answered by the consideration that races placed continuously under the same conditions of climate and other circumstances do not change. The negroes may have been in Africa 1500 years before Sethos I. Rapid changes take place when circumstances change rapidly, as in Europeans settling in N. America. The GENEALOGIES [see] in Gen. v. and xi. give only the great leading links, omitting many intermediate ones.

Chrysolite = gall stone. The garniture of the seventh foundation of New Jerusalem. The modern topaz.

Chrysoprasus = gold leaf. A transparent gem, an agate of the colour of the leaf's juice; it owes its colour to oxide of nickel. Found only in Silesia; also in antique Egyptian jewellery. The garniture of the tenth foundation of New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20).

Chub. Ezek. xxx. 5. A people named Kift on the monuments. Ptolemy (iv. 2, 5, 9) mentions a Chob-at in Mauritania, and a Chob-ion in the Muretic nome in Egypt.

Chun. A city of Hazerozer (1 Chron. xviii. 8) = Berthai (2 Sam. viii. 8).

Church. From Gr. Church, "house of the Lord," a word which passed to the Gothic tongue; the Goths being the first of the northern herds converted to Christianity, adopted the word from the Gr. Christians of Constantinople, and so it came to us Anglo Saxons (Trench, Study of Words). But Lipsius, from circus, whence kirk, a circle, because the oldest temples, as the Druid ones, were circular in form. "Ecclesia" in the N. T. never means the building or house of assembly, for church buildings were long after the apostolic age. It means an organized body, whose unity does not depend on its being met together in one place; not an assemblage of atoms, but members in their several places united to the One Head, Christ, and forming one organic living whole (1 Cor. xii.). The bride of Christ (Eph. v. 25-32, i. 22), the body of which He is the Head. The household of Christ and of God (Matt. x. 25, Eph. ii. 19). The temple of the Holy Ghost, made up of living stones (Eph. ii. 22, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 1 Pet. ii. 5).

Church is used of one or more particular Christian associations, even one small enough to worship together in one house (Rom. xvi. 5). Also of "the whole church" (Rom. xvi. 23, 1 Cor. xii. 25). Church occurs twice only in Matt. (xvi. 18, xviii. 17), elsewhere called "the kingdom of the heavens" by Matthew, "the kingdom of God" by Mark, Luke, and John. Also called Christ's "flock," never to be plucked out of His hand (John x. 25). "branches" in Him "the true Vine." Founded on the Rock, "the Christ the Son of the living God," the only Foundation (Matt. xvi. 18, 18; 1 Cor. iii. 11). Constituted as Christ's mystical body on Pentecost; thenceforth expanding in the successive stages traced in Acts [see]. Described in a beautiful summary (Acts ii. 41, 47). [On its apostasy see BANYON.] Professing Christendom numbers now probably 80 millions of Greek churches, 90 millions of Teutonic or Protestant churches, and 170 millions of Romanists. The Church of England definition of the church is truly scriptural (Art. XIX.): "a congregation of faithful men in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." The church that shall reign with Christ is made up of those written in heaven, in the Lamb's book of life, the spirits of just men made perfect (Heb. xii. 22, 23; Rev. xxi. 27). The faultless perfections and the glorious promises in Scripture assigned to the church (election, adoption, spiritual priesthood, sure guidance by the Spirit into all truth, eternal salvation) belong not to all of the visible church, but to those alone of it who are in living union with Christ (Eph. v. 23-27; Heb. xii. 22, 23). The claim for the visible church of what belongs to the invisible, in spite of Christ's warning parable of the tares and wheat (Matt. xiii. 24-30, 36-43), has led to some of Rome's deadliest errors. On the other hand, the attempt to sever the tares from the wheat prematurely has led to many schisms, which have invariably failed in the attempt and only generated fresh separations. We must wait till Christ's manifestation for the manifestation of the sons of God (Rom. viii. 19, Col. iii. 4).

The true catholic church is restricted to "them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours" (1 Cor. i. 2). They are visible in so far as their light of good works so shines before men that their Father in heaven is glorified (Matt. v. 16). They are invisible in so far that it is God alone who can infallibly see who among professors are animated by a living, loving faith, and who are not.

A visible community, consisting of various members and aggregations of members, was founded by Christ Himself, as needed for the extension and continuation of Christianity to all lands and all ages. The ministry of the word and the two sacraments, baptism and the supper of the Lord, (both in part derived from existing Jewish rites, Matt. xxvi. 26-28, 1 Cor. v. 7, 8) [see BAPTISM, LORD'S SUPPER] were appointed as the church's distinctive ordinances (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20 Gr.); "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them . . . Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and (only on condition of your doing so) I am with you always," etc. The professing church that neglects the precept forfeits the promise, which is fatal to Rome's claims.

No detailed church government is explicitly commanded by Jesus in N. T. The O. T. ministry of highpriest, priests, and Levites necessarily ended with the destruction of the one and only temple appointed by God. That the Christian ministry is not sacerdotal, as the O. T. ministry, is proved by the title hiericus, the Gr. of sacerdos, being never once used of Christian ministers. When used at all as to the Christian church it is used of the whole body of Christians; since not merely ministers, as the Aaronic priests, but all equally, have near access to the heavenly holy place, through the rent veil of Christ's flesh (Heb. x. 19-22, xiii. 15, 16; 1 Pet. ii. 19; Rev. i. 6). All alike offer "spiritual sacrifices." For a minister to pretend to offer a literal sacrifice in the Lord's supper, or to have the sacerdotal priesthood (which appertains to Christ alone), would be the sin which Moses charged on Korah: "Seemeth it but a small thing unto you that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation to bring you near to Himself, . . . to stand before the congregation to minister to them; and seek ye the priesthood also?"

The temple then not being the model to the Christian church, the synagogue alone remained to be copied. In the absence of the temple during the captivity the people assembled together on sabbaths and other days to be instructed by the prophet (Ezek. xiv. 1, xx. 1, xxxiii. 31). In Neh. viii. 1-8 a specimen is given of such a service, which the synagogues afterwards continued, and which consisted in Scripture reading, with explanation, prayers, and thanksgivings. The synagogue officers consisted of a "ruler of the synagogue," the "legate of the church" (scheliach tzibbur), answering to the angel of the church (Rev. i. ii. iii.), a college of elders or presbyters, and subordinate ministers (chazzen), answering to our deacons, to take care of the sacred books. Episcopacy was adopted in apostolic times as the most expedient government, most resembling Jewish usages, and so causing the less stumblingblock to Jewish prejudices (Acts iv. 8, xxiv. 1). James, the brother of our Lord, after the martyrdom of James the son of Zebedee and the flight of Peter (Acts xii. 17), alone remained behind in Jerusalem, the recognised head there. His Jewish tendencies made him the least unpopular to the Jews, and so adapted him for the presidency there without the title (xv. 13-19, xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 2, 9, 12). This was the first specimen of apostolic local episcopacy without the name. The presbyters of the synagogue were called also bishops [see], or overseers. "Those now called 'bishops' were originally 'apostles.' But those who ruled the church after the apostles' death had not the testimony of miracles, and were in many respects inferior, therefore they thought it unbecoming to assume the name of apostles; but dividing the names, they left to 'presbyters' that name, and themselves were called 'bishops.'" (Ambrose, in Bingham Eccles. Ant. ii. 11; and Amalaricus, De Officiis, ii. 13.) The steps were apostle, then vicar apostolic or apostolic delegate, as Timothy in Ephesus and Titus in Crete, temporarily (1 Tim. i. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 21; Tit. iii. 12, i. 5), then angel, then bishop in the present sense.

Episcopacy gives more of centralized unity, but when made an absolute law it tends to spiritual despotism. The visible church, whilst avoiding needless alterations, has power under God to modify her polity as shall tend most to edification (Matt. xviii. 18; 1 Cor. xii. 28-30, xiv. 26; Eph. iv. 11-16). The Holy Spirit first unites souls individually to the Father in Christ, then with one another as "the communion of saints." Then followed the government and ministry, which are not specified in detail till the pastoral epistles, viz. 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, the latest epistles. To be "in Christ" (John xv.) presupposes repentance and faith, of which the sacraments are the seal. The church order is not imposed as a rigid unchangeable system from without, but is left to develop itself from within outwardly, according as the indwelling Spirit of life may suggest. The church is "holy" in respect to those alone of it who are sanctified, and "one" only in respect to those who "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. iv. 3-6, 15, 16), "growing up . . . into the Head, Christ, in all things."

The latest honourable and only Christian use of "synagogue" (A. V. "assembly") occurs in James (ii. 2), the apostle who maintained to the latest the bonds between the Jewish synagogue and the Christian church. Soon the continued resistance of the truth by the Jews led Christians to leave the term to them exclusively (Rev. ii. 9). Synagogue expresses a congregation not necessarily bound together; church, a people mutually bound together, even when not assembled, a body called out (ekklesia, from ekkulein) from the world in spirit, though not in locality (John xvii. 11, 15). The Heb. quahal, like "church," denotes a number of people united by definite laws and bonds, whether collected together or not; but 'edah is an assembly independent of any bond of union, like "synagogue."

Christian churches were built like synagogues, with the holy table placed where the chest containing the law had been. The desk and pulpit were the chief furniture in both, but no altar. When the ruler of the synagogue became a Christian, he naturally was made bishop, as tradition records that Crispus became at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8). Common to both church and synagogue were the discipline (Matt. xviii. 17), excommunication (1 Cor. v. 4), and the collection of alms (1 Cor. xvi. 2).

Chushan Rishathaim = the Ethiopian of double wickednesses. (A Cushite or Hamitic element was prominent in the oldest Babylonian race, as their vocabulary proves.) The Mesopotamian king who oppressed Israel eight years in the generation succeeding Joshua (Jud. iii. 8). About 1402 B.C. he was king of the Syrian country about Haran, the region between the Euphrates and the Khabour, held by the Nairi, divided into petty tribes, as Assyria had not at this time extended her dominion to the Euphrates. Cuneiform inscriptions two centuries later confirm this; in 1270 B.C. the Assyrian empire rose. Othniel delivered Israel from him. C., a chieftain, probably had established a temporary dominion over the petty tribes of Mesopotamia, which ceased long before Assyria marched thither.

Chuza. Herod's house steward, husband of Joanna, who ministered to the Lord of her substance (Luke viii. 3). Subsequently she was one of the women who, on the morning of the resurrection, brought spices to complete the Lord's burial (xxiv. 10), and who came and told the eleven and all the rest of His being no longer in the tomb, and of their having seen angels. We read in Matt. xiv. 1, "Herod heard of the fame of Jesus, and said unto his servants. This is John the Baptist, who is risen from the dead." The reason does not in Matthew appear why Herod addressed his servants about Christ; but we infer it from Luke's incidental mention of Joanna, wife of C., Herod's steward, as among the women ministering to Christ. Also from marg. Acts xiii. 1, where "Manaen, Herod's foster brother," appears among the Christian "prophets." How naturally, since Christ had followers among Herod's household, did that prince turn to his servants for information about Christ. The undesigned coincidence is a proof of the gospel veracity.

Ciccar. A. V. "the plain" (Gen. xii. 10, 12). The Heb. means the "circuit" or low tract round about the Jordan. [See REGION ROUND ABOUT.]

Cilicia. A province S.E. of Asia Minor, having the Mediterranean on the S., Pamphylia on the W., the Taurus and Antitaurus range on the N., separating it from Lycania and Cappadocia, and on the E. the range of Amanus separating it from Syria. The eastern portion is level, well watered, and fruitful; the western rugged, and chiefly fit for pasture. Tarsus, on the Cydnus, capital of the E., became a favourite residence of the Greeks and seat of learning under the Greco-Macedonian empire. Many Jews were settled there and had their synagogue (Acts vi. 9). Paul belonged to Tarsus, and there acquired his knowledge of the Greek poets, three of whom he quotes: Aratus of C., Menander, and Epimenides (Acts xvii. 28, 1 Cor. xv. 33, Tit. i. 12). He naturally visited it after his conversion, and probably founded the church there. C. was the high road between Syria and the W.; from Syria into C. by the gates of Amanus, a pass at the head of the valley of Pinarus; from C. by the gates of C., near the sources of Cydnus, through the Antitaurus into Lycania and Cappadocia, the pass whereby Paul crossed into Lycania (Acts xv. 41). The goats' hair cloth, called cilicium, was one of its products. Paul, according to the excellent Jewish custom that all boys should learn a trade, wrought at making tents of this hair cloth procurable in every large town of the Levant, a profitable trade in those days of travelling. The hair cloth is still manufactured in Asia Minor, and the word still retained in French, Spanish, and Italian (cilicio). Theodore of Mopsus in C. was another of its eminent Christian writers.

Cinnamon. The aromatic inner rim of the Laurus cinamomum. A perfume only in O. T. (Exod. xxx.

CINNAMON.

23); a condiment with us. Imported into Judea by the Phoenicians. It now grows best in S.W. Ceylon. From the coarser pieces oil of cinnamon is obtained, and after oil by boiling the ripe fruit. This last gives the delightful odor to incense when burning. Gesenius derives it from quinn, quaneh, "cane," the idea being that of standing upright. Cassia lignea is often substituted in the markets for the more delicate flavoured cinnamon. Others derive the word from Cinn (Chinese), amomum (nard). It reached Phoenicia overland from China by way of Persia.

Cinneroth, all. The district by the N. side of the lake Chinnereth or Tiberias; afterwards "the plain of Gennesareth." Laid waste by Benhadad king of Damascus, ally of Asa king of Judah (1 Kings xv. 29).

Circumcision. The cutting off all round of the foreskin (the projecting skin in the male member, the emblem of corruption, Deut. x. 16, Jer. iv. 4) of males, appointed by God as token of His covenant with Abraham and his seed (Gen. xvii. 10-14). The usage prevailed, according to Herodotus (ii. 104, § 36, 37), among the Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Syrians. But his statement may refer only to the Egyptian priests, and those initiated in the mysteries. The Jews alone of the inhabitants of the Syrian region were circumcised. So circumcision kept them distinct from uncircumcised Canaanite heathen around. If the rite existed before Abraham it was then first sanctioned as a token of God's covenant with Abraham and his seed, and particular directions given by God as to the time of its being performed, the eighth day, even though it were a sabbath (John vii. 22, 23), and the persons to be circumcised, every male, every slave, and (at the exodus it was added) every male foreigner before he could partake of the passover (Gen. xvii. 12, 13; Exod. xii. 48). So the rainbow existed before the flood, but in Gen. ix. 13-17 first was made token of the covenant. The testimony of the Egyptian sculptures, mummies, and hieroglyphics, is very doubtful as to the pre-Abrahamic antiquity of circumcision. (See note Gen. xvii., Speaker's Commentary.) The Hamite races of Palestine, akin to the Egyptians, as (Jud. xiv. 3) the Philistines and Canaanites (the Hivites, Gen. xxxiv.), were certainly not circumcised. The Egyptian priests probably adopted the rite when Joseph was their governor and married to the daughter of the priest of On. The Israelites by the rite, which was associated with the idea of purity, were marked as a whole "kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix. 6, Deut. vii. 6, 7). In Jer. ix. 25, "I will punish all them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised: Egypt, and Judah, and Elam," two classes seem distinguished: Israel circumcised in flesh, but uncircumcised in heart; and the Gentile nations uncircumcised both in flesh and heart. Hyrcanus first compelled the Edomites to be circumcised (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2, § 1; comp. Ezek. xxxi. 1-5).

Its significance is, the cutting the outside flesh of the organ of generation denotes corruption as inherent in us from birth, and transmitted by our parents, and symbolises our severance from nature's defilement to a state of consecrated fellowship with God. Jehovah consecrated the nation to Himself; and whatsoever male was not circumcised on the eighth day was liable to be "cut off." Moses had neglected to circumcise his son, owing to Zipporah's repugnance to it, as a rite not generally adopted in the East, even by the descendants of Abraham and Keturah, the Midianites. Therefore he was attacked by some sudden seizure in the resting place for the night, which he and his wife were divinely admonished arose from the neglect. She took a sharp stone or flint (comp. marg. Josh. v. 2, 8), the implement sanctioned by patriarchal usage as more sacred than metal (as was the Egyptian usage also in preparing mummies), and cut off her son's foreskin, and cast it at Moses' feet, saying, "a bloody husband art thou to me," i.e., by this blood of my child I have recovered thee as my husband, and sealed our union again (Exod. iv. 25).

The name was given at circumcision, as at baptism (Luke i. 59, ii. 21). The painfulness of O. T. initiatory rite, as compared with the N. T. sacrament of baptism, marks strongly the contrast between the stern covenant of the law and the loving gospel. Jesus' submission to it betokened His undertaking to fulfil the law in all its requirements, and to suffer its penalty incurred by us.

"Oh wherefore bring ye here this holy Child?

Such rite befits the sinful, not the clean;

Why should this tender Infant undefiled Be thus espoused in blood, while we have been

So gently into covenant beguiled?

No keen edged knife our bleeding foreheads scored

With the sharp cross of our betrothed Lord:

But we belike in quiet wonder smiled,

While on our brow the priest, with finger cold,

Traced with the hallowed drops the saving sign;

Whilst Thou, unsparing of Thy tears, the old

And sterner ritual on Thyself didst take: Meet opening for a life like Thine, Changing the blood to water for our sake."—Whythead.

"Uncircumcised" is used of the lips (Exod. vi. 12, 20), the ears (Jer. iv. 4, vi. 10), the heart (Lev. xxvi. 41, Deut. x. 16, Acts vii. 51), in the sense closed by the foreskin of inborn fleshliness; impure, rebellious (Deut. xxx. 6, Isa. lii. 1). Even the fruit of the Canaanites' trees was called "uncircumcised," i.e. unclean (Lev. xix. 23). Christians "are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands in putting off the body [not merely the foreskin, as in literal circumcision] of the sins of the flesh [i.e. the whole old fleshly nature with its sins] by the circumcision of Christ" (Col. ii. 11, Rom. ii. 28, 29).

The reason of the omission of circumcision in the wilderness (Josh. v. 5, 6) was, whilst suffering the penalty of their unbelief the Israelites were practically dis-covenanted by God, and so were excluded from the sign of the covenant. "The reproach of Egypt" was the taunt of the Egyptians that God brought them into the wilderness to slay them (Num. xiv. 13-16, Deut. ix. 23-28); which reproach lay on them so long as they were in danger of being "cut off" in the wilderness as uncircumcised, but was rolled off the younger generation by their circumcision at Gilgal.

Paul warned Christians who regarded circumcision as still possessing spiritual virtue, that thereby they made themselves "debtors to do the whole law," and "Christ should profit them nothing" (Gal. v. 2, 3.

12). He calls its practisers "the circumcision," in contrast to the true circumcision (Phil. iii. 2, 3), a mere flesh cutting. So he resisted the demand that Titus should be circumcised; for, being a Greek, Titus did not fall under the rule of expediency that Jewish born Christians should be circumcised, as Timothy was (Acts xv., xvi. 1, 3; Gal. ii. 3-5). Christianity did not interfere with Jewish usages, as social ordinances (no longer religiously significant) in the case of Jews, whilst the Jewish polity and temple stood. After their overthrow the Jewish usages necessarily ceased. To insist on them for Gentile converts would have been to make them essential to Christianity. To violate them in the case of Jews would have been inconsistent with the clarity which in matters indifferent becomes all things to all men, that by all means it may win some (1 Cor. ix. 22, Rom. xiv.). The Arabians circumcised in the 13th year, after Ishmael's example (Gen. xvii. 25). The Mahometans and the Abyssinian Christians practise it still.

Cistern. Bar, a dug pit for receiving water conducted from a spring or the rainfall. [See CONDUIT.] The dryness between May and September in Palestine makes reservoirs necessary; of which the larger are called "pools," the smaller "cisterns." The rocky soil facilitates their construction. The top, with stone-work and a round opening, has often a wheel for the bucket; an image of the aorta or great artery circulating the blood from the ventricle of the heart, or the wheel expresses life in its rapid motion (Jas. iii. 6, Eccles. xii. 6). The rain is conducted to them from the roofs of the houses, most of which are furnished with them; whence is derived the metaphor, Prov. v. 15, "drink waters out of thine own cistern," i.e. draw thy enjoyments only from the sources that are legitimately thine. Hezekiah stopped the water supply outside Jerusalem at the invasion of Sennacherib, whilst within there was abundant water (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4). So it has been in all the great sieges of Jerusalem, scarcity of water outside, abundance within.

Empty cisterns were used as prisons. So Joseph was cast into a "pit" (Gen. xxxvii. 22); Jeremiah into one miry at the bottom, and so deep that he was let down by cords (Jer. xxxviii. 6), said to be near "Herod's gate." Cisterns yield only a limited supply of water, not an overflowing spring; representing creature comforts soon exhausted, and therefore never worth forsaking the never failing, ever fresh supplies of God for (Jer. ii. 13). The stonework of tanks often becomes broken, and the water leaks into the earth; and at best the water is not long fresh. Comp. Isa. lv. 1, 2; Luke xii. 33.

Citizenship. Paul's Roman citizenship was of the lower kind, which though not entitling him to vote with the tribes and enjoy a magistracy, yet secured to him the protection of the laws of the empire, and the right of appeal from his own hostile countrymen to Caesar, as also exemption from scourging (Acts xvi. 37, xxii. 25-28, xxv. 11). He seems to have inherited it from his father.

Hence he naturally uses the image to express the believer's high privileges as a citizen of the heavenly Jerusalem. "Our citizenship (Gr., or rather our life as citizens; politēma, not politēia) is in heaven," etc. (Phil. iii. 20); an image especially appropriate at Philippi, it being a Roman colony and possessing Roman citizenship of which its people were proud. Moreover it was there that Paul had compelled the magistrates publicly to recognise a Roman citizen's privileges. So believers, though absent from their heavenly city in body, still enjoy its civic privileges and protection; pilgrims on earth, citizens of heaven (Eph. ii. 6; Gal. iv. 26; Heb. xi. 9, 10, 13-16, xii. 22; Rev. xxi. 2, 10; Luke x. 20).

City. Cain first founded one (Gen. iv. 16, 17). The material civilization of the Canite race was superior to that of the Setlite. To the former belonged many inventions of useful arts and luxury (iv. 20-22). Real refinement and moral civilization are by no means necessary concomitants of material civilization; in these the Setlites took the lead (iv. 25, 26). The distinction between tent or nomad and town life early began. The root meaning of the Heb. terms for "city," ar or ir (from ur "to keep watch"), and kirjath (from qarah "to approach as an enemy," Gen. xxiii. 2) implies that a leading object of gathering into towns was security against marauders. So "the tower of Edar," i.e. flocks (xxxv. 21). Of course the first "cities" would be mere groups of rude dwellings, fenced round together.

Sir H. Rawlinson supposes Rehoboth, Calah, etc., in Gen. x. 11, denote only sites of buildings afterwards erected. The later dates assigned to the building of Nineveh, Babylon, etc., refer to their being rebuilt on a larger scale on the sites of the primitive towns. Unwalled towns are the symbol of peace and security (Zech. ii. 4).

Special cities furnished supplies for the king's service (1 Kings ix. 19, iv. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25; 2 Chron. xvii. 12). So our Lord represents the different servants having the number of cities assigned them in proportion to their faithfulness (Luke x. 17, 19).

Forty-eight were assigned to the Levites, of which 13 were for the family of Aaron, nine in Judah, four in Benjamin, and six cities of refuge. The streets of eastern cities are generally narrow, seldom allowing more than two loaded camels to pass one another. But Nineveh's admitted of chariots passing, and had large parks and gardens within (Nah. ii. 4). Those of one trade generally lived in the same street (Jer. xxxvii. 21). The GATES are the usual place of assembly, and there courts of judges and kings are held (Gen. xxiii. 10, Ruth iv. 1).

CITIES OF REFUGE. [See BLOOD, AVENGING OF.] Kedesh (holy, so Jesus our city of refuge, Heb. vi. 18, vii. 26), now Kedes, 20 miles E.S.E. from Tyre. Shechem (shoulder, upon Jesus' shoulder the government is, Isa. ix. 6), now Nablous. Hebron (fellowship, so Christ to us, 1 Cor. i. 9), now El-Khalil. Bezer, perhaps Bozor in the Book of Maccabees (= fortress, so Jesus, Isa. xxxii. 2, xxvi. 1, 4). Ramoth Gilead, on the site of Ez-Salt (Ramoth = high, so Jesus to us, Acts v. 31). Golan, Jaulan (= joy; Jesus is our joy, Rom. v. 11). All the 48 cities of Levi had the right of asylum. But the six of refuge were bound to entertain the involuntary manslayer gratuitously. The cities on each side of the Jordan were nearly opposite one another (Deut. xix. 2; Num. xxxv. 6, 13, 15; Josh. xx. 2, 7, 9). If manslayers had been driven out of the country as among the Greeks, they would have been exposed to the temptation of worshipping strange gods (1 Sam. xxvi. 19).

The Levitical cities were to have a space of 1000 cubits (583 yards) beyond the city walls for pasture and other purposes (Num. xxxv. 4, 5). The 2000 also specified mean probably the sum of the two single thousands on opposite sides of the city, exclusive of the city itself; as here shown. Clermont-Ganneau has discovered a bilingual inscription, Gr. and Heb., meaning "limit of Gezer" (now Tel-el-Jezer), on a horizontal slab E. of that royal Canaanite city; also a second similarly inscribed stone 1696 yards due N.W. of the first. This proves that the sacred boundary was a square, having its four angles at the four cardinal points (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1874).

Civilization. The early invention of the arts, recorded in Gen. iv., agrees with the Greek tradition that Prometheus in the beginning stole fire from heaven, and taught men all the arts and ornaments of life (Grote, Hist. of Greece, i. 68), especially to work metals. So Oannes long before the flood, in the Babylonian tradition, taught the Chaldeans art and science. "So that no grand discovery was ever made afterwards" (Berosus, Fragm. i. 1). The earliest remains in Egypt and Babylonia soon after the flood indicate advanced civilization, with metallic implements. On the other hand, no instance can be given of a savage race having ever, without light introduced from without from civilized races, risen by their own independent efforts to civilization (see Abp. Whately's Civilization). The inference follows that man began not with savagery but with a considerable civilization, especially its highest constituent the moral and religious element. At the same time it is noteworthy that the arts of secular life began with the corrupt line of Cain. The fall soon developed a divorce between secular art, refinements and luxuries, and religious civilization. The two were joined, and shall be again, in the perfect state. So after the flood the Hamitic, which was the corrupter race, developed as to civilization the earliest theirs were the first great empires, Egypt, Babylon, Canaan, Sidon; but they degenerated the soonest because apostates from true religion, the great conservator. So, though they were the foremost in commencing, however rudely, alphabetic writing, astronomy, history, sculpture, navigation, agriculture, weaving, they are now among the lowest.

Clauda = Gaudos (Pliny); Gaudonesi is its present Gr. name. Due W. of cape Matata, S. of Crete, and due S. of Phœnicie. Paul's ship on her way from Fair Havens to Phœnicie (Acts xxvii. 12-17) was attacked by a gale coming down from the island, and was in danger of being driven into the African "quicksands" (Syrtis). She ran under the lee of Claudia. The Euroclydon (rather as Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS. read, Euraquilon) or E.N.E. wind would be exactly the one to drive the vessel as described. In the smooth water under the lee of C. they got the boat on board, and undergirt the ship (Smith, Voyage, etc., of St. Paul). Now Gozzo.

Claudia. Mentioned (2 Tim. iv. 21) with Pudens, whose wife she afterwards became (Martial, iv. 13, xi. 54); he a Roman knight, she a Briton, surnamed Rufina. Tacitus (Agricola, 14) mentions that territory in S.E. Britain was given to a British king, Cogidunus, for his fidelity to Rome A.D. 52, whilst Claudius was emperor. In 1772 a marble was dug up at Chichester (now in the gardens at Goodwood) mentioning Cogidunus, with the surname Claudius from his patron the emperor's name. Pudens too is mentioned, Cogidunus' son-in-law. Cogidunus' daughter would be C., probably sent to Rome for education, as a pledge of her father's fidelity. There she was put under the patronage of Pomponia, wife of Aulus Plautius, conqueror of Britain. Pomponia was accused of foreign superstitions A.D. 57 (Tacitus, Annals, iii. 32), probably Christianity. C. probably learned Christianity from Pomponia, and took from her the surname of the Pomponian clan, Rufina; so we find Rufus a Christian in Rom. xvi. 13. Pudens in Martial, and in the inscription, appears a pagan. He, or perhaps his friends, through fear concealed his Christianity. Tradition represents Timothy, Pudens' son, as taking part in converting the Britons.

Claudius: Tiberius Nero Drusus Germanicus; fourth Roman emperor; reigned from A.D. 41 to 54; successor of Caligula; son of Nero Drusus; born 9 B.C.; lived in privacy till he became emperor (A.D. 41) mainly through the influence of Herod Agrippa I. (Josephus, Ant. xix. 2, §1, 3, 4), whose territory therefore he enlarged by adding Judea, Samaria, and part of Lebanon. He appointed Herod's brother to Chalcis and the presidency over the temple at Jerusalem. In C.'s reign occurred the famine in Palestine and Syria (Acts xi. 28-30) under the procurators Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander. Suetonius (Claud., 25) writes: "C. expelled the Jews from Rome, as they were constantly raising disturbances under the instigation of one Christ" (this was between A.D. 50 and 52): a sample of the ignorance of heathen writers in respect to Christ and Judaism. C. was poisoned by his fourth wife, Agrippina, Nero's mother (A.D. 54), after a weak reign in which, according to Suetonius (29), "he showed himself not a prince but a servant" in the hands of others.

Clay. Tough plastic earth, containing silica and alumina. Used for making pottery in Palestine (Jer. xlviii. 2, 6). Vessels of dark blue clay are still made at Gaza. Used by Jesus in curing the blind man (John ix. 6), a mixture of dust and spittle. Doors are sealed with clay in the East, to facilitate detection of thieves. Wine jars were so sealed. It may have been with clay our Lord's tomb, and the earthen vessel with the proofs of Jeremiah's purchase, were sealed (Matt. xxvii. 66; Jer. xxxix. 14). At Koyunjik fine clay cylinders with Assyrian impressions have been found, which were made by rolling the seals on the moist clay, which was then baked in the fire.

Clement. Paul's fellow helper at Philippi, whom Origen (Comm., John i. 29) identifies with the Clement, the apostolical father afterwards bishop of Rome, whose epistle to the Corinthian church (part of Alex. MS. of Gr. O. and N. T.) is extant. Philippi being closely connected with Rome, as a Roman colony, might easily have furnished a bishop to the Roman church.

Cleopas. One of the two disciples who walked to Emmaus on the day of Christ's resurrection, and unconsciously spoke with Him (Luke xxiv. 18). Identified by some with ALPHAS (see) or Clotas or Cleophas (John ix. 25). But Aphorus or Clotas is an Aramaic name; whereas C. is a Greek name, contracted from Cleopater, as Antipas from Antipater. Cleopas was probably dead before Jesus' ministry began; for his wife and children constantly appear with Joseph's family in the time of our Lord's ministry.

Cloud. A type of refreshment, as it shades off the oppressive sun in Palestine, and gives promise of rain (1 Kings xviii. 45). It stands out the more prominent because of the clear sky that surrounds it, and the usually cloudless weather that prevails in the East. "Cloud without rain," therefore, symbolises a man that promises much, but does not perform (Prov. xvi. 15, xxv. 14; Jude 12). Isa. xxv. 5: "as the heat in a dry place (is brought down by the shadow of a cloud, so) Thou shalt bring down the triumphant shout of the foreigners." Also typifying transitoriness (Job xxv. 15, Hos. vi. 4). Also of what intercepts God's favour from us (Lam. ii. 1, iii. 41). As the veil between things seen and things unseen, it, with its floating undefined form, is the symbol manifesting the mysterious unseen presence of God (2 Sam. xxii. 12, 13). Sometimes in thick gloom portending judgment (Joel ii. 2). "Clouds and darkness round about Him" (Ps. cxvii. 2). The fire of lightning, too, wrapt in the clouds, suggesting the same punitive aspect of God (Isa. xix. 1), especially as He shall come to judgment (Dan. vii. 13, Rev. i. 7, Matt. xxvi. 64). The supernatural cloud on mount Sinai was attended with fire (Exod. xix. 16, 18; Deut. iv. 11), a fit symbol of the legal dispensation which speaks the Divine terror to the transgressor, in contrast to the gospel which speaks Jesus' loving invitation from the heavenly mount (Heb. xii. 18-25).

PILLAR OF CLOUD. The symbol of God's presence with Israel, guiding them from Egypt to Canaan (Exod. xiii. 21, 22). It became fire by night. So in the Red Sea it gave light to the escaping Israelites, whilst interposing between them and the pursuing Egyptians, to whom it "was a cloud and darkness." When Israel was appointed to rest in any place, it rested on the tabernacle over the mercy seat, and was named by later Jews the Shekinah (Exod. xxix. 42, 43; at the door (xxxiii. 9, 10; Num. xii. 5, ix. 15-23); covering the tabernacle of the congregation (Exod. xl. 34-38).

The ark (Num. x. 33-36, Speaker's Comm.) went in the midst of the people, and the cloud rested on them, guiding them where to halt. The cloud covered them from the heat (Ps. cv. 39, Isa. iv. 5). Its fire symbolised God's purity and glory (Exod. xxiv. 17, Dan. vii. 10), and His consuming wrath against transgressors (Lev. x. 2, Num. xvi. 35, Deut. iv. 24, Heb. xii. 29). Its nebulous haze typifies His hiding Himself, even whilst revealing Himself (Isa. xlv. 15); unfolding only a small part of His ways to our finite faculties (Job xxvi. 14, 1 Tim. vi. 16). The cloud is not mentioned as having been on the tabernacle after Israel's entrance into Canaan, until it rested on Solomon's temple at the dedication (2 Chron. v. 13, 14), in the moment when the trumpeters and singers together "made one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord."

Again, Ezekiel in vision saw the glory of the Lord leaving the temple (x. 4, xi. 23). Its return is foretold (xlii.

2, Isa. iv. 5). Paul speaks of "the glory," i.e. the Divine glory cloud, as Israel's peculiar privilege (Rom. ix. 4).

Cnidus. A magnificent city S.W. of Asia Minor, in Caria on the promontory, now cape Crio, projecting between the islands Cos and Rhodes (Acts xvi. 1). Passed by Paul in sailing from Myra, N. of Rhodes, to Crete. The promontory is what was originally an island, joined to the mainland by an artificial causeway, forming two harbours, one on the N. the other on the S.

Coal: peccam, "a black coal," and gachelath, "burning coals." Prov. xxvi. 21: "as coals (fuel) are to burning coals," etc.; so we speak of quarrelsome men "adding fuel to the flame." "Coals of fire" in 2 Sam. xxii. 9, 13, represent the lightnings of God's wrath. In Prov. xxv. 22, "heap coals of fire upon thine enemy's head" (Rom. xii. 20), the meaning is, melt him into burning shame at his own unworthy hatred, and love for thee who hast overcome his evil with thy good. Either he shall be like metals melted by fire or like clay hardened by it.

In Ps. cxx. 4 "coals of juniper" rather burning brands of broom, retanum. The Arabs regard the retem or broom the best firewood. As their slanders burnt like coals on fire, so, by righteous retribution in kind, God will give them hot coals. Ps. cxl. 10, xviii. 12, 13; comp. the same image of the tongue, Jas. iii. 6.

In 2 Sam. xiv. 7 "they shall quench my coal that is left," i.e., extinguish the only surviving light of my home, my only son.

In Isa. vi. 6 and 1 Kings xix. 6 the "coals" are in the Heb. (reseph) hot stones, on which cakes were baked and flesh cooked.

In Hab. iii. 5 (reseph) "burning coals" poetically and figuratively express "burning diseases," as the parallel "pestilence" shows; also comp. Deut. xxxiii. 24, Ps. xci. 6.

In Lam. iv. 8 translate as marg. "darker than blackness." Mineral coal protrudes through the strata to the surface of parts of Lebanon, at Cornale, eight miles from Beyrût, the coal seams are three feet thick; but it seems not to have been anciently known as fuel. Charcoal is what is meant by "coal."

Cock. "Cockerowing" was the third watch of the four WATCHES [see] introduced by the Romans. The Jews originally had but three. The first ended at 9, the second at 12, the third or "cockerowing" at 3, and the fourth at 6 o'clock a.m. (Mark xiii. 35). The second cockerowing (xiv. 72), which marked Peter's third denial of Jesus, was probably at the beginning of the fourth watch between 3 and 4 in the morning, not long before the first day dawn, just when our Lord was being led bound to Caiphas across the court where Peter was standing. The Mishna states that "cocks were not bred at Jerusalem because of the holy things." But Peter could easily hear their shrill crow on mount Olivet, only a half mile off from where he was in the porch of the highpriest's palace, in the stillness of night.

Moreover, the restriction could only apply to the Jews, not to the Romans, who used fowl for food. The first crowing being fainter in the distance did not awaken his slumbering conscience; but the second with its loud sound was the crowing which alone is recorded by Matthew (xxvi. 34), Luke (xxii. 34), and John (xiii. 38), being that which roused him to remember bitterly his Lord's neglected warning.

Cockatrice. Isa. xiv. 29. [See ADDER.]

Cockle=baesha, from a root "to stink" (Job xxxi. 40). Probably the "tares" (zizania) of Matt. xiii. 30. Bad weeds in general; or barley affected by Uredo fetida, "the stinking rust."

Colhozeh. A man of Judah in Nehemiah's time (iii. 15, xi. 5); father of Shallum and Barnah.

Collar. Job xxx. 18: "my affliction (disease) bindeth me about as the collar of my (inner) coat"; just as in the preceding clause, "my (outer) garment is changed into affliction"; comprising Job's trials, both those from without and those from within.

College. Not a school of learning in 2 Kings xxii. 14, but the second part or suburb or lower part of the city. Zeph. i. 10, answering to Akra N. of Zion; the Bezetha or Newtown, Heb. ha-mishneh; called by Josephus "the other city," i.e. the lower city (Ant. xv. 11. § 5). "Outside the wall, between the two walls, which was a second part of the city" (Rashi).

Colony. Philippi was one, planted with Italian colonists, transplanted from those parts of Italy which had espoused Antony's side, and which Augustus assigned therefore to his veterans. Inscriptions and coins of COIN OF PHILIP.

Augustus are still extant, with the designation "colonia" assigned to Philippi. It had the "jus italicum," or privileges of Italian citizens. The accuracy of Acts xvi. 12 appears in calling Philippi "colonia" (Roman), not Gr. apoikia.

Colosse, properly Colossæ. A city on the Lycus, an affluent of the Mæander. To the Christians there was addressed St. Paul's epistle, before he had seen their face (chap. ii. 1; i. 4, 7, 8). Epaphras probably founded the Colossian church (Col. i. 7, iv. 12). C. was ethnologically in Phrygia, but politically then in the province of Asia. On the site of the modern Chonos. The foundation of the church must have been subsequent to Paul's visitation, "strengthening in order" all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts xviii. 24), for otherwise he must have visited the Colossians, which chap. ii. 1 implies he had not. Hence, as in the epistle to the Romans, so in the epistle to C. there are no allusions to his being their father in the faith, such as there are in 1 Cor. iii. 6, 10; iv. 15; 1 Thess. i. 5, ii. 1. Probably during Paul's "two years" stay at Ephesus, when "all which dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xix. 10, 26), Epaphras, Philemon (2, 13, 19), Archippus, Apphia, and other natives of C. (which was on the high road from Ephesus to the Euphrates), becoming converted at Ephesus, were subsequently the first preachers in their own city. This accounts for their personal acquaintance with, and attachment to, Paul and his fellow ministers, and their salutations to him. So as to "them at Laodicea" (chap. ii. 1). He hoped to visit C. when he should be delivered from his Roman prison (Philem. 22, comp. Phil. ii. 24).

The angel worship noticed in Col. ii. 18 is mentioned by Theodoret as existing in his days. A legend connected with an innodation was the ground of erecting a church to the archangel Michael near a chasm, probably the one noticed by Herodotus. "The river Lycus, sinking into a chasm in the town, disappears under ground, and, emerging at five stadia distance, flows into the Mæander" (vii. 30). Two streams, one from the N. the other from the S., pour into the Lycus, both possessing the power of petrifying. The calcareous deposits on the plants, and obstructions which the stream met with, gradually formed a natural arch, beneath which the current flowed as Herodotus describes; the soft crust was probably broken up by an earthquake. In the 4th century the council of Laodicea (in the same region) in its 35th canon prohibited calling upon angels.

EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS: written by Paul during his first captivity at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), in that part of it when as yet it had not become so severe as it did when the epistle to the Philippians (i. 20, 21, 30) was written (probably after the death of Burrhus, A.D. 62, to whom Tigellinus succeeded as prætorian prefect). Its genuineness is attested by Justin Martyr (c. Tryphon, p. 311 b.), Theophilus of Antioch (Autol., ii. 100), Irenæus (iii. 14, § 1), Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, i. 325), Tertullian (Preser. Hæret., vii.), Origen (c. Celsus, v. 8).

Object: to counteract the Jewish false teaching there, of which Paul had heard from Epaphras (iv. 12), by setting before them their standing in CHRIST ALONE, exclusive of angels; the majesty of His person (chap. i. 15), and the completeness of redemption by Him. Hence they ought to be conformed to their risen Lord (chap. iii. 1-5), and exhibit that conformity in all relations of life. The false teaching opposed in this epistle (ii. 16, 18, "new moon . . . sabbath days") is that of Judaizing Christians, mixed up with eastern theosophy, angel worship, and the asceticism of the Essenes (ii. 8, 9, 16-23). The theosophists professed a deeper insight into the world of spirits and a greater subjugation of the flesh than the simple gospel affords. Some Alexandrian Jews may have visited C. and taught Philo's Greek philosophy, combined with the rabbinical angel-ology and mysticism, afterwards embodied in the Cabala.

Alexander the Great had garrisoned Phrygia with Babylonian Jews. The Phrygians' original tendency had been to a mystic worship, viz. that of Cybele; so, when Christianized, they readily gave heed to the incipient gnosticism of Judaizers. Later, when the pastoral epistles were written, the evil had reached a more deadly phase, openly immoral teachings (1 Tim. iv. 1-3, vi. 5).

The place of writing was Rome. The three epistles, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, were sent at the same time. The epistle to Colossians, though carried by the same bearer, Tychicus, who bore that to the Ephesians, was written earlier, for the similar phrases in Ephesians appear more expanded than those in Colossians. The "ye also" (as well as the Colossians) may imply the same fact (Eph. vi. 21). The similarity between the three epistles written about the same date to two neighbouring cities (whereas those written at distant dates and under different circumstances have little mutual resemblance) is an undesigned coincidence and proof of genuineness. Comp. Eph. i. 7 with Col. i. 14; Eph. i. 10 with Col. i. 20; Eph. ii. 2 with Col. i. 25; Eph. v. 19 with Col. iii. 16; Eph. vi. 22 with Col. iv. 8; Eph. i. 19, ii. 5 with Col. ii. 12, 13; Eph. iv. 2-4 with Col. iii. 12-15; Eph. iv. 16 with Col. ii. 19; Eph. iv. 32 with Col. iii. 13; Eph. iv. 22-24 with Col. iii. 9, 10; Eph. v. 6-8 with Col. iii. 6-8; Eph. v. 15, 16 with Col. iv. 5; Eph. vi. 19, 20 with Col. iv. 3, 4; Eph. v. 22, 23, vi. 1-9 with Col. iii. 18; Eph. iv. 24, 25 with Col. iii. 9; Eph. v. 20-22 with Col. iii. 17, 18.

Onesimus travelled with Tychicus, bearing the letter to Philemon. The persons sending salutations are the same as in epistle to Philemon, except Jesus Justus (Col. iv. 11). Archippus is addressed in both. Paul and Timothy head both. Paul appears in both a prisoner.

The style has a lofty elaboration corresponding to the theme, Christ's majestic person and office, in contrast to the Judaizers' beggarly system. In the epistle to the Ephesians, which did not require to be so controversial, he dilates on these truths so congenial to him, with a fuller outpouring of spirit and less antithetical phraseology.

Commerce. In Solomon's time first, the foreign trade of the Israelites to any extent began; chiefly consisting in imports, viz. linen yarn, horses, and chariots from Egypt. For these he paid in gold brought by his fleets, in concert with the Phœnicians, from India, East Africa, and Arabia (1 Kings x. 22-29). He supplied provisions for the workmen in Lebanon, whilst the Phœnicians brought the timber by sea to Joppa (v. 6, 9). Palestine supplied Tyre with corn, honey, oil, balm, and wine (Ezek. xxvii. 17, Acts xii. 20). Solomon's and the Phœnician united fleets brought on the Indian Ocean, from Ophir to Elath and Ezion Geber on the Eilatitic gulf of the Red Sea (ports gained by David from Edom).

gold, silver, ivory, ALGUM or ALMUG [see] trees, and precious stones, peacocks and apes (1 Kings ix. 26; x. 11, 22). He fortified Babel and Palmyra too, as a caravan station for the inland commerce of eastern and south eastern Asia. Oil was exported to Egypt (Hos. xii. 1). Fine linen and girdles were sold to merchants (Prov. xxxi. 24).

Jerusalem appears in Ezek. xxvi. 2 as the rival of Tyre, who exulted at the thought of her fall; "she is broken that was the gates (the mart) of the people, she (i.e. her commerce from Palmyra, Petra, and the East) is turned unto me . . . I shall be replenished now she is laid waste." Caesarea was made a port by Herod; besides Joppa.

The law strictly enjoined fair dealing, and just weights (Lev. xix. 35, 36; Deut. xxv. 13-16).

Compel. The Gr. anagareuein is a Tartar word adopted by the Persians for impressing into the government service men and horses to carry the despatches without interruption, by relays of men and horses stationed at intervals (Matt. v. 41, Mark xv. 21).

Conaniah. 2 Chron. xxxv. 9.

Concubine. The desire of offspring in the Jew was associated with the hope of the promised Redeemer. This raised concubinage from the character of gross sensuality which ordinarily it represents, especially when a wife was barren. This in some degree palliates, though it does not justify, the concubinage of Nahor, Abraham, and Jacob. The concubine's children were adopted, as if they were the wife's own offspring; and the suggestion to the husband often came from the wife herself (Gen. xxx.). The children were regarded, not as illegitimate, but as a supplementary family to that of the wife. Abraham sent them away with gifts during his lifetime, so as not to interfere with the rights of Isaac, the son of the promise.

The seeming laxity of morals thus tolerated is a feature in the Divine scheme arising from its progressive character. From the beginning, when man was sinless it was not so; for God made male and female that in marriage "they twain should be one flesh" (Matt. xiv. 4, 5, 8). But when man fell, and, in the course of developing corruption, strayed more and more from the original law, God provisionally sanctioned a code which imposed some checks on the prevalent licentiousness, and exercised His Divine prerogative of overruling man's evil to ultimate good. Such a provisional state was not the best absolutely, but the best under existing circumstances. The enactment was not a licence to sin, but a restraint upon existing sin, and a witness against the hardness of man's heart. The bondmaid or captive was not to be cast away arbitrarily after lust had been gratified (Exod. xxi. 7-9; Deut. xxi. 10, 11); she was protected by legal restraints whereby she had a kind of secondary marriage relationship to the man. Thus limits were set within which concubinage was tolerated until "the times of this ignorance" which "God winked at" (Acts xvii. 30) passed by, and Christ restored the original pure code. Henceforward fornication is a sin against one's own body, and against the Lord Christ, with whom the believer is one in body and spirit (1 Cor. vi. 15-20).

To take the royal concubines was regarded as tantamount to seizing on the throne. [See ABNER, ADONIJAH.]

Conduit. Hezekiah stopped the "upper watercourse of Gihon," and brought it down straight to the W. of the city of David (2 Chron. xxxii. 30). Robinson identifies Gihon with the pool Birket-es-Mamilla at the head of the valley of Hinnom S.W. of Jerusalem. He thinks the lately discovered subterranean conduit in the city to be a branch from Hezekiah's watercourse. Williams places Gihon N. of Jerusalem, near the tombs of the kings, and thinks that the watercourse flowed S. to the temple, and thence into the pool of Siloam, the lower pool. The proximity of "the upper pool" to "the fuller's field" (2 Kings xviii. 17) favours this; as "the fuller's monument" was N.E. of the city (Josephus).

The pools of Solomon beyond Bethlehem for irrigating his garden (Eccles. ii. 6) were probably connected with the supply of water for Jerusalem, which Talmudical tradition assigns to him. Pontius Pilate applied the sacred treasure of the corban to an aqueduct of 200 or 300 stadia, which is about the measure of the existing one. Probably he repaired Solomon's original watercourse. The water is still conveyed from the fountains which supply the pools two miles S. of Bethlehem. It crosses the Hinnom valley on a nine-arched bridge above the pool Birket-es-Sultan, and at last is conducted to the Haram; repaired by Sultan Mahomet Ibn Kalaun of Egypt about A.D. 1300.

Coney; shaphan, from the root "to hide"; the S. Arab. thofun; the Syrian Arab. weber. A pachydermatous animal, gregarious, greybacked, white on the belly, with long hair, short tail, and round ears; common on the ridges of Lebanon; living in caves and clefts; the Hyrax Syriacus, not the rabbit or coney. Prov. xxx. 26: "the coneys are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks;" exactly true of the hyrax; with weak teeth, short incisors, and nails instead, it seems defenceless, but its security is in rocky hiding places, such as Ain Feshkah on the Dead Sea shore. "No animal" (says

CONEY.

Tristram) "gave us so much trouble to secure." It is described as "chewing the cud" (Lev. xi. 5, Deut. xiv.

7), in phenomenal language, because the motion of its jaws is like that of ruminating animals; so also the bare. Though in some respects like the rodentia, it is really akin to the rhinoceros; its molar teeth differ only in the size; its body is as large as the rabbit. The "exceeding wisdom" of the coneys is illustrated in their setting an old male sentry near their holes to warn his companions when danger approaches, by a whistling sound.

Confession. Jas. v. 16: "confess your faults one to another (the apostle does not say to the priest), and pray one for another, that ye may be healed." The "faults" (papaptomata) are literally "falls" in relation to one another. But Sin., Alex., and Vat. MSS. and Vulg. read "sins" (hamartias). Confession is desirable (1) in case of wrong done to a neighbour, Matt. xviii. 15; (2) to a Christian adviser, ordained or unordained, any one who can apply God's written word suitably to one's need, and "pray for" and with one, Jas. v. 16; (3) open confession of any wrong done to the church, which has caused scandal to religion, in token of penitence. Not auricular: Matt. iii. 6, Acts xix. 18, "many confessed and shewed (openly, not in the ear of a priest under seal of secrecy) their deeds."

Confirmation. [See BAPTISM. Laying on hands.]

Congregation: eccleh. CONVOCATION, quahal (restricted to the pentateuch, except Isa. i. 13). The Hebrews, regarded in their collective capacity as a "holy" community, gathered in sacred assembly composed of the homeborn Israelites. Settlers, only if circumcised, were admitted to the privileges (Exod. xii. 19). Each Israelite was member of a house; the family was a collection of houses; the tribe, a collection of families; the congregation, a collection of tribes. The CONGREGATION was a national parliament, with legislative and judicial powers. The CONVOCATION was restricted to religious meetings (Lev. xxiii.). Each house, family, and tribe had its head; these representative heads were "the elders" or "princes."

Moses selected 70 elders by God's appointment to share the burden of government with him (Num. xi. 16). The sounding of the two silver trumpets was the signal for the whole body of the people assembling at the door of the tabernacle, which was there called "the tabernacle of the congregation," the mo'ed, lit. place of meeting (Num. x. 24). The princes were convened with only one trumpet. The people were bound to abide by the acts of their representatives (Josh. ix. 18).

In later times the Sanhedrim council (answering to Moses' seventy) represented the congregation. Synagogue, which originally applied to the assembly, came to mean the place of worship.

Conaniah. 2 Chron. xxxi. 12, 13.

Copper (Ezra viii. 27). But for A. V. "brass" the trans. elsewhere ought to be copper, (nechosheth), or where native ore is not meant, probably bronze. Zinc, one ingredient of brass, was then unknown. Used by the ancients for many purposes, for which its ductile nature adapted it. The earliest inhabitants of Europe used flint weapons, now discovered in various places. But Tubalcain (Gen. iv. 22, whence probably by corrupted tradition was derived the classic idol, Tulcan, the god of the forge) was "an instructor of every artificer in brass (copper) and iron," 500 years after creation according to Heb., or 1000 according to LXX., chronology. The ignorance of large portions of mankind, of iron and copper, subsequently or even at that early date, does not disprove Tubalcain's and his artificers' acquaintance with them. Savage nations, or races which have sunk in course of ages into barbarism, used first flint, then copper or bronze (an alloy of tin and copper), then iron. But there is no well established instance of a savage race gradually civilizing themselves; the civilization has always been introduced from without. Thus bronze or copper was probably introduced among savages from more civilized nations. The American Indians at cape Honduras visited by Columbus had hatchets, etc., of copper, and crucibles for melting it.

ASSYRIAN BRONZE MIRROR.

Seth's race was less distinguished for advancement in arts and luxuries than Cain's race, which was wise in their generation; but the truest civilization is that which develops man's moral and highest nature; in this respect Seth's descendants were far superior, walking in recognition of conscience and of the providence and grace of God.

Many intimations show that the Israelites knew how to dig out and smelt metals (Deut. iv. 20, viii. 9; Ezra xii. 18). Their mirrors of polished copper (Exod. xxxviii. 8 marg.) and "bows of copper" (Heb. Ps. xviii. 34) and "helmets," etc. (1 Sam. xvii. 38), show they had some secret of rendering copper harder than ours. The absence of iron remains does not necessarily prove it was unknown in Egypt, for it and the making of good steel have been known from very ancient times in India. It quickly decomposes, and so would leave no remains of implements. The copper mines worked by the Moschi, whose merchants imported it into Tyre, are mentioned Ezek. xxvii. 13.

Coral. More precious anciently than now, when it is more easily procured (Job xxviii. 18, Ezek. xxvii. 16). The red coral is the stony skeleton of a red zoophyte. In the Mediterranean, on the African coast off Tunis, attached to the rock at a considerable depth, and broken off from them by long hooked poles, and thus drawn out (Heb. for "price," Job xxviii. 18, is meshek, "the drawing out"). From Carthage (where Tunis now stands) the rough coral was imported to the mother city Tyre, and there manufactured into ornaments to be purchased by merchants for the women of Syria. Its tree-like growth is implied by its name ramoth, from raam "to be high"; others from the Sanskrit ramye, "pleasant."

Corban. An offering to God in fulfilment of a vow; from which the temple treasury into which such gifts were cast is called in Gr. Corbinas (Matt. xxvii. 6). Also whatever men by vow interdicted themselves from, as wine, etc., was called corban (Lev. xxvii.; Num. xxx.; Jud. xiii. 7; Jer. xxxv.). Undutiful children, under the plea of having consecrated as corban to the Lord whatever help they might otherwise have given to their parents, evaded their filial obligation; this Christ denounced as a "making the commandment of God of none effect by man's traditions" (Matt. xv. 5; Mark vii. 11, 12). The rabbins allowed a youth even to pronounce corban upon his property, and retain it for himself, though withholding it from his own parents. This extreme case however was not immediately referred to by our Lord.

Cord. "Lengthen thy cords, strengthen thy stakes" (Isa. liv. 2); an image from a tent (appropriate, as the Israelite church was symbolised by the tabernacle); it, when enlarged, needs at once longer cords and stronger stakes. The church must not merely seek new converts, but strengthen in faith existing members. So in Job iv. 21, "is not their cord in them unstrung?" or "snapped," so that their earthly tabernacle comes down (2 Cor. v. 1). In Eccles. xii. 6, "or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken," the meaning is, before life's gilded lamp, suspended from on high by the cord of intertwined silk and silver, be broken by the snapping of the cord. "The golden bowl" may hint at the skull; "the silver cord," the spinal marrow attached to the brain, white and precious as silver. "He hath loosed my cord" (Job xxx. 11) is an image from a bow unstrung (contrast xxix. 20). In Hos. xi. 4, "I drew them with cords of a man," i.e., with human methods, as a father would draw his child by leading strings. In Mic. ii. 5, "cast a cord by lot," i.e., have any measured out possession, cords being used for measurement (Josh. xiii. 6, Ps. xvi. 6).

Coriander. To it in form and colour the manna is compared (Exod. xvi. 31, Num. xi. 7). The god, Phœnician goid. An umbelliferous plant, with white or red flowers, producing globular, grey, spicy, striated, seed-vessels. Used as a condiment with food in Egypt, and in making confectionery.

Corinth. Famed for its commerce, chiefly due to its situation between the Ionian and Ægean seas, on the isthmus connecting the Peloponnese with Greece. In St. Paul's time it was capital of Achaia, and seat of the Roman proconsul (Acts xviii. 12). Its people had the Greek love of philosophical subtleties. The immorality was notorious even in the heathen world; so that "to Corinthianize" was proverbial for playing the wanton. The worship of Venus, whose temple was on Acrocorinthus, was attended with shameless profligacy, 1000 female slaves being maintained for the service of strangers. Hence arose dangers to the purity of the Corinthian church (1 Cor. v.—vii.), founded by St. Paul on his first visit in his second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 1-17).

The early Greek C. had been for a hundred years left desolate; its merchants had withdrawn to Delos, and the presidency of the Isthmian games had been transferred to Sicyon, when Julius Cæsar refounded the city as a Roman colony. Gallio the philosopher, Seneca's brother, was proconsul during Paul's first residence, in Claudius' reign. Paul had come from Athens, shortly afterwards Silas and Timothy from Macedonia joined him. His two earliest epistles, 1 and 2 Thess., were written there, A.D. 52 or 53. Here he made the friendship of Aquila and Priscilla, and laboured at tentmaking with the former. Hither, after his departure, Apollos came from Ephesus.

The number of Latin names in Paul's epistle to the Romans, written during his second visit of three months at C. (Acts xx. 3), A.D. 58, is in undesignated harmony with the origin of many of its people as a Roman colony. At the time of Paul's visit Claudius' decree banishing the Jews from Rome caused an influx of them to C. Hence many Jewish converts were in the Corinthian church (Acts xviii.), and a Judaizing spirit arose.

Clement's epistles to the Corinthians are still extant. C. is now the seat of an episcopal see. It is a poor village, called by a corruption of the old name, Gortho. The remains of its ancient Greek temple, and of the Posidonium or sanctuary of Neptune (N.E. of C., near the Saronic gulf), the scene of the Isthmian games, are remarkably interesting. The stadium for the foot race (alluded to in 1 Cor. ix. 24), and the theatre where the pugilists fought (26), and the pinetrees of which was woven the "corruptible crown" or wreath for the conquerors in the games (25), are still to be seen. The Acrocorinthus eminence rising 2000 feet above the sea was near C., and as a fortress was deemed the key of Greece. N. of it was the port Lechæum on the Corinthian gulf; on the other side on the Saronic gulf was Cenchrea (Acts xviii. 18).

The ornate "Corinthian order" of architecture, and "the Corinthian brass" or choice bronze statuary, attest the refinement of its people.

FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. Its authenticity is attested by Clement of Rome (Ep., c. 47), Polycarp (Ep. to Philipp., c. II), Ignatius (ad Eph., 2), and Irenæus (Adv. Her., iv. 27, § 3).

Its occasion and subject. Paul had been instrumental in converting many Gentiles (xii. 2) and some Jews (Acts xviii. 8), notwithstanding the Jews' opposition (5), during his one year and a half sojourn. The converts were mostly of the humbler classes (i. 26). Crispus, Erastus, and Caius (Caius), however, were men of rank (i. 14; Acts xviii. 8; Rom. xvi. 23). Chap. xi. 22 implies a variety of classes. The immoralities abounding outside at C., and the craving even within the church for Greek philosophy and rhetoric which Apollos' eloquent style gratified, rather than for the simple preaching of Christ crucified (ii. 1, etc.; Acts xviii. 21, etc.), as also the opposition of Judaizing teachers who boasted of having "letters of commendation" from Jerusalem the metropolis of the faith, caused the apostle anxiety. The Judaizers depreciated his apostolic authority (ix. 1, 2; 2 Cor. x. 1, 7, 8), professing, some to be the followers of the chief apostle, Cephas; others to belong to Christ Himself, rejecting all subordinate teaching (i. 12; 2 Cor. x. 7). Some gave themselves out to be apostles (2 Cor. xi. 5, 13), alleging that Paul was not of the twelve nor an eyewitness of the gospel facts, and durst not prove his apostleship by claiming support from the church (ix.). Even those who declared themselves Paul's followers did so in a party spirit, glorying in the minister instead of in Christ. Apollos' followers also rested too much on his Alexandrian rhetoric, to the disparagement of Paul, who studied simplicity lest aught should interpose between the Corinthians and the Spirit's demonstration of the Saviour (ii.). Epicurean self-indulgence led some to deny the resurrection (xv. 32). Hence they connived at the incest of one of them with his stepmother (v.).

The elders of the church had written to consult Paul on minor points: (1) meats offered to idols; (2) celibacy and marriage; (3) the proper use of spiritual gifts in public worship; (4) the collection for the saints at Jerusalem (xvi. 1, etc.). But they never told him about the serious evils, which came to his ears only through some of the household of Chloe (i. 11), contentions, divisions, lawsuits brought before heathen courts by Christian brethren against brethren (vi. 1). Moreover, some abused spiritual gifts to display and fanaticism (xiv.); simultaneous ministrations interrupted the seemly order of public worship; women spoke unveiled, in violation of eastern usage, and usurped the office of men; even the Holy Communion was desecrated by revellings (xi.). These then formed topics of his epistle, and occasioned his sending Timothy to them after his journey to Macedonia (iv. 17).

In iv. 18, v. 9, he implies that he had sent a previous letter to them; probably enjoining also a contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Upon their asking directions as to the mode, he now replies (xvi. 2). In it he also announced his design of visiting them on his way to and from Macedonia (2 Cor. i. 15, 16), which design he changed on hearing the unfavourable report from Chloe's household (xvi. 6-7), for which he was charged with zekleness (2 Cor. i. 15-17). Alford remarks, Paul in 1 Cor. alludes to the tornication only in a summary way, as if replying to an excuse set up after his rebuke, rather than introducing it for the first time.

Before this former letter he paid a second visit (probably during his three years' sojourn at Ephesus, from which he could pass readily by sea to C.: Acts xix. 10, xx. 31); for in 2 Cor. xii. 14, xiii. 1, he declares his intention to pay a third visit. In xiii. 2 trans. "I have already said (at my second visit), and declare now beforehand, as (I did) when I was present the second time, so also (I declare) now in my absence to them who have heretofore sinned (viz. before my second visit, xii. 21) and to all others" (who have sinned since it, or are in danger of sinning). "I write," Alex., Vat., and Sin. MSS. rightly omit; A.V. "as if I were present the second time," viz. this time, is inconsistent with ver. 1, "this is the third time I am coming" (comp. 2 Cor. i. 15, 16).

The second visit was a painful one, owing to the misconduct of many of his converts (2 Cor. ii. 1). Then followed his letter before the 1 Cor., charging them "not to company with fornicators." In 1 Cor. v. 9-12 he corrects their misapprehensions of that injunction. The Acts omits that second visit, as it omits other incidents of St. Paul's life, e.g. his visit to Arabia (Gal. i. 17-23).

The place of writing was Ephesus (xvi. 8). The English subscription "from Philippi" arose from mistranslating xvi. 5, "I am passing through Macedonia;" he intended (8) leaving Ephesus after Pentecost that year. He left it about A.D. 57 (Acts xix. 21). The passover imagery makes it likely the date was Easter time (v. 7), A.D. 57. Just before his conflict with the beastlike mob of Ephesus, 1 Cor. xv. 32 implies that already he had premonitory symptoms; the storm was gathering, his "adversaries many" (xvi. 9, Rom. xvi. 4). The tumult (Acts xix. 29, 30) had not yet taken place, for immediately after it he left Ephesus for Macedon.

Sosthenes, the ruler of the Jews' synagogue, after being beaten, seems to have been won by Paul's love to an adversary in affliction (Acts xviii. 12-17). Converted, like Crispus his predecessor in office, he is joined with Paul in the inscription, as "our brother." A marvellous triumph of Christian love! Paul's persecutor paid in his own coin by the Greeks, before Gallio's eyes, and then subdued to Christ by the love of him whom he sought to persecute. Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, were probably the bearers of the epistle (xvi. 17, 18); see the subscription.

SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. Reasons for writing. To explain why he deferred his promised visit to C. on his way to Macedonia (1 Cor. iv. 19, xvi. 5; 2 Cor. i. 15, 16), and so to explain his apostolic walk, and vindicate his apostleship against gainsayers (i. 12, 24; vi. 3-13; vii. 2; x. xi. xii.). Also to praise them for obeying his first epistle, and to charge them to pardon the transgressor, as already punished sufficiently (ii. 1-11, vii. 6-16). Also to urge them to contributions for the poor brethren at Jerusalem (viii.).

Its genuineness is attested by Irenæus

(Hæc., iii. 7, § 1), Athenagoras (De Res. Mort.), Clement of Alex. (Strom., iii. 91, iv. 101), and Tertullian (Pudic., xiii.).

Time of writing. After Pentecost A.D. 57, when Paul left Ephesus for Troas. Having stayed for a time at Troas preaching with success (ii. 12, 13), he went on to Macedonia to meet Titus there, since he was disappointed in not finding him at Troas as he had expected. In Macedonia he heard from him the comforting intelligence of the good effect of the first epistle upon the Corinthians, and having experienced the liberality of the Macedonian churches (viii.) he wrote this second epistle and then went on to Greece, where he stayed three months; then he reached Philippi by land about passover or Easter, A.D. 58 (Acts xx. 1-6). So that the autumn of A.D. 57 will be the date of 2 Cor.

Place of writing. Macedonia, as chap. ix. 2 proves. In "ASIA" [see] he had been in great peril (chap. i. 8, 9), whether from the tumult at Ephesus (Acts xix. 23-41) or a dangerous illness (Alford). Thence he passed by way of Troas to Philippi, the first city that would meet him in entering Macedonia (Acts xx. 1), and the seat of the important Phihppian church. On comparing chap. xi. 3 with Phil. ix. 15, 16 it appears that by "Macedonia" there Paul means Philippi. The plural "churches," however, (viii. 1) proves that Paul visited other Macedonian churches also, e.g. Thessalonica and Berea. But Philippi, as the chief one, would be the centre to which all the collections would be sent, and probably the place of writing 2 Cor. Titus, who was to follow up at C. the collection, began at the place of his first visit (viii. 6).

The style passes rapidly from the gentle, joyous, and consolatory, to stern reproof and vindication of his apostleship against his opponents. His ardent temperament was tried by a chronic malady (iv. 7, v. 1-4, xii. 7-9). Then too "the care of all the churches" pressed on him; the weight of which was added to by Judaizing emissaries at C., who wished to restrict the church's freedom and catholicity by bonds of letter and form (iii. 3-15). Hence he speaks of (vii. 5, 6) "lightnings without" and "fears within" until Titus brought him good news of the Corinthian church. Even then, whilst the majority at C. repented and excommunicated, at Paul's command, the incestuous person, and contributed to the Jerusalem poor fund, a minority still accused him of personal objects in the collection, though he had guarded against possibility of suspicion by having others beside himself to take charge of the money (viii. 18-23). Moreover their insinuation was inconsistent with their other charge, that his not claiming maintenance proved him to be no apostle. They alleged too that he was always threatening severe measures, but was too cowardly to execute them (x. 8-16, xii. 2); that he was inconsistent, for he had circumcised Timothy but did not circumcise Titus, a Jew amongst the Jews, a Greek among the Greeks (1 Cor. ix. 20, etc.; Gal. ii. 3).

That many of his detractors were Judaizers appears from chap. xi. 22. An emissary from Judea, arrogantly assuming Christ's own title "he that cometh" (Matt. xi. 3), headed the party (xi. 4); he bore "epistles of commendation" (iii. 1), and boasted of pure Hebrew descent, and close connection with Christ Himself (xi. 13, 22, 23). His high sounding pretensions and rhetoric contrasted with Paul's unadorned style, and carried weight with some (x. 10, 13; xi. 6). The diversity in tone, in part, is due to the diversity between the penitent majority and the refractory minority. Two deputies chosen by the churches to take charge of the collection accompanied Titus, who bore this 2 Cor. (viii. 18-22).

Cormorant. The Pelicanus basanus, of the family Colymbidae, order Natitiformes. Heb. shalak, i.e. the diver, from a root "to cast down" itself, or plunge after its prey. Unclean (Lev. xi. 17, Deut. xiv. 17). LXX. katarhaktēs, which Speaker's Comm. makes the "cormorant," Phalacrocorax crabo, often seen in Syria, and occasionally at the sea of Galilee; thus the Appendix to Smith's Diet. contradicts. But for "cormorant" in Isa. xxiv. 11, Zeph. ii. 14, trans. "pelican," Heb. guathil.

Corn. Wheat, barley, spelt (as the Heb. for "rye," Exod. ix. 32, ought to be trans., for it was the common food of the Egyptians, called doora, as the monuments testify; also in Ezek. iv. 9 for "fitches" trans. spelt). "Principal wheat," i.e. prime, excellent (Isa. xxviii. 25). "Seven ears on one stalk" (Gen. xli. 22) is common still in Egypt.

The sheaves in harvest used to be decorated with the lilies of the field, which illustrates S. of Sol. vii. 2. "Plenty of corn" was part of Jacob's blessing (Gen. xxvii. 28). From Solomon's time the Holy Land exported grain to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 17). See Amos viii. 5.

It is possible Indian corn or maize was known and used in Palestine as it was at Thebes in Egypt, where grains and leaves of it have been found under mummies. The wheat root will send up many stalks, but never more than one ear upon one stalk. But seven full ears upon one maize corn stalk have often been found. Maize corn in the milky state roasted is delicious; this, if meant in Lev. ii. 14, would give zest to the offering.

Cornelius. Centurion of the Italian band or cohort at Caesarea (Acts x.); "devout and one that feared God with all his house": he ordered not merely himself but all his family in God's ways. Comp. Gen. xviii. 19, Josh. xxiv. 15. He had made the most of his spiritual opportunities; for coming to the Holy Land a heathen, when he knew of the true God there he became a true proselyte. Now "whosoever hath to him shall be given" (Matt. xiii. 12, Isa. lxi. 5, Mic. ii. 7, John vii. 17). So, "giving much alms to the people," which showed the self sacrificing sincerity of his religion, and "praying to God always," he was vouchsafed a further revelation, viz. the gospel, through Peter's instrumentality. A vision to C. desiring him to send to Joppa for Peter, and a vision to Peter on the morrow, just as C.'s messengers, two household servants and "a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually" (for he followed David's rule, Ps. ci. 6), were drawing nigh the city, instructing him to regard as clean those whom "God had cleansed," though heretofore ceremonially "unclean," and desiring him to go with C.'s messengers "doubting nothing," prepared the way. Whatever uncertainty there might be of the miraculous nature of either vision by itself, there can be none of the two mutually supporting each other. Whilst Peter preached Jesus to them the Holy Ghost fell on all who heard. This left no doubt as to the propriety of baptizing these Gentile proselytes of the gate with Christian baptism.

Thus Peter showed in act what Jesus meant by His promise, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever (ceremonies) thou shalt bind (declare obligatory), etc., loose (declare not so), etc., shall be bound . . . loosed." The question which perplexed the early church was not whether Gentiles might become Christians (for that was plainly declared Mark xvi. 15, Luke xxiv. 47), but whether they could be admitted without circumcision. C.'s case decided this (Acts xi. 17, x. 28, 34, 35). C. already "knew" by hearsay of Jesus' preaching (ver. 36, 37); but now the faith was authoritatively declared to and accepted by him.

An undesigned coincidence (a mark of truth) is to be observed in comparing "four days ago," ver. 30, with ver. 9, 23, 24, from which it incidentally comes out that four days in all intervened between C.'s vision and Peter's arrival, two days in going to Joppa and two in returning, just as C. states. C., representing Roman nationality and force, was peculiarly fitted to be the first Gentile convert, the first-fruits of the harvest that followed.

Corner. A merciful provision of the law left the corners of the fields and whatever crop was on them to be enjoyed by the poor (Lev. xix. 9). So also gleanings of fields and fruit trees (xxiii. 22, Deut. xxiv. 19-21). Such regulations diminished much the amount of poverty. In David's time only 500 or 600 in debt or distress joined him out of all Judaea (1 Sam. xxi. 11). Later the prophets constantly complain of the rich defrauding the poor (Isa. iii. 14, 15; x. 2; Amos v. 11).

Corner stone. Binding together the sides of the building. Some of the temple ones are 19 ft. long and 7½ thick. Comp. Solomon's temple, 1 Kings v. 17, vii. 9. Christ is the true corner stone, laid by the Father in Zion, on whom the whole church rests (Isa. xxviii. 16). He is also "the head stone," or fifth crowning top corner of the pyramid, in which the whole building meets and culminates (Zech. iv. 7). Comp. Gen. xlix. 24; Ps. cxviii. 22; Matt. xxii. 42; Rom. ix. 33, 34; Eph. ii. 21.

Cornet. A horn trumpet used for war, for signals, for proclaiming the jubilee and new year. The shophar was long and straight; the queren (Dan. iii.) crooked. Shophar is generally "trumpet," queren "cornet" (Dan. iii.). God appointed the making of two silver trumpets. They were 120 in Solomon's time (2 Chron. v. 12), and were employed for other purposes besides those originally contemplated, viz. in the temple orchestra.

The first day of the seventh month was "the memorial of blowing of trumpets" (Lev. xxiii. 24, Num. xxix. 1). The beginning of the civil new year was thus ushered in with joyful thanksgivings for the mercies of the old year, the Levites chanting the 81st Psalm. This usage, however, cannot be proved so early as Moses' time, when the beginning of the (religious) year was fixed at the spring equinox, the period of the institution of the passover, the month Abib (Exod. xii. 2).

The rabbins represent the seventh month as the anniversary of creation. The first day "memorial of blowing of trumpets" preluded the tenth day yearly great "atonement."

Cos, Coos: now Stanchio, a contraction of eis ten choa. Paul passed the night on this island on his way by sea from Miletus to Rhodes (Acts xxi. 1). It is N.W. of Rhodes; 25 miles long by 10 broad. The chief town was on the N.E. of the island, near the promontory Scandarium.

Cosam. Luke iii. 28. [See GENEALOGIES.]

Cotton. Karpas. A. V. has "green" (Esth. i. 6), where "cotton" ought to be; for karpasa in Sanskrit and kindred terms of other eastern languages means "cotton." Cotton was manufactured, though not grown, anciently in Egypt. In India is the earliest record of its use for dress.

Council. The SANHEDRIM, a term formed from the Gr. sunhedrion. The Jews' supreme council in Christ's time. Moses' tribunal of seventy seems to have been temporary (Num. xi. 16, 17), for there are no traces of it in Deut. xviii. 8-10, nor under Joshua, judges, and the kings. As the permanent great council it probably took its rise after the return from Babylon, under the Græco-Macedonian supremacy. 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27, contain the earliest allusion to it. The number was probably derived from Moses' council. Its members were the chief priests or heads of the 24 courses, and those who had been highpriests; also the elders and scribes learned in Jewish law (Matt. xxvi. 57, 59; Mark xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66; Acts v. 21). Seventy-one is the number, according to Jewish tradition, to correspond to the 70 and Moses (Num. xi. 16). Others say 72, since to the 70 Eldad and Medad are to be added (Num. xi. 26).

The president was called nasi; generally the highpriest (Matt. xxvi. 62). The vice-president is called in the Talmud "father of the house of judgment." One scribe registered the votes for acquittal, another those for condemnation, according to the Babylonian Gemara. They sat in the form of a half circle; the vice-president or the oldest at the president's right hand, the rest sat before these two according to their dignity. The Gazzith or council hall was in the S.E. corner of a court near the temple. Sometimes they met in the highpriest's palace (Matt. xxvi. 3). In Christ's time the sessions were moved from Gazzith to a hall farther from the temple, but still on mount Moriah. Its final seat was at Tiberias. They tried cases of idolatry and false prophets. On this allegation Jesus, and subsequently Peter, John, Stephen, and Paul were brought before them (John xi. 47). Their authority extended even to Jews in foreign cities (Acts ix. 2). The Gemara states that power of life and death was taken from them just forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, coinciding with John xviii. 31, 32. The continuation and execution of a capital sentence rested with the Roman procurator, whence they took Jesus before Pontius Pilate on a different charge from that of blasphemy, for which the Sanhedrim condemned Him, viz. that of treason against Cæsar, the only one which Pilate would have entertained. The stoning of Stephen (Acts vii. 56, etc.) was an illegal assumption of power, an outbreak of fanatical violence, as also the execution of the apostle James in the procurator's absence (Josephus, Ant. xx. 9, § 1).

There were two lesser courts or "councils" (Matt. x. 17) in Jerusalem; one in each town of Palestine, 23 members in each in a town of 120, three when the population was below 120 (Talmud). They were connected with the several synagogues and possessed the right of scourging (2 Cor. xi. 24); but Josephus represents the local courts, as constituted by Moses, to have consisted of seven, with two Levitical assessors apiece. Matt. v. 21, 22, "the judgment," perhaps alludes to such courts.

There was also a privy "council" to assist the Roman procurator when he chose to consult them (Acts xxv. 12).

Covenant. Heb. berith, Gr. diatheke. From barah "to divide" or "cut in two" a victim (Genesis), between the parts of which the covenanting parties passed (Gen. xv. 9, etc., Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19). Probably the covenanting parties eating together (which barah sometimes means) of the feast after the sacrifice entered into the idea; comp. Gen. xxxi. 46, 47, Jacob and Laban.

"A COVENANT OF SALT," taken in connection with the eastern phrase for friendship, "to eat salt together," confirms this view. Salt, the antidote to corruption, was used in every sacrifice, to denote purity and perpetuity (Lev. ii. 13, Mark ix. 49). So a perpetual covenant or appointment (Num. xviii. 19, 2 Chron. xiii. 5).

The covenant alluded to in Hos. vi. 7

marg. is not with Adam (A. V. "men" is better, comp. Ps. lxxxii. 7), for nowhere else is the expression "covenant" applied to Adam's relation to God, though the thing is implied in Rom. v. 12-19, 1 Cor. xv. 22; but the Sinaitic covenant which Israel transgressed as lightly as "men" break their every day covenants with their fellow men, or else they have transgressed like other "men," though distinguished above all men by extraordinary spiritual privileges.

"Covenant" in the strict sense, as requiring two independent contracting parties, cannot apply to a covenant between God and man. His covenant must be essentially one of gratuitous promise, an act of pure grace on His part (Gal. iii. 15, etc.). So in Ps. lxxxix. 28 "covenant" is explained by the parallel word "mercy." So God's covenant not to destroy the earth again by water (Gen. ix., Jer. xxxiii. 20). But the covenant, on God's part gratuitous, requires man's acceptance of and obedience to it, as the consequence of His grace experienced, and the end which He designs to His glory, not that it is the meritorious condition of it. The LXX. renders berith by diatheke (not suntheke, "a mutual compact"), i.e. a gracious disposal by His own sovereign will. So Luke xxii. 29, "I appoint (diatithemai, cognate to diatheke, by testamentary or gratuitous disposition) unto you a kingdom."

The legal covenant of Sinai came in as a parenthesis (parenthesis, Rom. v. 20) between the promise to Abraham and its fulfilment in his promised seed, Christ. "It was added because of the (so Gr.) transgressions" (Gal. iii. 19), i.e. to bring them, and so man's great need, into clearer view (Rom. ii. 20, iv. 15, v. 13, vii. 7-9). For this end its language was that of a more stipulating kind as between two parties mutually covenanting, "the man that doeth these things shall live by them" (x. 5). But the promise to David (2 Sam. vii.; Ps. lxxxix. ii., lxxxii.; Isa. xi.) took up again that to Abraham, defining the line, the Davidic, as that in which the promised seed should come. As the promise found its fulfilment in Christ, so also the law, for He fulfilled it for us that He might be "the Lord our righteousness," "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Jer. xxxiii. 6; 1 Cor. i. 30; Rom. x. 4; Matt. iii. 15, v. 17; Isa. xlii. 21, xlv. 24, 25).

In Heb. ix. 15-18 the gospel covenant is distinguished from the legal, as the N. T. contrasted with the O. T. "Testament" is the better, trans. here, as bringing out the idea of diatheke, God's gracious disposal or appointment of His blessings to His people, rather than suntheke, mutual engagement between Him and them as though equals. A human "testament" in this one respect illustrates the nature of the covenant; by death Christ chose to lose all the glory and blessings which are His, that we, who were under death's bondage, might inherit all. Thus the ideas of "mediator of the covenant," and "testator," meet in Him, who at once fulfils God's "covenant of promise," and graciously disposes to us all that is His. In most other passages "covenant" would on the whole be the better rendering. "Testament" for each of the two divisions of the Bible comes from the Latin Vulg. version.

In Matt. xxvi. 28, "this is My blood of the new testament" would perhaps better be trans. "covenant," for a testament does not require blood shedding. Still, here and in the original (Exod. xxiv. 8) quoted by Christ the idea of testamentary disposition enters. For His blood was the seal of the testament. See below. Moses by "covenant" means one giving the heavenly inheritance (typified by Canaan) after the testator's death, which was represented by the sacrificial blood he sprinkled. Paul by "testament" means one with conditions, and so far a covenant, the conditions being fulfilled by Christ, not by us. We must indeed believe, but even this God works in His people (Eph. ii. 8).

Heb. ix. 17, "a testament is in force after men are dead," just as the O. T. covenant was in force only in connection with slain sacrificial victims which represent the death of Christ. The fact of the death must be "brought forward" (ver. 16) to give effect to the will. The word "death," not sacrifice or slaying, shows that "testament" is meant in Heb. ix. 15-20. These requisites of a "testament" here concur: 1. The Testator. 2. The heirs. 3. Goods. 4. The Testator's death. 5. The fact of His death brought forward. In Matt. xxvi. 28 two additional requisites appear. 6. Witnesses, His disciples. 7. The seal, the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the sign of His blood, wherewith the testament is sealed. The heir is ordinarily the successor of him who dies, and who so ceases to have possession. But Christ comes to life again, and is Himself (including all that He had), in the power of His now endless life, His people's inheritance; in His being heir (Heb. i. 2, Ps. ii. 8) they are heirs.

low." Thirteen MSS. of Kennicott read isis for sus or oris; that goddess having been, according to Egyptian fable, changed into a swallow; a fable transferred to the Greek mythology, in the story of Phœne.

Creation. Science and revelation being from the same God cannot be mutually opposed. But either, or both, may be misinterpreted; and there have been as many false interpretations of the book of nature as of revelation.

As the Copernican theory was ultimately found not to militate against, but to harmonize with, Scripture, when the language of the latter was better understood; so no real scientific discovery ever since has been found adverse to full belief in revelation, when the latter has been better understood. The full knowledge of both has ever advanced side by side. The Bible, having not scientific but religious truth for its object, speaks in phenomenal language, which in part even the scientific have to do, as in the phrases sunrise and sunset.

C., in the strict sense of the first origination of being out of nothing, does not come within the scope of science. It is by the Bible alone, and "through faith we understand that the worlds were framed (jilily formed) by the word of God, so that not [as, from the analogy of things reproduced from previously existing and visible materials, one naturally would suppose] out of things which appear hath that which is seen been made" (Heb. xi. 3). No human being was witness of creation (Job xxxviii. 4). Geology traces ages ascending backwards, marked by animal and vegetable existences, less and less highly organized the further back we go; but at last comes to a point beyond which it has no light, and must fall back on revelation and faith for information.

"In the beginning God created" the world, "the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1). "In the beginning the Word was" (John i. 1). Bura, "created," used of creating (1) the universe; (2) the sea monsters whose vastness causes amazement at God's power; (3) man, in the image of God (ver. 27). Everywhere else God "makes" (asa), as from an already created material, the firmament, sun and stars, and the brute (ver. 7, 16, 25), or "forms" (yatzar) beasts out of the ground (ii. 19), and "builds up" (ii. 22 marg.) the woman of the rib from man. The three verbs occur together (Isa. xliii. 7). Bura is confined to God's acts; the other two verbs are used also of man's acts. Though bura extends to other acts of God besides the original creation, it is only in a secondary application, without reference to preexisting materials; still, except in the original creation, they are not excluded. Moreover the contextual "in the beginning" can only mean an absolute beginning, in contrast to the previous nonexistence of the world and sole existence of the Creator. This creation of all things out of nothing distinguishes the Bible from all heathen cosmogonies and philosophical speculations, which make matter eternal. The Creator's mode of "creating" is not revealed, but simply the fact, that it was by the putting forth of His will.

Two narratives of creation, the latter (Gen. ii. 4, etc.) the supplement to the former (Gen. i.—ii. 3), appear at the forefront as the basis of the Bible revelation. That in chap. ii. 4, etc., evidently continues and recapitulates that in chap. i.—ii. 3, in order to prepare the way for the account of paradise and man's fall. The first gives a clear summary of creation, man included, down to the sabbath rest from creation. The second concentrates attention on man. Accordingly in the first Elohim (from alah "strong"), the name for the mighty God of creation in general, appears. In the second Jehovah, the personal God in covenant relation to man, the unchanging "I AM." To mark the identity of this personal Jehovah with the Elohim of the previous part, the two, the personal and the generic names, are joined, Jehovah-Elohim "the Lord God." The mighty Elohim who created all things is also the Jehovah, who from the days of paradise down to the days of Moses, the writer of the pentateuch, has been in personal and unchangeable covenant relation with His people. Moreover, Jehovah, being derived from havah the Syriac and Chaldee for the Heb. hayah "to be," must have come down from a time prior to the separation of the Hebrews from the Arameans, i.e. prior to Abraham (for Syriac was soon after quite distinct from Heb., Gen. xxxi. 47).

The accounts of creation and of the construction of the tabernacle resemble each other (the world being God's great tabernacle, Ps. xix.); the general plan first (chap. i.), then the actual creation of the first pair, Eden, etc., next. Scripture's design being to unfold redemption, only so much of the natural world is set forth as is needed for that design. The 1st chap. of Gen. is not so much a full narrative of details as a revelation of the scheme in the Creator's mind, the archetype of the actual (Gen. ii. 4, 5; Gesen., Targ., and Syr.). "Now no plant of the field was yet in the earth, and no herb of the field had yet sprouted forth, for the Lord God had not caused it to ram," etc. The earth already had brought forth grass (i. 11); but no cultivated land and no vegetables fit for man's use existed yet; "plant," "field," "grew," do not occur in chap. i. In the pattern of the tabernacle shown on the mount the description begins with the furniture of the tabernacle, then goes on to the priests, and ends with the sabbatical law. So in creation the process begins with the lower creatures, plants, and animals, then man, creation's priest, Eden, and lastly the sabbath.

Gen. i. 1 teaches the religious truth needed for a right knowledge of God, that the world is not eternal, that God created it in the beginning; when that beginning was it does not state. But the high antiquity of the earth is expressly taught in Ps. xc. 2, where God's formation of "the earth" in general is distinguished from that of "the (Heb. tebeel) habitable world," Gr. oikoumenē (cii. 25, Prov. viii. 22). Geology shows that creation occupied immense ages, but that man's creation was its closing act and at a comparatively recent date.

Two views are held as to Gen. i. The one that between ver. 1 and 2 intervened the vast geological periods, and that these are undescribed in Gen. i.; and that ver. 2 describes the chaotic state which succeeded the last geological period before the earth's preparation for man; and that the description of the six days refers to this preparation.

If the seventh day sabbath in Gen. ii. 2 be an ordinary day, then the six days must be ordinary days and this view is favoured. But geology seems to oppose any such state of the earth intervening between the preceding age and that of man's creation as could be described as "without form (desolate) and void." No universal convulsion (if these words are to be pressed literally) separates the present orders of life from those preceding. No one series of stratified rocks is void of traces of life. Thus we seem led to the conclusion (2) that the stage in the earth's progress when it became surrounded with chaotic waters (how long after "the beginning" we know not), described in ver. 2, is that which existed before the arrangement of its surface took place. (But see below.) The sabbath of God is described in Heb. iii., iv., as not yet ended; it will last till He who sitteth on the throne shall say, "Behold I make all things new." God's creating this dark and desolate state of the earth was not in vain, but that in due time it might be "inhabited" (Isa. xlv. 18). It was no "fortuitous concurrence of atoms," or "laws of nature" acting independently of the continually active Divine will of their Author. "The Spirit of God" as the Giver of life "brooded" ("moved") upon the waters." Then began organic life, at first in the lower types. Sir W. Jones (Asiatic Researches) states that the Indian philosophers similarly believed (doubtless from the primitive tradition) that water was the first element and work of the creative power. "The waters are called Nara, since they are the offspring of Nara or Iwara, and thence was Narayana named, because His first moving was upon them. That which is (the exact meaning of the I AM or JEHOVAH), the invisible Cause eternal, self-existing, but unperceived, is Brahma." This address of Menu, Brahma's son, to the sages who consulted him concerning the formation of the world, evidently corresponds with the revelation in Genesis.

Then God said "Let there be light," and there was light. Light was first in a diffused state. It is not a separate, distinct body in itself, but caused by undulations of ether propagated through space with inconceivable rapidity. Hence it is not said God created, but God commanded it to be. Scientifically the Bible distinguishes between "light" (or), ver. 3-5, and the light bearing "luminaries" (menoroth), ver. 14-18. Much of the pre-existing light diffused through space on the fourth day gathered round the sun's body (comp. Job xxxviii. 19). Still, through the incandescent photosphere that enwraps the sun we catch glimpses of the orb itself by the spots visible on it.

"Day" is used often for a long period, with a beginning and close, like morning and evening (Gen. xlix. 27, Dent. xxxiii. 12). As the prophetic "days" at the close (Dan. xii. 11, 12), so the historical "days" at the beginning of the Bible seem to be not literal but "days of the Lord"; comp. Ps. xc. 4, "a thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday," and 2 Pet. iii. 8. "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day." The 104th Psalm is an inspired commentary on the history of creation in Gen. i.; comp. the account in Ps. civ. 8, Prov. viii. 25-28, of the upheaval of mountains from beneath the waters and depression of valleys, whereby land was severed from sea; just as we still find traces (sea shells, etc.) of their former submersion on the highest mountains.

The peculiar phrase in the Heb. for the first day, "one day," marks it as a day unique, just as the day that shall usher in the millennium is called "one (extraordinary and unique) day" (Zech. xiv. 7). The seventh day is not described as the previous six, "it was evening, it was morning," because the Lord's sabbath extends over the whole present order of things, eventuating in the "sabbath rest that remaineth for the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9 marg.). The Creator entered into the sabbath rest when He ceased from material creation, to carry on the new and spiritual creation in man (2 Cor. v. 17, Heb. iv. 10). Yet God's sabbath is not an idle one: "My Father worketh hitherto," viz. upholding all creation. Comp. Jesus's "day" (John ix. 4, v. 17); man's present short-day-sabbath is a type of God's and the saints' sabbatism. The proportion of the seventh day to the previous six, of whatever length it and they be, is the ground of our seventh-day sabbath.

For the "firmament" (ver. 6) trans. "the (air) expanse," or sky overhead which supports the clouds or "waters above the heavens." Air, involved in the creation of the expanse, was the second necessity after light. Light was needed for the crystallization of inorganic forms and the molecular arrangement of the mineral matter of rocks. Light and air are needed for even the lowest types of life.

Hugh Miller identifies the first day's work with the azoic period; the second day with the silurian or paleozoic; the third day with the carboniferous; the fourth day with the permian and triassic; the fifth day with the oolitic or cretaceous, the period when, the air and the waters having been previously prepared, the waters brought forth in swarms insects, fishes, and monstrous reptiles of sea and land, and fowl flew in the air; the sixth day with the tertiary, which saw first the higher animals, the land mammalia, and lastly MAN.

Plants appear before animals in Gen. i. Geology does not directly as yet confirm this; but it may hereafter; the cellular structure of the earlier plants was not favourable to their preservation. Moreover, dependent as animals are on vegetation, it must have preceded them.

Traces of life are found in the laurentian and certainly in the cambrian strata, the former the oldest rocks, whereas animal creation seemingly does not appear till the fifth day in Gen. i. 20-22. But "fish" (dag) is omitted in the fifth day; an omission the more remarkable, as "fish" occurs (ver. 26, 28) as among the animals over which God gave man dominion. The creation of fish long previously is therefore assumed, not stated. The tonnia, from tonan "to stretch, and romesheth, from ramas "to trample" ("whales" and "every living creature that moveth," ver. 21), answer to the saurians and allied reptiles occurring in the rocks precisely at the point assigned them by Moses. The narrative in Gen. does not assert simultaneous creation of all the plants on the third day, and of reptiles and birds on the fifth, and of mammals on the sixth day; the Divine command and its fulfilment are narrated as distinct. What Moses narrates is, not the first appearance of each class, but the time when each came into remarkable development and prominence. The simplicity and brevity of the narrative exclude the noting of the creation of the primeval types which passed out of existence ages before man appeared. God ordered His own work on a system of law, and from time to time supplied new forces, or gave new directions to existing forces; not that He changed His design, or found His original plan defective. He contemplated the interferences from the first, but did not introduce them till their time was come.

In the theory of the correlation of forces, electricity, galvanism, chemical action, gravitation, light and heat, are various manifestations of the same thing, called force or energy. Light is not a material substance, but a mode of motion, undulations of ether propagated with inconceivable velocity. Accurately Moses writes, not God made light, but said on the first day Let light be. But why at the first, before organisms needing light existed? Because, to call forth light was to call into action force in its various manifestations. Matter and force are the two elements out of which visible creation is formed. Matter was already made, but it remained chaotic (i. 2) till force in the form of "light" was evolved. Then gravitation would begin, light and heat would permeate the mass, elementary substances which chemistry reveals would be developed, and the whole would move towards the centre of gravity. The great nebula of Orion illustrates the state of the solar system when light first appeared. God's dividing the light from the darkness, and calling the light Day and the darkness Night, is the Mosaic phrase which marks His communicating rotatory motion to the mass, so that the earth revolved on its axis, whence now results the division of day and night; a result however not then ensuing till the sun concentrated the diffused light in itself on the fourth day, when accordingly again the division of day and night is mentioned. Laplace's nebular hypothesis is possible only by supplying what revelation supplies, viz. God's interposition to impart force and rotation to matter. The nebulae in Orion and Argo represent the state of our system on the first appearance of light; there are changes passing over nebulae, some in the purely gaseous stage, others (as the nebula Draco) in transition, others in incipient central condensation. The 118 Andromeda nebula assumes a lenticular form resulting from rapid rotation, the mass being ready to break up into separate worlds. All the motions of the bodies of our solar system are from W. to E., proving that their motions have a common origin, all at one time existing as a single mass revolving in the same direction. Uranus' satellites alone on the outer verge of our system retrograde, having been acted upon by some disturbing force. Bode's law of planetary distances ceases beyond Uranus, and does not hold good in Neptune. The figure of the earth is that naturally assumed by a plastic mass revolving about its axis; also its traces of intense heat accord with the nebular theory as modified by revelation; also the sun's state as a nebulous star which has not yet gathered up the whole of the original nebula.

At the beginning of THE SECOND DAY the earth had become separated from the gradually condensing mass of the solar system, and formed into a sphere. The "waters" mean the fluid mass of what afterwards was divided into solid, fluid, and gas. The sorting of them was the work of the second day. Hydrogen and nitrogen in an incandescent state compose mainly many nebulae, as the spectroscope shows. God's introduction of oxygen into active operation produced air and water in our earth, which before the second day had consisted of a fused heterogeneous mass. Almost half of the earth's crust consists of oxygen, which enters into the composition of every rock and metallic ore. Chemical action therefore must have been most intense during the whole second day. By it the waters above the firmament were separated from that molten mass under the firmament which subsequently consolidated into rocks and ores. Probably all the water, strictly so called, floated above, in the condition in which Jupiter now appears. His apparent surface is crossed by alternating belts of light and shade, due to vast masses of steam ejected forcibly from the body of the fiery planet. His atmosphere being of vast depth (7850 miles), the rotatory velocity of its upper portions is much greater than that of the planet's surface; hence the steam arranges itself in belts parallel to its equator. The eight greater planets are divided into two groups of four by the intervening belt of minor planets. The two groups differ much; but the members of each differ little in density, size, and length of day; the moon is the only satellite of the inner group; the outer has 17 satellites. The steam of the earth floating at the second day's commencement would soon lose its heat by radiation into space, and would descend to the surface as rain. So the nucleus would gradually cool, and solids be formed, as granite, from the heat, moisture, and enormous pressure; and the globe internally molten would have a solid crust, covered all round with water, and surrounded by an atmosphere denser and more complex and extensive than now.

The laurentian is the earliest sedimentary rock, 200,000 square miles N. of the St. Lawrence: the lower laurentian has been displaced from its original horizontal position before the upper was deposited above it. At this point is the first trace of upheaval and subsidence; here the Creator's interposition is marked, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place, and let the dry land appear," the first work of THE THIRD DAY. The first appearance of life is not noted in Gen. In the laurentian rock the first traces of life appear, a lowly organization akin to the foraminifera, the individuals being connected together as in varieties of coral. In the cambrian, the next rocks, ripple marks occur showing that those rocks (the Harlech grit) formed a sea beach. The silurian, deposited in the bed of a sea, and the old red sandstone, a fresh water formation, come next. Then the carboniferous, with the coal measures above, testifying to an uniformly high temperature (since coal is found in far N. latitudes), a moist atmosphere, and an enormous terrestrial vegetation. This answers to God's command on the third day, "Let the earth sprout sprouts (desse), the herb seedling seed," and the fruit trees yielding fruit, etc. The majority of the vegetation then was cryptogamous, having only spores which only contain the germ; but seeds contain the germ and nourishment for it. No traces of grasses are found. The first of the three classes in God's words is the cryptogamous or seedless, the other are seedbearers. Not the first beginnings, but the extraordinary development of vegetable life is here marked. The cryptogams thrive best in an atmosphere such as then existed, in which light was diffused rather than concentrated in the sun, and in which the atmosphere was full of moisture. They absorbed and decomposed the excess of carbonic acid, and so purified the atmosphere. The great heat was derived from other sources than the sun, perhaps from the interior of the earth.

On the FOURTH DAY the concentration of light and heat in the sun was so far completed that he became the luminary of the system which heretofore had derived its light and heat from other sources; possibly the light now in the sun had existed as a nebulous ring warming the planets within it, as the nebula ring in Lyra; or as diffused luminous matter, filling a space which included the earth's orbit. The system's light is not even yet wholly concentrated into the sun, but a vast chromosphere or ring of light surrounds his disc. Enormous volumes of hydrogen are ejected from it, and rotate on their axis as a cyclone. A corona, like the nebula in Draco 4373, extends beyond the chromosphere, reaching from 400,000 to

1,800,000 miles beyond the sun; besides gaseous hydrogen, the corona contains solid or fluid particles giving a spectrum with dark lines indicating matter capable of reflecting light. The zodiacal light is thought to be a faint extension of the corona. The fourth day work was the concentration of light into the sun, "God made two luminaries" light bearers, marking the distinction between them and light itself). The permian and triassic rocks, of which the magnesian limestone and the new red sandstone are chief representatives in England, answer to the fourth day. The earliest saurian fossils occur in very small numbers, and the first traces of mammalia, viz. small marsupials. Old forms pass away, and the barrenness of new forms of life answers to the Mosaic silence as to new forms of life on the fourth day.

The great sized saurians characterize the lias and oolite and chalk, answering exactly to Moses' account of THE FIFTH DAY.

The mammalia, the rodentia, and mustelidae, predominating in the tertiary period, answer to Moses' account of THE SIXTH DAY.

However, in favour of the six days being ordinary days, D'Orbigny maintains that a gulf of darkness and death must have intervened between the tertiary strata and our present fauna and flora; for that not a single species, vegetable or animal, is common to the tertiary and the human periods. Dr. Pusey (Daniel, preface, xix.) thinks that the condition of the earth "without form and void" was such as God, who made all things "very good," never created (ver. 2); then for an undefined period (ver. 3) "the Spirit of God was brooding (Heb.) upon the face of the waters" of the dark and disordered "deep." Then followed successive action in God's remodelling the earth for man's habitation. Possibly the order of creation of the whole world in six vast periods, called "days," was repeated in six literal days in preparing the earth for man, its noblest occupant, "the minister and interpreter of nature" (Bacon).

Natural selection and sexual selection, the causes conjectured lately as accounting for change of species, are inadequate; for in each individual the concurrence of many contingent causes through azes is needed for producing the result. The probabilities against this concurrence in any one case are enormous, and in a large number of cases are out of the question. Such causes do not account for the development of a new organ, as mammary glands; or for the case of man, in whom intellectual superiority is accompanied by loss of physical power. No one case is known of natural or sexual selection altering species, and man's moulding of breeds to his mind has never been carried beyond narrow limits. The plan of creation is progressive development modified by continual superintendence and occasional interpositions of the Creator, just at the points where they were required to make the theory of Darwin possible. God's "breathing into man the breath of lives" marks that whilst his body is allied to lower animals his moral and intellectual qualities come directly from above. The facts of observation confirm Genesis, and prove that these never could have been developed by natural or sexual selection, or the struggle for life out of lower organizations. Man's moral and intellectual superiority, whilst he is physically inferior, distinguishes his creation from that of all below him. (Condensed from Ackland's Story of Creation.) Unless one abnormal variety in a species furnished both a male and a female of the new kind, the new species would cease. Even if both were produced simultaneously, unless intermixture with the original species were secured, hybrids would result, and these do not propagate. No trace in all the strata of geology occurs of intermediate links between species. Cuvier's principle of final causes and conditions of existence requires the co-ordination of each being so as to render the total possible. Every organized being has an entire system of its own, all the parts of which mutually correspond and combine by reciprocal action to the same end; no one can change in one part without a corresponding change in its other members. Thus, if the viscera be fitted only for digesting recent fish, the jaws must be constructed for devouring, the claws for seizing and tearing prey, the teeth for dividing its flesh, the limbs for pursuing and overtaking it, the organs of sense for discovering it far off, and the brain for such instincts as will enable it to plot for its prey.

The Assyrian tradition of creation, discovered by G. Smith, accords with the Bible rather than with Berossus. The fall of an evil angel is described; the creation by the gods out of chaos (over which a goddess Tislat, the Gr. Thalatta, "sea," presides) in successive stages; its being pronounced good by the gods; its culmination in the creation of man with the faculty of speech; man's original innocence, temptation, fall, and curse. There is however an elaborate lengthening of details (e.g. the Deity's long address to the newly created man on his duties, privileges, and glory), and an introduction of gods many, which contrasts with the sublime simplicity and Divine brevity of the inspired record. The Bible account of the primeval tradition, in its reticence of all details save what subserve the ends of a moral and spiritual revelation, is just what man would never have given except by inspiration. The Assyrian account is uninspired man's expansion and dilution of the original history; at the same time confirming remarkably the true story.

The general harmony in the order of plants, animals, and man, between Scripture and science is strikingly confirmatory of revelation. Geology and Scripture agree: (1) that the material world had a "beginning," the flora and fauna advancing progressively from the less perfect to the more perfect. The Greeks and Latins mark the orderly formation of the universe by expressing "order" and "world" by the same term, kosmos, mundus.

Furthermore, revelation states the scientific truth that God "hangeoth the earth up in nothing" (Job xxvi. 7). The mention of the northern hemisphere here, and the southern hemisphere (ix. 9), "the chambers of the S," hints plainly at the globular form of the earth; (2) that fire ("light") and water were two great agents of the mighty changes on the earth (Gen. i. 3, 9; Ps. civ. 2, 3, 6-9); the connection of light and heat is admitted, the sun's light being now known to come from its photosphere of incandescent hydrogen; (3) that continents were formed under the ocean (Gen. i. 9, 10; Ps. civ. 6-9; xxiv. 2, "He founded it above (not upon) the seas"; cxxxvi. 6); (4) that creation was not sudden, but progressive; (5) that man was the last created (no fossil remains of man are found), that his appearance is comparatively recent. Man is the crowning apex of creation; all the previous steps described are preparations for, and so silent prophecies of, his advent. Man is the summary of all preceding organizations; hence his brain in the embryo passes through the successive types of the fish's, reptile's, and mammal's brain. Geology gives no support to the theory that every species grew out of some species less perfect, the lower animal developing into the higher, the stronger surviving the weaker in the struggle for existence, and by the law of "natural selection" assuming those members which it needed for its development. There is no unbroken chain of continuity. New forms appear on the stage of life, having no close affinity to the old. The marvellous instinct of the working bee has not grown by cultivation and successive inheritance. It does not inherit its cell building or honey making power from its parents; for the drone and queen bee do neither. It does not transmit it to its offspring, for it has none. Man degenerates indeed to an almost brutish state. But, as such, the race becomes enfeebled and dies out; whereas the domesticated animal which reverts to the wild state becomes stronger and more fruitful. This proves that the wild state is natural to the brutes, the civilized to man. Civilization never comes to savages from themselves, but from without; almost all barbarous races have traditions of having sprung from ancestors more powerful and enlightened than themselves.

Man retains in a rudimentary form certain muscles and organs which are fully developed in the quadrupeds (apes, etc.); the tail is a remarkable instance. But man's development has taken the form most disadvantageous (in the Darwinian view) in the struggle of life. His body unclad, slowness of foot, want of power in teeth, hands, and feet compared with many brutes, bluntness of smell and sight, put him at an immense disadvantage in the struggle for life. "Man must have had human proportions of mind before he could afford to lose bestial proportions of body" (Duke of Argyll, Good Words, April 1863).

Specific centres for the creation of many animals and plants are generally now supposed, since each species is confined to a certain habitat. Probably, those specific centres which are very far from man's primitive home were the scene of the creation of animals going on during the six days, simultaneously with the creation of the animals in the region of Adam's paradise.

No clear proof of pre-Adamite man exists. If such yet be found, no physiological reason can forbid the Scripture view that God, after having formed the body of Adam on the highest type of human form, "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life," so that man thenceforward "became a living soul;" thus he is distinct from the brute, of which it is not said that God so breathed into them, but only that they have body and "living soul" (Gen. i. 20, 21); man, besides "body and soul," has "spirit" (1 Thess. v. 23, Eccles. iii. 21).

The unity of the human species is a fundamental principle of the Bible scheme of redemption (Deut. xxxii. 8; Matt. xix. 4; Acts xvii. 26; Rom. v. 14, 19; 1 Cor. xv. 22). The differences of races, though hard to explain on the supposition of their unity, are not so hard as it is to account, on the opposite theory, for the close affinities, physical, intellectual, and moral, of all the human family. The germs of various characteristics were doubtless originally implanted in man by the Creator, to be manifested as the race progressed, in order to diffuse man over the earth of which he was the appointed lord under God (Gen. i. 28). The supposed confusion of tongues at BABEL [see] was not at random, but a systematic distribution of languages in connection with corresponding varieties of characteristics, for the purpose of a systematic distribution of the human race, as Gen. x. 5, 20, 31 proves. The several varieties of race are gradually shaded off from one another, so that there is no alternative between the extremely improbable theory of eleven distinct species (!) and the Bible statement of only one. All men have reason and articulate speech; general words used by all prove in all the power of abstract reasoning; the absence of the former proves the absence of the latter, in beasts. All have the sense of responsibility to unseen powers; all are capable of being Christianized and civilized. All are reducible to one original ideal type, to which the Indo-European comes nearest. The cubic contents of the skull of the lowest savage is 82 inches, the highest 94; the gorilla only 30. Man alone walks erect; the negro's skull, unlike the ape's, is as perfectly balanced on the vertebral column as the European's. The lowest savage has more brain than he needs for the few wants of his rude life.

Man brought death on himself by sin (Rom. v. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 21; Gen. ii. 17, iii. 19). But he did not entail death on the animal world according to any scripture; and geology proves the death of whole races of animals before man. That the lower creature world has a connection with man in its common present subjection to "vanity" (i.e. failure as yet of their designed end), and its future emancipation into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, appears from Rom. viii. 18-23. Man's fall is only a segment of a wider circle of evil which began with Satan and his angels' previous fall.

Creseens. Paul's companion at Rome who had gone to Galatia when Paul wrote 2 Tim. iv. 10. In Galatia he preached the gospel, according to the Apostolic Constitutions.

Crete, now Candia. 158 miles long, from cape Salmone on the E. (Acts xxvii. 7, 12) to cape Criumetopen on the W. beyond Phenice. Its breadth is small. [On its connection with the CHERETHIM see.] It abounded with Jews in the apostolic age; hence "Cretans" were among the witnesses of the effusion of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts ii. 11). Paul's ship was constrained by contrary winds off Cnidus to sail under the lee of C. "over against Salmone"; having passed which with difficulty the ship reached FAIR HAVENS, near Lasea. Thence it made for Phenice to winter there, but was driven by a sudden gale from the N.E., sweeping down from the region of mount Ida to the island Clanda, whence it drifted to Melita or Malta (xxvii. 13-16).

Paul visited C. between his first and second imprisonments at Rome, and left TITUS [see] to "set in order the things wanting, and to ordain elders in every city" (Tit. i. 5). In ver. 12 he quotes Epimenides a Cretan poet. C. was without wild beasts; the poet's sarcasm was that beastly men supplied their place: "the Cretians are always (not merely at times, as all natural men are) liars, evil beasts, slow bellies." "To Cretanize" was proverbial for to lie, as "to Corinthianize" for to be dissolute. In C. was the fabled birthplace of Jupiter, king of the gods. They themselves are called "bellies," since it is for their bellies they live (Phil. iii. 19). Christianity won its triumphs for truth and holiness even in such an unpromising soil.

In the middle ages the cathedral of Megalocastron was dedicated to Titus.

Crispus. Ruler of the Corinthian synagogue; converted and baptized by Paul (Acts xviii. 8, 1 Cor. i. 14).

Cross. The instrument of a slave's death, associated with the ideas of pain, guilt, and ignominy. "The very name," writes Cicero (Pro Rab. 5), "ought to be excluded not merely from the body, but from the thought, eyes, and ears of Roman citizens." The Hebrews, having no term for it as not being a punishment in their nation, called it "warp and woof."

Scourging generally preceded crucifixion: so Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 26, Mark xv. 15; foretold in Isa. l. 6, liii. 5). Pilate had probably hoped the Jews would be content with this scourging, and still let Him escape crucifixion (Luke xxiii. 22, John xix. 1). Jesus bore His own cross toward Golgotha outside the city (Heb. xiii. 12; so Stephen, Acts vii. 58), but sinking exhausted probably He was relieved, and it was transferred to Simon of Cyrene; prefigured in Isaac carrying the wood (Gen. xxii. 6; contrast Isa. ix. 6, "the government shall be upon His shoulder"). Jesus' sacred and lacerated body was raised aloft, the hands nailed to the transverse beam, the feet separately nailed to the lower part of the upright beam so as to be a foot or two above the ground (others think the two feet were pierced by one and the same nail). Stupefying drink, vinegar mixed with gall and myrrh, was first offered to Him and refused (Matt. xxvii. 34), for He would meet suffering consciously. Near death, to fulfil Ps. lxxix. 21, He drank of the sour wine or vinegar kindly offered Him on a sponge. His death was hastened by rupture of the heart (see BLOOD; also Mark xv. 23; comp. John xix. 28, Matt. xxvii. 48). The sour wine called posca was the common drink of the Roman soldiers. Pilate marvelled at His speedy death, crucifixion often not terminating in death for days. The approach of the passover sabbath, one of peculiar solemnity, led to his permitting the Jewish law to be carried out which forbids bodies to hang after sunset (Deut. xxi. 22, 23). His legs could not be broken, because the passover type must be fulfilled (Exod. xii. 46). Constantine when converted abolished crucifixion. The agony consisted in: (1) the unnatural position of the body, causing pain at the least motion; (2) the nails being driven through the hands and feet, which are full of nerves and tendons, yet without a vital part being directly injured; (3) the wounds so long exposed bringing on acute inflammation and gangrene; (4) the distended parts causing more blood to flow through the arteries than can be carried back through the veins; (5) the lingering anguish and burning thirst.

After Constantine's vision of the cross in the air and the inscription, "Under this standard thou shalt conquer," a new standard was adopted, the Labarum, with a pendent cross and embroidered monogram of Christ, the first two Gr. letters of His name, and Alpha and Omega (Rev. i. 8).

The St. Andrew's cross is shaped like an X, though Hippolytus says he was crucified upright.

The St. Anthony cross (embroidered on his cope) was shaped as a T. The heathen Egyptians, Copts, Indians, and Persians, all have the same sacred emblem.

Tradition, and the inscription over our Lord's head, make it likely that the form of His cross was \dagger . The pole on which the brazen serpent was lifted by Moses was the type (John iii. 14; Num. xxi. 8, 9). The fathers regarded its four limbs pointing above, below, and to both sides, as typifying "the height, depth, length, and breadth" of the love of Christ, extending salvation to all (Eph. iii. 18). The harmlessness of cruciform flowers is another suggested type in nature. Christ's cross transforms the curse into a blessing (Gal. iii. 13, 14); the inscription was written with letters of black on a white gypsum ground.

By a striking retribution in kind, the Jewish people, whose cry was "crucify Him," were crucified in such numbers by Titus "that there was not room enough for the crosses, nor crosses enough for their bodies" (Josephus, B. J., vi. 28). The piercing of Jesus' hands was foretold in Ps. xxii. 16, Zech. xii. 10.

The story of "the invention of the cross," A.D. 326, is: Helena the empress, mother of Constantine, then nearly 80 years old, made a pilgrimage to the holy places, and there, by help of a Jew who understood her superstitious tastes, found three crosses, among which Christ's cross was recognised by its power of working miracles, at the suggestion of Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem. Bits of this real cross were distributed as relics throughout Christendom. To supply the enormous demand, they were alleged to have been miraculously multiplied! In the church of the Holy Jerusalem Cross at Rome, relics of the top of the cross with the inscription are yearly exhibited to the people for veneration. The falsity of the whole story appears from the fact that the Jews' law required the cross to be burnt; Eusebius is silent as to the alleged discovery of it.

A symbol or emblem merely at first, it soon began to have the notion of spiritual and supernatural efficacy attached to it. In the 6th century the crucifix image was introduced, and worship (latría) to it was sanctioned by the church of Rome.

Figuratively the cross and crucifixion are used for spiritually mortifying the flesh, in union spiritually by faith with Christ crucified, not self imposed austerities (Matt. xvi. 24, Phil. iii. 18, Gal. vi. 14, Col. ii. 20-23). Our will and God's will are as two separate pieces of wood; so long as both lie side by side there is no cross; but put them across one another, then there is a cross. We must take up the cross Christ lays on us if we would be His disciples.

Crown. A band encircling the head by way of honour; the royal badge of kings; the sacerdotal badge of priests; the prize winner's badge of victory. The Gr. diadema, "diadem" which A. V. less fitly trans. "crown" in Rev. xii.

ANCIENT CROWNS.

3. xix. 12, is restricted to Christ the King of kings; Satan wears it only as usurping Christ's right (Rev. xii. 1). Stephanos is once applied to His golden "crown" (Rev. xiv. 14), which refers to Him viewed as a victor, the image being from the wreath of conquerors in contests. This is also the sense of "crown" in the reward promised to believers who overcome the world, the flesh, and Satan; the "incorruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix.

25); "crown of righteousness," for righteousness will be its own reward (Rev. xxii. 11; Exod. xxxix. 30; 2 Tim. iv. 8). "Crown of life" (Jas. i. 12; Rev. ii. 10, iii. 11), "crown of glory that fadeth not away" as the withering garlands of wild olive, ivy, or parsley, given to the victors in the Isthmian and other games (1 Pet. v. 4). The priests' mitre was a linen crown or fillet. The mitznepheth or linen tiara of the highpriest was preeminent in splendour (Lev. viii. 9). A "blue (the colour of heaven) lace" fillet was underneath, and the golden plate graven with "Holiness to the Lord" on the front of the mitre (Exod. xxviii. 36-38, 40). In Ezek. xxi. 26, "remove the diadem (mitznepheth), and take off the crown" (atarah), i.e. remove the mitre, the last Jewish king Zedekiah's priestly emblem, as representing the priestly people. The "mitre" elsewhere is always used of the highpriest; but the anointed king partook of the priestly character, whence his "diadem" is so called (Exod. xix. 6, xxviii. 4; Zech. iii. 5); also the crown, the emblem of the kingdom; until they be restored and united in the Mediator Messiah (Ps. c. 2, 4; Zech. vi. 13). Gold was the chief material of the king's crown (Ps. xxi. 3); comp. 2 Sam. xii. 30, the Ammonites' crown, with its precious stones, was worth (rather than "weighed") a talent of gold.

Those feasting at banquets wore "crowns" or wreaths. Comp. Isa. xxviii. 1, 5; "woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower"; Samaria, Ephraim's capital on the brow of a hill, is the proud crown of his drunkards; it shall perish as the flower crown on his drunkard's brow soon "fades"; but "the Lord of hosts (in striking contrast) shall be for a crown of glory and for a diadem (tephtrah, splendid headdress) of beauty unto the residue (the remnant left after consuming judgments) of His people."

The Jews boast of three crowns: the law, the priesthood, the kingly crown. Better than all, a good name. So "crown" is used figuratively (Prov. xii. 4, xiv. 24, xvii. 6; 1 Thess. ii. 19). "Crown" is used in the sense of the projecting rim round the top of an altar or a table (Exod. xxv. 25, xxx. 4, xxxvii. 27).

Christ's "crown of thorns" has been supposed to have been made of the Rhamnus nabeca (Hasselquist) or the Lycium spinosum, probably the latter (Sieber). To mock rather than to pain Him was the soldiers' object, and they took what first came to their hand. The dark green was a parody of the triumphal ivy wreath.

Cruse: tsappachath. Probably like the vessels still made at Gaza; a blue clay porous globular vessel, about nine inches wide, a neck three long, a handle below the neck, and a straight spout, with an opening the size of a straw (1 Sam. xvi. 11, 12, 16; 1 Kings xiv. 6, xvii. 12, 14, 16). The bagabonyu, from the gurgling noise in pouring (1 Kings xiv. 3). Tzellachah, from a root to sprinkle; a flat saucer or dish (2 Kings ii. 20).

In Prov. xix. 24, "a slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom" (tal-lachath, the eruse or dish like cavity in the bosom, or else trans. "in the dish").

Crystal: zekukith, from zakak, "to be pure." Job xxviii. 17: "the gold and the crystal cannot equal wisdom." Glass is meant, some costly goblet composed of glass and gold, such as Wilkinson says the Egyptians made (Auc. Egypt., ii. 61).

Kerach, lit. ice, the ancients believing rock crystal to be ice intensely congealed. In Ezek. i. 22, "the likeness of the firmament was like the terrible (rather splendid, dazzling) crystal" (Rev. iv. 6, xxi. 11).

Cuckoo: shachaph, Lev. xi. 16, Deut. xiv. 15: unclean. Rather the Gr. cephalus of Aristotle, a large petrel, as the Puffinus cinereus. From a root to be slender; light of body like a gull, whose body is small compared with its apparent size and outspread wings; it skims the waves, seeking its food in the agitated water. Andouin's gull, abounding on the shores of Syria (Tristram), a more likely bird than the storm petrel, which is seldom seen on land.

Cucumber. A product abounding in Egypt, a variety of which, the Cucumis chate, is "the queen of cucumbers" (Hasselquist). A variety of the melon; hence the Israelites pined for this Egyptian dainty in the wilderness (Num. xi. 5). Quishu, from quasha "to be hard," it being an indigestible food. Tristram observed quantities of the common cucumber in Palestine. Isa. i. 8: "a lodge (a lovely box for watching in against depredations) in a garden of cucumbers," so solitary was Zion to be, as such a lodge when deserted and wrecked by the winds, the poles fallen or leaning every way, and the green boughs which had shaded it scattered.

Cummin. An umbelliferous plant like fennel, with aromatic, pungent, carminative seeds; beaten out with a rod, not threshed (Isa. xxviii. 25, 27); tithed by the punctilious Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 23). "Cummin splitting" was a Greek adage for cheese-paring parsimony (Aristophanes, Wasps). Grown still in Malta.

Cup. Gen. xl. 11, for drinking; xlv. 5, for divination, practised by dropping gold, silver, or jewels into the water, and examining their appearance; or looking into the water as a mirror. The sacred cup symbolised the Nile (which was "the cup of Egypt," Phry H. N., viii. 71) into which a golden and silver goblet was yearly thrown. Joseph's cup was of silver; the Egyptians ordinarily drank from vessels of brass. Joseph's preserving his disguise by language adapted to his supposed character before his brethren, "Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" is inconsistent with his disclaiming all knowledge except what God revealed (xli. 16), but was the net of a good but erring man; Scripture does not sanction it. One alone there was in whose mouth was found no guile (1 Pet. ii. 22).

Solomon and the Assyrians probably derived their art mainly from Phoenicia. Assyrian cups from Khorsabad resemble the heads of animals, some terminating in the head of a lion. In Matt. xxvi. 7 an "alabaster vase" for ointment is meant, broad at the base, tapering to the neck, with little projections at the sides; such as are in the British Museum. Glass was a material for cups, and a glass bead bearing a Pharaoh's name of the 18th dynasty has been found, i.e. 3200 years ago. Alabastron, a town in Upper Egypt, had quarries of alabaster near, whence the name is derived.

Figuratively, one's portion (Ps. xi. 6, xvi. 5, xxiii. 5). Babylon was called a golden cup (Jer. li. 7), because of her sensuality, luxury, and idolatries which she gave draughts of to the subject nations; so mystical Babylon, the apostate church (Rev. xvii. 4). So "the cup of devils" is opposed to "the cup of the Lord" (1 Cor. x. 21). To partake of a wine feast where a libation was first poured to an idol made one to have fellowship with the idol, just as believing participation of the Lord's supper gives fellowship with the Lord. This is called "the cup of blessing which we bless," the celebrants being the whole church, whose leader and representative the minister is; answering to the pass-over "cup of blessing," over which "blessing" was offered to God. It was at this part of the feast Jesus instituted His supper (1 Cor. x. 15; Luke xxii. 17, 20; comp. 1 Chron. xvi. 2, 3). Figurative also is the cup of affliction (Ps. lxxv. 8; Isa. li. 17, 22). Christ's sufferings (Matt. xx. 22). The cup of salvation (Ps. cxvi. 13).

Cupbearer. Gen. xl. 1-21. A high officer in eastern courts, e.g. Solomon's (1 Kings x. 5). Pharaoh's was the instrument of Joseph's elevation (Gen. xli. 9). Rabshakeh was "chief cupbearer" in Sennacherib's court (Isa. xxxvi. 2), as his name implies. Nehemiah was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (i. 11, ii. 1).

Curtains. 2 Sam. vii. 2: "the ark of God dwelleth within curtains" or "the curtain" = the curtain covered tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 1-13, xxxvi. 8-17), implying its transitoriness and slightness. In Isa. liv. 2 = the cloth forming the covering and sides of the tent. Black haircloth is used for the Bedouin's tent. Jer. xlix. 29, Hab. iii. 7, "curtains," i.e. shifting tents. S. of Sol. i. 5: "the curtains of Solomon" mean the hangings and veil of Solomon's temple, typifying Christ's righteousness, the covering of saints who together constitute the living temple of the antitypical Solomon (Isa. lxi. 10, Rev. xix. 8, 1 Cor. iii. 16).

Cush: "the Benjamite," heading of Ps. vii. An enigmatic title for Saul the Benjamite, with an allusion to the similar sounding name of Saul's father, Kish. Cush or the Ethiopian expresses one black at heart, who "cannot change his skin" or heart (Jer. xiii. 23, Amos ix. 7). David in this Ps. vii. 4 alludes to Saul's gratuitous enmity and his own sparing "him that without cause is mine enemy," viz. in the cave at Engedi, when Saul was in his power (1 Sam. xxiv.).

Cush. Gen. x. 6-8, 1 Chron. i. 8-10.

Eldest son of Ham; his descendants were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtechah; Raamah's sons, Sheba and Dedan; Nimrod, mentioned after the rest as C.'s son, was probably a more remote descendant. C. ethnologically includes not only Ethiopia (meaning the sunburnt, Nubia and N. Abyssinia) in Africa, its chief representative, but the C. of Asia, watered by the Gihon river of paradise (Gen. ii. 13). Israhel couples it with Elam (xl. 11), Ezekiel with Persia (xxxviii. 5). Also part of Arabia (Gen. x. 7, Isa. xliii. 3, especially 2 Chron. xxi. 16), Mesopotamia (Gen. x. 8-10), and still farther E.

Chuzistan in the region of Susiana, in S. Asia, was their first home. Thence the main body crossed over to Ethiopia. C.'s connection with Midian appears in Hab. iii. 7, where Cush-an is joined to Midi-an. But the Cush-an there may be Israel's first oppressor, CHUSHAN RISHATHAIM [see]; the name however shows a Cushite origin. The Babylonian inscriptions of the mounds of Chaldaea proper, the primitive seat of the Babylonian empire close to the Persian gulf, prove there was a C. on the E. or Asiatic side of the Arabian gulf, as well as on the W. or African side. So Homer (Odys., i. 23) speaks of the Ethiopians as divided, part towards the E., part towards the W. Nimrod's kingdom began with Babel or Babylon, whence "he went forth into Assyria and builded Nineveh" (Gen. x. 11 marg.).

Two streams of Hamitic migration appear to have taken place: (1) an earlier one of Nigritians through the Malayan region, the Mizraites spreading along the S. and E. coasts of the Mediterranean resembled the modern seafaring Malays. (2) A later one of Cushites through Arabia, Babylonia, Susiana, eastward to W. of India. Meroe of Ethiopia is called in the Assyrian inscriptions by the name Nimrod, which must therefore be a Cushite name. The writing and vocabulary at Ur or Umuqueir, near the Persian gulf, is Hamitic rather than Semitic. Ideographic rather than phonetic writing characterizes the Taramian races. Massive architectural remains, and a religion of nature worship from the highest to the lowest (fetish) kind, are found in all the Mizraite and Cushite settlements; and the language is partly Taramian, partly Semitic.

The 22nd Egyptian dynasty, to which Zerah the Cushite who invaded Asa belonged, contains names of Babylonian origin. Shishak = Sheshak, Namuret = Nimrod, Tekhit = Tiglath. [See BABEL.]

Cushi. 1. Jer. xxxvi. 14. 2. Zeph. i. 1. 3. Jeab's retainer, a foreigner, probably from his name a Cushite, and so unrecognised by the watchman, and ignorant of David's devoted affection for Absalom, as appears from the abrupt inconsiderateness with which he announced Absalom's death. Less acquainted also with "the way of the Ciccar," the ground in the Jordan valley, whence Abimeaz outran him (2 Sam. xviii. 21-23).

Cuthah. The region of the Assyrian empire whence Shalmaneser transported colonists, after the deportation of Israel from it. The seat of the worship of Nergal (2 Kings xvii. 24, 30). The name is akin to CUSH [see], as the Chaldeans said Ashur for Ashur. Its locality is probably Chuzistan in the region of Susiana E. of the Tigris. The mountainous region between Elam and Media was called C. It would be a natural policy to transplant some of the hardy mountaineers (called also Cosseii) from their own region, where they gave the Assyrians trouble, to Samaria. There is also a town C., now Towiba, close to Babylon. G. Smith and Rawlinson identify it with Tel Ibrahim. Intermixing with the ten tribes' remnant, they became progenitors of the Samaritans who are called "Cuthaans" by the Jews. The Samaritans claimed kindred with the Sidonians, and these again with the Cuthaans (Josephus, Ant. xi. 8, § 6; xii. 5, § 5; Chald. Paraphr. Gen. x. 19; 1 Chron. i. 13).

Cuttings. Lev. xix. 28: "ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for (in behalf of) the dead, nor print any mark upon you." And (xvi. 5) the priests "shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh." The prohibition was directed against the heathen self-inflicted mutilation or baldness which was supposed to propitiate the manes of the dead; probably a milder substitute (Homer, Il., xxiii. 141) for the human sacrifices offered over the dead, as the 12 Trojans immolated by Achilles at Patroclus' burial (Homer, Il., xxiii. 171, 176), and as among the ancient Scythians (Herodotus, iv. 71) and modern Africans (e.g. in Dahomey) at the death of chiefs both men and animals are sacrificed. The cuttings also expressed excessive grief, death being to the heathen a dark blank future (contrast 1 Thess. iv. 13).

Self mutilation and cuttings were also supposed to propitiate the idols at other times (1 Kings xviii. 28). The Syrians (Lucian de Dea Syr., ii. 658, 661; comp. Ezek. viii. 14), the neighbours of Israel in Canaan, not the Egyptians from whose land Israel had come, practised these self-cuttings, expressive of excited feeling.

Tattooing also, in mark of allegiance to a deity, as soldiers and slaves indicated their devotion to those over them, is hereby forbidden. Voluntary disfigurement of the person is an outrage on God's workmanship (Speaker's Comm., Lev. xix. 28). This explains the "mark in the right hand or in the forehead" (Rev. xiii. 16, xvii. 5, xix. 20). God signs His people with His own name on their forehead mystically (the most conspicuous, highest part of the body, whereon the helmet "the hope of salvation" is worn; implying open confession on their part as well as on His): Rev. xiv. 1-9, xxii. 4. Paul's bodily scars, suffered for Jesus' sake, were God's own marks that Paul was His, in contrast to the circumcision marks in the flesh of their followers in which the Judaizing teachers gloried (Gal. vi. 17, 13, 14; Col. i. 24; Rev. vii. 3). Isa. xlv. 5, "another shall subscribe his head unto the Lord," Lowth explains, shall write upon his hand, I am Jehovah's; as soldiers punctured their hands in token of devotion to their commander. Brahmins bear similar marks on their foreheads.

Cuttings of the flesh, the beard, whiskers, and hair of the head expressed extreme grief (Jer. xli. 5, xlvii. 5, xlviii. 37; comp. Isa. xv. 2). In spite of the prohibition the Jews often practised it in Jeremiah's time (xvi. 6).

Cymbals: tiztzelim, from a root to tinkle or tinkle. Of two kinds: "loud cymbals," castanettes; four small plates of brass; two plates were attached to each hand, and smitten together, marking for the choir their time for joining in the sacred song; see 1 Chron. xiii. 8. And "high sounding cymbals," two larger plates, one held in each hand, and struck together as an accompaniment to other music, like the Italian piatti, marking the rhythm. Zech. xiv. 20, "the bells," rather concave plates of brass attached to horses as an ornament, and tinkling in striking against one another; even the common things shall have sanctity attached to them.

Cypress. Isa. xlv. 14: tirzah, from tazaz "to be hard." Eccles. xxiv. 13, i. 1-21. A large, coniferous, evergreen tree; the wood very durable, hard, and fragrant. The cypress, which is a native of Taurus, is now only found in lower levels of Syria. As its seldom rots it was used for idol statues. The juniper is found 7000 ft. up Lebanon, but not at the top, which is 10,500 ft. high.

CYPRESS

Cyprus. The Chittim of Ezek. xxvii. 6. Citium, one of its towns, is a kindred name. This island in easternmost part of the Mediterranean runs from N.E. to S.W., 148 miles long, about 40 broad for the most part, facing Phœnicia and Lebanon on the E., and Cilicia with the Taurus range on the N.; containing the mountain range of Olympus. Notorious for its licentious worship of Venus, or the Assyrian Astarte. Yet in this unpromising soil Christianity took early root, the Jews having prepared the way. Its copper mines in the mountains were once farmed to Herod the Great; hence the number of Jews on the island was natural. Barnabas was born there, and "being a good man and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith" was keen to impart to his countrymen that gospel which he so much loved (Acts iv. 36). Moreover those scattered abroad in the persecution whereby Stephen suffered "travelled as far as C., preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only." Some of the men of C. too preached the Lord Jesus to the Greeks effectually at Antioch (xi. 19, 20). Moreover, when Barnabas and Paul were there "separated for the Lord's work" by the Holy Ghost (xiii. 1-13), C. was their first destination. With John Mark as their minister they preached in the Jews' synagogue at Salamis; and then passing by the Roman road to Paphos, the proconsular residence in the W., at his request they preached before Sergius Paulus the "proconsul," A. V. "deputy." A delicate mark of truth. C. had been an imperial province, and governed by the emperor's "lieutenants"; but the emperor transferred it to the senate, and so Luke accurately designates its governor, as under the senate, "proconsul," anthupatos (Dion Cassius, liii. 12, liv. 4). Coins and inscriptions confirm this (one on the lintel of a doorway with the name of the very officer referred to by Luke, confuting Beza's doubt). Elymas or Barjesus, a sorcerer and false prophet, a Jew, withstood Paul and Barnabas, "seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith"; but on his being struck with blindness at Paul's word the deputy was astonished and believed.

Barnabas visited his native island again, with his nephew Mark, when Paul had refused to allow Mark's attendance because of his former departure from them from Pamphylia, instead of going forward with them to the work (xv. 36-39). Mnason, "an old disciple" of C., is mentioned in xxi. 16 as the appointed entertainer of Paul at Jerusalem. In sailing from Rhodes and Patara Paul's ship "sighted" C., leaving it on the left in going to Phœnicia (xxi. 3). In sailing from Sidon on their way to Rome they went N. of it, to be under lee of land, and to take advantage of the current, which flows northward along Phœnicia and westward along Cilicia (xxvii. 4).

Cyrene. The chief city of Cyrenaica (now Tripoli), or the Libyan pentapolis (five cities) in N. Africa, between Egypt and Carthage, S., across the sea, of Crete and the Greek Peloponnese. A Dorian Greek colony, reigned over by Battus and his family 630 B.C. Afterwards joined to its eastern neighbour Egypt. A table land descending by terraces to the sea. Famed for luxuriant vegetation and grandeur of its hills; for its intellectual activity in philosophy and poetry; and for its commerce. Jews in large number were settled there, and had a synagogue at Jerusalem, some of whose members took part against Stephen (Acts vi. 9). Others were hearers of Peter and witnesses of the Spirit's miraculous effusion on Pentecost (ii. 14). Being converted, and subsequently scattered at the persecution of Stephen, they preached to the Greeks at Antioch, at which time and place believers were first called Christians (xi. 19, 20). Simeon, who bore Jesus' cross, was of C. (Luke xxiii. 26). Among "the prophets and teachers" at Antioch who ministered to the Lord was Lucius of C. (Acts xiii. 1), whom some identify with Luke the evangelist and physician. Certainly, it is from Luke alone that we hear so much of C. [But see LUKE.] C. was a great centre from which the gospel afterwards went forth, raising the famous N. African churches.

Cyrenius. [See CENSUS.] Publius Sulpicius Quirinus (not Quirinius).

Consul 12 B.C., main governor of Syria after Archelaus' banishment, A.D. 6 (Josephus, Ant. xvii. 13, § 5). He was directed to make a census or "enrolment" of property (Luke ii. 2, apographē) in Syria and Judaea. Varus was governor up to the end of 4 B.C. Volusius Saturninus was governor (we know from an Antioch coin) A.D. 4 or 5. In the interval between Varus' governorship ending 4 B.C. and Volus. Saturninus' government A.D. 4 falls the census (Luke ii. 2). Quirinus, as having been consul 12 B.C., must have had a proconsular province subsequently. A. W. Zumpt shows by an exhaustive reasoning that Cilicia was the only province that could have been his, and that Syria was at this time attached to Cilicia. Quirinus was rector or adviser to Caius Caesar when holding Armenia (Tacitus, Ann. iii. 48). This cannot have been during Quirinus' governorship of Syria in 6 B.C., for Caius Caesar died A.D. 4, and the nearness of Syria to Armenia was probably a reason for choosing Quirinus, Syria's governor, to be the young prince's adviser. He must then have had a first governorship, 4 B.C. to 1 B.C., when he was succeeded by M. Lollius. Probably in Luke ii. 2 the "first" implies that "the first enrolment" or registration of persons and families was in Quirinus' first government; intimating indirectly that there was a second enrolment which carried into effect the tutatio ultimately contemplated by the previous enrolment. The second enrolment we know from Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1) was to ascertain the resources. C. is called therefore an "appraiser" of these. Tacitus (Ann. iii. 48) records that the emperor Tiberius asked for Quirinus the honour of a public funeral from the senate. He represents him as unpopular because of his meanness and undue power in old age.

It was during his first governorship of Cilicia and Syria that he conquered the Homonadenses of Cilicia, and obtained the insignia of a triumph.

A brevarium of the empire was ordered by Augustus (Tacitus, Ann., i. 11), giving a return of its population and resources. The enrolment in Luke ii. 1, 2 perhaps was connected with this, "all the world" meaning the whole Roman empire.

Cyrus: Korēsh, from the Persian kōhr "the sun," as Pharaoh from phrah "the sun." Founder of the Persian empire. Represented as the son of Mandane, who was daughter of Astyages last king of Media, and married to Cambyzes a Persian of the family of the Achemenidae. Astyages, because of a dream, directed Harpagus his favourite to have the child C. destroyed; but the herdsmen to whom he was given preserved him. His kindly qualities, when he grew up, betrayed his birth. Astyages enraged served up at a feast to Harpagus the flesh of his own son. Harpagus in revenge helped C. at Pasargadae, near Persepolis, 559 B.C., to defeat and dethrone Astyages, and make himself king of both Medes and Persians. Afterwards C. conquered Croesus, and added Lydia to his empire. In 538 B.C. he took BABYLON [see] by diverting the course of the Euphrates into another channel, and entering the city by the dry bed during a feast at which the Babylonians were revelling, as Isa. xxi. 5, xlv. 27, Jer. i. 38, li. 57 foretell.

TOMB OF CYRUS.

He finally fell in a battle against the Massagetae. His tomb is still shown at Pasargadae.

In Dan. v. 31, at the overthrow of Babylon, we read "Darius the Median took (received) the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old." Isa. xlii. 17, xxi. 2 confirm Daniel as to the Medes' share in destroying Babylon. Daniel (vi. 28) joins the two, "Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius and in the reign of C. the Persian." Comp. also Jer. li. 11, 28. The honorary precedence given to the Medes in the formula, "the law of the Medes and Persians altereth not," also in Dan. v. 28, marks their original supremacy. But the expressions "Darius received the kingdom" (Dan. v. 31), and "Darius the son of Ahasuerus (the same name as Cyaxares and Xerxes) of the seed of the Medes . . . was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans" (ix. 1), mark that C. was the supreme king and conqueror, and Darius made subordinate king under him. It is probable that this Darius was representative of the deposed Median line of supreme kings, whether he is to be identified with Astyages or his successor Cyaxares II., and that C. deemed it politic to give him a share of royal power, in order to consolidate by union the two dynasties and conciliate the Medes. [See DARIUS.] Darius reigned as viceroy at Babylon from 538 to 536 B.C., when C. assumed the throne there himself; whence Ezra (ii. 1) regards the year of C.'s beginning to reign at Babylon as the first year of his reign over the whole empire, though he was king of Persia 20 years before. So also 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22. The prophecies of Isaiah attribute the capture of Babylon to C., not Darius; xlv. 27, 28, xlv. 1, "C. My (Jehovah's) shepherd . . . the Lord's anointed," a type of Messiah, the true King, Sua of righteousness (Mal. iv. 2), and Redeemer of His people from mystical Babylon. "Ahasuerus" is another form of Cyaxares, whom Xenophon represents as uncle of C. and son of Astyages.

The pure monotheism in which C. had been reared as a Persian predisposed him to hate the Babylonian idols and favour the Jewish religion. Zoroaster about this very time reformed the popular nature worship of Persia, and represented the sun or fire as only a symbol of the one God. In C.'s decree for the Jews' restoration from Babylon he intimates his acquaintance with Isaiah's and Jeremiah's prophecies concerning him, which he doubtless heard from Daniel the prophet of Belshazzar's doom: "the Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem which is in Judah . . . He is the God."

Smith's Bible Dict. (B.F. Westcott) truly says: "the fall of Sardis and Babylon was the starting point of European life; and the beginning of Grecian art and philosophy, and the foundation of the Roman constitution, synchronize with the triumph of the Aryan race in the East." C. represents eastern concentration and order, Alexander western individuality and independence. The two elements exercised an important influence upon the history of the world and of the church, and C.'s restoration of the Jews is one of the great turning points in the development of God's mighty scheme for ultimate redemption. Xenophon (Cyr. i. 2, § 1) celebrates C.'s humanity. This, with his Zoroastrian abhorrence of idolatry and its shameful rites, and veneration for the "great god Ormazd," the special object of ancient Persian worship, would interest him in behalf of the sufferings of the Jews, whose religion so nearly resembled his own. Thus their restoration, an act unparalleled in history, is accounted for. His acknowledgment of "the Lord God of heaven" (Ezra i. 2), whom he identifies with the Jehovah of the Jews, and his pious ascription of his wide dominion to His gift, accord with his belief as a votary of the old Persian religion. His gift of the golden vessels out of the treasury (i. 7-11, vi. 5), the allowance of the temple rebuilding expenses out of the royal revenue (vi. 4), and the charge to his subjects to "help with silver, gold, goods, and beasts" (i. 4) accord with his characteristic munificence. His giving so high a post as the government of Babylon to a Mede agrees with his magnanimity in appointing two Medes in succession to govern the rich Lydia (Herodotus, i. 156, 162). See Rawlinson's Historical Illustrations of O. T. J. W. Bushanquet gives reasons for thinking that the C. (son of Cyaxares and grandson of Astyages) who took Babylon is distinct from C. son of Cambyzes who conquered Astyages.

D

Dabareh, rather Daberath. Josh. xxi. 28, xix. 12. A Levitical town on the boundary of Zebulun. Also stated to be in Issachar (1 Chron. vi. 72). Probably on the border between Issachar and Zebulun. Called Dabartha by Josephus. Now Dehazieh, at the base of mount Tabor.

Dabbasheth. A town on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 11). Now Dabweth.

Dagon. Diminutive (expressing endearment) of dag, "a fish." The male god to which Atargatis corresponds (2 Macc. xii. 26), the Syrian goddess with a woman's body and fish's tail, worshipped at Hierapolis and Ascalon. Our fabulous mermaid is derived from this Phœnician idol. She answers to the Greek foam-sprung Aphrodite. The divine principle supposed to produce the seeds of all things from moisture. Twice a year water was brought from distant places and poured into a chasm in the temple, through which the waters of the flood were said to have been drained away (Lucian de Syr. Dea, 883). Derived from tarag, targeto, "an opening," the goddess being also called DERCETO; or else adlar, "glorious," and dag-to, "a fish." The tutelary goddess of the first Assyrian dynasty, the name appearing in Tig-lath.

Dag-on was the national god of the Philistines, his temples were at Gaza and Ashdod (Jud. xvi. 21-30; 1 Sam. v. 5, 6). The temple of Dagon, which Samson pulled down, probably resembled a Turkish kiosk, a spacious hall with roof resting in front upon four columns, two at the ends and two close together at the centre. Under this hall the Philistine chief men celebrated a sacrificial meal, whilst the people assembled above upon the balustraded roof. The half-man half-fish form (found in basrelief at Khorsabad) was natural to maritime coast dwellers. They senselessly joined the human form Divine to the beast that perishes, to symbolise nature's vivifying power through water; the Hindoo Fishnu; Babylonian Odakon. On the doorway of Sennacherib's palace at Koyunjik there is still in basrelief representations of Dagon, with the body of a fish but under the fish's head a man's head, and to its tail women's feet joined; and in all the four gigantic slabs the upper part has perished, exactly as 1 Sam. v. 4 marg. describes: now in the British Museum. The cutting off of Dagon's head and hands before Jehovah's ark, and their lying on the threshold (whence his devotees afterward durst not tread it), prefigure the ultimate cutting off of all idols in the great day of Jehovah (Isa. ii. 11-22). Beth-Dagon in Judah and another in Asher (Josh. xv. 41, xix. 27) show the wide extension of this worship. In his temple the Philistines fastened up Saul's head (1 Chron. x. 10).

Dalaiah. 1 Chron. iii. 24.

Dalmanutha. On the W. of the sea of Galilee, as what Mark (viii. 10) calls "the regions of D." Matthew (xv. 39) calls "the borders of Magdala." Magdala was at the S. end of the plain of Geunsesaret, near the water. D. is probably now Ain-el-Bardeh, "the cold fountain," surrounded by ancient walls and ruins of a village, at the mouth of a glen a mile S. of Magdala, near the beach.

Dalmatia. A region E. of the Adriatic Sea, forming part of Illyricum. Paul sent Titus there (2 Tim. iv. 10), and had himself preached in the neighbourhood (Rom. xv. 19).

Dalphon. Esth. ix. 7.

Damaris. An Athenian woman converted by Paul's preaching (Acts xvii. 34). When most "mocked" or deferred, she and Dionysius the Areopagite "clave unto Paul and believed."

Damascus. The most ancient city of Syria, at the foot of the S.E. range of Antilibanus, which rises 1500 ft. above the plain of D., which is itself 2200 above the sea. Hence D. enjoys a temperate climate cooled by breezes. The plain is a circle of 30 miles diameter, watered by the Barada (the ABANA of 2 Kings v.), which bursts through a narrow cleft in the mountain into the country beneath, pouring fertility on every side. This strikes the eye the more, as bareness and barrenness characterize all the hills and the plain outside. Fruit of various kinds, especially olive trees, corn and grass abound within the D. plain. The Barada flows through D., and thence eastward 15 miles, when it divides and one stream falls into lake el Kiblijeh, another into lake esh-Shurkijeh, on the border of the desert. The wady Helbon on the N. and Awaj on the S. also water the plain. The Awaj is probably the scriptural PHARPAR.

First mentioned Gen. xiv. 15, xv. 2. Abraham entering Canaan by way of D. there obtained Eliezer as his retainer. Josephus makes D. to have been founded by Uz, son of Aram, grandson of Shem. The next Scripture notice of D. is 2 Sam. viii. 5, when "the Syrians of D. succoured Hadadezer king of Zobah" against David. David slew 22,000 Syrians, and "put garrisons in Syria of D., and the Syrians became servants to David and brought gifts" (1 Chron. xviii. 3-6). Nicholas of D. says Hadad (so he named him) reigned over "all Syria except Phœnicia," and began the war by attacking David, and was defeated in a last engagement at the Euphrates.

His subject Rezon, who escaped when David conquered Zobah, with the help of a hand made himself king at D. over Syria (1 Kings xi. 23-25), and was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon. Hadad's family recovered the throne; or else BEN-HADAD I. [see], who helped Baasha against Asa and afterwards Asa against Baasha, was grandson of Rezon. He "made himself streets" in Samaria (1 Kings xv. 34), so completely was he Israel's master. His son, Benhadad II., who besieged Ahab (ver. 1), is the Ben-idri of the Assyrian inscriptions. These state that in spite of his having the help of the Phœnicians, Hittites and Hamathites, he was unable to oppose Assyria, which in one battle slew 20,000 of his men.

Hazael taking advantage of his subjects' disaffection owing to their defeats, murdered Benhadad (2 Kings viii. 10-15, 1 Kings xix. 15). HAZAEL [see] was defeated by Assyria in his turn, with great loss, at Antilibanus; but repulsed Ahaziah's and Jehoram's attack on Israel (2 Kings viii. 28), ravaged Gilead, the land of Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh (x. 32, 33); took also Gath, and was only diverted from Jerusalem by Jehoshaphat giving the royal and the temple treasures (xii. 17, 18). Benhadad his son continued to exercise a lordship over Israel (xiii. 3-7, 22) at first; but Joash, Jehoshaphat's son, beat him thrice, according to Elisha's dying prophecy (ver. 14-19), for "the Lord had compassion on His people . . . because of His covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, neither cast He them from His presence as yet" (ver. 23). Jeroboam II., Joash's son, further "recovered D. and Hamath, which belonged to Judah, for Israel . . . according to the word of the Lord . . . by Jonah the prophet" (xiv. 23-28), 836 B.C.

Rezin of D., a century later, in a respite from the Assyrian invasions, allied himself to Pekah of Israel against Judah, with a view to depose AHAZ [see] and set up one designated "the son of Tabeal." The successive invasions of Pul and Tiglath Pileser suggested the thought of combining Syria, Israel, and Judah as a joint power against Assyria. Ahaz' leaning to Assyria made him obnoxious to Syria and Israel. But, as their counsel was contrary to God's counsel that David's royal line should continue until Immanuel, it came to nought (2 Kings xv. 19, 29, 37, xvi. 5; Isa. vii. 1-6). Elath on the shore of the Red Sea, in Edom, built by Azariah of Judah on territory alleged to be Syrian, was "recovered" by Rezin. Whereupon Ahaz begged Assyria's alliance; and the very policy of D. and Israel against Assyria, viz. to absorb Judah, was the very means of causing their own complete absorption by Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 6-9, xvii.; Isa. vii. 14-25, viii. 6-10, x. 9). The people of D. were carried captive to Kir, as Amos (i. 5) foretold, the region from which they originally came, associated with Elam (Isa. xxii. 6), probably in Lower Mesopotamia=Kish or Cush, i.e. eastern Ethiopia, the Cissia of Herodotus (G. Rawlinson). Isaiah (xvii. 1) and Amos (i. 4) had prophesied that D. should be "taken away from being a city, and should be a ruinous heap," that Jehovah should "send a fire into the house of Hazael, which should devour the palaces of Benhadad"; and Jeremiah (xlix. 24, 25) that "D. is waxed feeble. . . . How is the city of praise not left, the city of my joy!"

By the time of the Medo-Persian supremacy D. had not only been rebuilt, but was the most famous city in Syria (Strabo, xvi. 2.19). In Paul's time (2 Cor. xi. 32) it was part of ARETAS' [see] kingdom. It is still a city of 150,000 inhabitants, of whom about 130,000 are Mahometans, 15,000 Christians, and about 5000 Jews.

D. was the centre through which the trade of Tyre passed on its way to Assyria, Palmyra, Babylon, and the East. It supplied "white wool and the wive of Helbon" (in Antilebanon, 10 miles N.W. of D.) in return for "the wares of Tyre's making" (Ezek. xxvii. 18). Its once famous damask and steel were not manufactured till Mahometan times, and are no longer renowned. The street called "Straight" is still there, leading from one gate to the pasha's palace, i.e. from E. to W. a mile long; it was originally divided by Corinthian colonnades into three avenues, of which the remains are still traced (Acts ix. 11); called by the natives "the street of bazaars." The traditional localities of Acts ix. 3, 25, 2 Cor. xi. 33 (Paul's conversion on his way to D., and his subsequent escape in a basket let down from the wall) are more than doubtful. Nowes-Sham, "The East." Magnus was its bishop at the council of Nice, A.D. 325. The khalif Omar A.D. 635 took it. It fell into the hands of the Turks, its present masters, under Selim I., A.D. 1516.

Dan=judge. Jacob's fifth son, Bilhah's (maid of Rachel) first (Gen. xxx. 6), own brother to Naphtali. The female corresponding name is Dinah (judgment). Rachel's exclamation originated the name, "God hath judged me," i.e. vindicated my cause by giving me a son. Jacob on his deathbed said, "D. shall judge his people as one of the tribes of Israel" (xlix. 16), i.e., having the full tribal standing as much as Leah's descendants. [See CONCURRING.] The judgeship of Samson may also be a fulfilment of Jacob's words (Jud. xv. 20). Hushim (the plural implying a family) or Shinham alone is mentioned as D.'s son (Gen. xli. 23); but at the exodus the tribe stood second of Israel in numbers (Num. i. 39), 62,700; 64,400 at the close of the wilderness sojourn (xxvi. 43). It occupied the N. side of the tabernacle, the hindmost in the march (ii. 25, 31; x. 25), with Asher and Naphtali. Of D. was Ahiohiab, associated with Bezaleel, in the construction of the tabernacle. (Exod. xxxi. 6, etc.)

Its allotment was on the coast W. of Judah and Benjamin, S. of Ephraim, N. of Simeon; small, but most choice, extending from Joppa on the N. to Ekron on the S., 14 miles long, part of the shephelah (or vale sweeping along the whole coast, the N. part of which is Sbaron). The powerful Philistines near them drove them partly towards the mountainous region bordering on Judah, so as to encroach on Judah's towns, Zorah and Eshtaol and Ir-shemesh or Beth-shemesh; comp. Josh. xv. 33 with xix. 41. The Amorites previously "would not suffer them to come down into the valley" (Jud. i. 34). Hence Samson resides at Mahaneh-Dan (the camp of D.) in the hills, between Zorah and Eshtaol, behind Kirjath Jearim, and thence "comes down" to the vineyards of Timnath and the valley of Sorek. There too was his final resting place (Jud. xiii. 25; xiv. 1, 5, 19; xvi. 4, 31; xviii. 12). The Phœnician king Esmonazar made this rich plain his prize long after, as an inscription records if rightly deciphered. In Josh. xix. 47, "the coast of D. went out (too little) for them," rather "went out from them" (Heb. megeh), i.e. to a distance from their original allotment, viz. to Leshem or Laish, (which 600 of their warriors armed went forth from Zorah and Eshtaol to seize on, in the far N.) and named D. after their father, at the W. source of the Jordan, four miles W. of Pnass. Thrice stress is laid on the 600 being "appointed with weapons of war" (Jud. xviii. 11, 16, 17), for the Philistines deprived all Israelites they could of arms, so that we find Samson using as his only weapon an ass's jawbone (1 Sam. xiii. 19-21). Hence, as being so occupied with the Philistine warfare, Danites were not among Barak's and Deborah's helpers against Sisera (Jud. iv., v. 17, where allusion occurs to D.'s possession of the only Israelite port, "Why did D. remain in ships?").

The N. Danites of Laish (named by them D.) carried with them Micah the Ephraimite's Levitical family priest (Jud. xvii., xviii.) and graven image, which they worshipped "until the day of the captivity of the land" (ver. 30, 31), i.e. till the Israelite reverse whereby the Philistines carried away the ark; what aggravated their idolatry was it was at the very time "that the house of God was in Shiloh," within their reach. This probably suggested the city Dan to Jeroboam as one of the two seats of the golden calf worship (1 Kings xii. 29).

D.'s genealogy is not given in 1 Chron. ii. to xii. Its unsettled state and its connection with the far N. Dan, the headquarters of idolatry, may have caused the loss of the genealogy. D. is omitted among the sealed in Rev. vii. as having been the first to lapse into idolatry, for which cause Ephraim also is omitted (Jud. xvii., Hos. iv. 17) and Joseph substituted. Arctias of the 10th century suggests that D.'s omission is because Antichrist is to be from him, or else to be his tool (comp. Gen. xlix. 17, Jer. viii. 16, Amos viii. 14), as there was a Judas among the twelve.

Jacob's prophecy, "D. shall be a serpent in the way, . . . that biteth the horse heels, so that his rider shall fall backward," alludes primarily to D.'s local position in front of the royal Judah; so ready to meet the horse, forbidden in Israelite warfare, with the watchword "I have waited for Thy salvation," and to fall unawares on the advancing enemy by the way. D.'s mode of warfare is illustrated in its attack on the men of Laish, "careless, quiet, and secure," as also in their great judge Samson's mode of attack, watching for an opportunity and striking an unlooked for, stealthy, sudden blow. Mainly perhaps he by the Spirit has in view the old serpent which was to "bruise the heel" of the promised Saviour (Gen. iii. 15), but ultimately to have its head bruised by Him; therefore he adds the desire of all believers, "I have waited for Thy salvation," which abrupt exclamation is thus clearly accounted for.

Dan. The city at the northern bound of Israel, as Beersheba was the southern, so that "from D. even to Beersheba" (Jud. xx. 1, etc., and latterly, 1 Chron. xxi. 2, "from Beersheba even to D.") expresses the whole country. Originally Leshem or Laish, see above. "Far from Zidon, in the valley that lieth by Beth Rehob," but belonging to Zidon, as their living "after the manner of the Zidonians" implies; they were too far off for Zidon to help them when attacked by the Danites (Jud. xviii. 7, 28). Already in Abraham's time the spot was called by him D., the scene of God's "judgment" on Chedorlaomer and the invaders (Gen. xiv. 14; comp. Isa. xli. 1-3). But its ordinary name was even then Lasha or Laish, the north eastern bound of Canaan, as Sodom was the southwestern bound (Gen. x. 19). This too would be an additional reason for the Danites naming their city close by Abraham's camping ground, D. The repetition thrice of "the city" (Jud. xviii. 28, 29) marks that there was already another application of the name "Dan," viz. to Abraham's camping ground (comp. Dent. xxxiv. 1).

Le Clerc suggests that the fountain was called Dan, "judge," as Ain-mishpat means "the fount of justice." The city was smitten by Benhadad (1 Kings xv. 20, the last place of mentioning it). Now Tel-el-Kady (the Arabic equivalent to Dan), "the judge's mound," whose long level top is strewn with ruins, probably those of D. From its foot gushes out one of the largest fountains in the world, the main source of the Jordan, called el Led-dan, a corruption of D., and the stream from it Nahr el Dahn; all these names confirming Le Clerc's view. The land is truly "a large land, where there is no want of anything that is on the earth" (Jud. xviii. 10).

In 1 Kings vii. 13, 14, Hiram the worker in brass is said to be of Naphthali; but in 2 Chron. ii. 13, 14, he is called "son of a woman of D." As the "outgoings" of Naphthali were at Jordan, the city D. probably was in the tribe of Naphthali. So she dwelt in Naphthali, but was by birth of the Danite colony there. An undesigned mark of truth. The seeming discrepancy, thus cleared, powerfully disproves the possibility of collusion, and shows the witness of Kings and of Chronicles to be mutually independent and true.

A place in S. Arabia whence the Phœnicians obtained wrought iron, cassia, and calamus (Ezek. xxvii. 19). "D. also." As none of the other places begin with "also" (Heb. ve), Fairbairn translates Edon the modern Aden, near the straits of Babelmandeb. Ptolemy mentions a Dana. But probably, as Judah is mentioned in ver. 17, so Dan in ver. 19 represents northern Israel. Sailors from ports of Dan, with descendants of Javan, traded in the fairs of Tyre, "going to and fro."

Dan-Jaan. 2 Sam. xxiv. 6. Visited by Joab in taking the census for David; lying on the route between Gilead and Zidon. LXX. and Vulg. read "Dan in the wood" (Dan-jaur), answering to the country about Tel-el-Kady. Daol-jaan, a Phœnician god's name, is found upon coins. The Dan forming the northern bound of Israel at the sources of the Jordan is probably meant.

Dance: machol, lit. moving or leaping in a circle. Gesenius however translates machalath "a stringed instrument," and machol "dancing." Mendelssohn makes machol "a hollow musical instrument" (Ps. cl. 4 marg.) Expressing joy, as contrasted with mourning (Eccles. iii. 4, Ps. xxx. 11). The woman nearest of kin to the champion in some national triumph or thanksgiving, and who had a kind of public character with her own sex, led a choir of women; as Miriam (Exod. xv. 1, 20) (whilst Moses led the men), Jephthah's daughter (Jud. xi. 34), Deborah (Jud. v.) (whilst Barak led the men). Some song or refrain in antiphonal answer, forming the burden of the song, accompanied the dance (Exod. xxxii. 18, 19; 1 Sam. xvii. 7, xxi. 11). The women are represented as "coming out" to do this and meet the hero. Miriam went out before "Jehovah, the Man of war" (Exod. xv. 3, 20, 21), and answered the entire chorus. But the women glorifying Saul and David, having no leader, "answered one another." The peculiar feature of David's conduct before the returning ark (2 Sam. vi. 5-22) is that he was choir leader, the women with their timbrels (ver. 5, 19, 20, 22) taking a prominent part. Michal ought to have led them; but jealousy of David's other wives, married whilst she was with Phaltiel, and attachment to the latter (2 Sam. iii. 15, 16), and the feeling that David's zeal rebuked her apathy, led her to "come out to meet" him with sneers not songs. The dance necessitated his taking off his royal upper robes to "dance with all his might." This she called "uncovering himself in the eyes of the handmaids." His leading thought was to do honour to God who had delivered him from all his enemies (1 Chron. xiii. 8, xvi.; 2 Sam. vi. 21-23).

TIMBREL.

Enthusiasm was kindled by these religious dances, which enlisted at once the tongue and the other members of the body in acts of worship; which explains Ps. xxv. 10. David says, "All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto Thee?" the very language that the Israelites, whilst the women danced to the Lord, uttered as their song after the Red Sea deliverance (Exod. xv. 11). The dance however was generally left to women (Jud. xxi. 19-23). It is mentioned as a censure on their looseness that "the people rose up to play" at Aaron's calf festival (Exod. xxxii. 6, 1 Cor. x. 7), also that the Amalekites were "dancing" (1 Sam. xxx. 16). The woman leader usually in the East leads off the dance, and the other women exactly follow her graceful movements. In S. of Sol. vi. 13 allusion possibly is made in the "two armies" to two rows of female dancers vis-a-vis in performing; but the spiritual sense refers to the two parts of the one church army, the militant and the triumphant.

Dancing accompanied festivity of a secular kind (Jer. xxxi. 4, 13; Lam. v. 15; Luke xv. 25), especially that of women and children (Job xxi. 11, Matt. xi. 17). Dancing by men and women together was unknown; as indeed the oriental seclusion of women from men would alone have sufficed to make it seem indecorous. Maimonides says that in the joyous feast of tabernacles the women danced separately in an apartment above, the men below. Herod's extravagant promise to Herodias' daughter shows that it was an accomplishment rare in those regions (Mark vi. 22, 23).

Daniel, i.e. God is my judge; or as others, the judge of God, as his Chaldean name Belteshazzar means the prince of Bel. Probably of the blood royal; comp. i. 3 with 1 Chron. iii. 1, whence it appears he bore the same name as David's son by Abigail (who is called Chileab in 2 Sam. iii. 3 = like his father). Carried to Babylon in Nebuchadnezzar's first deportation of captives, in the fourth (Jer. xxv. 1, xvi. 2) or third (Dan. i. 1 counting only complete years) year of Jehoiakim, the first of Nebuchadnezzar (acting under Nabopolassar in the last year of the latter's reign, but reigning alone not until the year after, as Dan. ii. 1 proves, for after D.'s three years' training the year is nevertheless called the "second" of Nebuchadnezzar, i.e. of his sole reign).

D. was put in training with three others of the royal seed, still "children" (i. 4), according to eastern etiquette, to become courtiers; and to mark his new position he received a Babylonian name, Belteshazzar (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 34, xxiv. 17; Ezra v. 14; Esth. ii. 7). He gave a noble proof of faithfulness combined with wisdom at this early age, by abstaining from the food of the king's table, as being defiled with the idolatry usual at heathen feasts (Dan. i. 8-16), living for ten days' trial on pulse and water, and at the end looking fairer and fatter than those fed on the king's dainties. They who would excel in piety and wisdom must early subject the flesh to the spirit. D. experienced the truth of Deut. viii. 3.

Ezekiel in the early part of his ministry refers to him as a model of "righteousness" and "wisdom" (xiv. 14, 20; xxviii. 3), for not yet had D. become a writer. Noah before and at the flood, Job in the post-diluvian patriarchal age, and D. toward the close of the legal theocracy are made types of "righteousness." So Ezekiel's reference, in what it alleges and in what it omits, exactly tallies with what we should expect, presuming that Ezekiel and D. lived and wrote when and where they are represented. D.'s high position whilst still a mere youth (Dan. i. 3-5, 11-16; ii. 1), at the court of the Jews' conqueror and king, gave them a vivid interest in their illustrious countryman's fame for righteousness and wisdom; for in his person they felt themselves raised from their present degradation. As at the beginning of the covenant people's history their kinsman Joseph, so towards its close D., by the interpretation of dreams (ii. iv.), was promoted to high place in the court of their heathen masters. Thus they both represented Israel's destined calling to be a royal priesthood among the nations, and ultimately to be the bearers of Messiah's light to the whole Gentile world (Rom. xi. 12, 15). D. was made by

BABYLONIAN PRIESTS.

Nebuchadnezzar governor of Babylonia and president of the Babylonian "wise men," not to be confounded with the later Persian magi. Under Belshazzar D. was in a lower office, and was occasionally away from Babylon (Dan. v. 7, 8, 12) at Susa (viii. 2, 27). His interpretation of the mystic handwriting on the wall caused his promotion again, a promotion which continued under Darius and Cyrus. Under Darius he was first of the three presidents of the empire. Envy often follows high office which men so covet; so by a law cunningly extorted by his enemies from the weak Darius, that none should offer petition to man or god except to the king for 30 days, as though it were a test of loyalty, on pain of being cast into a lions' den, D. was cast in and was delivered by God, who thus rewarded his pious faithfulness (vi.). It is an accordance with Medo-Persic ideas which flows from the truth of Scripture, that the mode of capital punishment under the Babylonian rule is represented as burning (iii.), but under the Medo-Persians exposure to wild beasts, for they would have regarded fire as polluted by contact with a corpse, whilst they approved the devouring of bodies by animals.

Berosus calls the last Babylonian king Nabonidus, and says that he surrendered to Cyrus in Borsippa, and was assigned an honourable abode in Carmania. Rawlinson has shown that the Babylonian inscriptions at Ur (Unquair) explain the seeming discrepancy. BELSHAZZAR [see] or Bel-shar-zer (on the mother's side descended from Nebuchadnezzar, v. 11) was joint king with his father; having shut himself up in Babylon he fell there whilst his father at Borsippa survived. Berosus as being a Chaldean suppressed all concerning Belshazzar, since it was to the national dishonour. Had D.'s book been a late one, he would have copied Berosus; if it had been at variance with that prevalent in Babylonia, the Jews there would have rejected it. His mention of Darius the Mede's reign, which profane history ignores (probably because it was eclipsed by Cyrus' glory), shows that he wrote as a contemporary historian of events which he knew, and did not borrow from others. He must have been about 84 years old when he saw the visions (x.-xii.) concerning his people, extending down to the resurrection and the last days. Though advanced years forbid his return to the Holy Land, yet his people's interests were always nearest his heart (ix., x. 12). His last recorded vision was in the third year of Cyrus (534 B.C.), on the banks of the Tigris (Hiddekel) : x. 1-4.

In iii. 2, Heb. for "princes," Nebuchadnezzar summons his satraps (achashdarpni, Persian khshtropa). Some allege that D. erroneously attributes to the Babylonians the satrapial form of government. But Gedaliah was virtually a satrap under Nebuchadnezzar in Judea, i.e. a governor over a province, instead of its being left under the native kings (2 Kings xxv. 23). Berosus speaks of Nabopolassar's "satrap of Egypt, Coelosyria, and Phœnicia." D. writing for Jews under Persia at the time uses naturally the familiar Persian term "satrap" instead of the corresponding Babylonian term. [On D.'s representation of the relation of the Medes to the Persians and Darius the Mede (possibly = Astyages, or his son, the former of whom Cyrus deposed and treated kindly) to Cyrus, see CYRUS.]

The objection to D. on the ground that Susa, or at least its palace, was not built when D. saw the vision there, rests on Pliny alone, who alleges it to have been built by Darius Hystaspis. But the Assyrian inscriptions prove it was one of the most ancient Mesopotamian cities, and its palace (the Meannium is the name the Greeks give it) famous centuries before D. Darius Hystaspes was only the first to build at Susa a palace in Persian fashion.

D., like Moses, was trained in all the learning of the world; his political experience moreover, as a minister of state under successive dynasties of the great world powers, gave the natural qualifications to which God added supernatural spiritual insight, enabling him to characterize to the life the several world monarchies which bore or were to bear sway until Messiah's kingdom shall come with power. Personal purity and self-restraint amidst the world's corrupting luxuries (Dan. i. 8-16; comp. Moses, Heb. xi. 25; Joseph, Gen. xxix. 9); faithfulness to God at all costs, and fearless witnessing for God before great men (Dan. v. 17-23), unbridled by lure and unawed by threats (vi. 10, 11); the holiest and most single-minded patriotism which with burning prayers interceded for his chastened countrymen (ix.); intimate communion with God, so that, like the beloved disciple and apostle, the seer of the N. T., John, D. also is called "a man greatly beloved," and thence, by the angel of the Lord (ix. 23, x. 11), and received the exactest disclosure of the date of Messiah's advent, the 70 weeks of years, and the successive events down to the Lord's final advent for the deliverance of His people: these are all prominent characteristics of this man of God.

It is not stated in chap. iii. why D. was not among the rulers summoned to worship Nebuchadnezzar's golden image. Perhaps he was on state business in some distant part of the empire where the summons had not time to reach him. The Jews' enemies found it more politic to attack first the three nearer at hand before proceeding to attack D. the most influential. The king too, regarding him as Divine (ii. 46), forbore to summon him to worship the image, the self-deifying formation and setting up of which D.'s own interpretation probably had suggested unintentionally to Nebuchadnezzar (ii. 37-39).

As chaps. ii. and vii. go together, so iii. and vi., iv. and v.; the pair iii. and vi. shows God's nearness to save His saints, if faithful, just when they are on the point of being crushed by the world power. The pair iv. and v. shows God's power to humble the world power in the height of its impious arrogance; first Nebuchadnezzar, whose coming hypochondriacal exile among the beasts D. foretells with fidelity and tenderness; then Belshazzar, whose blasphemy he more sternly reproves. As Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego refuse positive homage to the world power's image, so D. refuses it even negative homage by omitting even for a few days worship to Jehovah. Jehovah's power manifested for the saints against the world first in individual histories (iii., vi.) is exhibited next in worldwide prophetic pictures (ii. and vii.). God manifested His irresistible power in D. and his friends, as representing the theocracy then depressed, before the heathen king who deemed himself Divine. Thus God secured the heathen's respect for His covenant people which found its culmination in Cyrus' decree for their restoration and the rebuilding of the temple of Jehovah, whom he confessed to be preeminently "THE God of heaven" (Ezra i. 1-4).

Ezra viii. 2 and Neh. x. 6 mention another Daniel, Ithamar's descendant. BOOK OF DANIEL. Authenticity. That D. composed it is testified by vii. 1, 28; viii. 2; ix. 2; x. 1, 2; xii. 4, 5. In the first six chaps., which are historical, he does not mention himself in the first person, for in these the events, not the person, are prominent (comp. Isa. vii. 3, xx. 2). In the last six, which are prophetical, wherein his Divine commission needed to be shown, he comes forward personally as the writer. Being a "seer," having the gift and spirit, not the theoretical office and work, of a prophet, his book stands in the third rank in the Hebrew canon, viz. in the Hagiographa (Chethubim) between Esther and Ezra, the three relating to the captivity. Its position there, not among the prophets as one would expect, shows it was not an interpolation of later times, but deliberately placed where it is by Ezra and the establishers of the Jewish canon. D. was "the politician, chronologer, and historian among the prophets" (Bengel). Similarly, the psalms, though largely prophetic, are ranked with the Hagiographa not the prophets. He does not, as they writing amidst the covenant people do, make God's people the foreground; but writing in a heathen court he makes the world kingdoms the foreground, behind which he places the kingdom of God, destined ultimately to be all in all. His book written amidst heathen isolation is the O. T. Apocalypse, as the Revelation of John written in the lonely Patmos is the N. T. Apocalypse; the two respectively stand apart, his from the prophets, John's from the epistles.

Porphry in the third century A.D. assailed the book of D. as a forgery in the time of the Maccabees, 170-164 B.C. But the forgery of a prophecy, if D. were spurious, would never have been received by the Jews from an age when confessedly there were no prophets. Antiochus Epiphanes' history and attack on the holy people are so accurately detailed (Dan. xi.) that Porphry thought they must have been written after the event. But Zechariah, Ezra, and Nehemiah allude to it; Jesus in His peculiar designation "the Son of man" (Matt. xxiv. 30, comp. Dan. vii. 13) refers to it, and especially in the crisis of His trial when adured by the living God (Matt. xxvi. 64), and stamps him authoritatively as "the prophet D." and ratifies his particular prophecies (Matt. xxiv. 15, 21; comp. Dan. xii. 1, etc.). Luke i. 19-26 mentions Gabriel, whose name occurs elsewhere in Scripture only in Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21. The prophecies tally with those in Revelation. The judgment of the world given to the saints, and the destruction of the blasphemous king at the Lord's coming, (Dan. vii. 8, 25; xi. 36) foretold by D., are further unfolded by Paul (1 Cor. vi. 2, 2 Thess. ii. 3-12). The deliverances from fire and lions (Dan. ii. and vi.) are referred to in Heb. xi. 33, 34. Thus the N. T. attests (Dan. ii., iii., vi., vii., xi.) expressly on the three points to which rationalists object, viz. the predictions, the miracles narrated, and the manifestations of angels. The former part also is referred to by Christ, viz. as to "the stone" smiting the image (ii. 34, 35, 44, 45), in Matt. xxi. 44. The miracles, like those of Moses in Egypt, were designed to show to the seemingly victorious world power the really superior might of the seemingly prostrate kingdom of God, and so to encourage the captive Jews to patient trustfulness in God. What completely disproves Porphry's theory is, 1 Mace. (i. 24; ix. 27, 40) refers to D. as an accredited book, and even to LXX. version of it; comp. Dan. xi. 26 (LXX. xii. 1). D.'s place in the LXX. shows it was received by the Jews before the Maccabean times. What a strange testimony then does Porphry unwillingly bear to the Divine inspiration of the book! the events so minutely fulfilling the prophecies about Antiochus that it might be supposed to be a history of the past instead of, as it is proved to be, a prediction of events then future.

Josephus (Ant. vii. 11, § 8) records that Alexander the Great had designed to punish the Jews for their fidelity to Darius; but Jaddua (332 B.C.) the highpriest, at the head of a procession, met him and averted his wrath by showing him D.'s prophecy that a Grecian monarch should overthrow Persia (viii. 5-8). Josephus' statement, if true, accounts for the fact that Alexander favoured the Jews; it certainly proves that the Jews of Josephus' time believed in the existence of D.'s book in Alexander's time long before the Maccabees.

With Jaddua, highpriest 341-322 B.C., the O. T. history ends (Neh. xii. 11). As this was long after Nehemiah, who died about 400 B.C., the register of priests and Levites must have been inserted in Nehemiah with Divine sanction subsequently. The language of D. from the 4th ver. of chap. ii. to the end of chap. vii. is Chaldee, the world empire's language, the subject here being about the world at large. The rest is Heb. generally, as the subject concerns the Jews and their ultimately restored theocratic kingdom. D.'s circumstances exactly tally to this, he being Hebrew by birth and still keeping up intercourse with Hebrews, and at the same time Chaldee by residence and associations. The union of the two languages in one book would be as unnatural to one in a later age, and therefore not similarly circumstanced, as it is natural to D. D.'s Heb. is closely like that of Ezekiel and Habakkuk, that is, just those prophets living nearest the assumed age of D. The Aramaic, like Ezra's, is of an earlier form than in any other Chaldaic document.

Two predictions establish D.'s prophetic character, and that the events foretold extend to subsequent ages. (1) That the four world monarchies should rise (ii., vii.), Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, and that Rome in a tenfold divided form should be the last, and should be overthrown by Messiah's kingdom alone; Charlemagne, Charles V., and Napoleon have vainly tried to raise a fifth. (2) The time of Messiah's advent dating from the foretold decree to restore the temple, His being cut off, and the city's destruction, are foretold definitely. "He who denies D.'s prophecies undermines Christianity, which is founded on D.'s prophecies concerning Christ" (Sir Isaac Newton).

The vision mode of revelation, which is the exception in other prophets, is the rule in D. and in Zech. i.-vi. A new stage in the theocracy begins with the captivity. Hence arose the need for miracles to mark the new era. National miracles in Egypt, the wilderness, and Canaan marked the beginning of the theocracy or outwardly manifested kingdom of God. Personal miracles mark the beginning of the church, the spiritual kingdom of God, coming not with outward observation in "the times of the Gentiles," which began from the captivity. Originally Abraham was raised out of the "sea" (Dan. vii. 2) of nations as an island holy to God, and his seed chosen as God's mediator of His revelation of love to mankind. Under David and Solomon the theocracy attained its O. T. climax, being not only independent but ruling the surrounding heathen; so this period was made type of the Messianic (as it ultimately shall be manifested). But when God's people rested on the world powers the instrument of their sin was made the instrument of their punishment. So the ten tribes' kingdom, Israel, fell by Assyria (722 B.C.), on whom it had leaned, and Judah similarly by Babylon (Ezek. xxiii.). The theocracy, in the strict sense of the manifested kingdom of God on earth, has ceased since the Babylonian exile, and shall only be resumed with a glory vastly exceeding the former at the millennium (Rev. xi. 15, xx.).

D.'s position in the Babylonian court answers to the altered relations of the theocracy and the world power; see above. He represents the covenant nation in exile, and in subjection to the world power externally. But his heavenly insight into dreams which baffle the Chaldeans' lore represents the covenant people's inner superiority to their heathen lords. His high dignities in the world typify the ultimate giving of the earth kingdom "to the people of the saints of the Most High" (Dan. vii. 27). Thus his personal history is the basis of his prophecy.

Chaps. ii.-vii. represent the world powers developed historically; viii.-xii. their development in relation to Israel. The period of D.'s prophecies is that from the downfall of the theocracy to its final restoration; it is the period of the world's outward supremacy, "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24; Dan. ix. 27, xii. 7), not set aside by Christ's first coming (John xviii. 36, Matt. iv. 8-10); for Satan yet is "prince of this world," and Israel has been depressed and Judah's kingdom prostrate ever since the Babylonian captivity. But His second advent shall usher in the restored Israelite theocracy and His worldwide manifested kingdom.

In chap. ii. the world kingdoms are seen by the heathen king in their outward unity and glory, yet without life, a metal colossus; in chap. vii. they appear to the prophet of God in their real character as instinct with life, but mere beast life, terrible animal power, but no true manhood; for true manhood can only be realized by conscious union with God, in whose image man was made. The Son of God as "the Son of man" is the true ideal Standard and Head of humanity. [See BEAST.] In Rev. iv., v., the four cherubim are "living creatures," not "beasts" as A. V. The "beast" (therion) appears in Rev. xiii., xiv., xvii., xix., as in Dan. vii., viii. When Nebuchadnezzar glorified and deified self, becoming severed from God, he became beast-like and consorted with the beasts, that look downward to the earth, having lost his true humanity; but when "he lifted up his eyes to heaven" his understanding returned, and he blessed the Most High, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion" (iv. 28-34). Nebuchadnezzar's degradation, repentance, and restoration contrast strikingly with Belshazzar's sacrilegious luxury and consequent doom; and D. develops definitely the prophetic germs already existing as to Messiah (vii., ix.), the resurrection (xii. 2, 3), and the ministry of angels (viii. 16, x., xi. 1).

The "seventy weeks" (ix. 24) probably date from 457 B.C., when Ezra (vii.) in the 7th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus returned to Jerusalem empowered to restore the temple and the national polity, 13 years before the rebuilding of Jerusalem by Nehemiah, who carried out the commission of Ezra, which virtually included the rebuilding of the city.

457 B.C. (the A.D. dating four years after Christ's actual birth.)

30 A.D. the crucifixion.

3½ years, afterwards, of gospel preaching to the Jews only.

So Jeremiah's foretold 70 years of the captivity begin 606 B.C., 18 years before the actual destruction of Jerusalem, when Judah's independent theocracy ceased, Jehoiakim being put in fetters by Nebuchadnezzar. The seventy weeks of years are divided into 7, 62, and 1. The 70th one week, the period of N. T. revelation in Messiah, consummates the preceding ones, as the sabbath succeeds and crowns the work days. The Messianic time (seven years) is the sabbath of Israel's history, in which it had the offer of all God's mercies, but was cut off temporarily for rejecting them. The seven weeks or sevens in the beginning, i.e. 49 years, answer to the period closing O. T. revelation, viz. that of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Malachi. The 62 are the intermediate period of 434 years between the seven and the one, and in them was no revelation; in all 490 years. The closing one week (or seven years) includes the 3½ years of Jesus' own preaching to the Jews, and 3½ of the apostles' preaching to the Jews only; then the persecution as to Stephen drove the evangelists from Jerusalem to Samaria. The universal expectation of a Saviour existed even in the Gentile world at the very time He came; doubtless due to D.'s prophecy carried far and wide by the Jews (Tacitus, Hist., v. 13; Suetonius, Vespasian iv.). Jerusalem was not actually destroyed till A.D. 70, but virtually and theoretically was "dead" A.D. 33, 3½ years after Christ's death, having failed to use that respite of grace (Luke viii. 7-9). Gen. ii. 17, in the day that Adam sinned he died, though his actual death was long subsequent. Hos. xiii. 1, 2: Jerusalem's destruction by Titus only consummated the removal of the kingdom of God from Israel to the Gentiles, which took place at the scattering of the disciples from Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 43), to be restored at Christ's second advent, when Israel shall head the nations (xxiii. 29; Acts i. 6, 7; Rom. xi. 25-31, xv.).

Dannah. A city in the mountains of Judah, S.W. of Hebron (Josh. xv. 49). Identified by Conder (Pal. Expl.) with Dameh, two miles N. of Dhoeh-riyeh (Delir).

Dara, Darda. 1 Chron. ii. 6, 1 Kings iv. 31. One of the four noted for wisdom, but excelled by Solomon (1 Kings iv. 31), sons of Zerach, of Pharez' distinguished family of Judah. [See CALCOL.] "Sons of Mahol" probably mean "sons of the choir," i.e. the famous musicians of whom Ethan and Heman are named in the titles Ps. lxxxviii, lxxxix. As "son" is often used for descendant, even if Mahol be a proper name their being called "sons of Mahol" in 1 Kings iv, but "sons of Zerub" in 1 Chron. ii. 6, is no objection to their identity.

Daric. A gold coin current in Palestine after the return from Babylon.

The Persian kings issued it; the obverse having the king with bow and javelin or dagger, the reverse a square; 128 grains Troy. Ezra ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70-72; 1 Chron. xxix. 7, "dracms" A.V. Derived from Darius the Mede, or else dara a king, the regal coin (comp. our "crown"). The Gr. drachm, our dram, is akin.

PERSIAN DARIC.

Darius. A common name of several Medo-Persian kings, from a Persian root dareesh, "restraint;" Sanskrit dhari, "firmly holding." 1. D. the Mede. [See DANIEL, BABYLON, BELSHAZZAR, and CYRUS.] Dan. v. 31, vi. 1, ix. 1, xi. 1. This D. "received the kingdom" (v. 31) of Babylon as viceroy from Cyrus, according to G. Rawlinson, which may be favoured by ix. 1: "D. the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans." He in this view gave up the kingdom to his superior Cyrus, after holding it from 535 to 536 B.C. Abydenus makes Nebuchadnezzar prophesy that a Persian and a Mede, "the pride of the Assyrians," should take Babylon, i.e. a prince who had ruled over the Medes and Assyrians. Cyrus, having taken such a prince 20 years before Babylon's capture, advanced him to be deputy king of Babylon. Hence he retained the royal title and is called "king" by Daniel. Thus Astyages (the last king of the Medes, and having no issue according to Herodotus, i. 73, 109, 127) will be this D., and Ahasuerus (Achashverosh) = Cyaxares (Huwakshatra), father of Astyages. Eschylus (Persæ, 766, 767) represents Cyaxares as the first founder of the empire and a Mede, and Sir H. Rawlinson proves the same in opposition to Herodotus. Eschylus describes Cyaxares' son as having "a mind guided by wisdom"; this is applicable both to D. in Dan. vi. 1-3, and to Astyages in Herodotus. The chronology however requires one junior to Astyages to correspond to D. the Mede and Cyrus' viceroy, whether a son or one next in succession after Astyages, probably Cyaxares. Harporation makes him to have introduced the coin named from him the daric. Xenophon's account of Cyaxares agrees remarkably with Daniel's account of D. Xenophon says Cyrus conquered Babylon by Cyaxares' permission, and appointed for him a royal palace and rule and home there (see Dan. vi. 1, 23; ix. 1; v. 31). Daniel's statement that D. was 62 years old accords with Xenophon that when Cyaxares gave Cyrus his daughter he gave him along with her the Median kingdom, himself having no male heir, and being so old as not to be likely to have a son. D.'s weakness in yielding to his nobles (Dan. vi.) accords with Xenophon's picture of Cyaxares' sensuality. The shortness of his reign and the eclipsing brilliancy of Cyrus' capture of Babylon caused Herodotus and Berosus to pass D. unnoticed. Cyaxares is the Median weakshatra, "autocrat," answering to D. the Persian, Darjavousch "the ruler;" kschaja, "kingdom," is the root in the Persian Ahasuerus, Kschajarscha, and the Median Astyages.

2. D., son of Hyastaspes, fifth from Achæmenes, who founded the Persian dynasty. The Magian Pseudo-Smerdis [ARTAXERXES, see; Ezra iv. 7] usurped the throne, pretending to be Cyrus' younger son. As he restored the Magian faith, effecting a religious as well as political revolution, he readily gave ear to the enemies of the Jews whose restorer Cyrus had been (Ezra iv. 7-24). D. Hyastaspes with six Persian chiefs overthrew the impostor and became king 521 B.C. As soon as D. was on the throne the Jews treated Smerdis' edict as null and void. This bold step is accounted for by D.'s own inscription at Behistun stating that in his zeal for Zoroastrianism he reversed Smerdis' policy, "rebuilding the temples which the Magian had destroyed and restoring the religious chants and worship which he had abolished." The Jews so counted on his sympathy as not to wait for his express edict. Their enemies, hoping that Smerdis had destroyed Cyrus' decree, informed the king of the Jews' proceeding and proposed that the archives at Babylon should be searched to see whether Cyrus had ever really given such a decree. It was found at Ecbatana. In his second year Haggai (i. 1, ii. 1, 10) and Zechariah (iii. iv., vii. 1-3) the prophets encouraged Zerubbabel and Jeshua to resume the building of the temple that had been discontinued (Ezra v.). Tatnai and Shethar Boznai's effort to hinder it only occasioned the ratification of Cyrus' original decree by D. D. in his decree in Ezra (vi.) writes as might have been expected from the Zoroastrian D. of secular history; he calls the Jews' temple "the house of God," Jehovah "the God of heaven," and solicits their prayers "for the life of the king and of his sons." Herodotus (vii. 2) confirms the fact that he had sons when he ascended the throne. His curse (ver. 12) on those who injure the temple answers to that on those who should injure the inscriptions at Behistun, and his threat of impaling such (ver. 11) answers to the Behistun and Herodotus (iii. 159) record of the ordinary punishment he inflicted. The "tribute" (ver. 8) too he was the first to impose on the provinces (Herodotus, iii. 89). In four years it was completed, i.e. in the sixth year of D., (Ezra vi. 15) 516 B.C. In this same year he suppressed with severity a Babylonian revolt. He reduced under his supremacy Thrace, Macedon, and the islands in the Ægean Sea, 513-505 B.C. Invading Greece he was defeated at Marathon 500. Before he could renew the campaign, with preparations completed he died 485 B.C.

3. D. the Persian (Neh. xii. 11, 22). As "Jaddua" was highpriest at the invasion of Alexander the Great, D. III., Codomanus, his enemy (336-330 B.C.), last king of Persia, is meant. D. II., or Nothus, king from 424 to 405 B.C., would be meant if Nebemiah were the writer; but it is more likely he was not, and that the continuation of the register down to Alexander's contemporary, Jaddua, is inserted by a later hand.

Darkness. The ninth Egyptian plague (Exod. x. 21, etc.). Especially calculated to allude the Egyptians who worshipped Ra, the sun god. Its sudden and intense coming when Moses stretched out his hand marked it as supernatural. Its basis was natural, viz. the chamsin or sandstorm (see LXX.), from the S.W. desert. It produces a darkness denser than the densest fog, so that no man rises from his place; men and beasts hide till it is over, for it penetrates even through well closed windows. This explains the peculiar phrase "darkness which may be felt." What still more marked its judicial character was (comp. Isa. xiii. 9, 10; Joel ii. 31, iii. 15; Matt. xxiv. 29) "the children of Israel had light in their dwellings." The date of Amos viii. 9 coincides with a total eclipse visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon, Feb. 9th, 784 B.C.; the date of Micah iii. 6 with the eclipse June 5th, 716 B.C. (Dionys. Hal., ii. 56); the date of Jer. xiv. 9 with the eclipse Sept. 30th, 610 B.C. (Herodotus, i. 74, 103.)

The darkness over all the land (Judæa) from the sixth to the ninth hour during Christ's crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 45) cannot have been an eclipse, for it would not last three hours, seldom intensely more than six minutes. The eclipse, darkness and earthquake in Bithynia, noted by Phlegon of Tralles, was probably in the year before. This darkness at Christ's crucifixion was nature's sympathy with her suffering Lord; perhaps partly intended by the prophecy Amos viii. 9. As the glory of the Lord shone around the scene of His birth (Luke ii. 9), so a pall of darkness was fitly spread over His dying scene. By the paschal reckoning the moon must then have been at its full, when the sun could not be eclipsed.

Darkness is the image of spiritual ignorance and unbelief (Isa. ix. 2; John i. 5, 13, 19; 1 John ii. 8). "Outer darkness" expresses exclusion from the brightness of the heavenly banquet (Matt. viii. 12). "The works of darkness," i.e. sins (Eph. v. 11). God dwells in thick darkness; i.e., we cannot penetrate the awe-inspiring mysteries of His person and His dealings. But God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all (1 John i. 5, 1 Kings viii. 12, Ps. cxvii. 2).

Darkon, children of, "Servants of Solomon" (Ezra ii. 56, Neh. vii. 58).

Dathan, [See AARON and KORAH.] He and ABIRAM [see], sons of Reuben, conspired with Korah against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. 1, xxvi. 9-11; Dent. xi. 6; Ps. cvi. 17).

Daughter, used also for granddaughter, or female descendant (Gen. xxii. 43, xxvii. 46). "Daughter of Zion," "daughter of Jerusalem" (Isa. xxxvii. 22); i.e., Zion or Jerusalem and her inhabitants, personified poetically as an abstract collective feminine. Hengstenberg takes "daughter of Zion" = Zion, "daughter of Jerusalem" = Jerusalem (comp. Ps. ix. 14). "Daughters of music" (Eccles. xii. 4): songs and instrumental performances sound low to the old (2 Sam. xix. 35); otherwise the voice and ear, the organs which produce and enjoy music. Analogy favours the former view. As the principal city is termed "mother," so its dependent villages are called "daughter towns" (Josh. xv. 45, Heb.).

David = Beloved. His outer life is narrated in the histories of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles; his inner life is unfolded by himself in the Psalms. The verbal coincidences in Psalms and the allusions incidentally to facts which the histories detail are evidently undesigned, and therefore confirm the genuineness of both. The youngest of the eight sons of Jesse of Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvi. 11); great grandson of Ruth and Boaz, "a mighty man of wealth" (Ruth ii. 1; iv. 21, 22). Born, according to the common chronology, 1085 B.C. Began to reign when 50 years of age, but over Judah alone, 1055 B.C. (2 Sam. v. 4, 1 Kings ii. 11, 1 Chron. xxix. 27); over all Israel, seven years and six months later, 1048 B.C. He died in 1015 B.C., 70 years old. In early life he tended Jesse's flocks, thereby being trained for his subsequent career, for he had ample scope for quiet and prayerful meditations, such as Moses had in his 40 years' retirement in Midian before his call to public life, and as Paul had in the Arabian sojourn (Gal. i. 17) before his worldwide ministry. Those who are to be great public men often need first to be men of privacy. His intimate acquaintance with the beauties of nature, alike water, field, hill, and forest below, and the sun, moon, and glorious heavens above, gives colouring to many of his psalms (xxix., viii., xix., etc.). His shepherd life, exposed to wild beasts, yet preserved by God amidst green pastures and still waters, furnishes imagery to Ps. xxii. 20, 21;

xxiii.; vii. 2. His active energies were at the same time exercised in adventures amidst the hills and dales of Judah, in one of which his courage was tested by a close encounter with a lion, and in another with a bear, both of which he slew, grasping the beast by the beard and rescuing a lamb out of his mouth. These encounters nerved him for his first great victory, the turning point of his life, the slaying of Goliath of Gath (1 Sam. xvii. 35). Moreover, his accurate acquaintance with all the hiding places in the cavern-pierced hills, e.g. the cave of Adullam, proved of great service to him afterwards in his pursuit by Saul.

The Bible authorities for his biography are the Davidic psalms and poetic fragments in the histories (2 Sam. i. 19-27; iii. 33, 34; xxii.; xxiii. 1-7); next the chronicles or state annals of D. (1 Chron. xxvii. 24); the book (history) of Samuel the seer, that of Nathan the prophet, and that of Gad the seer (xxix. 29). Jesse had a brother Jonathan whom D. made one of his counsellors (1 Chron. xxvii. 32). Jesse's wife, D.'s mother, is not named; but Nahash her former husband is, by whom she had two daughters, D.'s half sisters: Zeruiah, mother of Abishai, Joab and Asahel; and Abigail, mother of Amasa by Jether or Ithra (1 Chron. ii. 13-17, 2 Sam. xvii. 25). Jesse was an old man when D. was a mere youth (1 Chron. xvii. 12). His sisters were much older than D., so that their children, D.'s nephews, were his contemporaries and companions more than his own brothers. D. shared some of their warlike determined characteristics, but shrank from their stern recklessness of bloodshed in whatever object they sought (2 Sam. iii. 39, xix. 7). His eldest brother, Eliab, behaved unkindly and imperiously toward him when he went like a second Joseph, sent by his father to seek his brethren's welfare (1 Sam. xvii. 17, 18, 28, 29). Eliab's "command," as head of Jesse's sons, was regarded by the rest as authoritative (xx. 29), and the youngest, D., was thought scarcely worth bringing before the prophet Samuel (xvi. 11). Hence he had assigned to him the charge of the flock, ordinarily assigned to the least esteemed of the family, women, and servants, as was the case with Moses, Zipporah, Jacob, Rachel. When D. became king, instead of returning evil for evil he made Eliab head of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. xxvii. 18), Elihu = Eliab. His brother Shimeah had two sons connected with his subsequent history, Jonadab the subtle, bad, selfish adviser of incestuous Amnon (2 Sam. xiii. 3, 32, 33), and Jonathan who slew a giant of Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 21).

Nahash was probably one of the royal family of Ammon, which will account for D.'s friendship with the king of the same name, as also with Shobi, son of Nahash, from both of whom he received "kindness" in distress (2 Sam. x. 2, xvii. 27). Ammon and D. had a common enemy, Saul (1 Sam. xi.); besides D.'s Moabitic great grandmother, Ruth, connected him with Moab, Ammon's kinsmen. Hence it was most natural to him to repair to Moab and Ammon when pursued by Saul. We at first sight wonder at his leaving his father and mother for safe keeping with the king of Moab (1 Sam. xxii.); but the book of Ruth shows how coincident with probability this is, and yet how little like the harmony contrived by a forger! His Gentile connection gave him somewhat enlarged views of the coming kingdom of Messiah, whose type and ancestor he was privileged to be (Ps. ii. 8, Matt. i. 5). His birthplace was Bethlehem (as it was of his Antitype, Messiah: Luke ii. 4, etc.); and of his patrimony there he gave to Chimham a property which long retained Chimham's name, in reward for the father Barzillai's loyalty and help in Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xix. 37, 38; Jer. xli. 17). His early associations with Bethlehem made him when in a hold desire a draught of water from its well whilst the Philistines held it. Three of his 30 captains broke through and brought it; but D., with the tender conscientiousness which characterized him (comp. 1 Sam. xxiv. 5, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10), and which appreciated the deep spirituality of the sixth commandment, would not drink it but poured it out to the Lord, saying, "My God forbid it me: shall I drink the blood of these men that have put their lives in jeopardy?" (1 Chron. x. 15-19).

SAUL [see], the people's choice, having been rejected from being king for disobedience, God manifested His sovereignty by choosing one, the very last thought of by his own family or even by the prophet; not the eldest, but the youngest; not like Saul, taller than the people by head and shoulders, but of moderate stature. A yearly sacrificial feast used to be held at Bethlehem, whereat Jesse, as chief landowner, presided with the elders (1 Sam. xvi. 11, 12; comp. at Saul's selection, ix. 12). But now suddenly at God's command, Samuel, though fearful of Saul's deadly enmity, appears there driving a heifer before him, to offer an extraordinary sacrifice. The elders trembling, lest his visit should be for judicial punishment of some sin, inquired, "Comest thou peaceably?" He answered, "Peaceably." Then inviting them and Jesse's sons he caused the latter to pass successively before him. Seven so passed, but were rejected, notwithstanding Samuel's prepossession in favour of Eliab's countenance and stature, since Jehovah, unlike man, "looks not on the outward appearance but on the heart." D., seemingly the least likely and the youngest, was fetched from the sheep; and his unction with oil by the prophet previous to the feast was accompanied with the unction of the Spirit of the Lord from that day forward. Simultaneously the Spirit of Jehovah left Saul and an evil spirit from Jehovah troubled him. D. was "a man after the Lord's own heart" (1 Sam. xiii. 14, Acts xiii. 22). Moreover he did not lack those outward graces which were looked for in a king; "ruddy," i.e. with anuburn hair, esteemed to be a beauty in the South and East, where black hair is usual; with "bright eyes" (marg. 1 Sam. xvi. 12, 18); goodly in countenance, and comely in person (xvii. 42); besides being "mighty, valiant, a man of war," and withal "pudgent." Like his nephew Asahel, his feet were by his God made "like hinds' feet." D. adds (1's. xviii. 33, 34): "He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms." Nothing could be more homely than his outward attire, with a staff or wand in hand used for dogs, and a wallet round his neck for carrying a shepherd's necessities (1 Sam. xvii. 40-43). But God gave him "integrity of heart and skilfulness of hands," qualifying him for "feeding and guiding Israel," after that he was "taken from the sheepfolds" (1's. lxxviii. 70, 72), and "from the sheepcote" (2 Sam. vii. 8). Nor was he ashamed of his early life, but delighted gratefully to acknowledge before God that he was "the man raised up on high." (2 Sam. xxiii. 1; comp. 1's. lxxix.)

The first glimpse we have of his taste in music and sacred poetry, which afterwards appears so preeminent in his psalms, is in his having been chosen as the best minstrel to charm away the evil spirit when it came upon Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 15-23). Thus the evil spirit departed, but the good Spirit did not come to Saul; and the result was, when D. was driven away, the evil returned worse than ever (comp. xxviii. with Matt. xii. 43-45). D. received doubtless further training in the schools of the prophets, who connected their prophesying with the soothing and elevating music of psaltrey, tabret, pipe, and harp (1 Sam. x. 5); for he and Samuel (who also feared Saul's wrath for his having anointed D.; xvi. 2) dwelt together in NATHAN [see] near Ramah, i.e. in the "habitations" of the prophets there, connected together by a wall or hedge round; a school over which Samuel presided, as Elisha did over those at Gilgal and Jericho; schools not for monastic separation from life's duties, but for mental and spiritual training with a view to greater usefulness in the world. Thus he became "the sweet singer of Israel" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1), "the inventor of instruments of music" (Amos vi. 5). Comp. 1 Chron. xxiii. 5, xv. 16, 19, 21, 24, xxv. 1; 2 Chron. xxix. 25, 26. The use of cymbals, psalteries, and harps, in a form suitable for the temple worship, was by his command; the kinor (the lyre) and the nebel (the psaltrey, a stringed instrument played by the hand) being improved by him and added to the cymbals, as distinguished from the "trumpets."

The portion 1 Sam. xvii.—xviii. 2 has been thought a parenthesis explaining how D. became first introduced to Saul. But xvii. 12, 15 show that Saul already had D. in attendance upon him, for Jesse his father is called "that Ephrathite" (viz. that one spoken of above), and it is said before D.'s going forth to meet Goliath that "D. went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem." How then shall we account for Saul's question just before the encounter, "Almer, whose son is this youth?" and after it, "Whose son art thou, young man?" (xvii. 55-58.) Also, is this question consistent with his being already "Saul's armour-bearer and loved greatly" by him? (xvi. 20, 21.) The title "armour-bearer" was honorary, like our aide-de-camp, e.g. Job had ten (2 Sam. xviii. 15). D. merely attended Saul for a time, and returned to tend his father's sheep, where he was when the war broke out in which Goliath was the Philistine champion. Saul's question (xvii. 55-58), "Whose son art thou?" must therefore imply more than asking the name of D.'s father. Evidently he entered into a full inquiry about him, having lost sight of him since the time D. had been in attendance. The words (xviii. 1) "when D. made an end of speaking unto Saul, the soul of Jonathan was knit unto the soul of D.," imply a lengthened detail of all concerning his father and himself. The sacred writer of 1 Samuel probably embodied in his narrative some fragments of the authoritative documents mentioned above, stamping them with Divine sanction; hence arises a variation between the different documents which would be cleared up if we knew more fully the circumstances. Both are true, though the explanation of how they harmonize can only be conjectured with more or less probability.

The battle was at EPHESE-DAMMIM [see] in the boundary hills of Judah; Saul's army on one side of the valley, the Philistines on the other, the brook Elah (i.e. the Terebinth) running between. Goliath's complete armour contrasted with the ill armed state of Israel, whose king alone was well armed (ver. 38). For, as Porsena imposed on the Romans the stipulation that they should use no iron save in husbandry (Pliny, xxiv. 14), so the Philistines forced the Israelites to have "no smith throughout all their land, lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears" (1 Sam. xiii. 19, 20). D. at this moment, when all the Israelites were dismayed, came to bring supplies for his brethren and to get from them a "pledge" that they were alive and well. Arriving at the wagon rampart (not "the trench" as A.V.) round Israel's camp, he heard their well known war shout (Num. xxiii. 21, comp. x. 35). Leaving his CARRIAGE [see] (the vessels of supplies which he carried) in the hand of the baggage-master, he ran to salute his brethren in the midst of the lines, and there heard Goliath's challenge repeated on the fortieth day for the fortieth time. The meekness with which D. conquered his own spirit, when Eliab charged him with pride, the very sin which prompted Eliab's own angry and uncharitable imputation, was a fit prelude to his conquest of Goliath; self must be overcome before we can overcome others (Prov. xvi. 32, xiii. 10). The same principle, "judge not according to the appearance" (John vii. 24), as at his anointing (1 Sam. xvi. 7), is set forth in the victory of this "youth" over "a man of war from his youth." Physical strength and size, severed from God, is mere beast strength, and must fall before the seemingly feeblest whose God is the Lord. This is the force of his words: "thy servant slew both the lion and the bear, and this uncreniced Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God." Man becomes beastlike when severed from God, and is only manly when he is godly. [See BEAST, and DANIEL.] Confidence in God, not self, grounded on past deliverances, and on God's honour being at stake before the assembled people of God and the enemies of God (xvii. 45-48), filled him with such alacrity that he "ran" toward the enemy, and with his simple sling and stone smote him to the ground. His armour D. took first to his tent, and afterwards to the tabernacle at Nob; his head D. brought to Jerusalem (the city, not the citadel, which was then a Jebusite possession).

At this point begins the second era of D.'s life, his persecution by Saul. A word is enough to rouse the jealous spirit, especially in a king towards a subject. That word was spoken by the women, unconscious of the effect of their words whilst they sang in responsive strains before the king and his champion, "Saul has slain his thousands, and D. his ten thousands." "They have ascribed unto D. ten thousands, and to me but thousands, and what can he have more but the kingdom?" Conscience told him he had forfeited his throne; and remembering Samuel's word after his disobedience as to the Amalekites (xv. 28), "the Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine that is better than thou," he "eyed David" as possibly the "neighbour" meant. Envy moved Saul under the evil spirit to cast his javelin at him, but twice he eluded it. His already noted (xvi. 18) prudence, whereby "he behaved himself wisely in all his ways," was now brought into exercise; a quality which in dependence on Jehovah its giver (1's. v. 8) he in Ps. ci. 1, by an undesigned coincidence, professes in the same words his determination to exercise, and which as it was the characteristic of Jacob, Israel's forefather, so it has been prominent in his descendants in all ages, modern as well as ancient, especially in times of persecution; analogous to the instinctive sagacity of hunted animals. So wisely did he behave, and so manifestly was the Lord with him, that Saul the king was afraid of D. his subject; "therefore Saul removed him from him and made him captain over a thousand" (xviii. 13). Subsequently he was captain of the king's bodyguard, next to Almer the captain of the host and Jonathan the heir apparent, and sat with the king at table daily (xx. 25, xxii. 14). Next, after Saul broke his promise of giving Merab his elder daughter to be D.'s wife, by giving her to Adriel instead, Michal, Saul's second daughter, became attached to D. Saul used her as a "snare" that D. might fall by the Philistines. The dowry Saul required was 100 foreskins of the Philistines. D. brought him 200, which, so far from abating his malice, seeing that the Lord was so manifestly with D., made him only the more bitter "enemy." But God can raise up friends to His people in their enemy's house; and as Pharaoh's daughter saved Moses, so Saul's son Jonathan and daughter Michal saved D. After having promised in the living Jehovah's name D.'s safety to Jonathan, and after D. had "slain the Philistines with a great slaughter" from which they did not recover till the battle in which Saul fell, Saul hurled his javelin at D. with such force that it entered into the wall and then would have killed D. in his own house, but that by Michal's aid he escaped through a window. Jonathan, his bosom friend, he saw once again and never after. Michal was given to Phaltiel, and was not restored to him until he made her restoration a condition of peace with Abner (xix., 2 Sam. iii. 13-16). How striking a retribution by the righteous God it was, that Saul himself fell by the very enemy by whom he hoped to slay D.! How evidently this and kindred cases must have been in D.'s mind when he wrote of the sinner, "he made a pit and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made" (Ps. vii. 15, 16); the title of this psalm probably refers to Saul the black hearted son of Kish the Benjamite, enigmatically glanced at as "Cush (Ethiopia; comp. Jer. xiii. 23, Amos ix. 7) the Benjamite."

This first act in his long wanderings forms the subject of Ps. lix. The title states the occasion: "when Saul sent and they watched the house to kill him." The "bloody men" are Saul and his minions (ver. 2). "The mighty are gathered against me, not for my transgression; . . . they run and prepare themselves without my fault" (ver. 3, 4); herein he appeals to the all-knowing Jehovah, since the earthly king will not believe his protestations of innocence of the treason laid to his charge. This psalm harmonizes with the independent history, 1 Sam. xviii. 8-end; xx. 30, 31; xxii. 8; xxiv. 9. This is the "lying" alluded to (ver. 12); Saul's "pride" would not brook that D.'s exploits should be extolled above his; hence flowed the "lying" and malice. His minions, "like a dog returning at evening," thirsting for prey which they had in vain sought throughout the day, came tumultuously besieging D.'s house "that night" after Saul's vain attempt to destroy him in the day. His doom answered to his sin. Greatly trembling at the Philistine hosts, warlike though he was, but cowed by a guilty conscience, he who had made D. to "wander up and down" now in his turn wanders lither and thither for that spiritual guidance which Jehovah withheld, and at last by night in disguise was a suppliant before the witch of Endor, which sealed his destruction (xxviii., 1 Chron. x. 13). As D. was "watched" by Saul's messengers (1 Sam. xix. 11) so D.'s remedy was, "because of his (Saul's) strength will I wait upon (watch unto, Heb.) Thee."

D., seeing no hope of safety whilst within Saul's reach, fled to Samuel and dwelt with him at the prophet's school in Naioth. Saul sent messengers to apprehend him; but they and even Saul himself, when he followed, were filled with the spirit of prophecy; and they who came to seize the servant of God joined D. in Spirit-taught praises of God; so can God turn the hearts of His people's foes (Prov. xvi. 7, xxi. 1); comp. Acts xviii. 17 with 1 Cor. i. 1, especially Saul's namesake (Acts vii. 58 with ix.).

After taking affectionate leave of Jonathan, D. fled to Nob, where was the tabernacle, in order to inquire God's will concerning his future course, as was D.'s wont. Ps. xvi. 7 herein undesignedly coincides with 1 Sam. xxii. 10, 15. AHIMELECH [see], alarmed at D.'s sudden appearance alone, lest he should be charged with some unwelcome commission, asked, "Why art thou alone?" (xxi.) D., whom neither beast nor giant had shaken from his trust in the Lord, now through temporary unbelief told a lie, which involved the unsuspecting highpriest and all his subordinates in one indiscriminate massacre, through Doeg's information to Saul. Too late D. acknowledged to the only survivor, ABIATHAR [see], that he had thereby occasioned their death (xxii.); so liable are even believers to vacillation and to consequent punishment. By the lie he gained his immediate object, the 12 shewbread loaves just removed from the table to make place for the new bread on the sabbath, and also Goliath's sword wrapped up in cloth behind the highpriest's own ephod (shoulder dress), so precious a dedicatory offering was it deemed. One gain D. derived and Saul lost by his slaughter of the priests; Abiathar, the sole survivor of the line of Ithamar, henceforth attended D., and through him D. could always inquire of God, in God's appointed way (Ps. xvi. 7, in undesigned coincidence with 1 Sam. xxiii. 2, 4, 6, 9; xxx. 7, 8). Saul on the contrary had bereft himself of those through whom he might have consulted the Lord. So at last, "when the Lord answered him, neither by dreams, by Urim, nor by prophets," he filled up the measure of his guilt by repairing to the witch of Endor. Surely men's "sin will find them out" (1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7; Num. xxxii. 23).

The title of the 52nd Psalm informs us that it was composed in reference to Saul's cruel act on Doeg's officious tale-telling information. The "boaster in mischief, the mighty man" (the very term used of Saul, 2 Sam. i. 19), is not the herdman Doeg, the ready tool of evil, but the master of hero might in animal courage, Saul. True hero might belongs to the godly alone, as Ps. xviii. 25 saith, "with an upright hero (Heb. for 'man') Thou wilt show Thyself upright." Saul's "lying and all devouring words" (ver. 3) are, with undesigned coincidence, illustrated by the independent history (1 Sam. xxiv. 9), "wherefore hearest thou men's words. . . Behold, D. seeketh thy hurt?" Saul's courtiers knew the road to his favour was to malign D. Saul was thus the prime mover of the lying charge. Doeg, for mischief and to curry favour, told the fact; it was Saul who put on it the false construction of treason against D. and the innocent priests; comp. D.'s similar language, Ps. xvii. 3, 4. Saul was "the man that made not God his strength, but trusted in the abundance of his riches and strengthened himself in his wickedness" (Ps. lii. 7). For in undesigned coincidence with this the history (1 Sam. xxii. 7-9) represents him saying, "Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards?" etc., implying that he had all these (as Samuel foretold would be "the manner of the king," viii. 14) to give, which D. had not. Singularly prophetic of Saul's own doom are the words (Ps. lii. 5) hinting at his having rooted out Ahimelech's family, "God shall likewise . . . pluck thee out of thy dwelling-place, and root thee out of the land of the living." Not only Saul, but all his bloody house save Mephibosheth, died by a violent death, by a righteous retribution in kind (1 Sam. xxxi. 6, 2 Sam. xxi. 1-14, Ps. xvii. 25, 26).

Unbelieving calculation of probabilities, instead of doing the right thing in prayerful faith, led D. to flee to Israel's enemies, the Philistines and Achish [see] of Gath. As Ps. lvi. represents him praying for deliverance at this crisis, so Ps. xxxiv. (in alphabetical acrostic arrangement in Heb.), which by its tranquil tone shows it was composed in a season of quiet, is his permanent memorial of thanksgiving for the deliverance granted to his prayers. The title of Ps. lvi., Jonath-elem-rechokim, means "the dumb dove among strangers." D. was "dumb," inasmuch as, feeling words useless to enemies who "wrested" all he said (ver. 5), he silently left his cause with God (Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14). "Dove" represents his defenseless innocence, whilst pursued as a bird. He longed to have "wings like a dove to fly away and be at rest" (Ps. lv. 6, 7; 1 Sam. xxvi. 20). The "strangers" are the Philistines, among whom he was sojourning in his "wanderings" (ver. 8). The title of Ps. xxxiv. says "he changed his behaviour" or "concealed his intellect" (Hengstenberg), i.e. feigned madness, "scrabbling on the doors and letting his spittle fall on his beard" (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15); so that Achish "AHIMELECH" [see], (lit. father of a king, hereditary not elective monarch) drove him away, and he departed. "Goliath's sword" perhaps betrayed him, for Achish's servants immediately said, "Is not this D. the king of the land? did they not sing, . . . D. hath slain his ten thousands?" The sword which he had dishonestly got from Ahimelech now cuts the ground from under him, before Ahimelech (Num. xxiii. 23), and the song of his former triumph is the very occasion of their interpreting it to mean his kingship. The title of Ps. lvi. implies he was "taken" prisoner, and only escaped by feigning madness.

He now became an independent outlaw (1 Sam. xxii. 1), and gathered a band of fugitives through debt or distress, in the cave some miles S.W. of Bethlehem, the largest in the land, ADULLAM [see]. "His father's house (probably including Zeruah's sons, certainly Abishai: 2 Sam. xxiii. 13, 18) went down thither to him," an appropriate expression, for the path goes down from Bethlehem to it towards the Dead Sea. As formerly a shepherd he knew every winding of the cavern, as the Arabs now do. Some of Canaanite origin joined him, as Ahimelech the Hittite (1 Sam. xxvi. 6). Long after we read of "600 men coming after him from Gath" (2 Sam. xv. 18).

As Ps. lvi. refers to his stay with the Philistine king, so Ps. lvii. title, "when he fled from Saul in the cave," refers to his subsequent stay in the cave of Adullam. The "cave" symbolises a gloomy position (Heb. xi. 38); and perhaps never did D.'s position seem darker than at that time, as he subsequently sets forth in the maschil (spiritual instruction) Psalm cxlii., for the edification and comfort of God's people when in similar cave-like positions of gloom and trial.

From Adullam he went to Mizpeh (watch-tower, mountain height) of Moab, the Moabite royal residence on mount Pisgah, and there, on the ground of kindred through Ruth the Moabitess, committed his aged parents to the charge of the king to secure them from Saul's enmity. This was the time probably when Nabash the Ammonite king showed him kindness (2 Sam. x. 2). Here too his future biographer, the prophet Gad, whose acquaintance he may have made when among the prophets at Naioth, joined him. His name makes it possible he was a Gadite, the forerunner of the 11 Gadite chieftains who crossed the then overflowing Jordan to reach D. shortly afterwards. But now he was on the E. side of Jordan in Mizpeh-hold. Gad's warning, "Abide not in the hold, depart into Judah" (1 Sam. xxii. 5), implies that he was not to seek refuge outside the Holy Land, but trust in the Lord as his refuge. Tradition reports that the Moabites slew his parents; if true, it must have been subsequently, as here it is implied D.'s parents left the hold when D. left it. One thing is certain, that many years afterwards D. treated the subjugated Moabites with extraordinary severity, "making them lie down upon the ground, and then with two lines measuring to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive," i.e. killing two thirds of their fighting men, and sparing only one third. If in the interim, in violation of the rights of hospitality and kindred, they treacherously murdered his parents, his exceptional severity is accounted for. In Ps. lx. 8, "Moab is my washpot," he marks their ignominious subjection to the slave's office of washing the feet of the master. Yearly they had to pay 100,000 lambs and as many rams (2 Kings iii. 4, Isa. xvi. 1). In Ps. xxvii. he alludes to this severance from his parents, who possibly (such is man's selfishness in calamity) blamed him for their exile: "when my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up" (yaaspheeni), as a child disowned by its parents, and taken up by the adoptive father from the streets; comp. Ezek. xvi. 5, 6.

The "sorrow multiplying" idolatries surrounding him, whilst among the Philistines and in Moab, and his prayer for preservation amidst all, suggested the related pair of psalms, xvi. and xvii. "Preserve me, O God, for in Thee do I put my trust" (ver. 1); "their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another God"; in contrast to which his blessed experience is, "the Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," "the lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places, yea I have a goodly heritage." The names for idol gods and sorrows are almost identical; 'al'tzeboth, 'al'zabbim; a bad augury for those who "hasten after" (as one buying a wife at the price of a costly dowry, Heb.) them. In undesigned coincidence with this, D. at Hehilah, in his appeal to Saul, fixes on this as the chief hardship of his exile from the Holy Land; they who stirred thee up against me "have driven me out from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, saying, Go serve other gods."

The Moabite stone of Dibon strikingly confirms the Scripture representation of the free intercourse carried on between Israelites and Moabites, not being impeded by difference of language; Moab, if sprung from Lot as the Bible states, would use a language not widely different from that of Lot's uncle Abraham's descendants; so the Dibon stone is inscribed (about 900 B.C.) with a language almost identical with the Heb. of the Bible histories, Samuel and Kings.

Next D. by Gad's warning fled to HARETH [see] forest. But hearing that the Philistines were robbing the threshing floors of KEILAH [see] (in the lowland of Judah towards Philistia), love of country prevailed over every thought of his own safety. But first he inquired of the Lord, "Shall I go, . . . and save Keilah?" Upon receiving a favourable response twice, probably through Gad, he went in spite of the remonstrance of his men, whose faith yielded to fears. He saved the city, slew many Philistines, and carried away their cattle. His self devotion in behalf of Keilah was rewarded by treacherous ingratitude on the part of the citizens so saved. For, on Saul's secretly plotting mischief against him whilst shut up in Keilah, he learned by inquiry of the Lord, through Abiathar with the ephod, that the men of Keilah would betray him if he stayed, a type of Him who was betrayed by those whom He came to save (1 Sam. xxiii.). From Keilah D. and his 600 men (to which number they had increased from 400 in Adullam, xxii. 2) going to a mount-

It is to this occasion that Ps. xi. refers: "in the Lord put I my trust, how say ye to my soul, flee as a bird to your mountain." Literally he did flee; but the flight from which his spiritual instincts recoiled (comp. Neh. vi. 11) was that from trust in Jehovah; though his followers' faith was giving way, especially when even Saul was claiming God as on his side against D. (1 Sam. xxiii. 3, 7.) The image of a "bird" is the very one the independent history represents him using whilst in the same neighbourhood (xxvi. 20): "the king of Israel is come out as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains." Birds on an alarm flee from the open plain to the covert of a hill. "The wicked bending their bow, . . . that they may privily shoot at the upright" (ver. 2), points to the treacherous Ziphites tracking "his foot" (marg. 1 Sam. xxiii. 22), and guiding Saul and his Benjamite bowmen towards D. They "compassed" him (as Ps. xvii. 9 expresses it, in agreement with the history) so closely at the wilderness of Maon, they on the one side whilst he was on the other, that D. only by "making haste got away." God's providence interposed, for just as Saul was on the verge of overtaking him the Philistines unintentionally saved D. by invading Judah and so requiring Saul in haste to meet them, the very enemies by whom Saul had hoped to kill D. (1 Sam. xviii. 21.) The name Sela-hammah-lekoth, "the rock of divisions," marked the spot where D. climbed down one side whilst Saul was surrounding the mountain on the other side. The 54th Psalm was written "when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not D. hide himself with us?" Twice they informed Saul (1 Sam. xxiii., xxvi.). The exact words corresponding in both show that 1 Sam. xxiii. 19 is the occasion meant in Ps. liv. "Strangers are risen up against me" (ver. 3); i.e., the Ziphites, who by the ties of country ought to have been friends, are behaving as hostile "strangers"; comp. Isa. xxv. 5, Ps. exx. 5. So in ver. 5 the "enemies" are shorerai, "those who watch me," liars in wait.

D. next dwelt in the strongholds of Engedi (=the fountain of the goat or kid), "the rocks of the wild goats" (xxiv.). This was in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, the scene of the destruction by fire of the guilty cities of the plain. How naturally here the idea would suggest itself (Ps. xi. 6), "upon the wicked Jehovah shall rain fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest" ("the wrath wind," zif'apheth; comp. "the breath of the Lord," Isa. xxx. 33). See last paragraph for the undesigned coincidence between Ps. xi. 1, 2 and 1 Sam. xxvi. 20-end. Here Providence put Saul the persecutor in his victim D.'s power. For Saul went into one of the caves with which the chalk and limestone conical hills W. of the Dead Sea abound, "to cover his feet" (to perform nature's necessities, Jud. iii. 24) whilst D.'s men were lurking in the sides. D. silently cut off Saul's skirt on his spreading out his long robe before and behind. But though his men regarded it as an opportunity for killing him, appointed by Jehovah, D. said, "Jehovah forbid that I should . . . stretch forth mine hand against . . . Jehovah's anointed." Nay, his conscience even "smote him because he had cut off Saul's skirt." After Saul had left the cave D. cried after him, "wherefore hearest thou men's words, . . . Behold, D. seeketh thy hurt?" So in Ps. vii. 3 he says, "if I have done this," viz. what my calumniators allege, "if there be iniquity in my hands." How undesignedly and naturally his words in the history coincide: "My father, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand, for in that I killed thee not, know there is neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, yet thou huntest my soul." The same favourite expressions occur in the psalm, "lest he tear my soul" (ver. 2, 5), and "persecute me" (ver. 1), as in 1 Sam. xxiv. 14, "whom dost thou persecute?" (Heb.) Saul was astonished at D.'s magnanimity as something above the mere natural man: "if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? Wherefore the Lord reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day." How natural that the charge which Saul had alleged against D. as his plea for persecuting him, but which really lay at Saul's own door, should be uppermost in D.'s mind: Ps. vii. 4, "if I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me." Moreover, the same phrases occur in 1 Sam. xxvi., describing the similar magnanimity of D. towards Saul (ver. 18), and the same allusion to men's calumnies against D. to gain Saul's favour.

In Ps. vii. 3-5 he defends himself against these calumnies; and the title, "concerning the words," refers to them, for the real calumniator was Saul himself, and his flatterers uttered the calumnies to please him, therefore the title attributes "the words" to "Cush the Benjamite," i.e. the Ethiopian (black) hearted son of Kish of Benjamin = Saul. As in 1 Sam. xxiv. 12, xxvi. 15, D. says, "The Lord judge between me and thee . . . but mine hand shall not be upon thee; the Lord render to every man his righteousness"; so in Ps. vii. 8, 11, "Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness . . . God judgeth the righteous." In both alike appears the same committing of his righteous cause to the righteous God (comp. Ps. xviii. 20). Jehovah's "whetted sword" and "arrows ordained against the persecutors" literally smote Saul, in accordance with D.'s prophecy in Ps. vii. 13, for he was smitten by the arrows of the very Philistines by whom he had hoped to smite D., and he fell by his own sword (1 Sam. xviii. 17, 21; comp. xxxi. 3, 4). D., of whom Saul had said, Let the hand of the Philistines be upon him, was actually saved by them (xxvii. 1-3), it was Saul who was slain by them. So accurately was the retributive law fulfilled: "he made a pit and digged, and is fallen into the ditch which he made. His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come upon his own pate" (Ps. vii. 15, 16).

The last interview between Saul and D. was farther S. in the same region, at the hill of Hachilah before Jeshimon, where Saul lay in the camp with the usual fortification of wagons and baggage around (1 Sam. xxvi. 5 marg.). D. abode in the wilderness, and having ascertained by spies Saul's presence, sallied forth with Abishai, and found Saul asleep, with his spear stuck in the ground beside him. Abishai would have smitten him with the spear, but D. interposed: "Destroy him not, for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless?" adding prophetically, "the Lord shall smite him . . . or he shall descend into battle and perish" (comp. xxxi. 6). This phrase became a motto, to him, "Destroy not," Altaschith, prefixed to Ps. lvii., lviii., and lix., and copied by Asaph, lxxv. He could say "Destroy not" to God, when he "destroyed not" his enemy (Matt. xviii. 32-35, xxvi. 52). Contenting himself with taking Saul's cruse, and the spear which had so nearly transfixed him, D. appealed to the persecutor, whose heart was "touched," and so D. overcame evil with good.

Whilst in Maon D. sought contributions from Nabal of Carmel (1 Sam. xxv.), of the house of Caleb but sadly degenerate from his whole-hearted ancestor; D.'s men had been "very good" to Nabal's shepherds, neither hurling men nor taking property though in their power, yea "being a wall unto them both by night and day." But Nabal churlishly replied, "Shall I take my bread, my water, and my flesh [the repeated my marks his covetous God-forgetting selfishness, Hos. ii. 5], and give it to men whom I know not whence they be? There be many servants [glancing at D.] now a days that break away every man from his master." D. here was strongly tempted to that which he had abstained from in the case of Saul, personal revenge. Abigail, Nabal's wife, by her timely present of bread, wine, sheep, and fruit, saved herself and her house when D. was bent on vengeance for having been requited evil for good. With wise unselfishness she said, "Upon me let this iniquity be . . . let not my lord regard this man of Belial, for as his name is so is he; Nabal (=fool) is his name, and folly is with him." At the same time she saved over the dishonour Nabal had done to D. personally: "my lord fighteth the battles of the Lord (comp. xviii. 17); yet a man is risen . . . to seek thy soul; but the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life, . . . and the souls of thine enemies shall the Lord sling out as out of the middle of a sling," with feminine tact alluding to the great achievement of D., his slaying Goliath with a sling. In ten days after Nabal's unreasonable and drunken feast, from which he awoke only to hear of his imminent danger, the Lord smote him that he died. Then D. blessed Jehovah for having "pleaded his cause" [the phrase in the history coinciding un-designedly with that in Ps. xxxv. 1] against Nabal, and having kept him (D.) from self revenge; comp. Rom. xii. 19.

Another coincidence between D.'s language in the independent history and that in his sacred poetry appears from comparing ver. 39, "the Lord hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head," with Ps. vii. 16, "his mischief shall return upon his own head." Scripture, which calls things by their right names, designates the unbelieving sinner a "fool," however wise in his own eyes and those of the world because gilded by worldly success. D. could not fail to be deeply impressed with this in Nabal's case, whose name expressed his self indulging, unbelieving folly. Having taken Abigail to wife, D. must have often thought of the remarkable providence under which he met her. How naturally then in the psalm which was indited for private devotion in the form of Psalm liii., and for public use in the sanctuary in the form of Psalm xiv., does he stigmatize godlessness as the secret spring of the folly of worldlings: "the fool (Nabal) hath said in his heart, No God!" How suddenly "great fear" came upon him in the midst of his godless feasting, "when no fear was" (liii. 5). For when told, in the morning after his revel, of his danger, "his heart died within him, and he became as a stone"; the same heart which just before had been so "merry within him"; like the rich man who in the midst of his self aggrandizing and indulging plans received the awful summons, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee" (Luke xii. 16-20). The death of Saul after he had "played the fool and erred exceedingly" (1 Sam. xxxi. 21), and the utter "perishing" of AMALEK'S [see] "memorial with them," because their "hand was against the throne of the Lord" (Exod. xvii. 16 marg.), illustrate the same principle as set forth in D.'s 9th Psalm, with the title Muth-Labben, i.e. anagram for Nabal, concerning the dying of the fool, the phrase of D. again in 2 Sam. iii. 33.

Unbelieving fear ("I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul") and human calculations (such is the vacillation even in believers) induced D. again to seek refuge among the Philistines; but now no longer a fugitive, but captain of an organized band, 600 men with their wives and families. Achish of Gath (son of the former Achish says tradition), according to the usage of eastern monarchs, gave him Ziklag for his maintenance, which thenceforth appertained to Judah (1 Sam. xxvii.). So did his power grow that a band of Benjamites, of Saul's brethren, right and left handed slingers and archers, with their captains, including Ismaiah the Gibeonite, a mighty man over the 30, joined him here (1 Chron. xii. 1-7), and he stayed "a full year and four months." D. during his stay smote the Geshurites, Gezrites, and Amalekites, the very people the sparing of whom in disobedience to God was the cause of Saul's rejection; but he was guilty of a deception to Achish, saying his inroad was upon the Jerahmeelites and Kenites, nomad races on the S. of Judah, allied to Israel. But for God's providential interposition his putting himself in this false position would have been fatal to his peace of conscience, for he would have had to join with the heathen Philistines in the battle of Gilboa against his own countrymen. He narrowly escaped by the protest of the Philistine nobles (1 Sam. xxviii., xxix.). Ps. xxxiv., referring probably to both his stays in Philistia (see title), celebrates how "the angel of the Lord encamped around" him because he "feared" God, and "delivered" him; and how "the Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants," besides "keeping all his bones" so that "not one of them is broken." On the march towards Ziklag, and as he turned back to Ziklag, several captains of the thousands of Manasseh joined him, "all mighty men of valour," so that his host increased "day by day until it was a great host, like the host of God" (1 Chron. xii. 19-22).

On returning he found the Amalekites had burned Ziklag with fire (1 Sam. xxx.), and carried all its inhabitants, women and children, captives. "D. was greatly distressed," for besides his own deep grief, his two wives Abinoam and Abigail being among those carried off, the people with characteristic fickleness "bade stone him." But distress now brought out into strong relief his faith which had vacillated in his coming to Philistia, so "he encouraged himself in the Lord his God." In undesigned coincidence with this representation, in the history of his fears silenced by his faith, in Psalm lvi., which commemorates his two stays in Philistia, he says (ver. 3), "what time I am afraid I will trust in Thee." Consulting, as was his wont, God through Abiathar and the ephod, and receiving a favourable response, he pursued with 400 men (probably including some of the recently joined Manassites, 1 Chron. xii. 21), leaving 200 who were faint at the brook Besor. By an Egyptian's information he came upon the Amalekites and slew all except 100 who escaped on camels, and recovered all the captives and spoil. Besides he took large spoil belonging to Amalek, and of it distributed "presents to all the places where D. and his men were wont to haunt." This suggested his language Ps. lxxviii. 18, "Thou hast received gifts for men," as explained in relation to the Antitype (Eph. iv. 8). The law of division of plunder equally, among those engaged in the field and those guarding the baggage, was established (1 Sam. xiv. 13, xxx. 25). D.'s generosity to his fallen enemy appears in his punishment of the Amalekite, who, bringing tidings of Saul's death, and carrying to D. the crown and bracelet stripped from him, confessed that he had put an end to Saul. D. composed the beautiful elegy on Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 17-27), which he bade the children of Judah to be "taught" (comp. title Ps. lx.) in, designated "the bow" song, not as A.V., "he bade them teach the children of Judah (the use of) the bow."

Having first consulted the Lord, as always, D. by His direction went up to Hebron, the sacred city where the patriarchs were buried and Caleb had his inheritance, and was there anointed king over Judah, which he continued to be 7½ years. His noble heartedness appears in his thanks to the men of Jabesh Gilead for burying Saul: "Blessed be ye of the Lord, that ye have showed this kindness . . . now the Lord show kindness and truth unto you . . . I also will requite you this kindness." What a contrast to Saul's thanks to the Ziphites for betraying D.: "Blessed be ye of the Lord (thus claiming God's sanction to treachery, malice, and bloodthirsty persecution of the innocent), for ye have compassion on me." Ishbosheth was not made king at Mahanaim till after D. had reigned five years. Probably all the country, except Judah in the S. and part of the transjordanic tribes on the E., were under the Philistine dominion after the fatal battle of Gilboa. Gradually Israel recovered its land, and Abner at the close of the five years made Ishbosheth king. D. however "waxed stronger and stronger," whilst "Saul's house waxed weaker and weaker" (2 Sam. ii. iii.). After a skirmish, disastrous to Ishbosheth's cause, that weak king offended Abner by charging him with an intrigue with Rizpah, Saul's concubine. Abner embraced D.'s side and procured D.'s wife Michal for him, severing her from her second husband, Phaltiel. Then followed Joab's murder of Abner, which D. felt himself politically unable to punish; but left the avenging of his blood to God. "these men the sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me, the Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness" (ver. 39), in coincidence with D.'s Ps. xxviii. 4. D. paid every honour to his memory, following the bier, and composing a dirge on his death. [See ABNER.]

Next followed Ishbosheth's murder and D.'s punishment of the murderers, Rechab and Baanah, who thought to gratify D. by bringing his enemy's head. The coincidence between 2 Sam. iv. 9, "as the Lord liveth who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity," and Ps. xxxi. 5, 7, is obvious. His sense of justice, even in the case of adversaries, his dependence continually on Jehovah, and humble ascription of all that he was to Him alone, kept him from behaving proudly in prosperity. Then he was anointed for the third time king, viz. over Israel (his reign lasting 33 years besides the previous 7½ over Judah), upon his making a league with them; and they kept a three days' joyous feast (1 Chron. xii. 38-40). Contingents from every tribe formed his host, which he put under Joab's command. The men of Issachar are especially noted as "men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do," also of Zebulun men "expert in war, with all instruments of war . . . which could keep rank, and were not of a double heart." The Aaronites Jehoiada and Zadok, then young, of the rival house of Eleazar, also joined D., in addition to Abiathar of the house of Ithamar already with him (1 Chron. xii. 27, 28; xxvii. 5).

Prosperity now tried him. He, in conformity with the usage of eastern kings, but in opposition to Deut. xvii. 17, multiplied wives to himself besides Abigail, Abinoam, and Michal: Maachah daughter of Talmai king of Geshur, whom probably he took in his raid (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), Hagith, Abital, Eglah. Beauty was his snare; and Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah, the offspring of these connections, proved his subsequent curse.

His martial achievements as king of the nation began with taking from the Jebusites the stronghold of Zion, thenceforth the city of D. and the capital. The Jebusites had said that, so secure was their fort, the blind and the lame would suffice to defend it. D. said, "Whoever . . . smites . . . the lame and blind (i.e. all the defenders of Zion, whom D. designates derisively after the Jebusites' words) hated of D.'s soul, he shall be chief and captain." For "getteth up to the gutter" Keil trans., "whoever smites the Jebusites, let him hurl into the waterfall (at the foot of the precipice) both the lame and the blind, hated of D.'s soul." Thence the proverb arose, "the blind and the lame (i.e. repulsive persons) shall not come into the house." Hence the extraordinariness of their entering the temple and being healed by Christ (Matt. xxi. 14; comp. Lev. xxi. 17, 18). Others take it proverbial of an impregnable fort; "the blind and lame are there, let him enter if he can." The objection to this is, D. did enter in spite of "the lame and the blind"; how then could the proverb originate of an impregnable house or fortress? Joab thus won the commander-in-chiefship (1 Chron. xi., 2 Sam. v.). The Philistines were the first to assail D. With characteristic dependence on God, D. first consulted God's will, and then assailed them. Attributing the victory to Jehovah alone, "the Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies as the breach of waters," he called the place Baal Perazim (the plain of breaches). Their idols he took and burned. On their spreading themselves in the valley of Rephaim again, D. once more consulted Jehovah, and on being told to "turn away from them and come upon them over against the mulberry trees," instead of the impatience and disobedience of Saul (1 Sam. xiii. 8-14; xiv. 18, 19; xv. 22, 23) he patiently took God's time and God's way, and so prevailed (1 Chron. xiv.). Comp. Isa. xxxviii. 16, 21. The imagery of the thunderstorm in Ps. xviii. 7-14 and xxix. may allude to this breaking forth of the Lord on the flood of enemies, and so giving His people peace.

Hiram of Tyre now became D.'s ally, and helped with cedars towards building his palace (2 Sam. v. 11, vii. 2). D.'s next concern was to remove the ark from the forest town, Kirjath Jearim or Baale of Judah, where it had lain mostly neglected during Saul's reign (1 Chron. xiii. 3), to the tabernacle which D. pitched for it in the city of D. After a three months stay of the ark at Obed Edom's house, owing to the breach upon Uzzah because of irreverent rashness (2 Sam. vi.; comp. 1 Sam. vi. 19, a sad contrast to God's breaking forth upon D.'s enemies at Baal Perazim), D. brought it up, stripping off his royal robe in the presence of the symbol of Jehovah's throne, the true King, and in a linen ephod, to mark his assuming the priestly along with the kingly function, "dancing before the Lord with all his might." The sacrosanctity of the ark, thus solemnly vindicated by the breach on Uzzah, naturally suggested the stress laid on holiness as the requisite for dwelling in God's house in the 15th and 24th Psalms, written on this occasion. In Ps. xiv. the words "when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of His people Jacob shall rejoice" give no ground for assigning the date to the Babylonian captivity. It is a Heb. phrase for reversing misfortune. In Jud. xviii. 30 "the captivity of the land" means the capture of the ark by the heathen Philistines (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11; vii. 4). Ps. lxxviii. 60, 61 proves this, "God forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh and delivered His strength into captivity." When this captivity was reversed by the bringing back of the ark to Kirjath Jearim, "they of Bethshemesh rejoiced to see it," just as D. says "Jacob shall rejoice." The hitherto victorious Philistines were discomfited by Jehovah's thunderings, through Samuel's intercession at Mizpeh, and so "were in great fear where no fear was," i.e. when they had supposed they had nothing to fear from the prostrated Israelites. God's presence "in the congregation of the righteous" was the cause; so "God scattered the bones of him that encamped against" Israel (Ps. liii. 5). D.'s "bringing again" the ark and settling it permanently on Zion amidst all "Israel's gladness" completed the reversal of Israel's captivity, prayed for in Ps. xiv. So Ps. xv. appropriately follows. The settlement of the ark on Zion marked Jehovah's new relation to His people, as manifesting Himself in Jerusalem, thenceforth to be the centre of the nation's devotions. Ephraim is gently warned by D.'s contemporary musician, Asaph, not to resist this appointment of God for transferring the seat of worship from Shiloh of Israel to Zion of Judah (Ps. lxxviii. 67-71). D.'s love for God's abode appears in Ps. xvi. 8, "Lord, I have loved the habitation of Thine house and the place where Thine honour dwelleth," harmonizing with the history, "I have set my affection to the house of my God" (1 Chron. xxix. 3). On the occasion of bringing up the ark D. convened a national assembly, the Levites foremost (1 Chron. xiii. 2, 5, 6; xv. 3, 4), and appointed the music, Heman, Asaph, Ethan, with cymbals, others with psalteries and harps, and Chenaniah chief of the Levites for song. D. as a king priest offered burnt offerings and peace offerings and blessed the people in the name of the Lord (1 Chron. xvi. 2; 2 Sam. vi. 17). Michal's contemptuous reception of him when he returned to bless his house (for public piety should be followed by home piety) was the only drawback to the joy of that day (1 Chron. xv. 29, xvi. 43; 2 Sam. vi. 16-23).

As Ps. ci. embodies D.'s good resolutions, of a thankful perfect walk, in entering his new house, followed by Ps. cii. implying distress and praying for deliverance, and Ps. ciii. rendering the thanksgiving here resolved on, the three forming a trilogy; so Psalms xv., xxiv., were composed to commemorate the bringing up of the ark to D.'s tabernacle for it on Zion, whilst the Mosaic tabernacle and altar remained at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 39). The anonymous pilgrim song, Ps. cxxxii., was probably composed like most of the "songs of degrees" (i.e. going up to the three great feasts at Jerusalem) after the return from Babylon, pleading that Jehovah should remember D.'s former zeal for His house, as a ground for remembering D.'s race now in affliction (comp. Ps. lxxxix.). The progress of the ark's removal is traced; whilst we were "in Ephratah (Bethlehem) we heard of it," as a mere hearsay, "we found it in" Kirjath Jearim = the city of the woods. Then the prayer: "arise, O Lord, into Thy rest; Thon and the ark of Thy strength; let Thy priests be clothed with righteousness, and let Thy saints shout for joy," is followed by God's immediate answer exactly corresponding to the prayer: "Jehovah hath chosen Zion . . . this is My rest for ever . . . I will clothe her priests with salvation, and her saints shall shout aloud for joy." Fragments of D.'s poetry he at this time delivered into the hand of Asaph for the tabernacle service (1 Chron. xvi. 8-36). Long afterwards they were embodied in Ps. xevi., which comforts Judah, when threatened by Assyria, with the prospect of Messiah's coming kingdom; also Psalms cv., cvi., which console the Jews, now probably in the Babylonian captivity, with the thought that God's promise of Canaan to their fathers when "few and strangers" there gives hope that God will restore their covenant possession, and pardon their unfaithfulness now that they turn to Him (cv. 12, 23, 41, 45; cvi. 3-6, 44-48). God overruled D.'s words, which in his time applied to the captive Jews taken by Edomite invaders (Ps. lx. title), to snit the nation in the Babylonian captivity, and at present also in their long dispersion.

With D. begins the widely extending Israelite monarchy. The sudden rise of Israel to power and magnificence in the reigns of D. and Solomon for above 50 years, and its collapse at Solomon's death, seem at first sight inconsistent with its position midway between the great rival powers, Egypt and Assyria. But in the East such sudden rises and falls are common, as in the case of Babylon, Media, Persia, Timur, Jenghis Khan. Moreover the monuments show that exactly at that time Egypt and Assyria were exceptionally weak. Egypt after Ramesses III.'s time (1200 B.C.) ceased to be aggressive in the Syrian direction, and continued till Shishak's (Sheshonk's) accession (920 B.C.) quiet and unwarlike. Assyria about 1100 B.C. ruled as far as the Orontes and threatened Palestine, but was defeated by an Aramean monarch 1050 B.C. and driven again beyond the Euphrates. Syria revolted, and Assyria declined in power till 884 B.C. when again Assur-nazir-pal crossed the Euphrates and threatened Syria. For an Israelite empire to arise it was necessary that both its powerful neighbours should be weak. Their simultaneous weakness was precisely at the time of the rise of the Israelite empire under Saul, D., and Solomon, between 1100 and 920 B.C.

Solomon alone of D.'s sons seems to have possessed his father's higher qualities. Solomon's line became united with Absalom's daughter or granddaughter, Maachab, and so carried on the royal race. D.'s strong parental affection betrayed him into too fond indulgence of his sons (2 Sam. xiii. 31-36, xiv. 33, xviii. 5, 33, xix. 4; 1 Kings i. 6). D. "had not displeased Adonijah at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so?" Thus D. laid up scourges in store for himself.

His militia was twelve divisions of 24,000 each, on duty month by month (1 Chron. xxvii.). His body guard numbered 600 "mighty men," subdivided into three bands of 200 each with "the three" over them, and 30 bodies of 20 each with "the thirty" over them. "The captain of the mighty men" commanded the whole, viz. Abishai D.'s nephew (1 Chron. xi. 9-47; 2 Sam. xxii. 8-39). Gad "the seer" represented the old prophetic schools, and accompanied his exile. Nathan's first appearance was to announce the continuation of his dynasty (of which he was the founder and is therefore called "the patriarch," Acts ii. 29) and kingdom. So there were two highpriests, Abiathar and Zadok, representing the two rival Aaronic houses, Ithamar and Eleazar. Also there were the masters of music, Asaph, Heman, Samuel's grandson, and Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv.). D. was the great centre of all, at once himself the soldier, prophet, priest (2 Sam. vi. 14, 17, 18) in acts (his sons are called so 2 Sam. viii. 18, Heb. for "chief rulers"), and poet musician. Such a combination was never before or since realized, and shall only be eclipsed by the Divine Antitype "sitting and ruling upon His throne, and being a priest upon His throne" (Zech. vi. 13).

Within ten years from capturing Zion D. reduced Philistia on the W., Moab on the E. (2 Sam. viii., xxiii. 20), Syria on the N.E. as far as the Euphrates, Edom on the S., and Ammon S.E. The capture of Rabbah, at which D. was present, crowned the last war, in which the ark accompanied the host (2 Sam. xi. 11, xii. 31). The cruel punishment inflicted upon the fighting prisoners was a righteous retribution for Ammon's own cruelties which they sought to inflict on Israel (1 Sam. xi. 2, Amos i. 13). Solomon "the peaceful" was at this time so named in token of universal peace secured. D. had now "a great name like unto the name of the great men in the earth" (2 Sam. vii. 9).

Ps. lxxviii., modelled after Deborah's song (ver. 7, 8; comp. Jud. iv. 14, v. 2.

and ver. 18 with ver. 12), commemorates the ark's return to Zion in triumph, after God had scattered the Ammonites before him; comp. ver. 1, 24 with Num. x. 35, 36. "Thou sett'st a crown of pure gold on his head" (Ps. xxi. 3) alludes to the costly crown of Ammon (2 Sam. xii. 31).

Ps. xlv. is Israel's cry of distress sung by the sons of Korah when Edom had invaded the Holy Land during the absence of D. and his warriors, who were then striving with Arum of the two floods and Arum Zobab, on the Euphrates. Israel's slain lay unburied till Joab returned from smiting Edom. The scattering among the heathen (ver. 11) was only partial (2 Sam. viii. 13, 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 1 Kings xi. 15, 16). Ps. lx. was composed by D. subsequently when he had beaten down Arum Nabaraim (Syria of the two floods), 2 Sam. viii. x. Joab did not return till he had, at the head of the main army, conquered fully the Syrians. The victory over Edom in the Valley of Salt is variously attributed to D. as king, Joab as commander in chief, and Abishai under Joab (2 Sam. viii. 13, x. 10; 1 Chron. xviii. 12). Abishai slew 6000, Joab 12,000. Ps. lx. 4 alludes to the victory as the earnest that the expedition at this time setting out to occupy Edom and Petra, "their strong city" of rock, for its invasion of Israel, would succeed. "Over Edom will I cast out my shoe" in token of taking possession of Edom. The casting of this shoe implied transference of possession (Ruth iv. 7, Josh. x. 24; comp. Ps. lx. 8, 9, 12 with 2 Sam. viii. 14). Ps. cvii. passes from the literal Edom to the foes of God's people in general, of which it was the type (ver. 9, 10).

The three years famine (2 Sam. xxi.) seems to have been chronologically earlier, and only placed where it is as no opportunity for its insertion occurred earlier. "God visits the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation." Saul, who had been so little zealous in fulfilling God's commands against Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 20), "in his zeal to Israel" sought to slay the Gibeonites to whom the Israelites had on oath promised security (Josh. ix.). Jehovah, on D.'s inquiry, declared the famine to be "because of bloodguiltiness (resting) upon Saul's house." So on the Gibeonites' demand, in obedience to the law (Num. xxxv. 33), D. gave up to be executed and hanged on a tree Saul's two sons by Rizpah, and the five sons of Merab (which ought to be read for "Michal"). Saul's eldest daughter, D. spared Jonathan's son Mephibosheth because of the Lord's oath between him and Jonathan. He had probably before this admitted Mephibosheth to his table. Mephibosheth perhaps alludes to his having been spared when the others were put to death, 2 Sam. xix. 24; "all of my father's house were but dead men before my Lord, yet didst thou set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table." D. took this occasion to show his tenderness in giving honourable burial to Saul's and Jonathan's remains.

The great blot of D.'s life, his adultery with BATHSHEBA [see] and murder of Uriah, is omitted in CHRONICLES [see], which avoided all that would tarnish the glory of the kingdom, at the time when Ezra the compiler wished to fire the patriotism of the returned captives from Babylon. Great as is the scandal of D.'s act to the cause of religion, the gain is greater; for God's mercy shines the brighter in covering over the guilt of such a transgressor when, conscience stung at Nathan's rebuke, he truly repented (2 Sam. xi., xii.). Though forgiven at once ("the Lord hath put away thy sin," or else "hath made it to pass" upon thy child: Blunt, Undesigned Coincidences), he did not at once experimentally realize his forgiveness. So in Ps. li. he sues for that which God had already promised by Nathan; and promises, when God should "restore to him the joy of His salvation, he would teach other transgressors the way, and so sinners should be converted to God." This gives the true answer to scoffers. Believers, when left to themselves, fall, and when restored by God's grace become more useful to the church of God than ever. D.'s fall has made many stand upright. It warns saints to walk humbly and not presume. It keeps from despair those who have deeply fallen, assuring them of pardon on repentance. D.'s sorrows ever after show how evil are the results of sin, even after sin has been forgiven. In Ps. xxxii., having realized his forgiveness, he fulfils his promise by teaching backsliding and other sinners the only way of peace, viz. believing, penitent confession to the Lord. God chastises His own people especially for sin, even though He forgive it, both to vindicate His justice before the world (hence Nathan announces "the sword shall never depart from thine house"), and in love to discipline His people themselves (Lev. x. 3, Amos ii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 17). Contrast D.'s true repentance (Ps. li. 4 and 2 Sam. xii.) with Saul's self excusing, reluctant, popularity seeking confession (1 Sam. xv.). The words "build Thou the walls of Jerusalem" refer to D.'s "building from Millo round about," whilst "Joab repaired the rest of the city" (1 Chron. xi. 8). D. feared his sin, in which Joab was his accomplice, might impede the work in which also Joab assisted. His prayer was heard, and the city wall completed by Solomon (1 Kings iii. 1, ix. 15). Yet Ps. li. 18 has been made an argument for dating the psalm after the Babylonian captivity!

Trial after trial clouded his remaining days. First, AMNON'S [see] outrage on Tamar; ABSALOM'S [see] murder of Amnon, expulsion, and almost successful rebellion, in which D.'s murder and adultery were repaid exactly in kind before all Israel (2 Sam. xvi. 22). ABITHOPHEL [see], the grandfather of Bathsheba with whom he sinned, was the instrument of his punishment (comp. Ps. xli. 9, lv. 12-14, 20, 21). D. and all the people "tarried at the house of the distance" (Heb. 2 Sam. xv. 17), i.e. a house so called near the city, on the road to Jericho; "the farthest house," viz. from the city. The personal attachment of his 600 men of the body guard, including men of Gath under Ittai, appears from Ittai's words: "as the Lord liveth, in what place the lord my king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be." He showed his reverence for the ark, and freedom from the superstition that it would save like a charm, by desiring Zadok and Abiathar to carry it back to the city, and casting himself on Jehorah's grace to "bring him back and show him it and His habitation." Crossing Kedron brook and ascending Olivet weeping D. typifies the Man of Sorrows on the night of His betrayal. Hushai, "D.'s friend," with rent coat (the Heb. expresses a priestly garment) met him, and undertook to foil Abithophel's traitorous counsel by countervailing treachery.

We might wonder that so brave a man as D. should betray such fear when first he heard the report of Absalom's conduct: "Arise and let us flee, for we shall not else escape from Absalom; make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly." The people noticed it subsequently: "the king saved us out of the hand of the Philistines, and now he is fled out of the land for Absalom!" The fact is true to nature; for conscience can unman the brave, whilst "thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just." Now Abithophel's desertion reminded D. that it was his own sin with Abithophel's granddaughter which caused this sore chastisement from the Lord. Absalom had from the first calculated on his adhesion, and sent for him to come from his abode in the hill country of Judah, Giloh, whilst he (Absalom) offered sacrifices. Already Absalom had got the king's leave to go to Hebron, a sacred seat of the nation, by the specious lie: "thy servant vowed a vow while . . . at Geshur [imitating with sanctimonious hypocrisy the patriarch Jacob's pious language]. If the Lord shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then I will serve the Lord" (comp. Gen. xxviii. 20, 21). How, with undesigned propriety, D. warns the rebels (Ps. iv. 5), "Offer the sacrifices of righteousness," not those of parricidal rebellion! Abithophel possibly suggested the scheme of the pretended vow and sacrifices. In the Psalms lv. 20, 21, xxxi. 13, lxi., cix., the treachery is plainly laid to his charge. Ps. iii. 1, "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me," coincides with the history; "the conspiracy was strong, for the people increased continually with Absalom" (2 Sam. xv. 12). Ps. iv. seems to refer to the evening of the first day of D.'s flight, at the ford where he passed the night: ver. 8, "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for Thou Lord only," or rather "Thou Lord makest me to dwell in safety alone," i.e. separated from foes; he quotes Deut. xxxiii. 28, Ubadad labatach (comp. Lev. xxv. 18, 19). Having appointed to Zadok, "I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me" (2 Sam. xv. 28), and having received the tidings there from Ahimaaz and Jonathan, D. and his retinue crossed Jordan before dawn. To this time Ps. iii. 5 refers: "I laid me down and slept, I awaked, for the Lord sustained me." Ver. 2 refers to the Benjaminite of Saul's house, Shimei's, cursings the previous day, on D.'s descending from Olivet towards the Jordan and reaching Bahurim: "many there be which say of my soul, There is no salvation (Heb.) for him in God," to which D. replies, "Salvation belongeth to the Lord." In Ps. xlv. 18 D. prays, "Look upon mine affliction and my pain, and forgive all my sin." So in the independent history, when Shimei cast stones at D. (the punishment of an adulterer), and cursing saying, "Come out thou, bloody man, The Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul" (the hanging of Saul's seven sons, 1 Sam. xxi., was probably before this in time and is Shimei's reference), and when Abishai would have punished him, D. meekly (Ps. xlv. 8-10), feeling his sin brought the chastisement, replied in unattended coincidence with the psalm: "Let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse D. It may be that the Lord will look on mine affliction" (2 Sam. xvi. 5-12). Again his words, "It may be that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing," answer to Ps. cix. 28: "Let them curse, but bless Thou." So it came to pass. Shimei the curser had the curse brought home to himself. D. the object of his cursing was finally blessed, and "his throne established before the Lord for ever" (1 Kings ii. 44, 45).

D. learned from Hushai's two messengers during the night Ahithophel's counsel to pursue D. that very night with "twelve thousand" chosen men. How naturally in Ps. iii. 6 he says, "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that have set themselves against me round about."

In Ps. iv. 7 how naturally D. says, "Thou hast put gladness in my heart more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased," when we know from the history that just before (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 2) Ziba had brought him 200 leaves of bread, 100 bunches of raisins, 100 of summer fruits, and wine, supplying D.'s immediate wants, and affording an earnest of Jehovah's continued care. His courage, which conscience had for a time robbed him of, now returned when he saw that God though chastening was not forsaking him; so he, in confidence of restoration, assigned Ziba the land. The revolted had restlessly sought their good from earthly sources, and so had lent a ready ear to the "leasing" (ver. 2, comp. 2 Sam. x. 2-6), i.e. lying promises of Absalom. D.'s cry on the contrary was, "Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us" (Ps. iv. 6). In opposition to their ignoring of God's appointment of D. He warns them, "How long, ye sons of men" (hence ish, "heroes," ironically), with all your boasting will ye not "know that Jehovah set apart him that is godly for Himself?" It is "vanity" for you to think to enthroned ungodliness, as represented by Absalom, in opposition to God's enthronement of the godly principle in the person of D. (ver. 2, 3.)

The 42nd Psalm, by the sons of Korah, speaks in the person of D. when in exile during Absalom's rebellion, beyond Jordan (comp. ver. 6). They regarded him head of their choral school. The faithfulness of the Levites to him appears in 2 Sam. xv. 24. It was D. who appointed the Korahites to lead the tabernacle music (2 Chron. xv. 19; comp. 1 Chron. vi. 16, 22, 32). The title of Ps. cxliii. in the LXX. attributes it also to this period. His head quarters were at Mahanaim, where Ishbosheth previously had reigned. The highland chief BARZILLAI [see] the Gileadite, Shobi son of D.'s former friend Nahash, and put by D. in his insolent brother Hannu's place over Rabbah of Ammon (2 Sam. xii. 30), and Machir son of Ammiel of Lodebar, ministered abundant supplies. Doubtless this, as well as Ziba's providentially brought necessities previously, was before his mind when he wrote his exquisite Ps. xxiii., "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies." Machir's kindness was probably called forth by the remembrance of D.'s kindness to Mephibosheth, Machir's former protégé (2 Sam. xvii. 27, comp. ix. 4). The battle fought in the wood of Ephraim between ABSALOM's [see] forces under Amasa against D.'s forces under Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, was fatal to Absalom. D.'s loving charge, "Deal gently for my sake with the young man, with Absalom," stands in striking contrast with Absalom's unnatural heartlessness (xvii. 2, 4); Ahithophel said, "I will smite the king only," and the saying pleased Absalom well." Not the will, but the wit, to carry out Ahithophel's devilishly wise counsel, was by God's appointment wanting. Hushai's picture of D. as "a man of war, chafed as a bear robbed of her whelps, and hid in some pit," as when an outlaw in Saul's days of old, is true to the life, and frightened the dastardly son, and misled him to his ruin.

D.'s magnanimous forgiveness of Shimei the curser, reinstatement in part of Mephibosheth whose loyalty was somewhat doubtful, and gratitude to Barzillai, all illustrate D.'s noble character. His design of superseding Joab, and appointing Amasa to the chief command, offended Joab and was frustrated by Joab's murder of Amasa. Joab crushed Sheba's rebellion by his promptness and energy at Abel of Beth-Maacah (xx.). So D. was fully reestablished on his throne.

On the CENSUS [see]: "God and Satan had their hand in this work: God by permission, Satan by suggestion; God as a judge, Satan as an enemy; God in just punishment for sin, Satan as in an act of sin; God in a wise ordination of it for good, Satan in a malicious intent of confusion" (Bishop Hall, Contempl. xvi. 6). Satan-suggested pride was the motive and brought on D.'s people, who shared in his sin, a plague which would have lasted "three days" but that the Lord interposed; as it was it lasted "from the morning to the time of assembly" (not as A. V. "even to the time appointed") i.e., to the time of evening sacrifice, three o'clock. The apparition of the angel of the Lord with drawn sword over Jerusalem led D. to intercede, laying all the guilt on himself: "I it is that have sinned; . . . but as for these sheep, what have they done?" Unlike Saul, who laid the blame on the people (1 Sam. xv. 21). Typifying Him who took on Himself the iniquity of us all. Whilst D. pleaded on earth the Lord interceded above; "it is enough; stay now thine hand." Jerusalem was saved, and Arannah's threshing-floor, the scene of the apparition, D. bought as the site of the altar whereon he offered burnt offerings and peace offerings which the Lord accepted by fire from heaven consuming them. This was afterwards the site of the temple altar; Mussulmen have it enclosed, as is thought by many, in their "Dome of the Rock." Certain it is that here (and scarcely anywhere as here) the rock projects above the present level of the ground, whilst all around are either chambers and passages or the shifting sand and rubbish. The 30th Psalm commemorates the "dedication," i.e. consecration, of the house or temple site. The words "of David" in the title do not belong to "the house," but to "a psalm and song," viz. by D. The heaven-sent fire was the consecration of the site, which is called "the house of God" even before the temple was built (comp. 1 Chron. xxii. 1, 2 with Gen. xxviii. 17-19). Pride through prosperity, and a sudden and severe but temporary reverse, appear alike in the psalm and in the history (2 Sam. xxiv., 1 Chron. xxi.). Not the act, but the motive, was the sin, and was displeasing to that unscrupulous man, Joab: ver. 6 (Ps. xxx. 6, 1 Chron. xxi.). The deliverance resulted from D.'s prayer (comp. ver. 8-10 with 1 Chron. xxi. 17, 18); the "sackcloth," ver. 11, accords with 1 Chron. xxi. 16. The "weeping endured for a night," but "joy came in the morning," after the one day's plague: God "put off his sackcloth, and girded him with gladness."

The rest of D.'s life was occupied in preparing Solomon for carrying out his cherished wish of building the temple on this spot. D.'s numerous wars excluded him from building it himself, but the Lord comforted him with the assurance of his son's carrying his design into effect (2 Sam. vii.: 1 Chron. xxii., xxviii., xxix.). And to Solomon therefore D. committed the vast stores which even "in his trouble" D. had prepared for the house of the Lord.

ADONIAH'S [see] conspiracy was the last cloud on D.'s reign. JOAB and ABIAHAR [see] from personal piques (Joab perhaps because of D.'s former appointment of Amasa, and Abiahah because of the honour paid to his rival, Zadok) joined Adonijah. The plot failed through the firmness of Nathan and D. (1 Kings i.) In D.'s old age the young Shunammite Abishag was introduced to cherish his person. D.'s last charge to Solomon directs, first as to Joab, that he should pay the penalty of double murder, that of Abner and Amasa; secondly, that Barzillai's sons should eat at the king's table, in grateful acknowledgment of their loyal services in Absalom's rebellion; thirdly, that Shimei the eunuch on the one hand should "not be held guiltless," on the other hand, as D. swore to him not to kill him with the sword, that Solomon should "not bring down his hoar head with blood to the grave." "Not" must be inserted, for in Heb. when two prohibitions come together the negative is only put in the former clause (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 3). The fact confirms this, for Solomon did not put him to death for his cursing, but kept him under restraint and gave him a chance of life; so that it was Shimei's own disregard of the condition that brought the penalty on him. That personal revenge did not actuate D. is plain, for he restrained Abishag when he would have "taken off his head," and spared him when, as restored to the kingdom, he could have justly destroyed him. At the dying hour least of all was such a man as D. likely to harbour revenge, when about to go before the Judge whose forgiveness we all need. But justice needed that the sin of Joab's and Shimei's past impunity should not lie on D.'s conscience; he therefore gave charge as to both before his death.

The 18th Psalm (2 Sam. xxii.) seems to have been among his latest psalms, for it was written "when the Lord had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies," besides his earliest and deadliest enemy "Saul." To him he refers, ver. 17, "He delivered me from my strong enemy;" to his various heathen enemies whom he vanquished, Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Syria, Zobah (ver. 43), "Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people, Thou hast made me the head of the heathen." The various trials of D. were the occasion of giving birth to those psalms which have been the comfort of God's people in all ages, when in affliction. To Nathan's announcement of the Lord's promise that D.'s "house, his kingdom, his throne should be established for ever" (2 Sam. vii. 13, 16), he refers in ver. 50: "He sheweth mercy to His anointed, to D. and to his seed for evermore." The fatherly discipline through which he had passed, through the instrumentality of Saul and afterwards Absalom, etc., he refers to, ver. 35, "Thy gentleness (P. B. V. 'loving correction') hath made me great." So LXX., Vulg., Syr., "Thy discipline." Comp. as to God's gentleness even in correcting, Isa. xxvii. 8, xl. 11; Hos. xi. 1-4; Acts xiii. 8; marg., "He bore or fed them as a nurse beareth or feedeth her child," Deut. i. 31, xxxii. 10-12; Isa. lxiii. 9; Heb. xi. 6-11. So the Antitype (2 Cor. x. 1), "the gentleness of Christ" (Matt. xi. 28-30). His claim to "righteousness" is not inconsisent with his one or two grievous falls: "the Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness, for I have kept the ways of the Lord" (Ps. xviii. 20, 21); for his sins he sincerely repented of, and the main current of his life was one of communion with God and true striving by faith after holiness. Not only in God's original choice was D. declared to be "a man after Jehovah's own heart" (1 Sam. xiii. 14, Acts xiii. 22), but also in 1 Kings xv. 3-5 it is written "the heart of D. was perfect with the Lord his God . . . he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from anything that He commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite." The impartial truthfulness of the Bible appears in its faithful record of the sins of one of its greatest heroes. His great fall and recovery has saved thousands from despair, and warned thousands. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

The 18th Psalm, "the great Hallelujah with which D. retires from the theatre of life" (Hengstenberg), is followed by the prophetic last will of D. (2 Sam. xxiii. 1.) "D. . . hath said (Heb. naum, the Divine saying of D.), the sweet psalmist of Israel" (Heb. the lovely one in Israel's songs of praise). Not only the first of the dynasty whose shall be the everlasting kingdom, but the one whom God has enabled to sing lovely songs of praise for edifying that kingdom (comp. Balaam's prophecy, Num. xxiv. 3, 15). This Divine utterance of D. through "the Spirit of God speaking by him" is the seal of those prophetic psalms (e.g. ii., xxi., cx.) concerning the eternal dominion of his seed, based on Nathan's prophecy. In spirit he beholds the model Ruler ruling justly in the fear of God, under whom the sons of Belial shall be thrust away and burned, but salvation shall grow for the righteous; and the pledge of this is God's everlasting covenant with him and his house (2 Sam. xxiii. 5), "for is not my house thus with God (i.e. in such a relation to God that the Righteous Ruler will spring from it), for He hath made with me an everlasting covenant . . . For all my salvation and all (God's) good pleasure (Luke ii. 14, Eph. i. 9, expressed in that covenant) should He then not make it to grow?" Solomon's Ps. lxxii. (ver. 6) is evidently based on this his father's last prophetic utterance which describes the coming "just Ruler," Messiah, and the effect of His government, "as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain."

D. died at the age of 70 (Josephus, Ant. viii. 15). On the return from Babylon "the sepulchres of D." still existed between the pool of Siloah and the house of the mighty men (Neh. iii. 16). It became the general tomb of the kings of Judah. "His sepulchre is with us unto this day" (Acts ii. 29). The so-called "tombs of the kings" are outside the walls, and so cannot be the tomb of D. which was within them. Captain Warren, from references in Josephus, thinks the entrance to the king's tomb was outside the N. wall of Jerusalem to the E. D.

may have here quarried the stones for the temple, and then taken advantage of the subterranean recesses so made (called the Cotton Grotto) for the formation of his sepulchre. So peculiar is his character that none else is so called in Scripture; and of him alone of men is Christ called "the Son," as the title marking His earthly kingdom, "the Son of D." (Luke i. 32.) His psalms and those with them are the only liturgy of devotion used in common by Christians of every denomination.

Day. Reckoned from sunset to sunset by the Hebrews. Gen. i. 5: "the evening and the morning were the first day." 2 Cor. xi. 25: "a night and a day." Dan. viii. 14 marg. So our fortnight=fourteen nights. "Evening, morning, and noon" (Ps. lv. 17) are the three general divisions. Fuller divisions are: dawn, of which the several stages appear in Christ's resurrection (Mark xvi. 2, John xx. 1, Rev. xxii. 16, "the bright and morning star" answering to Ajeleth Shahar, "gazelle of the morning," Ps. xxii. title, Matt. xxviii. 1, Luke xxiv. 1); sunrise; heat of the day; the two noons (zaharaim, Heb. Gen. xliii. 16); the cool of the day (Gen. iii. 8); evening (divided into early evening and late evening after actual sunset). Between the two evenings the paschal lamb and the evening sacrifice used to be offered.

"Hour" is first mentioned Dan. iii. 6, 15, v. 5. The Jews learnt from the Babylonians the division of the day into twelve parts (John xi. 9). Ahaz introduced the sun dial from Babylon (Isa. xxxviii. 8). The usual times of prayer were the third, sixth, and ninth hours (Dan. vi. 10; Acts ii. 15, iii. 1). "Give us day by day our daily bread" (Luke xi. 3); i.e., bread for the day as it comes (epiousion arton).

Daysman. Derived from "day" in the sense of a day of trial (1 Cor. iv. 3 marg.). An arbitrator. Job ix. 33: "neither is there any daysman between us that might lay his hand upon us both." The umpire in the East lays his hand on both parties to mark his power to adjudicate between them. An arbitrator could have been found on a level with Job; but none on a level with Jehovah, the other Party with whom Job was at issue. We Christians know a Mediator on a level with God, and also on a level with us, the Godman Jesus (1 Tim. ii. 5).

Deacon. The appointment of the seven was designed to remedy the "murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration." The apostles said, "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve (the deacons to; diaconen) tables," i.e. secular business. It is an undesigned coincidence confirming the narrative, that whilst no mention is made of their country their names are all Grecian. The church's design evidently was that, as the murmurers were Grecians, their cause should be advocated by Hellenists. There was a common fund to which most disciples contributed by the sale of their property, and out of which the widows were relieved; a proof of the strong conviction of the truth of Christianity, which could constrain men to such self sacrifice. It is doubtful whether these seven answer fully to the modern deacons of either episcopal or congregational churches. On the one hand the distribution of alms was the immediate occasion of their appointment; on the other the qualifications involved higher functions, "men . . . full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom." The result was, "the word of God increased, and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly, and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith; and Stephen (one of the seven), full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people." Philip, too, was an "evangelist." They were probably commissioners to superintend the deacons in distributing the alms, so that the Grecian (Hellenist, Greek-speaking Jewish) widows should not be neglected, and at the same time to minister in spiritual things, as their solemn ordination by laying on of hands implies.

The "young men" (Acts v. 6, 10, neoteroi) imply a subordinate ministration answering to the "deacons" (Phil. i. 1, 1 Tim. iii. 8, etc.). As bishops and presbyters or elders are different aspects of the same upper ministry, so "young men" and "deacons" are different aspects of the same subordinate ministry. Clement of Rome (1 Cor. xlii.) notices that the LXX. (Isa. lx. 17) prophetically use the two together. The synagogue had its "pastors" (poiarisim) and its subordinate "deacons" (chazanin) or ministers (Luke iv. 20). From it the church naturally copied. The deacon baptized new converts, distributed the bread and wine of the Lord's supper (Justin Martyr, Apol., 65, 67), and distributed alms, at first without superintendence, afterwards under the presbyters. The diaconate was not a probationary step (as now in episcopal churches) to the presbytery. What is meant by 1 Tim. iii. 13 is, "they that have used the office of a deacon well are acquiring to themselves (not a good degree for promotion, but) a good standing place" against the day of judgment (1 Cor. iii. 13, 14); not a step to promotion.

Deaconess. Rom. xvi. 1: "Phœbe, servant" (Gr. deaconess) of the church at Cenchrea." 1 Tim. iii. 11: "even so (marking a transition to another class from deacons) must the women (i.e. the deaconesses) be grave," etc. Domestic duties are omitted, though specified in the case of the deacons (ver. 12). The same qualifications are required in deaconesses as in deacons, with such modifications as the difference of sex suggested. Pliny in his letter to Trajan calls them "female ministers." The earliest instance of such female ministers (though of course not then formally appointed) is in Luke viii. 2, 3: "Mary Magdalene, Joanna, and Susanna, and many others which ministered unto Him of their substance." The social seclusion of women from men in many parts of the East would render necessary the services of women in teaching those of their own sex. See also Widows: an ecclesiastical order of widowhood, a female presbytery, existed from those of at least 60 years old, standing in the same relation to the deaconesses of younger age (1 Tim. v. 9-11) that the male presbyters did to the deacons.

Dead Sea. The name in the O. T. is never this, but "the SALT SEA" [see], "sea of the plain."

Debir. 1. In the highlands of Judah, near Hebron. First taken by Joshua (Josh. x. 38, 39, xi. 21, xii. 13, xv. 49). Formerly Kirjath Sepher (city of the book), or K. Samah (palm). There is still a Debir (near three miles W. of Hebron. But D. was S. of Hebron (Josh. xv. 49); so Van de Velde identifies it with Dilbeh, S.W. of Hebron. Conder (Pal. Expl.) better identifies it with El Dhoheriye, a corruption of the old name Deberah, meaning in Arabic "the village on the ridge." Exactly at 3000 (16 inch) cubits on the main S. road a large stone still there marked the bounds assigned outside to D. as a Levitical city (which also may be the limit of a sabbath day's journey); and another stone on the W. At 6½ miles northward are the "upper and lower springs," which Caleb's daughter begged for, in the valley Seil el Dilbeh, in all 14 springs divided into three groups; no other such are found in the Judah "south country," or Negeb; a brook flows through the small gardens for four or five miles (Jud. i. 15, Josh. xv. 19). Conder states the important discovery that "the list in Josh. xii., which precedes all the other topographical lists, forms the key of the whole system." They are the 31 royal cities; these divide the country into districts which have natural boundaries, and contain severally one or more of the royal cities. D. stood, according to Josh. xv. 19, in "a dry land" ("south land"), therefore Dilbeh near fine springs cannot be the site. Dhoheriye is remarkable for its broad rolling downs and fruitful soil; it is truly "a dry land" without a spring. Joshua returned to (made a detour to attack) D." (x. 38-40.) His direct march after Eglon and Lachish would have been northwards from Hebron to Gilgal, therefore it was probably S.W. of Hebron. The Negeb or "south land" consists of soft, porous, chalky limestone extending from the desert on the E. (the Jeshimon) to Anab and the plain on the W., and from Dilbeh and Yutta on the N. to Beer-sheba on the S. The dwellings of Dhoheriye are mostly caves in the rock, with rude arches carved over doorways; rock excavation is a mark of great antiquity, and is a relic of the troglodyte or primitive Canaanite way of living. It was originally the seat of a king of the Anakim. This people reoccupied it when the Israelite army withdrew and was engaged with the northern Canaanites. Othniel, son of Kenaz, for love of Achisab, Caleb's daughter, took it again. It was allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 15, 1 Chron. vi. 58). 2. A place on the northern bound of Judah, near the valley of Achor (Josh. xv. 7), between Jericho and Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 7). 3. Part of the boundary of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26); in the high pastures E. of Jordan, and possibly akin to dabar, Heb. for a wilderness pasture. Reland identifies it with Lodebar.

Debir. King of Eglon (a town in the lowland of Judah), one of the five hanged by Joshua (x. 33).

Deborah. 1. Rebekah's nurse (Gen. xxiv. 59), faithful as a servant from Rebekah's childhood, and so, when dead at an advanced age, lamented as much as one of the family. Her burial place at the oak beneath Bethel was hence called Allon-Bachuth, "the oak of weeping" (xxxv. 8). She was in Jacob's household now, as she had been in his mother's, who was by this time dead, as appears from ver. 27.

2. The prophetess and judge—a bee, a personal or possibly an official name applied to poets, seers, and priestesses. The symbol of a monarch in Egypt; a honey bee to her friends, a stinging bee to the enemy (Cornelius a Lapide). "Lived under the palm tree"; a landmark, as palms were rare in Palestine (Jud. iv. 5); possibly=Baal Tamar, "the sanctuary of the palm" (xx. 33). Wife of Lapidoth; "a mother in Israel," a patriotic and inspired heroine like Miriam. Jabin oppressed the northern tribes adjacent to Hazer his capital (Zebulun, Naphtali, and Issachar, which she judged). Barak, at her call, summoned these (to whom the central tribes, Ephraim, Manasseh [Machir], and Benjamin in part sent contingents, ver. 14) in a long train (daw: v. 6, 7) toward the broad topped mount Tabor. D. accompanied him at his request. With but 10,000 in his train ("at his feet"), by the Lord's interposition, descending from mount Tabor, he discomfited Sisera's mighty host and 900 chariots who were in the famous battlefield of Jezreel or Esdraelon, in the valley of Kishon. D.'s prediction was fulfilled by the "Lord's selling Sisera into the hand of a woman," viz. Jael, the Kenite Heber's wife. Enthusiasm for the cause of Israel, so closely allied with the Kenites through Moses' father in law Hobab, caused her to commit the treacherous murder.

The praise, "blessed above women in the tent (i.e. shepherdesses) shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be" commends her faith, not her treachery. Some actions of faith are mixed with the corrupt motions of the flesh, as that of the midwives and Rahab's treatment of the spies. So Jael's act showed real faith in the case of God's controversy with the godless Canaanites. The approval of her faith, the mainspring of her conduct, by no means implies approval of the deceit by which its true character was obscured. Yet faith is precious and "blessed" in spite of grievous infirmities, and will at last outgrow and stifle them utterly. God is keen to see the faith, slow to condemn the fault, of His children.

D. and Barak together sang the song of victory composed by her. It begins with a reference to Jehovah's original, grand, and awful manifestation at Sinai (Exod. xix., Deut. xxxiii. 2), the sealing of the covenant with Israel, and the ground of all His subsequent interpositions for them. Then follows Israel's deep degradation, its high-ways deserted, its 40,000 soldiers (a round number for a diminished army) without shield or spear, because they forsook Jehovah for "new gods" (comp. Deut. xxxii. 17). Then "war (pressed up) to their (very) gates." But now deliverance is come, for which "bless the Lord." All should join in "speaking" His praise: the upper classes "who ride upon white-spotted asses," and those "that sit upon coverings" (niddin, the rich, Matt. xxi. 7) spread upon the asses; also the humbler "who walk on the way," foot travellers. Those delivered from the plundering "archers" who infest "the places of drawing water" to plunder the shepherds, shepherdesses, and their flocks in lawless times (Exod. ii. 17), should rehearse there, now that all is peace, "the Lord's righteous acts." "Then shall the people of Jehovah go down (from their past mountain hiding places) to their gates" and towns now delivered. "Barak, lead away thy captivity (train of captives) captive" (quoted in Ps. lxxviii. 18); fulfilled exhaustively in Christ the ascended Conqueror (Eph. iv. 8, 13). "Out of Zebulun came they that handle the pen of the writer," i.e. the scribes of the host (Jer. li. 25) who wrote down the names of the soldiers. "Barak was sent by his feet into the valley," i.e. impelled irresistibly to the battle. "At the brooks of Reuben were great resolutions of the heart," but issuing in no practical action, the tribe resembling their forefather; Reuben preferred hearing "the bleatings of the flocks" to the blast of the war trumpets. Dan with its port Joppa preferred merchandise to warring for the fatherland. "Asher abode in his bays." "The kings of Canaan took no gain of money," i.e. no booty, as they expected, from the battle; for "the stars from heaven fought against Sisera;" i.e., a Jehovah-sent storm beat in their faces and on the Israelites' back (Josephus), swelling the Kishon, which suddenly fills up the dry channel and overflows the plain of Esdraelon, making it impassable with mud, especially to chariots, so that the "prancing horses" and their "mighty" riders were swept away. Meroz might have intercepted the retreating Issachar and Sisera, but is "cursed by the angel of Jehovah" for not doing so; and Jacl is "blessed" for her zeal, though mixed with earthly alloy. So "the land had rest 40 years." [See BARAK.] Neither Elmd nor Jacl are in the list of examples of faith in Heb. xi. Jacl apparently received Sisera in good faith, with the intention of hospitality, but a sudden impulse may have urged her to destroy the enemy of God's people. Her faith and patriotism are commendable, but not the means she took of delivering Israel.

Decapolis. Thrice mentioned in Scripture: Mark v. 20, which shows it was around Gadara; vii. 31; Matt. iv. 25. A district containing ten cities, rebuilt, colonized, and granted special privileges by Rome 65 B.C. Other cities afterwards receiving similar privileges cause confusion as to which are the original ten; probably Scythopolis (W. of Jordan), Hippos, Gadara, Philadelphia, Pella, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Damascus, Raphana (all E. of Jordan). The region once so populous is now almost without inhabitants, except a few living in savagery amidst the ruins and cavern tombs of Scythopolis, Gadara, and Canatha.

Dedan. Son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. x. 7), brother of Sheba. A second D. is son of Jokshan, son of Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3), and is brother of a second Sheba. The recurrence of the same names points to an intermarriage between the Cushite (Ethiopian, rather Hamitic) D. and the Semitic D., which is referred to as Edomite (Jer. xlix. 8, xxv. 23; Ezek. xxv. 13; Isa. xxi. 13, "ye travelling companies (merchant caravans) of Dedanim"). The Cushite D. near the head of the Persian gulf and Chaldaea, the avenue of commerce to India, is referred to in Ezek. xxvii. 15, as the names in the context prove; but ver. 20 D. is connected with N.W. Arabia, and associated with Assyria (23), i.e. the Semitic or Edomite D., yet also connected with the Cushite "Sheba and Raamah" (22) on the Persian gulf. The Semitic Sabaeans, descended from Sheba tenth son of Joktan, dwelt in S.W. Arabia from the Red Sea to the straits of Bab el Mandeb. Ezekiel thus recounts the two channels of merchandise, Raamah on the Persian gulf, and Sheba on the Red Sea in Arabia. The name D. still remains in Dailan, an island on the border of the Persian gulf. [See RAAMAH.]

Dedication, Feast of. John x. 22. In "winter," about our December (1 Macc. iv. 52-59, 2 Macc. x. 5). Commemorating the purging of the temple and rebuilding of the altar after Judas Maccabeus had driven out the Syrians, 164 B.C. It began on the 25th of Chisleu (December), the anniversary of Antiochus Epiphanes' pollution of the temple 167 B.C. Lasted eight days. Celebrated like the feast of tabernacles with much joy and singing, and with carrying of branches. The Hallel was sung in the temple daily. The feast was called "lights," and there was much illumination of houses.

The "dedication of the second temple" was on the 3rd of Adar (Ezra vi. 15, 16); that of Solomon's temple at the feast of tabernacles (1 Kings viii. 2, 2 Chron. v. 3).

Deep. Rom. x. 7, "who shall descend into the deep?" A proverb for impossibility: "say not in thine heart, I wish one could bring Christ up from the dead, but it is impossible." Nay, salvation "is nigh thee," only "believe" in the Lord Jesus raised from the dead, "and thou shalt be saved." Gr. abyss (Luke viii. 31), lit. the bottomless place. Transl. in Rev. ix. 1, 2, 11, xi. 7, 17, "bottomless pit."

The demons in the Gadarene besought not to be cast into the abyss, i.e. before their time, the day of final judgment. 2 Pet. ii. 4: they are "delivered into chains of darkness, and reserved unto judgment." They are free to hurt meanwhile, like a chained beast, only to the length of their chain (Jude 6). The "darkness of this present world," the "air" (Eph. ii. 2), is their peculiar element; they look forward with agonizing fear to their final torment in the bottomless pit (Rev. xx. 10). Language is used as though the abyss were in the lowest depth of our earth. We know not whether this be literal, or an accommodation to human conceptions, to express the farthest removal from the heavenly light.

Degrees, Songs of. Fifteen: Ps. exx.—cxxxiv.: four by David, one by Solomon, ten anonymous. Pilgrim songs: shir ham'alothe, "a song for the ascendings," i.e. for the going up (Jerusalem and its temple being regarded as on a moral elevation above other places, as it was in fact on the most elevated table-land of the country, requiring a going up from all sides) to the three great feasts (Exod. xxxiv. 21; 1 Kings xii. 27, 28); Ps. exxii. 1, 4, which is the oldest, being composed by David to supply the northern Israelites with a pilgrim song in their journeys to Zion, whither Asaph had warned them to repair now that the ark was transferred from Shiloh thither (Ps. lxxviii. 67-69). Solomon wrote Ps. exxvii., round which as a centre a third poet, on the return from Babylon, grouped, with David's four psalms, ten others, seven on one side and seven on the other. The simple style, brevity, and transitions formed by retaining a word from the previous verse (e.g. exxi. 1, 2, "whence cometh my help; my help cometh," etc.), are suitable to pilgrim-song poetry. They all have a general, not an individual, character, referring to the literal and the spiritual Israel, whom God's providence always and in all places guards (Ps. exxi., cxvii., cxv. 5, cxviii. 6, exxx. 8, exxxi. 3). The posture of affairs contemplated in most of these psalms is that after the Babylonian captivity, when the building of the temple was interrupted by the Samaritans. The sanctuary in exxxv. 2 is the altar erected at the return, 536 B.C., for the daily sacrifice (Ezra iii. 2-4, 8). The temple was completed under Zerubbabel the governor and Joshua the highpriest, with the help of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra v. 1, 2; vi. 14).

Dehavites. Ezra iv. 9. Persian colonists planted in Samaria by the Assyrian king Esarhaddon, after carrying away Israel. Probably the Dahi (Herodotus, i. 125). Widely scattered; under the name Dabæ, at the E. of the Caspian (Strabo, xi. 8, § 2, and 9, § 3), and near the sea of Azof; also as Dacians, upon the Danube. Possibly, ancestors of the Danes.

Dekar. Marg. 1 Kings iv. 9.

Delaiah = Jehovah's freedman; the modern Godfrey. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 18. 2. Ezra ii. 60; Neh. vi. 62, 61. 3. Neh. vi. 10. 4. Interceded that the king Jehoiakim would not burn Jeremiah's prophetic roll, but in vain (Jer. xxxvi. 12, 25).

Delilah = the languishing one. A Philistine harlot, of the valley of Sorek, whom the five Philistine lords, when they found Samson loved her, bribed for 1100 shekels each to be their political emissary, to find out from Samson the secret of his strength. On four different occasions she tempted him to tell the secret. On the third occasion Samson trifled so presumptuously with the Divine gift committed to him as to suggest that his seven consecrated locks should be woven with the web; when we go to the edge of temptation our fall is near. This "languishing" prostitute, with her vile challenging of his "love," "How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me?" and by daily vexing importunity, wrung the secret from him at the fourth time. His strength lay in dedication to God, of which his Nazarite locks were the sign. Laying down his head in her lap he lost them, and with them lost God in him, the spring of a strength which was not his own. Lust, severing from God the source of strength, makes the strongest powerless; only by waiting on the Lord, we, like Samson, renew the strength which was lost by self-indulgence and self-reliance. Contrast Dan. i. 8-16; Isa. xl. 30, 31; Prov. vii. 6-27. So Israel, strong whilst faithful to Jehovah, incurs the curse which Balaam, however wishing it, could not inflict, the moment that the people commits whoredom with the daughters of Moab (Num. xxv. 1, 6; xxxi. 15, 16).

Deluge. See NOAH.

Demas. Contracted from DEMETRIUS, or Demarehus. Paul's "fellow labourer," along with Mark and Luke (Philem. 24), and companion (Col. iv. 14) during his first Roman imprisonment. But he declined; for in 2 Tim. iv. 10 Paul writes, "D. hath forsaken (Gr. left behind) me, having loved this present world (world course), and is departed unto Thessalonica," probably his home (Chrysostom). Love of worldly ease and home comforts was his snare, a sad contrast to "all them that love Christ's appearing" (ver. 8).

Demetrius. 1. A maker of silver portable models of the great temple and statue of Artemis (Diana) at Ephesus (Acts xix. 24). They were kept as amulets against danger. D. and his fellow craftsmen, in fear for their gains, raised a tumult against Paul as saying "they be no gods which are made with hands." Like many men he made regard for religion his plea, whilst really having an eye to self; "not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought, but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised and her magnificence destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth." A religious party cry is sure to rouse many who care little at heart about piety. It shows how soon Christianity, notwithstanding its seeming weakness, was felt as a mighty power threatening heathendom with all its then greatness. 2. A Christian "having good report of all men, and of the truth itself," and of John (3 John 12). The gospel standard of truth witnessed his conformity to it in love and good works; a transparent real Christian.

Deputy = proconsul, or propraetor; Gr. anthupatos. The supreme governor of the provinces left by the emperors still under the Roman senate (Acts xiii. 7; xix. 38, plural for singular). The emperor gave the peaceable provinces to the senate. Over these the senate appointed those who had been praetors; governing only one year; having no power of life and death, not wearing sword or military costume (Dion. Cass., lii. 13, 14). Achaia had been imperial, governed by a procurator, but was restored to the senate by Claudius (Tacitus, Ann., i. 76; Suet., Claud., 25). So Gallio is rightly named "proconsul" or "deputy" (Acts xviii. 12). Cyprus after the battle of Actium was an imperial province (Dion. Cass., liii. 12), but five years later was given to the senate and had a deputy; so accurately Acts xiii. 7, 8, 12. A coin of Ephesus, in the senate's province of Asia, illustrates the use of "deputies" in Acts xix. 38.

Derbe. Near Lystra, E. of the upland plain of Lycaonia, stretching eastwards along the N. of the Taurus range. Probably near the pass ("the Cilician gates") from the plain of Cilicia up to the table land of the interior. Paul fled thither from Iconium and Lystra (Acts xiv. 6, 20, 21; xvi. 1). In enumerating places (2 Tim. iii. 11) he mentions Lystra but not D., though in the independent history they are mentioned together: a delicate instance of accuracy, for he is here enumerating only those places where he suffered persecution. Gaius or Cains belonged to D., Paul's companion in travel (Acts xx. 4). Identified by Hamilton (Researches in Asia Minor, ii. 313) with Dire, near the roots of Taurus near lake Ak-gol.

Desert. Not meaning a barren, burning, sandy waste, in the case of Sinai and Palestine. Sand is the exception, not the rule, in the peninsula of Sinai. Even still it is diversified by oases and verdant valleys with wells. Much more formerly, for traces exist in many parts of Egyptian miners' smelting furnaces. But forest after forest being consumed by them for fuel, the rain decreased, and the fertility of the land has sunk down to what it now is.

Arabah (now the Ghor) is the designation of the sunken valley N. and S. of the Dead Sea, especially the N., the deepest and hottest depression on the earth. Though in its present neglected state it is desolate, it formerly exhibited tropical luxuriance of vegetation, because the water resources of the country were duly used. Jericho, "the city of palm trees," at the lower end, and Bethshean at the upper, were especially so noted. Though there are no palms growing there now, yet black trunks of palm are still found drifted on to the shores of the Dead Sea (Ezek. xlvii. 8). In the prophets and poetical books arabah is used generally for a waste (Isa. xxv. 1). It is not so used in the histories, but specifically for the Jordan valley. [See ARABAH.]

The wilderness of Israel's 40 years wanderings (Parau, now the Tih) afforded ample sustenance then for their numerous cattle; so that the sceptic's objection to the history on this ground is futile. Mudbar, the regular term for this "desert" or "wilderness" (Exod. iii. 1, v. 3, xix. 2), means a pasture ground (from dabar, "to drive flocks") (Exod. x. 26, xii. 38; Num. xi. 22, xxxii. 1). It is "desert" only in comparison with the rich agriculture of Egypt and Palestine. The midbars of Zipli, Maon, and Paran, etc., are pasture wastes beyond the cultivated grounds adjoining these towns or places; verdant in spring, but dusty, withered, and dreary at the end of summer.

Charbah also occurs, expressing dryness and desolation: Ps. cii. 6, "desert," commonly translated "waste places" or "desolation." Also Jeshimon, denoting the wastes on both sides of the Dead Sea, in the historical books.

The transition from "pasture land" to "desert" appears Ps. lxx. 12, "the pastures of the wilderness" (Joel ii. 22).

Deuel. Num. i. 14, vii. 42; in iii. 14 Reuel, the Heb. r closely resembling d.

Deuteronomy = repetition of the law. Containing Moses' three last discourses before his death, addressed to all Israel in the eleventh month of the last year of their wanderings, the fortieth after their departure from Egypt; with the solemn appointment of his successor Joshua, Moses' song, blessing, and the account of his death subjoined by Joshua or some prophet (i. 1—iv. 40; v. 1—xxvi. 19; xxvii. 1—xxix. 29). The first is introductory, reminding Israel of God's protection and of their ungrateful rebellion, punished by the long wandering; and warning them henceforth to obey and not lose the blessing. The second discourse begins with the ten commandments, the basis of the law, and develops and applies the first table; next declares special statutes as to (1) religion, (2) administration of justice and public officers, (3) private and social duties. The third discourse renews the covenant, reciting the blessings and curses. The discourses must have been all spoken in the eleventh month; for on the tenth day of the forty-first year Jordan was crossed (Josh. iv. 19). Josh. i. 11, ii. 22, three days previous were spent in preparations and waiting for the spies; so the encampment at Shittim was on the seventh day (Josh. ii. 1). Thirty days before were spent in mourning for Moses (Deut. xxiv. 8); so that Moses' death would be on the seventh day of the twelfth month, and Moses began his address the first day of the eleventh month, fortieth year (Deut. i. 3). Hence the discourses, being delivered about the same time, exhibit marked unity of style, inconsistent with their being composed at distant intervals. The style throughout is hortatory, rhetorical, and impressive. A different generation had sprung up from that to which the law at Sinai had been addressed. Parts of it had been unavoidably in abeyance in the wilderness. Circumcision itself had been omitted (Josh. v. 2). Now when Israel was to enter Canaan, their permanent abode, they needed to be reminded of much of the law which they but partially knew or applied, and to have under Divine sanction, besides the religious ordinances of the previous books, supplementary enactments, civil and political, for their settled organisation. Thus D. is not a mere summary recapitulation, for large parts of the previous code are unnoticed, but Moses' inspired elucidation of the spirit and end of the law. In it he appears as "the prophet," as in the previous books he was the historian and legislator.

Two passages especially exhibit him in this character. The first xviii. 15-19: "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; according to all that thou desiredst of the Lord . . . in Horeb, Let me not hear again the voice of . . . God, . . . that I die not; and the Lord said, I will raise thee up a Prophet . . . and I will put My words in His mouth . . . And whosoever will not hearken unto My words which He shall speak in My name, I will require it of him." In the ultimate and exhaustive sense Messiah fulfils the prophecy; xxiv. 10 expressly says "there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." So Num. xii. 6-8, Heb. iii. 2-5, state how the Antitype exceeded the type. In a lower sense the whole order of prophets, the forerunners of the PROPHET, is included; hardly Joshua, for he was already designated as Moses' successor (Num. xxvii. 18, 23), and the prophecy contemplates a future "prophet." Our Lord Himself must have had this prophecy in view in John v. 46, "Moses wrote of Me." The Samaritans, who received the pentateuch alone, must have drawn their expectation of the all-revealing Messiah from it: "when He is come He will tell us all things," answering to "I will put My words in His mouth . . . He shall speak in My name." In Acts iii. 22, etc., vii. 37, Peter and Stephen both quote it as fulfilled in Jesus. The Jews, the adversaries of Christianity, are our librarians, so that we Christians cannot have altered the passage to favour our views. It at once foretells Christ's coming and their own chastisement from God ("I will require it") for "not hearkening" to Him.

The second passage is chap. xxviii., where he declares more fully than in Lev. xxvi. what evils should overtake Israel in the event of their disobedience, with such specific particularity that the Spirit in him must be not declaring contingencies, but foretelling the penal results of their sin which have since so literally come to pass; their becoming "a byword among all nations whither the Lord has led them"; their being besieged by "a nation of a fierce countenance, until their high walls wherein they trusted came down"; their "eating the fruit of their own body, the flesh of their sons and daughters, in the straitness of the siege, and the eye of the tender and delicate woman being evil toward the husband of her bosom and toward her child which she shall eat for want of all things secretly in the siege"; their dispersion so as to "find no ease, and the sole of their foot to have no rest among the nations," but to have "a trembling heart, failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind, their life hanging in doubt, in fear day and night, and having none assurance of life"; "the whole land (xxix. 23) not sown, nor bearing, nor having grass." Nay, more, Moses foresaw their disobedience: "I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you, and evil will befall you in the latter days" (xxxii. 29). So also xxxii., Moses' song.

But in the distant future he intimates, not merely their continued preservation, but also a time when Israel, dispersed "among all the nations, shall call to mind how all these things, the blessing and the curse, have come upon them, and shall return unto the Lord with all their heart and soul; though they be driven unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord their God gather them, and He will circumcise their heart, and make them plenteous in the fruit of their land, and again rejoice over them for good" (xxx., also xxxii. 36, 43). In xxxii. 8 Moses intimates that from the beginning the distribution of races and nations had a relation to God's final purpose that Israel should be the spiritual centre of the kingdom of God; "when the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel," i.e., that their inheritance should be proportional to their numbers.

The coincidences of Moses' song with other parts of the pentateuch and of D. confirm its genuineness. The style is no more different than was to be expected in a lyrical, as compared with a historical, composition. The 90th Psalm, which is Moses' work, resembles it: ver. 1, 13-16, with Deut. xxii. 4, 7, 36; explain ver. 5, "they are not His children but their spot," i.e. a disgrace to them (to God's children). Also 42, not "from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy," but "from the head (i.e. the chief) of the princes of the enemy." These are the germs in Moses which the prophets expand, setting forth the coming glory of the gospel church, and especially of Israel under the final Messianic kingdom. Herein D., "the second law," is the preparation for the gospel law; and Moses, in the very act of founding the Sinaiic law, prepares for its giving place to the higher law which is its end and fulfilment.

The falsity of the theory that D. is of a later age is proved by the fact that the archaisms of vocabulary and grammar characterizing the pentateuch occur in D. The demonstrative pronoun hæcel, characteristic of the pentateuch, occurs Deut. iv. 42, vii. 22, xix. 11, and nowhere else but in the Aramaic (1 Chron. xx. 8 and Ezra v. 15). The use of hæ local. The future ending in vn. The passive construed with eth of the object. Keseb for Kebeš (xiv. 4). Zakur for Zakar (xvi. 16). Ancient words: abib, yeguum, shegar, alaphum, methim, hermeesh for magal, teneh for sal. The Canaanite ashteroth hatzion, "offspring of the flocks." Yeshurun, for Israel, copied in Isa. xlv. 2. Madveh, "sickness." The resemblance of Jeremiah to D. is accounted for by the fact that the sins denounced in D. were those abounding in his time. Jeremiah, as a priest of Anathoth, familiar with the law from childhood, naturally adopts the tone of D. (as does Huldah his contemporary; comp. 2 Kings xxii. 16, etc., with Deut. xxii. 2, etc.), both in denunciation and in final consolation. Possibly too the book of the law found in the temple by Hilkiah the highpriest and brought before king Josiah, after disuse for the 60 years of the two previous reigns, was D. alone. But if it was the whole pentateuch put by the Levites, at Moses' command, in the sides of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 9, 26; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14), still D. was the part that mainly awakened the conscience of king and people (Deut. xii. 2, 3, xvi., xviii., xix. 25-27; comp. 2 Kings xxii. 13-17, xxiii.). Josiah's reforms are just those most insisted on in D. Jeremiah was son of Hilkiah, probably akin to the highpriest, and his uncle Shallum seemingly husband of Huldah the prophetess. But whilst having some resemblances the language and idioms of Jeremiah are of an altogether later date than D. Whilst he imitates or repeats phrases of D. he uses characteristic expressions never found in D.; for instances see Introd. to D., Speaker's Comm. The writer of D., if a forger, would never, having the rest of the pentateuch before him, have left seeming discrepancies between his work and it, when desiring his work to appear as if by the same author. The original writer, Moses, alone could treat his own work in such a free spirit.

The different circumstances and objects in view clear the seeming discrepancies. Thus the directions in Deut. xii. 6, 17, xiv. 22, 28, 29, xxvi. 12, etc., do not supersede the directions in Lev. xxvii. 30-34, Num. xviii. 20, etc. The earlier directions refer to the general and first tithe of all produce, animal and vegetable, for the maintenance of the priests and Levites. The later in D. refer to the second and additional tithe on the increase of the field only, and for celebrating the sacred feasts each first and second year in the sanctuary, every third year at home with a feast to the Levites, the stranger, fatherless, and widow; like the love-feasts of N. T. (Deut. xi. 5.) The first tithe is taken for granted in D. (x. 9; xviii. 1, 2), and no fresh injunction as to it is given, it being from the first recognised in Gen. xiv. 20, xxviii. 22, as well as in Leviticus and Numbers.

The different way in which the priests and Levites respectively are regarded in D. and in the preceding books [in these "the Levites" ministering to the priests "the sons of Aaron," as the priests minister to God (Num. iii. 5, etc., iv.; Exod. xxviii. 1, xxix. 1, etc.), and not mentioned as "blessing" the people, the prerogative of the priests (Num. vi. 23-27, comp. Dent. x. 8, 9); but in D. (xviii. 7, xi. 6) the Levites and Aaronite priests not being mutually distinguished, and Korah not being mentioned with Dathan and Abiram in their rebellion] is accounted for by the consideration that Moses in D. is addressing the people, and for the time takes no notice of the distinction of orders among ministers, and, similarly referring to the rebellions of the people against God, takes no notice of the minister Korah's share in the rebellion, as not suiting his present purpose. His additional enactments are just of that supplementary and explanatory kind which would come from the legislator himself, after a practical experience of the working of the law during the years of the wilderness wanderings. In ix. 14, "thou shalt not remove . . . landmark which thy of old time have set in thine inheritance which thou shalt inherit," "they of old time" are those about first to occupy the land. Moses lays down a law for distant generations, as the land was to be a lasting inheritance; the words "thou shalt inherit" prove that the occupation was still future. The relaxation granted in Deut. xii. 15 as to killing in all their gates, whereas in Lev. xvii. 3, 4, the victim even for ordinary eating must be killed at the door of the tabernacle, is precisely what we might expect when Israel was on the verge of entering Canaan, which they were at the time of the delivering of D.

Our Lord attests D. by quoting from it alone the three passages where-with He foiled the tempter in the wilderness (Matt. iv. : Deut. viii. 3, vi. 13, 16). St. Paul (Rom. x. 6, 19; xv. 10) attests it (Deut. xxx. 12, 18; xxxii. 21, 43). Moses tells us that all the words of this law he wrote and gave to the Levites to be put in the side of the ark at the one time (Deut. xxxi. 9, 22-26). St. Paul's quotations, "Rejoice, O ye nations (Gentiles), with His people," and "I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people," prove that Moses did not understand his own law as possessing that localized narrowness to which Judaism would restrict it.

Many circumstances which would naturally be noticed on the eve of Israel's entrance into Canaan occur for the first time in Moses' last address. Now first he enjoins the observance of the three great feasts (mentioned previously), at the place which the Lord shall choose (xii. 5). Now first he introduces the appointment of judges in the different cities (xvi. 18, xix. 11, xxi. 18). Tents were the abodes spoken of in the previous books, now houses. In first recording the appointment of captains, he attributes it to Jethro's counsel (Exod. xviii. 17, etc.); in repeating the fact to the people (Deut. i. 9, etc.) he notices their part in the selection. Jethro doubtless suggested the plan, and Moses, after consulting God, laid it before the people, assigning the choice to them. So in Num. xiii., xiv., the Lord commands the sending of the spies; and in addressing the people (Deut. i. 19, etc.) Moses reminds them of what was not noticed before, but was most to his point now, their share in sending them. They had been told to go up at once and possess the land, but requested leave first to send spies; God in compliance with their wish gave the command. His allusion to the Lord's anger and exclusion of himself, when speaking of that of the people, accords with the character of the meekest of men (i. 34-38). A forger would magnify the miracles in referring to them; Moses alludes to them as notorious, and uses them only as an incentive to enforce obedience. His notices of the children of Esau supplanting the Horims by God's help, and Moab supplanting the giant Emim (ii. 9-13) are made the argument why Israel need not, as their fathers, fear the giant Amakims. References to Jehovah's miraculous descent on Horeb are only so introduced as would be clear to the people if they had been spectators, and not otherwise. Finally, one miracle not noted in the direct narrative he here adds: "thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (viii. 2-4, xxix. 5, 6). He mentions this just at the fit place, where the real author would put it, as the people were on the point of entering Canaan, where the natural means of procuring food and raiment being attainable, the supernatural would cease. All these prophecies and harmonies confirm the genuineness and authenticity of D. See Graves, Pentateuch, i. 70-110.

Devil = (Gr.) the accuser or slanderer (Job i. 6-11, ii. 1-7; Rev. xii. 10). Heb. Satan means adversary. The twofold designation marks the twofold objects of his malice, the Gentiles and the Jews.

There is but one Devil, many "demons" as A.V. ought to translate the plural. Devil is also used as an adjective. 1 Tim. iii. 11, "slandereuses"; 2 Tim. ii. 3, "false accusers." Peter when tempting Jesus to shun the cross did Satan's work, and therefore received Satan's name (Matt. xvi. 23); so Judas is called a "Devil" when acting the Devil's part (John vi. 70). Satan's characteristic sins are lying (John vii. 44, Gen. iii. 4, 5); malice and murder (1 John iii. 12, Gen. iv.); pride, "the condemnation of the Devil," by which he "lost his first estate" (1 Tim. iii. 6; Job xxxviii. 15; Isa. xiv. 12-15; John xiii. 31, xvi. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6).

He slanders God to man, and man to God (Gen. iii., Zech. iii.). His misrepresentation of God as one arbitrary, selfish, and envious of His creature's happiness, a God to be slavishly feared lest He should hurt, rather than filially loved, runs through all heathen idolatries. This calumny is refuted by God's not sparing His only begotten Son to save us. His slander of good men, as if serving God only for self's sake, is refuted by the case of "those who lose (in will or deed) their life for Christ's sake."

Demons, "knowing ones," from a root daenai, to know, are spirits who tremble before, but love not, God (Jas. ii. 19), incite men to rebellion against Him (Rev. xvi. 14). "Evil spirits" (Acts xix. 13, 15) recognise Christ the Son of God (Matt. viii. 29, Luke iv. 41) as absolute Lord over them, and their future Judge; and even flee before exorcism in His name (Mark ix. 38). As "unclean" they can tempt man with unclean thoughts. They and their master Satan are at times allowed by God to afflict with bodily disease (Luke xiii. 16): "Satan hath bound this woman these eighteen years" with "a spirit of infirmity," so that she was "bowed together." Scripture teaches that in idolatry the demons are the real workers behind the idol, which is a mere "nothing." Comp. 1 Cor. x. 19-21, 1 Tim. iv. 1, Rev. ix. 20. Comp. Dent. xxxii. 17, Heb. shedim, "lords" (1 Cor. xvii. 5); Acts xvi. 16, "a spirit of divination" (Gr. of Python, an idol); xvii. 18, "a setter forth of strange gods" (Gr. demons); 2 Chron. xi. 15, Ps. cvi. 37, Lev. xvii. 7. Idolatry is part of the prince of this world's engines for holding dominion. Our word "panic," from the idol Pan, represented as Satan is, with horns and cloven hoofs, shows the close connection there is between the idolater's slavish terror and Satan his master. The mixture of some elements of primitive truth in paganism accords with Satan's practice of foiling the kingdom of light by transforming himself at times into an "angel of light." Error would not succeed if there were not some elements of truth mixed with it to recommend it. Corrupting the truth more effectually mars it than opposing it.

Satan as Beelzebub (Matt. xii. 24-30) is at the head of an organized kingdom of darkness, with its "principalities and powers" to be "wrestled" against by the children of light. For any subordinate agent of this kingdom, man or demon, to oppose another agent would be, reasons Christ, a division of Satan against Satan (involving the fall of his kingdom), which division Satan would never sanction (Eph. vi. 12, 13). Demons are "his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 7, 9). Natural science can give no light when we come to the boundary line which divides mind from matter. The Bible-asserted existence of evil among angels affords no greater difficulty than its manifest existence among men. As surely as Scripture is true, personality is as much attributed to them as it is to men or to God.

Possession with or by a demon or demons is distinctly asserted by Luke (vi. 17, 18), who as a "physician" was able to distinguish between the phenomena of disease and those of demoniacal possession. The Spirit of God in the evangelists would never have sanctioned such distinction, or left men under a superstitious error, not merely connived at but endorsed, if the belief were really false. There is nothing wrong in our using the word "lunacy" for madness; but if we described its cure as the moon's ceasing to afflict, or if the doctor addressed the moon commanding it to leave the patient alone, it would be a lie (Trench, Miracles, 155). In Matt. iv. 24, "those possessed with demons" are distinguished from "those lunatic" (probably the epileptic, but even this caused by a demon: Mark ix. 14, etc.). Demons spake with superhuman knowledge (Acts xvi. 16); recognised Jesus, not merely as son of David (which they would have done had their voice been merely that of the existing Jewish superstition), but as "Son of God" (Matt. viii. 29). Our Lord speaks of demons as an instalment or earnest of the final "fall" of Satan before the kingdom of Christ (Luke x. 18). Men might imagine the existence of demons; but swine could only be acted on by an external real personal agent; the entrance of the demons into the swine of Gadara, and their consequent drowning, prove demons to be objective realities. Seeing that bodily disease itself is connected with the introduction of evil into the world, the tracing of insanity to physical disorganization only partially explains the phenomena; mental disease often betrays symptoms of a hostile spiritual power at work.

At our Lord's advent as Prince of Light, Satan as prince of darkness, whose ordinary operation is on men's minds by invisible temptation, rushed into open conflict with His kingdom and took possession of men's bodies also. The possessed man lost the power of individual will and reason, his personal consciousness becoming strangely confused with that of the demon in him, so as to produce a twofold will, such as we have in some dreams. Sensual habits predisposed to demoniacal possession. In pagan countries instances occur wherein Satan seemingly exercises a more direct influence than in Christian lands. Demoniacal possession gradually died away as Christ's kingdom progressed in the first centuries of the church.

There are four gradations in Satan's ever deepening fall. (1) He is deprived of his heavenly excellency, though still having access to heaven as man's accuser (Job i. ii.), up to Christ's ascension. All we know of his original state as an archangel of light is that he lost it through pride and restless ambition, and that he had some peculiar connection, possibly as God's vicegerent over this earth and the animal kingdom; and thereby we can understand his connection and that of his subordinate fallen angels with this earth throughout Scripture, commencing with his temptation of man to his characteristic sin, ambition to be "as gods knowing good and evil," only his ambition seems to have been that of power, man's that of knowledge. His assuming an animal form, that of a serpent, and the fact of death existing in the pre-Adamite world, imply that evil probably was introduced by him in some way unknown to us, affecting the lower creation before man's creation. As before Christ's ascension heaven was not yet fully open to man (John iii. 13), so it was not yet shut against Satan. The old dispensation could not overcome him (comp. Zech. iii.). (2) From Christ to the millennium he is judicially cast out as "accuser" of the elect; for Christ appearing before God as our Advocate (Heb. ix. 24). Satan the accusing adversary could no longer appear against us (Rom. viii. 33, 34). He and his angels range through the air and the earth during this period (Eph. ii. 2, vi. 12). "Knowing that he hath but a short time" (Rev. xii.), in "great wrath" he concentrates his power on the earth, especially towards the end, when he is to lose his standing against Israel and expulsion shall be executed on him and his by Michael (Rev. xii. 7-9; Dan. xii. 1; Zech. iii.), where Joshua the highpriest represents "Jerusalem," whose "choice" by the Lord is the ground of the Lord's rebuke to Satan. (3) He is bound at the eve of the millennium (Rev. xx. 1-3). Having failed to defeat God's purpose of making this earth the kingdom of Christ and His transfigured saints, by means of the beast, the harlot, and finally Antichrist, who is destroyed instantly by Christ's manifestation in glory, Satan is bound in the bottomless pit for a thousand years during which he ceases to be the persecutor or else seducer of the church and "the god and prince of the world" that "lieth in the wicked one." (4) At its close, being loosed for a while, in person Satan shall head the last conspiracy against Christ (permitted in order to show the security of believers who cannot fall as Adam fell by Satan's wiles), and shall be finally cast into the lake of fire for ever (Rev. xx. 7-10). As the destroyer he is represented as the "roaring lion seeking whom he may devour" (1 Pet. v. 8). As the deceiver he is the "serpent." Though judicially "cast down to hell" with his sinning angels, "and delivered into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment" (2 Pet. ii. 4), he yet is free on earth to the length of his chain, like a chained dog, but no farther. He cannot hurt God's elect; his freedom of range in the air and on earth is that of a chained prisoner under sentence.

Devoted thing (Lev. xxvii. 28).

Cherem. Man was not to be offered in sacrifice. Trans. Lev. i. 2: "if any man of you bring an offering to Jehovah from the beasts, from the herd or from the flock shall ye bring your offering" (comp. Exod. xiii. 13, xxiv. 20; Num. xviii. 15). But certain persons and nations were doomed by God, who alone has the prerogative of taking, as He alone gives, life. Man in carrying out God's clearly revealed sentence is the executioner bound to execute God's will. So magistrates and soldiers (Rom. xiii. 4). So Israel utterly destroyed the Canaanites at Horeb (Num.

xxi. 2, 3; Deut. xiii. 12-18). So Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord (1 Sam. xv. 33). Rash vows, as Saul's (1 Sam. xiv. 24) and Jephthah's (Jud. xi. 30), are no objection to the soundness of the principle, for here self-will usurps the right of devoting another's life which belongs to God alone. Sacrifices rest on a different ground, viz. the voluntary offering of an innocent life of a creature without blemish, approved of God to represent the great Substitute. The heathen confounded the two ideas, the devoted thing under a ban (as criminals and captives), and the sacrifice of one's flock or herd as a voluntary offering in worship; but Scripture keeps them distinct.

Dew. In Palestine falling in early summer, again in autumn, and supplying the absence of rain. So copious as to saturate Gideon's fleece, so that a bowl full of water was wrung out, and to wet the ground in one night (Jud. vi. 37-40). A leading source of fertility (Gen. xxvii. 28, Deut. xxxiii. 13, Job xxix. 19, Hos. xiv. 5, Isa. xlviii. 4, Zech. viii. 12). Its being withheld brought barrenness (1 Kings xvii. 1, Hag. i. 10). Its speedy drying up symbolises the formalist's goodness (Hos. vi. 4, xiii. 3). On the other hand its gentle, silent, benignant influence, diffusing itself over the parched ground, represents the blessed effect of God's word and God's grace (Deut. xxxii. 2); also brotherly love (Ps. cxxxiii. 3), the "dew of Hermon (i.e. copious and refreshing dew) that descended upon Zion"; or else, believers from various parts are joined by brotherly love on the one spiritual Zion, like the countless dewdrops wafted together, if it were physically possible, from various mountains, as Hermon, to the one natural Zion. The effect on the world of brotherly love among various believers would be like that of dew, all simultaneously saturating the dry soil and making it fruitful (John xvii. 21, 23). The dew springing "from the womb of the morning," not by visible irrigation, is the emblem of youthful, fresh, living, beautiful, infinite vigour, viz. that of Christ and of Christ's people in union with Him (Ps. ex. 3). Israel shall hereafter be "in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord" (Mic. v. 7); overwhelming their enemies "as the dew falleth on the ground" (2 Sam. xvii. 12), and as "life from the dead" to the millennial earth, as "the dew of herbs" causes them to revive after the deadness of winter (Isa. xxvi. 19).

Diadem. [See CROWN.] The diadem in Gentile nations was a white fillet, two inches broad, bound round the head, the badge of the monarch. In Persia the king's diadem differed from that of the queen and the highest princes, in having an erect triangular peak. In Israel mitzenepheth is always the highpriest's turbaned cap, "mitre," or "diadem," (Isa. xxviii. 5) "diadem (tzeprirah) of beauty."

Dial ma'aloth, "degrees" or "steps" (Isa. xxxviii. 8). The sun dial and the division of the day into 12 hours were Babylonian inventions. As Ahaz copied the altar at Damasus (2 Kings xvi. 7, 10) so he probably copied the sun dial 700 B.C. But the division into 12 hours is not implied in the O. T. [See DAY.] The "degrees" were "steps" ascending to his palace (Josephus). The shadow of a column or obelisk fell on a greater or less number of steps according as the sun was high or low. The dial was of such a size and so placed that Hezekiah, when convalescent, could witness the miracle from his chamber; probably "in the middle court," the point where Isaiah turned back to announce to Hezekiah God's answer to his prayer (2 Kings xx. 4, 9; Isa. xxxviii. 21, 22). Ahaz' intimacy with Tiglath Pileser would naturally lead the "princes of Babylon to inquire of the wonder done in the land," which shows that the miracle of the recession of the shadow on the dial was local, perhaps produced by divinely ordered refraction, a cloud denser than the air being interposed between the gnomon and the "degrees" or "dial."

Diamond. Third in the second row of precious stones on the highpriest's breastplate (Exod. xxxviii. 18). Yahalom, which some trans. "onyx," others trans. the jasper. There is no proof the diamond was then known. Its engraving is very difficult, and the large size of the stones on the highpriest's breastplate makes it not probable the diamond is meant. Shamir is the usual term. [See ADAMANT.]

Diana = Gr. ARTEMIS (Acts xix.). Her original temple founded 580 B.C., finished 460, was burnt by Erostratus 356 B.C. The second temple, alluded to in Acts, was built in the reign of Alexander the Great. The Ephesian D. in attributes resembled the Phoenician ASTARTE, ASHTORETH [see]. She symbolised the generative and nutritive powers of nature, and so was represented with many breasts. On her head was a mural crown, each hand held a metal bar, the lower part was a rude block covered with mystic inscriptions and animals. The image was believed to have fallen from heaven, probably an aerolite. The bee was sacred to her, and her highpriest was called by a corresponding name (essen), as also the hierarchy of women (Melisse) and eunuchs (Megabyze). The temple was the public treasury and bank, and had the right of asylum. No bloody sacrifices were allowed. As Ephesus was the capital of Asia [see] in the limited sense, D. of Ephesus was naturally the idol "whom all Asia and the world worshipped." Games were celebrated at Ephesus in her honour, and her worship was the tie uniting politically Ephesus and other cities. In the great theatre at Ephesus, on one of the walls of the entrance lobby, Mr. Wood found a letter from the emperor Hadrian to the Ephesians, dated Sept. 20th, A.D. 120, and an inscription referring to the temple of D., concerning its endowments and ritual, such as lists of votive statues of gold and silver with their weights and the regulations under which such objects were to be carried in procession. In the list mention occurs of many figures of D.

with two stags. This illustrates the Scripture mention of DEMETRIUS [see] the silversmith as the maker of silver portable models of D.'s shrine. The inscription orders such votive objects to be carried in procession on certain days from the temple through the Magnesian gate to the great theatre, and thence through the Coressian gate back to the temple. This clause gave a clue to the discovery of the temple. First Mr. Wood found the Magnesian gate, and at a depth of 11 ft. a road with tombs on each side and the bases of piers. Secondly, near the stadium he found the Coressian gate. At the convergence of these two roads he found with their donors' names and the dedication to Artemis or D. The promaos was fenced off from the peristyle, as some of the mortices for the iron standards have been discovered. Remains of a wide portico surrounding the temple on three sides have been discovered. The base of one column remains in situ, of the outer row of columns, also one of the inner row. The temple was octastyle, eight columns in front. It has 18 on the sides, and the intercolumniations are three diameters, making the temple diastyle. Pliny's statement is correct, the external and internal pillars being 120. The projection of the sculpture of "the 36 the enclosing wall of the temple and an inscription that Augustus built it; also a white marble pavement on a level bed of black marble and several drums of columns, 6 ft. 4 in. in diameter, including the sculptures in relief, and Ionic capitals, all now deposited in the British Museum. The intercolumniations are more than 19 ft. Gold was largely used in the decoration. A fragment was found, composed of two astragals, between which a fold of lead infolded a fillet strip of gold. Remains of brilliant colours too are found, blue, in the background, red and yellow, prominent. The bases of several of the columns are inscribed carved columns" is as much as 13 in. The diameter of the columns themselves is about 5 ft. 10 in. The width of the platform measured at the lowest step was 238 ft. 3½ in., the length is 421 ft. 4 in.; Pliny gives the length 425 ft. The dimensions of the temple itself, "out to out," are 163 ft. 9½ in. by 308 ft. 4½ in. The height of the platform was 9 ft. 5½ in. The interior was adorned with two tiers of elliptical columns, Ionic and Corinthian, fragments of which are found near the walls of the cella or inner shrine. Diblain = doubled grape cakes. Gomer, Hosea's (i. 3) wife, was "daughter of D." i.e., wholly given up to sensuality. [See DOSEA.]

Diblath. Rather DIBLAH (Ezek. vi. 14). "I will make the land desolate from the wilderness (midbar) to Diblah," i.e. from the unclosed pastures S. and S.E. of Palestine to some town in the extreme N., probably Riblah, r and d from close resemblance becoming easily interchanged by copyists. Here it was that Nebuchadnezzar had sat in judgment on the last Jewish king, Zedekiah, and killed his sons before his eyes, and then blinded him and slain the chief men of Jerusalem.

Dibon. 1. Originally a town of Moab. Taken by Sihon, king of the Amorites (Num. xvi. 30). Taken from Sihon with his other possessions by Israel, and assigned to Gad (Num. xxxiii. 33, 34); mentioned also as belonging to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 9), the two pastoral tribes less strictly defining their boundaries than settled populations would. Gad rebuilt it and gave it the name D. Gad (Num. xxxiii. 45). It was in Moab's possession in Israel's time (Ex. 2, Jer. xlviii. 18, 22, 24). Called also Dimon, m and b being often interchanged. D. was probably the modern Dibon, on low ground three miles N. of the Arnon; trans. Isa. xv. 2, "D. (the people of D.) is gone up to the high places," the usual places of sacrifice. The Rev. F. A. Klein, of the Church Missionary Society, in travelling from Es-Salt to Kerak was informed by a sheikh of the Beni Hamide of the now well known basalt stone of Dibon, with its remarkable inscription by King Mesha. It was 3½ ft. high, and 2 in breadth and 1½ in thickness; rounded off at both ends. Unfortunately the Arabs, in jealousy of the Turkish government which demanded the surrender of the stone, broke it in pieces by lighting a fire around and throwing cold water on it; but not before M. Ganneau had secured an impression of the inscription. Capt. Warren obtained another impression and fragments of the stone. Ganneau and Warren subsequently obtained most of the fragments; so that only one seventh of the whole is missing. It is now in the Louvre at Paris. Of 1100 letters 660 have been secured. The first part (lines 1-21) records Mesha's wars with Omri, king of Israel (i.e. his successors); the second (line 21-31) his public buildings; the third part (31-34) his wars against Horonaim with the help of Chemosh, "the abomination (idol) of Moab." The Moabite stone confirms the connection of Israel with Moab, founded on their common descent through Lot and Abraham, and afterwards renewed through Ruth and her descendant David. The language of the stone is almost identical with that of the historical portions of the Hebrew Bible. The Alaph S, He 7, Fau 3, and Vel 3, are used (just as in the Old Test.) as "matres lectionis," to express vowel sounds, and the He at the end of a word, confirming the Masoretic text. The alphabet is almost the same as the Phœnician one. It has the 22 letters of the earliest Hebrew, except Teth, which probably is on the missing fragments. The present square Hebrew characters, which we find in our Hebrew Bibles, are probably of Chaldean origin, and resemble those in the inscriptions at Palmyra. The Greeks borrowed their alphabet from the Phœnicians. In Isa. xv. 2 Dibon is termed a "highplace"; Mesha on the stone terms it his birthplace, and chose it as the site of his monument. The phrase of "Mesha" (named on the stone just as we read it 2 Kings iii. 4-27), "Chemosh let me see my desire upon all my enemies," is word for word, substituting Jehovah for the idol of apostate Moab, David's phrase (Ps. lxx. 10). The revolt of Mesha (recorded on the stone) from Judah, to which he had paid a tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (2 Kings iii. 4, Isa. xvi. 1), was probably in Abaziah's reign, who died 896 B.C., so that as early as nine centuries B.C. the alphabet was so complete as it appears on the stone. As this tribute seems enormous for so small a country it was probably imposed temporarily as compensation for damages sustained in the revolt of Moab after Ahab's death. Or if the revolt followed the tragic end of the confederacy of Judah, Israel, and Edom against Moab (2 Kings iii. 26, 27), the date of the stone is but little later, and the completeness of the alphabet on it shows it was then no recent invention. [See ALPHABET.]

Jehoshaphat's own territory had been previously invaded by Moab (2 Chron. xx.). Hence he was ready to ally himself to Abaziah (2 Chron. xx. 35); then to Jehoram and Edom against Moab. Mesha's words on the stone imply that he had more than Israel alone to contend with: "he let me see my desire upon all my enemies" (line 4).

A confirmation of the Scripture account of Mesha's defeat by the three confederates appears in the Black Obelisk from Nimrud, of the same age as the Moabite stone. Moab is omitted in the list of Syrian independent states confederate with Benhadad of Damascus against Shalmaneser of Nineveh. Scripture explains why; Moab was then subject to Judah. In later Assyrian lists, when Moab had recovered its independence, three distinct Moabite kings are named.

The circuitous route taken by the three confederates to invade the E. of Moab is probably accounted for by the fact recorded on the Moabite stone; Mesha was carrying all before him in the W., and it would have been dangerous to have assailed him in that quarter. The stone notices expressly Israel's oppression of Moab in the reign of "Omri king of Israel and his son (and 'his son's son' is to be supplied in one gap of the inscription) forty years," and Mesha's breaking off the yoke; after which it says "all D. was loyal"; whereas previously "the men of Gad dwelt in the land of Ataroth" (comp. Num. xxxii. 34-38), and "the king of Israel fortified" it. The 40 years would be the round number for the 36 during which Omri, Ahab, and Abaziah reigned. The Moabite stone probably takes up the narrative broken off at 2 Kings iii. 27. There we read "Israel departed from the Moabite king, and returned to their own land;" ultimately, the Dibon stone informs us Mesha took town after town of Gad, "Medeba, Jahaz, Dibon, and Kir." Thus is explained how these towns in Isa. xv., xvi. (150 years later), are assigned to Moab, though David (2 Sam. viii. 2) had long before so effectually subjugated the nation. From the time of Mesha, Israel was from time to time subjected to Moabite invasions (2 Chron. xx. 1, 2 Kings xiii. 20). Mesha, according to the Dibon stone, "built (i.e. rebuilt and fortified) Baalmeon, Kiriathaim, and Nebo," all once in Reuben's hands; also "Bezer" (Deut. iv. 43). Mesha says in the inscription on the basalt stone, "I made this high place a [stone] of salvation;" comp. Ebenezer, "the stone of help," 1 Sam. vii. 12 marg. See "The Moabite Stone," by W. P. Walsh.

In three points the Dibon stone confirms Scripture: (1) The men of Gad dwelt in the land of old. (2) Moab's successes caused the confederacy of Israel, Judah, and Edom. (3) Moab's successes in the N.W. forced the allies to take the circuitous route S.E. 2. Dibon, reinhabited by men of Judah, returned from Babylon (Neh. xi. 25) = Dimonah.

Dibri: of Dan, father of Shelomith, whose son by an Egyptian husband was stoned for blaspheming Jehovah (Lev. xxiv. 11).

Didymus. Gr. twinn = Heb. Thomas. John xi. 16, xx. 24, xxi. 2.

Diklah. Arab tradition confirms Gen. x. 26-29 in making Joktan (= Kaitan) the great progenitor of all the pure tribes of central and southern Arabia. Thus Almodad = the Arabic Almudad; Sheleph = Es-Sulef in the Yemen; Hazarmaveth = Hadravant on the S.E. coast of Arabia; Diklah = Dakalah, an important city in the Yemen; it means a fruit-abounding palm tree.

Dilean. A city of the shephelah or low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 38), meaning gourd or cucumber. Perhaps now Tina, S. of Ekron, in Philistia.

Dimnah. A city of Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 35). Possibly = Rimmon (1 Chron. vi. 77).

Dimon. E. of the Dead Sea in Moab (Isa. xv. 9). Probably = Dibon, as a play between it and dam, "blood"; Dimon's waters shall be full of dam.

Dimonah. A city in southern Judah, near the Idumean desert (Josh. xv. 22 = Dibon), Neh. xi. 25.

Dinah. The feminine of Dan = judget, avenger, Jacob's daughter by Leah. After his return from Mesopotamia he pitched his tent in Shechem, and bought a field of Hamor, Shechem's father. D. then at maturity between 13 and 15 years old, through her parents' remissness and her own love of sight seeing (she "went out to see the daughters of the land"), instead of being a "keeper at home" as young women ought to be (Tit. ii. 2), gave occasion to Shechem to "see" (contrast Job xxxi. 1), and last after, and defile her. Sin, shame, and death enter the soul through the windows of the eyes and ears (Gen. xxxiv. 7). Evil communications corrupt good manners. Fondness to see novelties, worldly fashions, and worldly company, ruin many. "It is the first step that costs." The laxity of Canaanite morals ought to have made both her parents and herself more on their guard. Josephus (Ant. i. 21) states she went to a Canaanite annual festival of nature worship (comp. Num. xxv. 2). Young women are often led astray as much by their own sex as by the other.

Shechem offered the usual reparation, marriage, and a payment to her father. This was sufficient among Hebrews, according to Dent. xxii. 28, 29. But the offence was by an alien. Hamor therefore proposed to establish intermarriage and commerce between the two peoples. But Simeon and Levi, her own brothers, eager for revenge, required the Circumcision [see] of the Shechemites as a condition of union, a rite already known in Egypt as an act of priestly consecration; and when the feverish pain of the operation was at its height, on the third day, the two brothers, with their retainers, took cowardly advantage of their state, attacked, and slew all the males in the city. Their vindication of Israel's sacred calling, separated from the Gentiles, was right; and their refusal to sacrifice Jehovah's promises for the Hivite prince's offers of mammon was right. Seduction still is punished by death among the Arabs, generally inflicted by the brothers. "They were very wroth, because he had wrought folly in Israel," the phrase for offences, especially carnal ones, against the honour and calling of the people of God (Dent. xxii. 21, Jud. x. 10, 2 Sam. xiii. 12). But the way they took was treacherous, cruel, and wicked. The innocent townsmen were punished with the one delinquency, and all the sons joined in plundering the town. Jealousy for the high calling of Israel was made the plea for gross sin against the God of Israel. Jacob in reproving them lays stress only on the dangerous consequences of their crime, "ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land . . . and I . . . being few . . . they shall gather themselves and slay me," because it was the only argument that would weigh with his sons; but his dying words show his abhorrence of their "cruelty" and "cursed anger" (Gen. xlix. 5-7). Nothing but Jehovah's special interposition saved him and them from the penalty; xxxv. 5, "the terror of God was upon the cities . . . round about them, and they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob."

God made this tragedy the occasion of reviving Jacob's earnestness, which had declined into worldliness for a time through his settlement near Shechem (xxxiii. 17-20); reminding him of his vow to make an altar at Bethel to God, who had appeared to him there in the day of his distress when fleeing from Esau. So his family gave up their strange gods and purified themselves, and Jacob went up to Bethel and fulfilled his heretofore forgotten vow. Thus God overruled evil to good (xxxv. 1-5).

Dinaites. Canaan colonists planted in Samaria by the Assyrians, after Shalmaneser's carrying away of the ten tribes (Ezra iv. 9).

Dinhabah. Gen. xxxvi. 32, 1 Chron.

i. 43. The king of Edom, Bela's capital. In the list of Edomite kings the son does not succeed the father; the monarchy must therefore have been elective, and the kings chosen by the "dukes" (40-43), who ruled subordinately and contemporaneously with the kings.

Dinner. The early meal, generally at 11 o'clock, as "supper" was the later meal, and that to which friends were asked as to a feast (Luke xiv. 12).

Dionysius the Areopagite. Converted through Paul at Athens (Acts xvii. 34), by tradition its first bishop.

Diotrephes. 3 John 9, "loving to have the preeminence" through ambition. A Judaizer, who opposed the missionaries when preaching grace to the Gentiles, see ver. 7. He "prated against" John and the orthodox "with malicious words"; he "received not" John, but not receiving with love the brethren whom John recommended (Matt. x. 40). His influence was so great that he "cast out" of the church such as were disposed to receive them. But Neander thinks that the missionaries were Christian Jews who "took nothing of the Gentiles" (ver. 7), in contrast to the Jews who elsewhere abused ministers' right of maintenance (2 Cor. xi. 22, Phil. iii. 2, 5, 19); and that D. stood at the head of an ultra-Pauline party of anti-Jewish tendency, fore-runners of Marcion. This accounts for D.'s domineering opposition to the missionaries and to John, whose love combined with truth sought to harmonize the various elements in the Asiatic churches. Demetrius is praised as of the opposite spirit to D.; as the former was to be followed, so the latter to be shunned (ver. 11, 12).

Perhaps D. as local bishop simply resented the interference of John's apostolic legates as an infringement of his personal rights. For whereas in the 2nd Epistle of John corruption of doctrine is spoken of as disqualifying one from the hospitality of the church, in this 3rd Epistle no hint is given of erroneous doctrine; but only of D.'s "love of preeminence." D. and the presbyters influenced by him (whether as their bishop or not) treated the apostle's messengers as persons claiming an authority derogatory to his own. But John (ver. 10) uses language implying his own unquestionable power of restraining D.'s "prating" opposition: such as none but an apostle could properly have employed, an indirect confirmation of the Johannine authorship of the epistle.

Discerning of spirits. 1 Cor. xii. 10. Discerning between the operation of God's Spirit and that of the evil spirit, or unaided human spirit claiming to utter the dictates of God's Spirit. Acts v. 1-11, viii. 23; 1 Cor. xiv. 29, 37: "if any man think himself to be a prophet or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord." This it is which assures us of the inspiration of the N. T. The books were accepted as inspired, by churches having men possessing "the discerning of spirits" (1 John iv. 1, 1 Tim. iv. 1).

Diseases. The effect of sin's entrance.

Healed by the Lord Jesus, as Isaiah foretold, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. viii. 17, Isa. lili. 4, 1 Pet. ii. 24). His bearing our guilt in His manhood, assumed with all its infirmities, was the ground of His sympathetically feeling for and relieving our sickness by His miraculous power. At His second coming His people "shall not say, I am sick," for "they shall be forgiven their iniquity" (Isa. xxxiii. 24).

Dish. Guests handled food with their fingers. Each dips a "sop" or piece of bread in the dish, and takes up therewith a portion of meat or other contents of the dish. Judas' dipping in the same dish as the Lord betokened friendly intimacy. To hand a delicate morsel from the dish was a compliment (John xiii. 25-27, Matt. xxvi. 23).

Dishan. Gen. xxxvi. 21, 28, 30; 1 Chron. i. 38, 42.

Dishon. 1. [See DISHAN.] Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21, 26, 30. 2. Gen. xxxvi. 25.

Dispensations. Various dispensations have been traced in the development of God's dealings with mankind. (1) The dispensation of innocence in Eden. (2) The Adamic dispensation of promise (Gen. iii. 15) after the fall, down to the flood; the remembrance of the promise being kept alive by sacrifice. (3) The Noachian dispensation, like the Adamic, requiring, besides the duties of the light of nature, repentance for sin, faith in God's mercy, hope of the promised Saviour, kept up by sacrifices; to which were added the prohibition to shed blood of man on penalty of death, and to eat animals' blood, and the permission to eat flesh (Gen. ix.); extending from the flood to Abraham. (4) The Abrahamic covenant of more explicit promise (Gen. xii., xv., xvii., xxii.; Gal. iii.), extending to the dispensation of (5) The law, which was parenthetically introduced to be the schoolmaster until Christ, the end of the promise and the law, should come.

It is made an objection to the Jewish dispensation that it was restricted to one nation; but its influence extended beyond Israel to the adjoining nations, Egypt famed for wisdom, the Canaanites for war, Phœnicia for commerce, and ultimately to Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. Comp. Exod. ix. 16; Num. xiv. 20, 21; Jer. xxxix. 12, xl. 2. [See DANIEL] (iv. 37, vi. 25-27; Ezra i. 1, etc.) Zoroaster was probably contemporary with Daniel, and drew from the Heb. Scriptures the principles on which he reformed the Persian religion which had become corrupted by the worship of fire, and of an evil principle as well as a good. Judæa's position at the head of the Mediterranean, near Phœnicia, Egypt, Assyria, and Greece, adapted it for a worldwide influence.

The Divine Lawgiver from the very time of instituting the law (Dent. xviii.) looked forward to (6) the Christian dispensation, which was to embody its spirit whilst superseding its letter (2 Cor. iii. 6-18). The gospel dispensation is the last, and is called "the world to come" (Heb. ii. 5), "the ends of the world" (1 Cor. x. 11), "these last days" (Heb. i. 2), "the kingdom of God" or "of the heavens" (Matt. iv. 17). It has successive stages: (i) the present, "the ministration of the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 8), "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24), the period during which "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation" (Luke xvii. 20); (ii) the epiphany of the glory of the great God and Saviour (Tit. ii. 13), the manifested kingdom when He "will restore it to Israel" (Acts i. 6, 7; Ezek. xxi. 27), and Himself shall "take His great power and reign" with His transfigured saints for a thousand years over the nations in the flesh, and Israel at their head (Zech. xiv.; Isa. ii., lxx., lxxvi.; Rev. xi. 15, 17, v. 10, xx); (iii) the final ages of ages, when there shall be the new heavens and earth, and the holy new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven (Rev. xxi., xxii.).

Dispersion. [See CAPTIVITY.] Galluth (Jer. xxiv. 5, Ezra vi. 16). Lit. "the spoliation," those stripped of the temple and home of their fathers. LXX. used diaspora, "dispersion," in Deut. xxviii. 25; comp. xxx. 4, "driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven"; Jer. xxxiv. 17, John vii. 35, "the dispersed among the Gentiles." They became in God's gracious providence seed sown for a future harvest in the Gentile lands of their sojourn (1 Pet. i. 1). The dispersion included all the twelve tribes, the ten carried away by the Assyrians as well as Judah carried to Babylon, though Judah alone returned to Palestine (Jas. i. 1, Acts xxvi. 7).

"The pilgrim troops of the law became caravans of the gospel" (Wordsworth). The difficulties of literally observing the Mosaic ritual, whilst in Babylon and elsewhere, led them to see that they could be united by a common faith, though unable to meet at the same Jerusalem temple, and that the spirit of the law is the essential thing when the letter is providentially set aside. Still, connection with the temple was kept up by each Jew everywhere contributing the half shekel to its support (Matt. xvii. 21).

The three great sections of the dispersion at Christ's coming were the Babylonian, the Syrian, and the Egyptian (including Alexandria where the Grecian element was strongest, and with African oilshouts, Cyrene and N. Africa). Pompey, on occupying Jerusalem 63 B.C., took with him, and settled, many Jews in the trans-Tiberine quarter of Rome. The apostles in every city followed God's order, as Paul told the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia, "it was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken unto you" (Acts iii. 23, xiii. 46); so Rom. i. 16, "to the Jew first, and also to the Greek."

In the assembly on pentecost the several dispersions were represented: (1) Parthians, Mesopotamia; (2) Judaea (Syria), Pamphylia; (3) Egypt, Greece; (4) Romans. The converts from these pioneered the way for the subsequent labours of the apostles in their respective countries. Lucius of Cyrene and Simion Niger (the black) from N. Africa were leading members of the church of Antioch. So we find Aquila from Pontus, Barnabas of Cyprus, Apollos of Alexandria, Clement probably of Rome.

Besides the Jews, in the several cities there were the "devout" Gentiles who in some degree acknowledged the God of Israel. All these formed stepping stones for the ultimate entrance of the gospel among the idolatrous Gentiles. Forty years after Peter's martyrdom, Pliny, Roman governor of Pontus and Bithynia, writing to the emperor Trajan, says: "the contagion (Christianity) has seized not only cities, but the smaller towns and country, so that the temples are nearly forsaken and the sacred rites intermitted."

Divination. Ezek. xiii. 7. Used in Scripture of false systems of ascertaining the Divine will, such as are allied to idolatry: as necromancy, which evoked the dead (1 Sam. xxviii. 8); prognostication by arrows (Ezek. xxi. 21). The arrows marked with names of places to be attacked were shaken (for "He made His arrows bright," trans. "He shook") together in a quiver; which ever came out first intimated the place selected; or else threw them in the air to see in alighting which way they inclined, towards Jerusalem or Ammon. Inspecting entrails. The healthy or unhealthy state of the sacrificial entrails intimated success or failure. In the Nineveh sculptures the king is represented with a cup in his right hand, his left resting on a bow, also two arrows in the right, possibly for divination.

The "magicians" of Egypt in Gen. xli. 8, (chartummin, from cheret "a style" or pen,) were sacred "scribes" of the hieroglyphics, devoted to astrology, magic, etc.; else from Egyptian chertom, "wonder workers," or cher-tum, "bearers of sacred spells." Daniel was made "master of the magicians" (Dan. v. 11); chokmin, "wise men," our "wizards" (Exod. vii. 11); "sorcerers" (mekashphim). "mutterers of magic formulae" (Isa. xlvii. 9-12). Jannes or Anna in Egyptian means "scribe," a frequent name in papyri of the time of Rameses II. Jambres, the other name of an Egyptian magician preserved by Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8), means "scribe of the south."

The earliest prohibition of witchcraft is Exod. xxii. 18, "thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." Witchcraft was an appeal to a power alien from God. So it was accounted rebellion against Jehovah. Saul's disobedience and rebellion against God's will led him, though zealous to extirpate witches so long as God's law did not interfere with his impatient self-will, at last to consult the witch of Endor; Samuel's words as to his disobedience in the case of Amalek proving prophetic, "rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry" (1 Sam. xv. 23; comp. xxviii. 3-20). "So Saul died for his transgression (Heb. shugling evasion of obedience) . . . and also for asking counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it" (1 Chron. x. 13).

"Wizards," yid'onim from yidai "to know" (Lev. xix. 31). Consultants of "the dead," oboth (Lev. xx. 6), "those having familiar spirits" which they consulted to evoke the dead;

lit. "bottles" (leathern) inflated by the spirit; comp. Job xxxii. 19, "my belly is as wine which hath no vent . . . ready to burst like new bottles." The pythonesses (marg. Acts xvi. 16) spoke with a deep voice as from the belly; by ventriloquism (LXX. so transl. "them that have familiar spirits," ventriloquists) they made a low voice sound (= "peep and mutter") as from the grave or departed person's spirit (Isa. xix. 3, xxix. 4). Scripture has written for all ages (Isa. viii. 19, 20) "when they shall say, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter, should not a people seek unto their God? (should they seek) for the (good of) the living to the dead? To the law and to the testimony . . . if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." This tests and condemns modern spiritualism, the sign of "the latter times and the last days" (1 Tim. iv. 1), "seducing spirits and doctrines suggested by demons" (2 Tim. iii. 1-8). The phenomena seem supernatural and Satanic, and the communications often lying, as was to be expected from "the father of lying" (John viii. 44). The Angekoks, Esquimaux sorcerers, when converted, have declared that their sorceries, when they were heathen, were not mere impostures, that they were acted on by a power they could not control; but when they believed in Jesus they had neither the will nor the power to do what they used in their heathen state. Brainerd states the same as to the Indian diviners, viz., that all their former powers of divination departed the moment the word of God entered their souls. Satan's design in spiritualism is, judging from the alleged spirit communications, to supersede Scripture with another authority (viz. spirit communications) in matters of faith. Satan and his demons are the real speakers in these pretended communications from the spirits of the dead. The "associate spirit" of spiritualism answers to the Scripture "familiar spirit" of the wizards. The pythoness and the witch of Endor were each a "medium" between the consultants and the powers of darkness. The consultants are put en rapport with the latter, not really with the departed dead. Scripture (Eccles. ix. 5, 6, "the dead know not anything . . . neither have they any more a portion for ever in anything done under the sun"; 2 Kings ii. 9; Luke xvi. 19-31) implies that it is not the spirits of the dead that make the alleged communications, though these communications assert that it is; this assertion is from a lying spirit, such as was in Ahab's prophets (1 Kings xxii. 22). The dead do not return, they are personated by evil spirits. Spiritualism is virtually condemned in Deut. xviii. 10, 2 Kings xvii. 17 xxi. 6. "Sorcerers" are specially mentioned as about to abound with "lying wonders," and to be adjudged to damnation, at the Lord's coming again (2 Thess. ii. 9, 10, 11; Mal. iii. 5; Rev. xxi. 8, xxii. 15). The three froglike demons out of the mouths of the antitritity, the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, shall "work miracles" to tempt the ten kings under Antichrist to the last battle for the kingship of the world, against Christ, in "the great day of God Almighty" (Rev. xvi. 13, 14; comp. Zech. xiii. 2, Matt. xxiv. 24, Rev. xiii. 14, 15). Paul was "grieved," so far as he from seeking and welcoming like spiritualists the pythoness's testimony to him (Acts xvi. 17, 18); for the Spirit of Christ and the spirit of divination cannot dwell together in the same soul. God condemns those who "remain among the graves and lodge in the monuments" (Isa. lxx. 4) for necromancy, to consult the dead. The warning in viii. 19, 20, Mark v. 3, applies to all times. The witch of Endor was "mistress of a spirit by which the dead are conjured up" (1 Sam. xxviii. 7, baalath ob). Saul's request, "bring me him up whom I shall name," explains the previous "divine (quasom) unto me by the familiar spirit." The witch's recognising Saul as soon as Samuel appeared proves that her art was not mere jugglery: "Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul"; she was in a state of clairvoyance. On the other hand, her "erying with a loud voice," startled at the sight of Samuel, shows that his appearance differed essentially from anything she had ever by demon art effected before. She tells Saul, "I saw gods (a supernatural being) ascending out of the earth . . . an old man covered with a (prophet's) mantle" (meil). Saul apparently did not see Samuel's person, but recognised the "mantle." Saul's inconsistency is convicted by Samuel: "wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy?" If God was departed from him he should have been the more afraid to increase Jehovah's displeasure by breaking the laws in consulting the dead, as if they were less under God's control than the living. Abject superstition never reasons. Samuel's prophecy of his and his sons' death on the morrow, and Israel's defeat by the Philistines, proves Samuel's appearance to have been of God, and not by demoniacal agency nor an illusion (Ecclus. xli. 20). God for special reasons awakened His servant out of his repose ("why hast thou disquieted me," etc.) to appear, not at a conjuring call which He forbids, but to show the witch and the king the terrible penalty of disobedience and witchcraft, as he (Samuel) had long ago declared in more general terms when alive (1 Sam. x. 23, xxviii. 17-19). Jehovah's principle is (Ezek. xiv. 4, 7, 8), "every man that setteth up his idols in his heart and putteth the stumbling block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet, I the Lord will answer him that cometh, according to the multitude of his idols, that I may take the house of Israel in their own heart . . . I will answer him by myself" (by My own special interposition), answering the fool according to his folly, making the sinner's sin his own punishment.

In Egypt books containing magic formulae belonged exclusively to the king, the priests and wise men, who formed a college, being called in by Pharaoh when needful. The quesem divined the future by any mode of taking omens, from a root "to cut." But the kushaph, mekashphim, "sorcerers" above, used fascinations and magic charms (Exod. vii. 11, xxii. 18; Dan. ii. 2; Deut. xviii. 10). The me'oneh (2 Kings xxi. 6), "an observer of times," from 'anan "to cover," using covert arts; or else from 'on, "time," "fixed time"; those who define the exact auspicious time to travel, to traffick, etc.; or else "astrologers," who judge by the stars auspicious and inauspicious days. The LXX. explain it of "observers of words," so as to decide by them whether success will attend an undertaking or not (Gen. xxiv. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 9, 10; 1 Kings xx. 33). Others take it from 'ain, "the eye," "one fascinating with the eyes" (Matt. xxi. 15). "Monthly prognosticators" (modi'im), who every new moon professed by observations of it to foretell the future (Isa. xlviii. 13). Menachashim, "charmers of serpents," from nachash "serpent,"

HUMAN SACRIFICE TO THE SERPENT.

"to augur." Hobreev shammain, "dividers of the heavens," watching conjunctions and oppositions of the stars; in casting a nativity they observed the sign which arose at the time of one's birth, the mid heaven, the sign in the west opposite the horoscope, and the hypogee. Divination by rods is alluded to in Hos. iv. 12, "their staff declareth unto them"; a rod stripped of bark on one side, not on the other, was thrown up; if the bare side alighted uppermost it was a good omen, otherwise a bad omen. The Arabs mark one rod God bids, the other God forbids; whichever came out first from the case decided the issue. Consultation of idols' oracles is referred to in 2 Kings i. 2-6. The only true "oracle" (debir) was the holy of holies (1 Kings vi. 16, Ps. xxviii. 2); previously, consultation of the Lord through the priest with the ephod (2 Sam. ii. 1, v. 23). Our "oracles" are the Holy Scriptures (Acts vii. 38, Rom. iii. 2). Of dealings in magic in the N. T. instances occur: Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9-11); Elymas Bar Jesus (xiii. 6, 8); the pythoness (xvi. 16 marg.); the vagabond Jews, exorcists (xix. 13, 19); the Ephesian books treating of "curious arts"; Gal. v. 20, "witchcraft"; Rev. ix. 21, "sorceries."

Divorce. Deut. xxiv. 1-4 permits the husband to divorce the wife, if he find in her "uncleanness," lit. "matter of nakedness," by giving her "a bill of divorcement," lit. a book of cutting off. Polygamy had violated God's primal law joining in one flesh one man to one woman, who formed the other half or converse side of the male. Moses' law does not sanction this abnormal state of things which he found prevalent, but imposes a delay and check on its proceeding to extreme arbitrariness. He regulates and mitigates what he could not then extirpate. The husband must get drawn up by the proper authorities (the Levites) a formal deed stating his reasons (Isa. i. 1, Jer. iii. 8), and not dismiss her by word of mouth. Moses threw the responsibility of the violation of the original law on the man himself; tolerating it indeed (as a less evil than enforcing the original law which the people's "hardness of heart" rendered then unsuitable, and thus aggravating the evil), but throwing in the way what might serve as an obstacle to extreme caprice, an act requiring time and publicity and formal procedure.

The school of Shammai represented fornication or adultery as the "uncleanness" meant by Moses. But (Lev. xx. 10, John viii. 5) staving, not merely divorce, would have been the penalty of that, and our Lord (Matt. xix. 3, 9, comp. v. 31) recognises a much lower ground of divorce tolerated by Moses for the hardness of their heart. Hillel's school recognised the most trifling cause as enough for divorce, e.g. the wife's burning the husband's food in cooking. The aim of our Lord's interrogators was to entangle Him in the disputes of these two schools. The low standard of marriage prevalent at the close of the O. T. appears in Mal. ii. 14-16.

Rome makes marriage a sacrament, and indissoluble except by her lucrative ecclesiastical dispensations. But this would make the marriage between one heathen man and one heathen woman a "sacrament," which in the Christian sense would be absurd; for Eph. v. 23-32, which Rome quotes, and Mark x. 5-12 where even fornication is not made an exception to the indissolubility of marriage, make no distinction between marriages of parties within and parties outside of the Christian church. What marriage is to the Christian, it was, in the view of Scripture, to man before and since the fall and God's promise of redemption. Adulterous connection with a third party makes the person one flesh with that other, and so ipso facto dissolves the unity of flesh with the original consort (1 Cor. vi. 15, 16). The divorced woman who married again, though the law sanctions her remarriage (Deut. xxiv. 1-4), is treated as "defiled" and not to be taken back by the former husband. The reflection that, once divorced and married again, she could never return to her first husband, would check the parties from reckless rashness.

Dizahab (Deut. i. 1) = "where gold is abundant": an early stage of Israel's march after Sinai. Marks of former mining abound in the Arabian peninsula, and have led to recent discoveries. Dihah is probably too far out of the way on the W. of the gulf of Akaba to be the ancient D.

Dodai, 1. (1 Chron. xxvii. 4) = Dodo (xi. 12, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8). Possibly the clause "Eleazar, the son of" has fallen out before "D." in 1 Chron. xxvii. 4. Jewish tradition makes Dodo or D. brother of Jesse.

2. Dobo of Bethlehem (2 Sam. xxiii. 24, 1 Chron. xi. 12). 3. D. of Issachar (Jud. x. 1).

Dodanim (Gen. x. 4) = RODANIM (1 Chron. i. 7); as γ, d , and γ, r , closely resemble one another in Hebrew, LXX. and Samaritan versions translate "the inhabitants of Rhodes," the large island in the E. part of the Mediterranean; in tir. meaning "island of roses"; its coins are stamped with a rose. Sprung from Javan (= Ionia, the Greek race), son of Japhet. Gesenius identifies them with the Dardanii of Illyriam and Troy; a semi-Pelagic race, akin to the Kutim or Chittim. Dodona, seat of the oracle in Epirus, is a kindred name.

Dodavah. 2 Chron. xx. 37.

Doeg. An Idumean, chief of Saul's herdsmen. At Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 7) "detained before the Lord" by some act of purification or vow, which as a proselyte he was performing, when Ahimelech gave David Goliath's sword and the shewbread. With officious eagerness and talebearing exaggeration (marked in the title of Ps. lii. by the tautology "came and told and said") he gave information which he knew well his master Saul would keenly listen to. D. told substantially the fact; it was Saul who put on it the "lying" construction of treason on the part of the priests (comp. Ps. lii. 3, 4 with 1 Sam. xxii. 13). "The Edomite" in the title reminds us that herein D. represented Edom's and the world's undying enmity to Israel and the godly. He was but the accomplice and ready tool; Saul, the "mighty man" (ver. 1) who "trusted in the abundance of his riches" (ver. 7) as means of destroying David, was the real "boaster in mischief," for this was the very appeal that Saul made, and that induced D. to inform (1 Sam. xxii. 7): "Hear now, ye Benjamites, will the son of Jesse [as I can] give every one of you fields and vineyards?" (comp. viii. 14.) On D.'s information, and by D.'s own sacrilegious hand, at Saul's command, when the king's "footmen" declined in reverential awe to slay Jehovah's priests, eighty-five of these fell, and Saul "boasted" (Ps. lii. 1) of it as a sample of the fate of all who should help David. The undesigned coincidences here noted, between the psalm and independent history, confirm the authenticity of both. The enmity of D. was so well known to David that he said unto Abiathar, the only survivor of the slaughter, "I knew it that day, when D. the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul," therefore with characteristic sensitiveness of conscience David adds, "I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house."

Dog. The watch of the house, and of the flock (Isa. lvi. 10, 11; Job xxx. 1). Sometimes domesticated, as the Syriac woman's comparison and argument imply, "the household

EASTERN DOGS

(kunaria, 'little' or 'pet') dogs eat of the crumbs (Matt. xv. 26, 27; Mark vii. 27, 28) which fall from their master's table." More commonly ownerless, and landed in troops which divide cities into so many quarters; each half starved, ravenous troop keeps to its own quarter, and drives off any intruder; feeding on blood, dead bodies, and excrement; therefore regarded as "unclean" (1 Kings xiv. 11, xvi. 4, xxi. 19, 23, xxii. 38; 2 Kings ix. 10, 35, 36). Their dismal howlings at night are alluded to in Ps. lix. 6, 14, 15: "they return at evening, they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city"; perhaps in allusion to Saul's agents thirsting for David's blood coming to Michal's house at evening, and to the retribution on Saul in kind, when he who had made David a wanderer himself wandered about seeking vainly for help against the Philistines, and went at last by night to the witch of Endor.

As unclean (Isa. lxvi. 3), dog, dead dog, dog's head, are terms of scorn or else self abasement (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. iii. 8, ix. 8, xvi. 9; 2 Kings viii. 13). A wanton, self prostituting man is called a "dog" (Deut. xxiii. 18). One Egyptian god had a dog form. "Beware of the (Gr.) dogs," those impure persons of whom I told you often" (Phil. iii. 2, 18, 19); "the abominable" (Rev. xxi. 8; comp. xxii. 15, Matt. vii. 6); heathenish in spirit (Tit. i. 15, 16); dogs in filthiness, snarling, and ferocity against the Lord and His people (Ps. xxii. 16, 20); backsliding into former carnality, as the dog "is turned to his own vomit again" (2 Pet. ii. 22). The Jews regarded the Gentiles as "dogs," but by unbelief they ceased to be the true Israel and themselves became dogs (Isa. lvi. 10, 11).

"Deliver my darling from the power of the dog," i.e. my soul (lit. my unique one, unique in its preciousness) from the Jewish rabble; as "deliver My soul from the sword" is Messiah's cry for deliverance from the Roman soldiery and governor. The Assyrian hunting dog as vividly depicted on Assyrian sculptures resembled exactly our harrier or foxhound.

Doorkeeper. A place of dignity in the East; therefore translate as marg. Ps. lxxiv. 10, "I had rather lie at the threshold (as the lame man at the temple gate, Acts iii. 2; or as the poor in the synagogue, Jas. ii. 3) in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness;" for that is an abiding house, however low my position in it; these are but shifting tents, though one have a dwelling in them.

Dophkah: a station in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 12) between Rephidim and the sea.

Dor=habitation. An ancient, royal, Canaanite city, on the Mediterranean, S. of Carmel; assigned to Manasseh, though within Asher (Josh. xi. 2, xii. 23, xvii. 11); 9 miles N. of Caesarea towards Ptolemais; now Tantura. The coast line runs parallel to a spur of Carmel at a mile and a half distance; the intervening "region" is the "border" or "coast" of D. The original inhabitants were not expelled, but David made them tributary, and Solomon stationed one of his commissariat officers there (1 Kings iv. 11, Jud. i. 27, 28).

Dothan, i.e. Dothaim, "two wells." At it Joseph was put into a well pit (whence it derived its name) become dry, and afterwards sold to Ishmaelites merchants who travelled that route between Syria and Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 17); near Shechem. Elisha's place of sojourn, when the Syrian king invested the city with horses and chariots, to Gehazi's dismay; but "the mountain" whereon it stood he saw, when the Lord opened his eyes, to be "full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (2 Kings vi. 13-18). Situated in the centre of the country near the S. edge of the Esdraelon plain, from which hills extending from Carmel range separate it. The ruins on a large tell or mound mark the place, Dotan; beneath the S. side is a spring. Close by is an ancient road with massive pavement running N. and S. To this day there are numerous cisterns hewn in the rock, and bottle shaped with narrow mouth, such as egress would be impossible from without help. Into such a pit doubtless Joseph was cast here.

Dove. Emblem of peace (Gen. viii. 7-12). After God's wrath for sin had been executed upon the earth, the dove was thrice sent forth; at the first sending she found no rest for the sole of her foot until she put herself in Noah's (meaning comfort) hand, and was drawn into the ark; at the second she brought back the olive leaf, the earnest of the restored earth; at the third she was able to roam at large, no longer needing the ark's shelter. As the raven messenger "going forth to and fro," alighting on but never entering into the ark, symbolises the unbelieving that have "no peace," "like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest" (Isa. lvi. 20, 21); so the dove, in its threefold embassy, represents respectively the first return of the soul to its rest, the loving hand of Jesus; its subsequent reception of the dove-like spirit, the earnest of the final inheritance (Eph. i. 13, 14); and its actual entrance finally on the new heaven and new earth (Rev. xxi.), where there will be no need of the arklike church to separate between the world and God's people, between the saved and unsaved, where all shall be safe and blessed for ever and the church shall be coextensive with the world.

As the lamb is the emblem of the Saviour, so the dove of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, because of its gentleness, tenderness, innocence, and constant love (Matt. iii. 16). He changes us into His own likeness. The liquid full soft eye is the emblem of the heavenly bride's eye, through which the soul beams out (S. of Sol. i. 15). Contrast the sinner's eye (Matt. xx. 15, 2 Pet. ii. 14). The church's unsheltered innocence in the world calls forth the prayer: "Deliver not the soul of Thy turtle dove unto the multitude of the wicked" (Ps. lxxiv. 19, lv. 11). Their plaintive note symbolises the mourning penitent (Isa. lix. 11).

The change from the Egyptian bondage amidst the face blackening potteries to the freedom and beauty of Israel's theocratic state is expressed in Ps. lxxiii. 13, 14, "though ye have lain (lain) among the pots yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold," the dove's outspread wings reflecting a golden or silver splendour according to the direction in which the sunshine falls on them, typifying the dove-like spirit of joy and peace beaming forth from the believer, once darkness, but now light in the Lord. The dove's timid answers to the believer fleeing from sin, self, and wrath, to the refuge in the cleft Rock of ages (S. of Sol. ii. 14; Jer. xlviii. 28, Isa. xxvi. 4 marg.). Its gregariousness answers to the communion of saints, all having flocked together to Christ (Isa. lx. 8); the returning Israelites shall so flock to Jerusalem, as doves in a cloud to their coes; and the converted Gentiles to Israel. Saints must imitate its harmless simplicity (Matt. vii. 16), but not its stillness (Hos. vii. 11). The Israelites under God's visitation of the enemy's invasion "shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys" (Ezek. vii. 16); as doves which usually frequent valleys mount up to the mountains when fearing the birdcatcher (Ps. xi. 1), so Israel, once dwelling in the peaceful valleys, shall flee from the foe to the mountains, once the scene of their highplace idolatries, now retroactively the scene of their abject flight.

In Jer. xxv. 38, "because of the fierceness of the oppressor" (Heb. the dove), the allusion is to the Chaldean standard, the dove, the symbol of Venus. Semiramis the queen was said to have been nourished by doves when exposed at birth, and at death to have been transformed into a dove.

In 2 Kings vi. 25 the "dove's dung" sold for food in the famine seems to have been a vegetable or poor grain or etch pea, so named, that grew in the land not built upon and lying, as is common in the East, within the city. Linnæus identified it with the Ornithogalum umbellatum, with eatable bulbs, "the star of Bethlehem"; the colour of the flowers, white mixed with green, originated the name "dove's dung," which is of like colour. Keil thinks it to be a saltwort yielding alkali, Herba alkali. Josephus, however (B. J., v. 13, § 7), mentions literal dung having been eaten in terrible famine.

The offering of a dove was the alternative permitted to those unable to afford a more costly one, an alternative adopted instead of the lamb by the Virgin mother at her purification, a proof of the poverty to which our Lord stooped at His incarnation. The sellers of doves profaned the temple court by selling doves to meet the wants of the poorer classes (John ii. 13-17).

Dowry. The snitor's payment to the father for the wife (Gen. xxiv. 53, Isaac; xxix. 18, Jacob; xxxiv. 12, Shechem).

Dragon. Tannin, tan. Tan in Jer. xiv. 6, "dragons" "snuffing up the wind," is trans. by Henderson jackals; rather the great boars and python serpents are meant, which raise their body vertically ten or twelve feet high, surveying the neighbourhood above the bushes, while with open jaws they drink in the air. They were made types of the deluge and all destructive agencies; hence the dragon temples are placed near water in Asia, Africa, and Britain, e.g. that of Abury in Wiltshire. The ark is often associated with it, as the preserver from the waters. The dragon temples are serpentine in form; dragon standards were used in Egypt and Babylon, and among the widely scattered Celts. Apollo's slaying Python is the Gr. legend implying the triumph of light over darkness and evil. The tannin are any great monsters, whether of land or sea, trans. Gen. i. 21 "great sea monsters." So (Lam. iv. 3) "even sea monsters (tannin) draw out the breast," alluding to the mammalia which sometimes visit the Mediterranean, or the halibore cow whale of the Red Sea. Large whales do not often frequent the Mediterranean, which was the sea that the Israelites knew; they apply "sea" to the Nile and Euphrates, and so apply "tannin" to the crocodile, their horror in Egypt, as also to the large serpents which they saw in the desert.

"The dragon in the sea," which Jehovah shall punish in the day of Israel's deliverance, is Antichrist, the anti-type to Babylon on the Euphrates' waters (Isa. xxvii. 1). In Ps. lxxiv. 13, "Thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters," Egypt's princes and Pharaoh are poetically represented hereby, just as crocodiles are the monarchs of the Nile waters. So (Isa. li. 9, 10) the crocodile is the emblem of Egypt and its king on coins of Augustus struck after the conquest of Egypt. "A habitation of dragons" expresses utter desolation, as venomous snakes abound in ruins of ancient cities (Dent. xxxii. 33, Jer. xlix. 33, Isa. xxxiv. 13).

In the N. T. it symbolises Satan the old serpent (Gen. iii.), combining gigantic strength with craft, malignity, and venom (Rev. xii. 3). The dragon's colour, "red," fiery red, implies that he was a murderer from the beginning.

Drams (1 Chron. xxix. 7; Ezra ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70-72). Adarcomin, the Persian daric, from dara "a king," a gold coin circulated among the Jews during their subjection to Medo-Persia; the earliest coined money used by the Jews, and the oldest gold coin of which specimens are extant; a crowned archer is impressed on it; heavier than an English guinea; = 25 shillings.

The DRACHM is different, it was a Gr. coin which the Roman DENARIUS (translated unfortunately PENNY [see] Rev. vi. 6, a labourer's daily wages Matt. xx. 2-9) superseded; Luke xv. 8, 9, "PIECE OF SILVER," Gr. drachme. The "penny," denarius, in metal was equivalent to 7½ pence, but could purchase more than our shilling.

Dream. The revelation of God's will in dreams is characteristic of the early and less perfect patriarchal times (Gen. xxviii. 12, xxxi. 24, xxxvii. 5-10); to Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 5, in commencing his reign; the beginnings of the N. T. dispensation (Matt. i. 20, ii. 13, 19, 22); and the communications from God to the rulers of the heathen world powers, Philistia, Egypt, Babylon (Gen. xx. 5, xl. 5, xli. 1); Elihu, Job xxxiii. 15; Dan. ii. iv. 5, etc. The dream form of revelation is that most appropriate to those outside the kingdom of God. So the Midianite (Jud. vii. 13), Pilate's wife (Matt. xxvii. 19). But it is the Israelites Joseph and Daniel who interpret; for heathendom is passive, Israel active, in Divine things to the glory of the God of Israel.

Dreams were a frequent means of imposture and idolatry (Deut. xii. 1-3, Zech. x. 2). The dream form of revelation is placed below that of prophecy and even divination (Num. xii. 6, Joel ii. 28, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6). "Trances" and "visions" are mentioned in the Christian church, but not dreams. Whilst God has acted and can act on the mind in a dream (wherein the reason and judgment are dormant, but the sensations and imaginations active and uncontrolled by the judgment), His higher mode of revelation is that wherein the understanding is active and conscious; consequently the former mode appears more in imperfect stages of the development of God's scheme than in the advanced stages.

"In the multitude of dreams are divers vanities" (Eccles. v. 7), i.e., God's service becomes by "dreams" (foolish fancies as to what God requires of worshippers), and random "words," positive vanity of manifold kinds; comp. Matt. vi. 7, "they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking."

Dress. Aprons of figleaves were our first parents' earliest attempt at dress to clothe their shame [see ADAM, ABEL] (Gen. iii. 7, 21); "God made coats of skin and clothed them," doubtless taken from animals slain in sacrifice at His command; type of the garment of righteousness provided by God through His Son's sacrifice, wherewith we, whose own faulty righteousness could not clothe our shame, are completely covered so as to stand before the all-searching eye of God (Isa. lxi. 10).

Such a coat of skin Elijah and the prophets commonly wore, addereth implying its amplitude. (1 Kings xix. 13, 19; 2 Kings ii. 13; Zech. xiii. 4; Matt. vii. 15, "false prophets come to you in sheep's clothing, but," etc.) The kutoneth, or shirtlike inner vest, Gr. chiton, is inappropriately trans. "coat" (Matt. x. 10, John xix. 23). Those stripped of every garment but this are termed "naked," it being but a partial covering, our "nu-dress": 1 Sam. xix. 21 Saul to imitate the prophets; David (2 Sam. vi. 20); Peter (John xxi. 7); Isa. xx. 2, the prophet's undress being a silent mention to repentance.

Sackcloth, woven of hair, was the mourner's garment. So the king of Nineveh (Jonah iii. 6) laid aside his ample athlereth for sackcloth. Cloth of camel's hair was John Baptist's garment, silently condemning the prevalent luxury (Matt. iii. 4). Cloth of goat's hair (the Roman cilicium) was the material used by the poor.

The Israelites learned when bondmen in Egypt to fabricate fine linen (1 Chron. iv. 21). The cetoneth or kutoneth is akin to our word cotton. The Syrian term for linen, butz, is the root of bussos, the Gr. for "fine linen" (Luke xvi. 19, Rev. xviii. 12, 16). Shesh the earlier term was Egyptian, their linen being of the finest texture. Sadin, akin to our word satin, was a fine linen for summer wear. A wrapper sometimes used as a nightshirt (Mark xiv. 51). Silk was of late introduction (Rev. xviii. 12).

The mixture of wool and flax was forbidden (Lev. xix. 19, Deut. xxii. 11), the combination being reserved to the highpriest alone (Exod. xxviii. 4), and that a combination of different threads, not of different materials in one thread, such as lusey woolsey. The general object of the prohibition was to symbolise simplicity and purity. They were even in minute distinctions to be separated from the heathen, and to remember God is the God of order; and if so in small details, how much more will He disallow the confounding of the eternal distinctions of right and wrong (Gen. i. 11, 1 Cor. xi. 10-15, Deut. xxii. 5).

White was the prevalent colour of garments. It symbolised purity (Rev. iii. 4, 5; vii. 9, 13). Joseph's "coat (vest) was of many colours" (Gen. xxxvii. 3). On the tomb of Chnum-hotep of the 12th dynasty, at Beni Hassan, the Semitic visitors are represented in patchwork garments of many colours. An Arab sheikh to this day wears an aba or garment composed of stripes of many colours, as emblem of his office. Jacob hereby marked Joseph, the firstborn of his darling Rachel, as successor to the primogeniture, birthright, and priesthood as head of the family, which Reuben by incest had forfeited (1 Chron. v. 1 confirms this).

"Cunning work" had the devices woven into the stuff; "needlework" had the devices cut out of other stuff and attached by the needle (comp. Jud. v. 30, "needlework on both sides"). The brilliant colours of the Assyrian nobles spiritually seduced Israel; Ezek. xxvii. 12, "clothed most gorgeously," lit. to perfection. The ampler robes and the finer texture distinguished the rich from the poor Hebrews.

Women and men were forbidden to assume the dress characteristic of the other sex (Deut. xxii. 5). The veil distinguished women. The sword, ring, staff, and weapons of man she was not to assume.

The under cetoneth was made of two pieces sewn together at the side.

Jesus' "seamless tunic" was probably the neal or upper tunic without sleeves, reaching to the ankles, worn by kings, prophets, youths, and nobles (1 Sam. xxiv. 4, xxviii. 14, ii. 19; Job i. 20), whereas the under cetoneth reached only to the knee. Joseph, Tamar, and the priests wore one reaching to the ankles and wrists (2 Sam. xiii. 18; Exod. xxviii. 31; 1 Sam. xv. 27, xviii. 4; Jud. xiv. 12, 13). "Sheets," i.e. shirts, sedumim, clothes worn next the skin. John xxi. 7; Peter girt to him the linen coat worn by Syrian fishermen.

The usual outer garment was a quadrangular woollen cloth; simlah; begeg of a handsome kind, kesuth a covering; lebush a warrior's, priest's, or king's cloak (2 Sam. xx. 8, 2 Kings x. 22, Esth. vi. 11). Malbush a state dress, court apparel (1 Kings x. 5), or religious vestment (2 Kings x. 22). Mad, the long cloak (Jud. iii. 16). The Gr. himation is the outer robe, stolē "long robes" of rich amplitude and grandeur (Mark xii. 38, xvi. 5; Luke xv. 22; Rev. vi. 11, vii. 9, 13). The chiton, "coat" rather inner vest, is contrasted with the "cloak" or outer himation (Matt. v. 40, Acts ix. 39). The outer begeg might be wrapped round the body or the shoulders, with the ends hanging in front or covering the head, as 2 Sam. xv. 30, Esth. vi. 12. The ends had a fringe, and upon it a blue or purple riband, which continually being before their eyes, with its heavenly hue, would be a remembrancer to them that they should "remember all the Lord's commandments" (Num. xv. 38). A girdle secured it round the waist; the fold made by the overlapping of the robe served as a pocket (2 Kings iv. 39, Ps. lxxix. 12, Hag. ii. 12).

The cetoneth was worn by both sexes. Women's distinctive garments were the mitparkath, or shawl (Ruth iii. 15); Isa. iii. 22, "wimples," thrown over the head and body. The maatapha, full tunic with sleeves and reaching to the feet, worn over the ordinary tunic (Isa. iii. 22). The tzaph, a handsome ample summer cloak-like veil, thrown at pleasure over the head (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14). The radid, "veils" (Isa. iii. 23), large enough to cover the head and person, distinct from the smaller "mufflers," or veils closely covering the face above, with apertures for the eyes, but loosely flowing below (har-khaloth). The veil on the head marks the woman's subjection (1 Cor. xi. 3-10); "the woman ought to have power on her head," i.e. the head covering or veil, the emblem of her being under the power of man, her head. Radid, "a veil" is akin to radad, "subjection." The pethigil, "stomacher," or broad plaited girdle (Isa. iii. 21).

In Dan. iii. 21, for "coats," sarbalin, trans. wide long "pantaloon," such as the Babylonians wore (Herod., i.

195). For "hosen" (as stockings are not common in the East), trans. putish inner "tunics." For "hats," trans. karbla "mantles." In Matt. xxvii. 28 "robe," chlamys, is the military cloak of officers.

In 2 Tim. iv. 13 Paul's phelone, the Grecised panula of the Romans, is the long, thick, sleeveless, travelling cloak, with only an opening for the head. Paul then, on the confines of two worlds, in this wanted a cloak to cover him from the "winter" cold (ver. 21); in that world was about to be "clothed" upon with his house from heaven, even as his soul was already covered with the righteousness of saints. A graphic touch, not unworthy of inspiration.

The begeg was often used as a coverlet at night, as the Bedonin uses his aba. The law, in mercy to the poor, forbade the creditor to retain it after nightfall (Exod. xxii. 26, 27). Rending it expressed grief, indignation, etc. (Job i. 20.) Shaking it, renunciation (Neh. v. 13, Acts xviii. 6). Spreading it before another, loyal and joyful submission to his rule (2 Kings ix. 13, Acts xxi. 8). Wrapping it round the head, reverent awe or grief (1 Kings xix. 13, 2 Sam. xv. 30).

The long outer robes needed girding up round the waist, when active work was needed; hence, metaphorically (1 Pet. i. 13), "gird up the loins of your mind." Workers, pilgrims, runners, wrestlers, warriors, typify the Christian; they all needed girding. So Israel at the passover (Exod. xii. 11, comp. Luke xii. 35). The feet were covered in reverence of the presence of a king (Isa. vi. 2).

The readiness with which their loose garments were changed is noted in Jer. xliii. 12: "he shall array himself with Egypt as (speedily and easily) as a shepherd putteth on his garment" (comp. Ps. cii. 26). Changes of raiment were a leading constituent of wealth in the East (Isa. iii. 6, 7; Job xxvii. 16; Matt. vi. 19; Jas. v. 2) and a usual present (2 Kings v. 5). To present one's own robe was a strong token of love (1 Sam. xviii. 4). The gift of a robe installed in office (Gen. xli. 42, Esth. viii. 15). The presenting of the best robe was a special honour (Luke xv. 22). In Isa. iii. 22, "changeable suits" are those reserved for special occasions. A princely host sometimes caused "the keeper of the wardrobe" (2 Chron. xxxiv. 22) to furnish robes to his guests (comp. Matt. xxii. 11). White being the ordinary colour a spot was immediately visible (Jude 23, Rev. iii. 4).

Drink, strong = shechar. Any intoxicating beverage, wine especially from the grape (comp. Num. xxviii. 7 with Exod. xxix. 40). Strong drink was extracted from other fruit also, as the pomegranate (S. of Sol. viii. 2). Beer was made of barley, lupin and skirret and other herbs being substituted for hops. Spices were mingled with it (Isa. v. 22). Oider, or "apple wine," is noticed in the Mishna, Terum, ii, § 2. Honey wine was a mixture of wine, honey, and pepper, also a decoction from the grape called debash by the Hebrews, by modern Syrians drbs, wine, milk or water being added. Dute wine also was made in Egypt. The Speaker's Comm. explains the proverbial phrase, Deut. xxix. 19, "so that the soul that is drunken with sin carry away that which thirsts for sin." "Drinking iniquity like water himself (Job xv. 16), he corrupts others thirsting for it."

Dromedary. [See CAMEL.]

Drusilla. The fair but loose daughter of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros (Acts xii.); sister of Herod Agrippa II.; married to Azizus, king of Emesa, on his becoming a Jew; seduced by Felix, procurator of Judea, through Simon the Cyprian sorcerer (Josephus, Ant. xv. 7, § 2). Present at Paul's hearing before Felix at Casarea. By Felix she had a son, Agrippa, who perished with his mother in the Vesuvian eruption, under Titus.

Dulcimer. A Hebraized Gr. name, sumphonah, in Dan. iii. 5, 15. A bagpipe, consisting of two pipes thrust through a leathern bag, emitting a plaintive sound; the modern Italian zampogna. Some Greek Ionian of western Asia probably introduced the instrument into Babylon. However, Furst makes the word Semitic = a tube. The old spinet resembled its tone.

Dumah = silence. An Ishmaelite tribe and region (Gen. xxv. 14, 1 Chron. i. 30, Isa. xxi. 11). The name survives in Doomat el Jendel, "Dumah of the blocks of stone," viz. of which it was built. On the borders of Arabia and the Syrian desert. Put for all Idumea, to imply it should soon be put to silence, i.e. be destroyed. The name indicates its unheavenly cyclopean masonry, like the gigantic buildings of Bashan.

A town in the hills of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. xv. 52). Perhaps now Duweimeh, on the W. of the high district, N. of the Negeb or dry south land.

Dung. Used as manure and fuel. Straw was trodden in the water of the dunghill to make it manure (comp. Ps. lxxiii. 10). Isa. xxv. 10, "Moab shall be trodden down . . . as straw is trodden down for the dunghill"; also Isa. v. 25 marg. The dung sweepings of the streets were collected in heaps at fixed places outside the walls, e.g. "the dung gate" at Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 13), and thence removed to the fields. The dunghill is the image of the deepest degradation (Ps. cxiii. 7, Lam. iv. 5, 1 Sam. ii. 8). Manure is inserted in holes dug about the roots of fruit trees to the present day in S. Italy (Luke xiii. 8). The dung of sacrifices was burnt outside the camp (Exod. xxix. 14).

In Mal. ii. 3, "I will spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts," the point is, the maw was the priests' perquisite (Deut. xviii. 3); you shall get the dung in the maw, instead of the maw. The sanctity of the Israelites' camp through Jehovah's presence is made the ground for rules of cleanliness such as in Dent. xxiii. 12. The removal to separate receptacles, and exposure of human and other ordure, gives the force to the threats, Dan. ii. 5, iii. 20, Ezra vi. 11, 2 Kings x. 27, "a draught house," ix. 37, 1 Kings xiv. 10, Jer. viii. 2. In Isa. xxxvi. 12 the sense is, Is it to thy master and thee I am sent? Nay, it is to the men on the wall, to let them know that (so far am I from wishing them not to hear), if they do not surrender they shall be reduced to eating their own excrements (2 Chron. xxxii. 11). Scarcity of fuel necessitated the use of cows' and camels' dung, formed in cakes with straw added, for heating ovens as at this day; but to use human dung implied cruel necessity (Ezek. iv. 12). In Phil. iii. 8, "I do count them dung," skubala means "refuse cast to the dogs."

Dura. Now Duair, S.E. of Babil (Dan. iii. 1). Oppert found there the pedestal of a colossal statue.

Dust. To shake off dust from one's feet against a city or person implied a solemn refusal to take away aught, even the very dust of their ground, but to leave it to witness against them (Mark vi. 11); shaking off all connection with them, and all responsibility for their guilt and consequent punishment for rejecting the gospel.

E

Eagle. Nesher. Lev. xi. 13. The golden eagle (W. Drake). The griffon vulture; the Arab nisr plainly = Heb. nesher. In Mic. i. 16, "make thee bald (shaving the head betokening mourning) . . . enlarge thy baldness as the nesher," the griffon vulture must be meant; for it is "bald," which the eagle is not. "A majestic and royal bird, the largest and most powerful seen in Palestine, far surpassing the eagle in size and power" (Tristram). The Egyptians ranked it as first among birds.

The daah (Lev. xi. 14) is not "the vulture" but the black kite. The Heb. quaroch is to make bald the back of the head, very applicable to the griffon vulture's head and neck, which are destitute of true feathers. The golden eagle; the spotted, common in the rocky regions; the imperial; and the Circæus gallicus (short-toed eagle, living on reptiles only: Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1876), are all found in Palestine. Its swift flight is alluded to, and rapacious cruelty, representing prophetically (Hab. i. 8, Jer. iv. 13) the Chaldean, and ultimately the Roman, invaders of Israel (Deut. xxviii. 49, Ezek. xvii. 3-7). Comp. Josephus, B. J., vi. Its soaring high and making its nest in the inaccessible rock, also its wonderful farsightedness and strength (Job xxxix. 27-30). Ps. ciii. 5, "thy youth is renewed like the eagle's"; not as if the eagle renewed its youth in old age, but by the Lord's goodness "thy youth is renewed" so as to be as vigorous as the eagle. The eagle's vigour and longevity are illustrated by the Gr. proverb, "the eagle's old age is as good as the lark's youth." Its preying on decomposing carcases symbolises the Divine retributive principle that, where corruption is, there vengeance shall follow. "Where-soever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together," quoted by our Lord from Job xxxix. 30, Matt. xxiv. 28: the vulture chiefly feeds on carcases.

The eagle's training its young to fly forcibly pictures the Lord's power, combined with parental tenderness, in training and tending His people (Deut. xxxii. 11, Exod. xix. 4). In the law the fostering mother is the eagle, God manifesting His power and sternness mingled with tenderness in bringing His people out of Egypt with a mighty hand and outstretched arm; in the gospel the fostering mother is the hen (Matt. xxiii. 37), Christ coming in grace, humility, and obedience unto death (Bochart). Subsequently Christ rescues His people "from the face of the serpent" by giving His church the "two wings of a great eagle" (Rev. xii. 14). The eagle "hovers over her young" in teaching them their first flight, ready in a moment to save them when in danger of falling on the rocks below. Comp. Isa. xxi. 5. God stirred up Israel from the foul nest of Egypt, which of their own accord they would have never left, so satisfied were they with its fleshpots in spite of its corruptions. The "stirring up the nest" spiritually answers to the first awakening of the soul; the "fluttering over her young" to the brooding of the Holy Spirit over the awakened soul; the "taking and bearing on her wings" to His continuous teaching and guardian care. The eagle assists the young one's first effort by flying under to sustain it for a moment and encourage its efforts. So the Spirit co-operates with us, after He has first given us the good will (Phil. ii. 12, 13). The eagle rouses from the nest, the hen gathers to her; so the law and the gospel respectively.

The Persians under Cyrus had a golden eagle on a spear as their standard (Isa. xlv. 11). The eagle is represented in Assyrian sculptures as accompanying their armies; Nisroch, their god, had an eagle's head. The Romans had the eagle standard, hence the appropriateness of their being compared to an eagle (Deut. xxxiii. 49).

Earing. Old English for ploughing. "Neither earing, nor harvest" (Gen. xlv. 6, Exod. xxiv. 21, Deut. xxi. 4, Isa. xxx. 24).

Earnest. 2 Cor. i. 20, 22, v. 5; Eph. i. 13, 14. Money given by a purchaser as a pledge for the full payment of the sum promised. The Holy Spirit is to the believer the first instalment to assure him that his full inheritance as a son of God shall follow hereafter; the token of the fulfilment of "all the promises."

Hence the Spirit is called "the Holy Spirit of promise," "the first fruits of the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 23), i.e., we have the Spirit Himself as the first fruits of our full redemption. Heb. erabon, brought by the Phœnicians to Greece and Rome, Latin arrhabo. The payment of an earnest or deposit bound both seller and purchaser to carry out the contract.

This partpayment implies the identity in kind of the deposit with the future full payment; but a "pledge" may be of a quite different kind (Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18). "Earnest" implies, besides the security of the believer's future inheritance, its identity in kind, though not in degree, with his present possessed enjoyment of the Spirit. Heaven perfected will continue heaven already begun in part (Rev. xxi. 11 end).

Earrings: nezem, which also includes the nose ring hanging on one side of the nose (Gen. xxiv. 47, where the words "upon her face" imply either a nose ring or one to be hung from her forehead, xxv. 4). Circular, as its other name agil implies. Oriental men wore them as well as women. Jnd. viii. 24 seems to imply that the Israelite men did not wear them, as did the Ishmaelites; but Exod. xxxii. 2 proves that young "sons" wore them.

There were besides netiphoth (Jud. viii. 26), not "collars," but pearl shaped "eardrops," or jewels attached to the rings, or else pendent scent bottles, or pendants from the neck on the breast, "chains" A. V. (Isa. iii. 19, 21), "earrings" (lechashim, from lachash "to whisper"), amulets with magic inscriptions, and so surrendered along with the idols by Jacob's household (Gen. xxv. 4).

The best use made of them was that in Num. xxxi. 50, an offering to the Lord to "make atonement for souls"; not that our gifts can wipe away guilt, but acknowledgments of God's grace not being offered in loving gratitude evince an unatoned state, and so a state of guilt. When offered in loving faith, they evidence and seal visibly our reception of the atonement (Luke vii. 44-47).

The "phylacteries," headbands, totaphoth (Matt. xxiii. 5) in the Talmudists' opinion were the sanctioned antidote to the idolatrous amulets and "earrings" (Deut. vi. 7, 8; xi. 18, 19; contrast Hos. ii. 13, Isa. iii. 21, lechashim). But the language in Deut. and in Exod. xiii. 9, 16 is rightly taken by the Karaites as proverbial, not literal; as is apparent from the reason added, "that the law of Jehovah may be in thy mouth"; for it is by receiving the law into the heart, and by keeping it, that it would be naturally on the tongue continually. God does not say His law was to be written upon scrolls, but to be "for a sign upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes," i.e., was to be kept in view like memorials upon the forehead and the hand, the prominent visible parts symbolising respectively open confession and action (Rev. xiii. 16, xii. 4). This view is proved by Prov. iii. 3, iv. 21, vi. 22, vii. 3. But latterly the Jews used the "phylacteries," tota- photh, or tephullim, prayer fillets, parchment strips with sentences of the law, bound on the forehead or left arm during prayer.

Earth: eret; Heb. gee Gr. Designating either the whole globe, or land as opposed to sea, or a particular land; to be distinguished by the context. A distinct term expresses the material of which the earth consists, adamah, the "ground," "soil"; adamah, whence Adam was named (Gen. ii. 7), his body coming from and returning to the earth (Gen. iii. 19), a different word "dust" (Job x. 9, Eccles. xii. 7).

Naaman desired to have two mules' burden of earth of the Holy Land, whether for an altar or other sacred purpose (Exod. xx. 24), a half heathenish notion that God would accept devotions in connection with that soil rather than with any other. In Jas. v. 17 trans. "it rained not on the land (of Israel)"; for the drought was a judgment, not on the whole earth, but on Israel; comp. Luke iv. 25. So in Luke xxiii. 41 "there was darkness over all the land," not "all the earth"; comp. Matt. xxvii. 45.

In 1 Cor. xv. 47-49, "the first man is of the earth, earthy," contrasted with "the Lord from heaven" and "the heavenly," the term is choikos, not merely earthly, i.e. born upon earth, but "earthy," lit. "of heaped clay," answering to the surface "dust" in the O. T. of which man is made; not merely terrestrial, but terrene, therefore transitory.

Earthquake. Traces of volcanic agency abound in Palestine. Yet the only recorded earthquake is that in Uzziah's reign (Amos i. 1). It must have been a terrible one, as two centuries and a half later it is made an epoch in Zech. xiv. 5; his sin in the spiritual world was connected with the convulsion in the natural world. Such physical signs and premonitory upheavals shall accompany the closing conflict between the powers of light and darkness (Isa. xxiv. 20, Zech. xiv. 4, Matt. xxiv. 7). Also that in 1 Kings xix. 11. The awe it inspires made it an accompaniment attributed to Jehovah's presence (Jud. v. 4; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Ps. lxxvii. 18, civ. 32; Amos viii. 8; Hab. iii. 10). The valley of Siddim, S. of the Dead Sea, probably subsided owing to an earthquake. Bela is so called (=swallowed up) from having been engulged by an earthquake, as Dathan and Abiram were (Num. xvi. 30-32; Gen. xiv. 2). The miraculous darkness and earthquake at our Lord's death (Matt. xxvii. 51-54) accord with the natural fact of darkness often accompanying earthquakes. The Jordan valley, with a lower and a lower valley, the sulphureous and bituminous neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, the lava, pumice stones, and hot springs, the crater like depression of the Dead Sea, 1300 ft. below the Mediterranean level, and 3500 ft. below Jerusalem, only 20 miles off (the deepest depression on the earth), its basaltic columns, disturbed strata, and numerous crevices, all betoken action of volcanoes and earthquakes. The line of earthquakes extends from Hebron and Jerusalem to Baalbek and Aleppo, from S.W. to N.E., following the central chain of Syria, parallel to the Jordan valley, and terminating in the volcanic slope of Taurus on the N. and in the mountains of Arabia Petraea on the S.

East: quedem, lit. before; for in describing the points of the compass the person faced the E. or sunrise (Gr. anatole, the E.), which was thus before or in front of him; the S. was on his right, and so is called in Heb. the right hand; the N. was on his left, and so is called in Heb. the left hand. Job xxiii. 8, 9, "forward," i.e. eastward; "backward," i.e. westward; "on the left hand," i.e. to the N.; "on the right hand," i.e. to the S. So the Hindus call the E. para, "before"; the W. apara, "behind"; the S. daschima, "the right hand"; the N. bama, "the left." Mizrach, "the sunrise," is used when the E. is distinguished from the W.

Quedem is also used to designate the lands lying immediately E. of Palestine, viz. Arabia, Mesopotamia, Babylonia. Gen. xxv. 6; trans. "unto the land of Quedem," for "unto the E. country"; xxix. 1, Haran. Mizrach is used of the E. more indefinitely. The Gr. plural anatolai, "the sunrises," is used of the E. indefinitely, the eastern point of the compass (Matt. ii. 1); but he anatole, "the sunrise," singular, is used of a definite locality. So Quedem with the article (Gen. x. 30) expresses the definite country S. Arabia; "Sepharah mount of the E.," a seaport on the coast of Hadramaut. More generally said of N. Arabia and Mesopotamia. Job i. 3: "the children of the E." are mentioned with the Midianites and Amalekites (Jud. vi. 3, 33; vii. 12). Gideon and his servant understood their talk, showing that theirs was a Semitic dialect akin to the Hebrew, before it had greatly diverged from the common parent tongue. In Ezek. xxv. 4 "the men of the E." are the wandering Bedouin tribes of Arabia Deserta; "they shall set their palaces in thee" (Ammon); irony; where thy palaces once stood, they shall set up very different "palaces," viz. nomadic encampments and mud-surrounded folds (Jer. xlix. 28, 29). Arab is the O. T. name for "the children of the E." [See ARAB.] Isa. ii. 6, "replenished from the E.," i.e. filled with the superstitions of the E., viz. the astrology and sorceries of Chaldaea.

East Sea. Joel ii. 20; Ezek. xlvii. 18. Lit. the front sea, i.e. the Dead Sea, which one looking E. would face; "the utmost (hinder) sea" is the Mediterranean, at such a one's back (Num. xxxiv. 6).

East Wind. Dry, parching, and blighting, as blowing from over burning deserts. The E. wind was what blasted the corn in Pharaoh's dream; strictly the S.E. wind (ehamsia) is what is most hurtful in Egypt to animals and vegetation. Whilst it lasts doors and windows are shut; but the fine dust penetrates everywhere, wooden vessels warp and crack, the thermometer suddenly rises, the grass withers (Ukert in Henzenberg on Egypt and the Books of Moses). Israel's passage through the Red Sea after the passover was just the time of year when the "strong E. wind" from the Red Sea blows, exactly as the sacred narrative records (Exod. xiv. 21).

Easter. The A. V. of pascha (trans. rather "the passover"), in Acts xii. 4. E. is a Christian feast, the pass-over a Jewish one.

Ebal. 1. The hill on which the *curse*s of the law were to be read; as on the opposite hill GERIZIM the *bles*sings (Deut. xi. 29, 30, xxvii. 12, 13; Josh. viii. 30-35). The valley wherein Shechem or Sichem (now Nablous) lay runs between the two hills. E., the mount of the curse, is steeper and more barren; Gerizim, the mount of the blessing, more sloping, and having a ravine opposite the W. of Shechem full of fountains and trees. Gerizim, as the southern-most, was chosen for the blessing, light and life being associated with the S. by the Hebrews. The central position of these mountains adapted them for the scene of the reading. The associations of the locality were another recommendation. Here first in Canaan Abraham rested, and built an altar to Jehovah who appeared unto him (Gen. xii. 6, 7). Here too Jacob abode on returning from Mesopotamia, and bought a field from the children of Hamor, father of Shechem, and built the altar El-elohe-Israel (Gen. xxxiii. 19, 20). On Gerizim the Samaritans in ages long after built their temple in rivalry of that at Jerusalem. The remains of the road to it still exist. There is still a rocky amphitheatrical recess on the side of E., and a corresponding one of the same dimensions on the side of Gerizim; probably formed for the accommodation of the people, when all Israel, their elders, officers, and judges, stood: half of them, the six blessing tribes, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph, and Benjamin (sprung from Jacob's proper wives), over against Gerizim; and half, the six cursing tribes (four sprung from Zilpah and Bilhah, and Reuben the incestuous eldest and Zebulun the youngest) over against E.: with the ark and the priests and Levites in the centre between the two mountains. The priests pronounced after Joshua (viii. 33, 34) the blessings and curses, the people responded Amen. The voices of those standing on E. can be distinctly heard by those on Gerizim (such are the acoustic properties of the place, according to Tristram, etc.) and in the intermediate valley, which is about 1600 ft. broad and runs from Gerizim S.E. to Ebal N.W. The voice of the priests in the middle would only have to traverse half the interval between the hills. The mountains are about 2500 ft. high. On E. the great altar of unhewn stones was erected, plastered with lime and inscribed with the law (Deut. xxvii. 2-8) immediately after entering the Holy Land, when Joshua had the first leisure after destroying Ai. It symbolised their setting up of Jehovah's law as the permanent law of Israel in their land of inheritance; and it was the pledge, in the event of their continued obedience, that Jehovah would conquer all their foes and establish them in security. The distance which Joshua had to march from Ai to Shechem was 30 miles in a straight line.

Trans. Deut. xi. 30, "are they not on the other side Jordan, beyond (achareey) the way (road) of the W." (the sunset), i.e. on the farther side of the main route from Syria and Damascus to Jerusalem and Egypt, through the centre of Palestine. This road skirts Ebal and Gerizim. Moses adds "over against Gilgal" (not the Gilgal near Jericho and the Jordan, first named by Joshua (v. 9), but the modern Jiljuleh, 12 miles S. of Gerizim and on the brow of lofty hills, a suitable landmark, 2 Kings ii. 1, 2), "and beside the oaks (not 'plains,' but terebinths) of Moreh." These "terebinths of Moreh" near Shechem were familiar to the people, as marking the spot where Abraham first entered the land (Gen. xii. 6). The significance of the cursing and blessing is much increased by its scene being placed at Shechem in the heart of the country, equidistant between N. and S., E. and W., rather than on the outskirts of the country, at the Gilgal near Jericho.

"The Canaanites" are mentioned in Deut. xi. 30, as in Gen. xii. 6, as then already in the land, which originally was held by a Semitic race, but was afterwards taken by the Hamitic Canaanites whose original seat was near the Red Sea, whence they migrated northwards. The conquest of the heart of the country by Joshua, mount Ephraim, Esdraelon or the Jezreel valley, is not detailed; but the narrative passes from his conquest of the S. and Gilgal to Merom waters in the far N., the Ebal altar building and the blessing and cursing being the only allusion to the central country. The Samaritan Pentateuch reads "Gerizim" for E. (Deut. xxvii. 4) as the site of the altar and the plastered and law-inscribed stones; but all the Hebrew authorities are against it, and the site of the cursing is fitly the site of the altar where the penalty of the curse is borne by the typical victim. Moreover, the cursings alone are specified in the context (ver. 14-26), an ominous presage at the beginning of Israel's disobedience and consequent chastisement. The Samaritans' aim in their reading was to justify their erection of the temple on Gerizim.

The curses of E. have been literally fulfilled on the literal Israelites. Why should not also the blessings be literally fulfilled to literal Israel? The cross, our glory, was Israel's stumblingblock. Why should the crown, both our and their glory, be our stumblingblock? See Mic. v. 7, Zech. vii. 13, Zeph. iii. 20, Rom. xi. 12, 15.

2. EBAL, son of Shobal, son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 23).

Ebed = slave. 1. Father of GAAL who helped the men of Shechem against Abimelech. 2. Son of Jonathan; one of "the sons of Adin" (Ezra viii. 6), who returned from Babylon with Ezra.

Ebed-melech = king's slave (an oriental phrase), an Ethiopian eunuch of king Zedekiah, instrumental in Jeremiah's deliverance out of Malchiah's dungeon pit. E., an Ethiopian Gentile slave, did that which none of Jeremiah's own countrymen attempted in his behalf. Often God raises friends to His people from quarters whence least they could expect it. E.'s courageous interference in Jeremiah's behalf, at a time when he might naturally fear the wrath of the princes to which even the king had to yield (xxxviii. 4-13, xxxix. 16-18), brought deliverance not only to the prophet, but ultimately to himself as his reward from God. None ever loses by being held for God (Matt. x. 42). He might have spoken privately to the king, as being over the king's harcm (Nubians being chosen for that office to the present day), but E. "went forth out of the king's house to the gate of Benjamin," and there spake publicly to the king, "these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah whom they have cast into the dungeon, and he is like to die for hunger in the place where he is, for there is no more bread in the city." With 30 men to guard against the princes' opposition, and by means of torn clothes and worn garments ("cast clouts and rotten rags," for God chooses weak things to confound the mighty, 1 Cor. i. 27-29), he raised Jeremiah up from the pit. So when his enemies should perish God promised E. should be saved, "because thou hast put thy trust in Me" (comp. 1 Chron. v. 20, Ps. xxxvii. 40). Trust in God generates fearlessness of man and brings true safety for eternity, and often even here (Jer. xxxix.). So shall they be rewarded who have visited Christ, in the person of His servants, in prison (Matt. xxv. 34-36 end).

Eben-ezel. 1 Sam. xx. 19, the stone of departure.

Eben-ezer = the stone of help. Set up to the Lord by Samuel after Israel's defeat of the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 12), "saying, Hitherto hath Jehovah helped us." Between Mizpeh "the watchtower" and Shen "the tooth" or crag, a few miles N. of Jerusalem. The "great stone" (Eben, 1 Sam. vi. 14) on which the ark rested after coming from Ekron is now Deir Eban (Ganneau, Pal. Expl.).

Eber. Son of Salah, great grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 21, 24, 1 Chron. i. 19, Num. xxiv. 24, where the "Eber" whom "ships from Chittim shall afflict" represents not the Hebrews, but in general the western descendants of Shem, sprung from Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram; the posterity of Abraham who descended from E. through Peleg, and also the descendants of E. through Joktan. As "Asshur" represented the Shemites who dwelt in the far East, including Elam, so Eber represents the western Shemites.

Ebiasaph. 1 Chron. vi. 23, 37, ix. 19, contracted into Asaph, xxvi. 1.

Ebony. A dark hard wood, Diospyros ebenum, growing in Ethiopia, India, and the Mauritius (Ezek. xxvii. 15). The dark portion is in the heart of the trunk.

Ecbatana. Marg. Ezra vi. 2 for ACH-METHA = Haqmatana, the native appellation; a Median town where was a palace. There were two of this name: the capital of N. Media, "the seven walled town," with each wall of a different colour, white, black, scarlet, blue, orange, silver, and gold (Herodotus, i. 98, 99, 153); the capital of Cyrus, therefore probably the town where the roll was found containing Cyrus' decree for rebuilding the Jerusalem temple, which induced Darius to issue a new decree sanctioning the recommencement of the suspended work; now the ruins of Takht-i-Suleiman. The other town was capital of the larger province, Media Magna; now Hamadan. Takht-i-Suleiman contains a lake of pure water in its centre, 300 paces round. The Zendavesta makes Demshid, but Herodotus Deiocees, its founder. The seven walls were designed to put the city under the guardianship of the seven planets. The finding of Cyrus' decree at E., whereas, when Ezra wrote, the Persian kings resided usually at Susa or Babylon, visiting only occasionally in summer time E. or Persepolis, is one of those little points of agreement between sacred and profane history which confirm the truth of Scripture, because their very minuteness proves the undesignedness of the harmony. Susa and Babylon were the ordinary depositories of the archives. But Cyrus held his court permanently at E., and therefore kept his archives there. Ezra, living a century after, would not have been likely to have fixed on E. as the place of finding Cyrus' decree, had he been inventing, instead of recording facts.

Ecclesiastes. The speaker so entitles himself, Heb. Koheleth, Gr. E., "the convener of, and preacher to, assemblies," viz. church assemblies. The feminine form, and its construction once with a feminine verb (vii. 27), show that Divine Wisdom herself speaks through the inspired king; Solomon. God had specially endowed him with this wisdom (1 Kings iii. 5-14, vi. 11, 12, ix. 1, etc., xi. 9-11). "The preacher taught the people (and inquirers) knowledge" in a divan assembled for the purpose (1 Kings iv. 34, x. 2, 8, 24; 2 Chron. ix. 1, 7, 23). "Spoke," thrice in 1 Kings iv. 32, 33, refers not to written compositions, but to addresses spoken in assemblies.

Solomon's authorship is supported by chaps. i. 12, 16, ii. 1-15, xii. 9. But in the book are found words (1) rarely employed in the earlier, frequently in the later books of Scripture; (2) Words never found in Heb. writings till the Babylonian captivity; as z'man, "set time," for mo'ed, iii. 1, viz. in Neh. ii. 6, Esth. ix. 27, 31. So pythum, "sentence" (viii. 11); "thought," madang; illu "though" (vi. 6); bokeen, "so" (viii. 10); thus Esther approximates most to E. in idioms. (3) Words not found in the late Heb., but only in the Chaldee of Daniel and Ezra: pythron, "profit"; comp. pythran in the targums; kbar, "already," "long ago"; taquam, "make straight" (i. 15, vii. 13; Dan. iv. 33) ("established"); ruth, "desire," found also in the Chaldee parts of Ezra. (4) The grammatical constructions accord with the transition period from Heb. to Chaldee; frequent participles; the uses of the relative, van conversive rare. Probably, as the book is poetical not historical, a later writer, in the person of Solomon as an idealized Solomon, writes under inspiration the lessons that such an experience as that of Solomon would properly afford. Hence Solomon is not named; the writer speaks as Koheleth, "the preacher." If it were merely Solomon's penitent confession in old age, he would have used his own name. The spirit of Solomon speaks, the true Koheleth (Gatherer), type of Him who is "Wisdom" and calls Himself so, and who "would have gathered Jerusalem's children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings"; comp. Luke xi. 49 with Matt. xxiii. 31-37. The writer makes Solomon's saying after his late repentance, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," his text which he expands under the Spirit. So the sons of Korah write Ps. xlii. as from David's soul, in his transjordanic flight from Absalom, so that David is the speaker throughout. Koheleth addresses "the great congregation" (Ps. xxii. 25, xli. 2-4), giving his testimony for godliness as the only solid good, as the seal of his repentance under chastisement for apostasy (1 Kings xi. 14, 23; Ps. lxxxix. 30, 33). It is just possible that the peculiarities of language may be due to Solomon's long intercourse with foreigners; also the Chaldaisms may be fragments preserved from the common tongue of which Heb., Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic were offshoots. So Solomon himself would be the writer.

Its canonicity rests on the testimony of the Jewish church, "to whom were committed the oracles of God," and who are never charged in the N. T. with unfaithfulness in that respect, though so unfaithful in other respects (Rom. iii. 2). Many allusions to E. occur in N. T.: vii. 2, Matt. v. 3, 4; Eccles. v. 2, Matt. vi. 7; Eccles. vi. 2, Luke xii. 20, Matt. vi. 19-34; Eccles. xi. 5, John iii. 8; Eccles. ix. 10, John ix. 4; Eccles. x. 12, Col. iv. 6; Eccles. xii. 14, 2 Cor. v. 10; Eccles. v. 1, 1 Tim. iii. 15, Jas. i. 19, Eccles. v. 6, 1 Cor. xi. 10. The O. T. would be incomplete without the book that sets forth the unsatisfying vanity of the creature apart from God, even as the S. of Sol. depicts the all-satisfying fulness there is for us in God our Saviour.

The theme is the vanity of all human pursuits when made the chief end, and the consequent wisdom of making the fear of God and His commandments our main aim. This presumes the immortality of the soul, which was more needed as a doctrine at the time when God, whose theocratic kingship Israel's self chosen king in some measure superseded, was withdrawing the extraordinary providences whence the Messic law had drawn its sanctions of temporal reward or punishment. The anomalies that virtue is not always rewarded, nor vice always punished, here (ii. 16, iii. 19, iv. 1, v. 8, vii. 15, viii. 14, ix. 2, 11), suggested the truth that there must be a future life and a judgment, wherein God will deal with men according to their present works. This is "the conclusion of the whole" discussion, that man's wisdom and "whole duty" is to "fear God and keep His commandments" (xii. 13, 14), and meanwhile to use in joyful and serene sobriety, and not abuse, life's present passing goods (iii. 12, 13).

David, Solomon's father (Ps. xxxix. 12), and Job (vii. 16), had already taught the vanity of man and man's earthly aims. So Solomon speaks of man (adam, not ish) as such, frail and mortal, not redeemed man nor the elect nation Israel. Hence not Jehovah, expressing the covenant relation to His people, but the general name God (Elohim), appears throughout, the correlative to "man" (adam) in general. The fatiguing toil or travail (amal) of man is another characteristic phrase; it be-reeves of "quietness" and "good" (iv. 6, 8). In contrast stands "the work of God," which "no man can find out from the beginning to the end"; yet this much he sees, it is "beautiful," and "in His time," and "for ever"; "nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it" (iii. 11, 14); none "can make that straight which He hath made crooked" (vii. 13). So the "all" that is "vanity" is whatever work man, frail and mortal, undertakes, not falling in with God's irresistible work. Man's way to escape from the vanity that attends his work, however successful it seem for a time, is to "fear God," and to make His commandments the end of all our work; also to acquiesce patiently, cheerfully, and contentedly in all God's dispensations, however trying and dark (ii. 24; iii. 12, 13, 22; v. 17; vii. 15; ix. 7). The recommendation to "eat and drink," etc., was mistaken as recommending the Epicurean sensuality against which Paul (1 Cor. xv. 32, 33) protests, and made an objection to the book; but the eating and drinking recommended is that associated with labour, not idleness; with pious "fear of God," not sensual ignoring of the future Judge; the cheerful, contented "eating and drinking" which characterized Judah and Israel under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 20), and under Josiah (Jer. xxii. 15, "Did not thy father [Josiah] eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him?") So Nehemiah enjoins (viii. 10, 12).

Translate Eccles. ii. 24, "is it not good for man that he should eat?" etc. This is opposed to a self harassing, covetous, grasping carefulness (Phil. iv. 6, 7; Matt. vi. 24-34; Eccles. v. 18, comp. 11-15). The joy of sensual levity is explicitly forbidden (vii. 2, 6, xi. 9, xii. 1). The reference to hopeless oppression (iv. 1-3) is made the ground for supposing the period was one of the church's suffering, as Israel suffered under Persia after the return from Babylon. But even in Solomon's days, in the provinces, and especially when he fell into idolatry and consequent troubles, oppression must have often occurred, which his power was notable to prevent altogether in subordinate governors.

Fatality and scepticism might seem taught in vii. 16, ix. 2-10. But vii. 17, 18, ix. 11, xi. 1-6, xii. 13, confute such notions. What is forbidden is a self-made "righteousness" which would constrain God to grant salvation to man's works, and ceremonial strictness with which it wears itself profitlessly; also that speculation which would fathom God's inscrutable counsels (viii. 17).

"Under the sun" or "the heavens" is another characteristic phrase (i. 13; comp. vii. 11, xi. 7, xii. 2). Irresistible death is what stamps "vanity" on earthly aims and works (i. 4, viii. 8); in this respect man has "no preeminence above a beast" (iii. 19). With all man's ceaseless round of toils he returns to the point whence he came, like the winds and the currents (i. 5-11). He can bring forth no "new" thing, nor ensure his "remembrance." "What profit hath he of all his labour?" i. 3 answering to Matt. xvi. 26. The answer is, "Remember God thy Creator" (xii. 1, 13). He will create for His people a new covenant, name, heart, heavens, and earth, in which the "crooked shall be made straight" (i. 15; comp. Isa. xl. 4, xlii. 18, 19, lvii. 2, lxi. 17, Jer. xxxi. 31, Ezek. xi. 19, xvi. 31). Also God will have "the righteous in everlasting remembrance" (Ps. cxii. 6, Mal. iii. 16). At His "judgment" all thy works for Him shall be remembered (xii. 14). The hope of eternal life is involved in the "fear of God" enjoined; hence flows the assertion of the difference between "the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth" (iii. 21, so xii. 7; comp. Gen. ii. 7). But it is not prominently put forward; for Christ first "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10; contrast ix. 5-10 with Phil. i. 21-23). However, what is denied is that "the dead know anything" of the mere earthly concerns which their bodily senses formerly took cognizance of. Therefore, infers the preacher, now is the only time to work for eternity, and at the same time enjoy, in subordination to this first aim, whatever innocent enjoyment God vouchsafes; "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, etc., in the grave;" to which our Lord refers, John ix. 4.

This book is the believing philosopher's inspired reasoning as to life's true end, and as to the practical way to draw from the present scene of vanity the greatest amount of profit and enjoyment. Comp. Solomon's view of wisdom (Prov. i. 7, 20, viii. ix. 10; Ps. cxi. 10).

The introduction is i. 1-11; the body of the argument, i. 12-xii. 12; the conclusion arrived at is xii. 13, 14. The experience of Solomon is given, i. 12-ii. 26; and that of mankind is appealed to in the remainder. In the former the dark side of the picture preponderates; in the latter God's beautiful work relieves the gloom, which is perfectly cleared off to the godly at the close. God's providential work, so infinitely manifold, is in all its parts ordered as to time and place. Man's work loses its vanity only by falling into harmony with God's; faith and reverential fear of God is his true wisdom. The gleams of light from God, amidst the dreary catalogue of vanities, appear at iii. 11, 17, vii. 29, viii. 12. Even in troublous times and perplexing dispensations of Providence, cheerfully and contentedly enjoy whatever present mercies He gives (iii. 12, 23; v. 18; viii. 15; ix. 7-10). At the same time, not worldly carnal joys are to be sought, but the young are to remember God will judge them for sensual indulgences; therefore "remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not."

The book is mainly in poetical parallelism. The epithets, imagery, inverted order of words, ellipses, and similarity of diction, when parallelism is absent, mark versification.

Ed (Josh. xxii. 34), i.e. witness (comp. xxiv. 27). It is remarkable that not one of the famous towns of Palestine owes its origin to Israel. The rock-cut cemeteries, and ancient cultivation, are almost the only Israelite remains in the country. The great altar of Ed also was an Israelite work, founded by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, to be a witness of their having a share in the national covenant and sanctuary of Jehovah. In ver. 11 the Heb. expresses, "Reuben, . . . Gad, and . . . half Manasseh built an altar at the boundary of (lit. in the fore part of, not as A. V. over against) Canaan, by the gilelith (circles, i.e. the portion of the Ghor on the W. side of Jordan) of Jordan, at the passage of . . . Israel," viz. where Reuben, etc., crossed Jordan to return to their eastern possessions; not the ford near Jericho, but the Damieh ford the highway from the eastern uplands to central Palestine (identified with the "city Adam"), opposite to the opening of the broad wady Far'ah, the route from Shiloh the national sanctuary to Gilead and Bashan. The altar was erected on the W. side of and above (so Heb. for "by," ver. 10) Jordan, the pledge that the two and a half tribes held possession still with the remaining tribes on the W. The altar was "a great altar to see to," i.e. visible from afar. Gilelith is transl. in the Vulg. "mounds," probably the round islands with flat tops, formed by broad water channels and salt springs on the level of the Ghor or upper plain. The high cone of Kurn Sartabeh realizes the description of the altar of witness; it crowns an almost isolated block of hill, closing in the broader part of the Jordan valley on the N. The ancient road, cut in steps, arrives at the summit on the S., but on every side the valleys are deep, and the only natural ascent is from the N., by which the watershed is reached and followed along its winding course to the summit. The cone has sides sloping at 35 degrees, and 270 ft. high on the W. where it joins a narrow plateau. On the other sides the slope is sheer to the mountain's base. Human skill evidently has in part given the cone its peculiar shape. On it is an oblong area, 30 yards by 100 yards, enclosed by a ruined wall of fine hewn blocks; within this is a platform, 18 ft. high, consisting of ten courses of beautifully cut stones, each three or four feet long, with a broad marginal draft. The stones were brought probably from caves in the S.E. side of the hill. An aqueduct runs round the whole mountain block. The cone stands above the Damieh ford, on the W. side of Jordan, and beside the direct route to the ford from Seilun, or Shiloh. It is conspicuous from afar. The gilelith or insulated mounds of the upper plain lie at the foot of the hill. The monument on the top is such as the Bible describes the altar to have been. On the N. side lies a valley, Tal'at abu 'Ayd, "the ascent of the father of 'Ayd," i.e. the going up which leads to Ayd=Ed (Conder, Pal. Expl.). The altar of Ed was 11 miles from the national sanctuary at Shiloh, and separated from it by a range of mountains. It was not in sight of Phinehas when addressing the leaders of the two and a half tribes on mount Gilead. In the phrase, "in the fore part," or "front of Canaan," the Ghor or sunken land along the Jordan on its W. side may be meant by "Canaan," as the Arabs there still call themselves Ghawarni (Conder). Or else "Canaan" may be used of the whole country of the nine and a half tribes, the Jordan valley being excepted; the altar Ed being in front of the country of the nine and a half tribes (Keil and Delitzsch).

Edar, Tower of. Gen. xxxv. 21. Jacob's first halting place between Beth-lehem and Hebron was "beyond" this. The name means "a flock" or "drove." The tower was to watch the flock against wild beasts or robbers. Jewish tradition made it the destined birthplace of Messiah. Jerome saw in it the foreshadowing of the announcement of His birth to the "shepherds." Probably the Tower of E. answers to the present Kharbet Sir el Ghanem, "the ruin of the sheepfold," which however contains Christian remains, arches, cisterns, tombs, etc.

Eden=delight. Paradise=the LXX. transl. of "garden," a park and pleasure ground. From the Zendic pairi-daeza, a hedging round. In N.W. Mesopotamia an E. is mentioned near the Tigris (2 Kings xix. 12, Isa. xxxvii. 12, Ezek. xxvii. 23). Another, in Coelosyria, near Damascus (Amos i. 5). The primitive E. was somewhere in the locality containing the conjoined Euphrates and the Tigris (= "Hiddekel") which branch off northward into those two rivers, and southward branch into two channels again below Bassora, before falling into the sea, Gihon the E. channel, and Pison the W. Ilavilah, near the W. channel, would thus be N.E. Arabia; and Cush (= "Ethiopia"), near the E. channel, would be Kissia, Chnezstan, or Susiana. The united rivers are called the Shat-el-Arab.

E. was but a temporary nursery for the human family: thence men, lad they remained innocent, would have spread out in every direction till the whole earth became "the garden of the Lord." God's purpose, though deferred, will in His own time be realized by the Second Adam, the Lord from heaven. The rivers are named as they were after the flood, which must have altered the face of the ancient E. The four took their rise in it, as their centre, which is not true of the present Tigris (=arrow) and Euphrates (=the good and fertile). Armenia's highlands are the traditional cradle of the race; thence probably, from E. as their source, flowed the two eastern rivers, Tigris and Euphrates, and the two western ones through the regions answering to Arabia and Egypt. Man was to dress and keep the garden, for without human culture corn and other plants will degenerate. As nature was made for man, his calling was to ennoble it, and to make paradise, which, though so lovely, was susceptible of development, a transparent mirror of the Creator's glory. It was designed also as the scene of man's own spiritual development by its two trees, of life and of knowledge. Here too the "beasts of the field," i.e. that live on its produce (game and tame cattle, as distinguished from "beasts of the earth"), were brought to him to develop that intellect which constitutes his lordship and superiority to the brutes. His inner thought in observing their natures found expression in names appropriate.

The paradise regained can never be lost by those who overcome through the Lord Jesus (Rev. ii. 7, xiii. 14). The traditions of almost all nations have preserved the truth, in some form, that there was an original abode of man's innocence; the Gr. and Latin garden of the Hesperides; the Hindoo golden mount Meru; the Chinese enchanted gardens; the Medo-Persian Ormuzd's mountain Alborj (comp. Ezek. xxviii. 13, Joel ii. 3). The Hindoos' tradition tells of a "first age of the world when justice, in the form of a bull, kept herself firm on her four feet, virtue reigned, man free from disease saw all his wishes accomplished, and attained an age of 400 years." In the Tenthic Elda, Fab. vii., etc., corruption is represented as suddenly produced by strange women's blandishments who deprived men of their pristine integrity. In the Thibetan, Mongolian, and Cingalese traditions, a covetous temper works the sad change. The Babylonians, Egyptians, and Chinese had the tradition of man's life once reaching thousands of years. The Greeks and Romans made it from 800 to 1000 years.

Eder = flock. 1. A town in S. of Judah, on Edom's border (Josh. xv. 21).

2. A Levite of Merari's family in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiii. 23).

Edom, Idumea = red. Esau's surname, the firstborn of Isaac; Jacob's twin brother, who sold his birthright for the red pottage (of yellow brown lentils, adashim), the cooking of which is still seen in Egyptian representations), whence came his surname (Gen. xxv. 29-34). The name was appropriate to E.'s possession, "mount Seir," the mountainous territory having a reddish hue. Seir means rugged, applicable alike to Seir the hirsute (like Esau) progenitor of the Horites, E.'s predecessors, and to their rugged forest covered territory (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxii. 3, xxxvi. 1 S. 20-22). It extended from the Dead Sea S. to the Euxine gulf of the Red Sea. Esau, with his 400 armed men (xxxii. 6), commenced driving out the Horites, and permanently settled in mount Seir after his father's death, yielding Canaan to Jacob, in accordance with his father's blessing.

It is objected to Gen. xxxvi. 31 that the language supposes kings had already reigned over Israel. But in xxxv. 11 "God Almighty" (El-Shaddai) had promised Jacob "kings shall come out of thy loins." Moses, too, foretold of the Israelites having a king over them. Naturally then he notices that eight kings had reigned of Esau's family up to his own time, "before the reigning of any king to the children of Israel." The prosperity of the worldly is often immediate and brilliant, but it is transitory; that of God's people is slower in coming, that they may believably and patiently wait for it, but when it does come it will abide for ever. Of the kingdom of Messiah, Israel's king, there shall be no end (Luke i. 33). The dukes did not precede the line of Edomite kings, and afterwards succeed again (Gen. xxxvi.); but a single king (emir) reigned in all E. contemporaneously with several dukes (sheikhs) or princes of local tribes. The king is mentioned (Jud. xi. 17), and the dukes a short while before (Exod. xv. 15). Moreover the monarchy was not hereditary, but the kings apparently were elected by the dukes.

The Edomites became "dwellers in the clefts of the rocks" (Jer. xlix. 16; comp. 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12), like their Horite predecessors who were troglodytes or "dwellers in caves" (Obad. 3, 4). Petra (Sela Heb., rock), their chief city, was cut in the rocks. S. Idumea abounds in cave dwellings.

ROCK TOWNS OF PETRA.

Red ball-headed sandstone rocks are intersected by deep seams rather than valleys. In the heart of these, itself invisible, lies Petra (Stanley), Edom's stronghold in Amaziah's days (2 Kings xiv. 7). BOZRAH [see], now Buseirah, was its ancient capital, near the N. border. Elath and Ezion Geber were E.'s seaports; afterwards taken by David and made by Solomon his ports for equipping his merchant fleet (2 Sam. viii. 14, 1 Kings ix. 26). E. (100 miles long, 20 broad) stretched E. of the Arabah valley, southward as far as Elath. Eastward of Elath lay the desert. Israel, when refused a passage through Moab N. of E., as also through E., went from Kadesh by the S. extremity of E. past Elath into the desert E. of E. (Deut. ii. 8, 13, 14, 15; Jud. xi. 17, 18; 2 Kings iii. 6-9).

The brook Zered (wady el Ahsy) was the boundary between Moab (Kerak) and E. (now Jebel, Heb. Gebal, mountainous, the N. district, along with Esh-Sherah, the S. district). E. subsequently took also the territory once occupied by Amalek, S. of Palestine, the desert of Et Tih ("wandering") (Num. xiii. 29; 1 Sam. xv. 1-7, xxvii. 8). Low calcareous hills are on the W. base of the mountain range of igneous porphyry rock, surmounted by red sandstone. On the E. is a limestone ridge, descending with an easy incline to the Arabian desert. The promised (Gen. xxvii. 40) "fatness of the earth" is in the glens and terraces of E. (Gen. xxvii. 39), whilst from their rocky eyries they sallied forth "living by the sword." When navigation was difficult merchants' caravans took E. as their route from the Persian gulf to Egypt, which became a source of wealth to E.

At Kadesh E. came out against Israel, on the latter marching eastward across the Arabah to reach the Jordan through E. and offering to pay for provisions and water; for the rocky country there enabled them to oppose Israel. The wady Ghureir (where probably was "the king's highway") would be the defile by which Israel tried to pass through E., being the only practicable defile for an army, with pasture and springs (Num. xx. 14-21). But E. dared not resist Israel's passage along their eastern border, which is more defenceless than their frontier towards the Arabah. E. then at last made a virtue of necessity and let Israel purchase provisions (Deut. ii. 2-8, 28, 29). In both accounts Israel offered to pay for provisions, and did so at last on E.'s eastern side, whereas they and Moab ought to have "met (Israel as their brother) with bread and water" (Deut. xxiii. 4). E. was among the enemies on the frontier from whom Saul at the beginning of his reign delivered Israel (1 Sam. xiv. 47). Hadad the Edomite, who escaped from David's slaughter to Egypt, returned thence from Pharaoh Shishak to excite E. to revolt against Solomon (1 Kings xi. 14). Jehoshaphat of Judah reduced the Edomites 897 B.C., dethroning their king for a deputy from Jerusalem, and trying by a fleet at Ezion Geber to regain the trade; but his vessels were broken by the Edomites or the Egyptians. Amaziah of Judah slew many thousands in the Valley of Salt near the Dead Sea, and took Selah, afterwards Joktheel, the first mention of this extraordinary city (2 Kings xiv. 7), and adopted their gods of mount Seir. Uziah built Elath on the opposite side of the bay from Ezion Geber, the Roman (Etana, now Akabah; but in Ahaz's reign the Edomites (as 2 Kings xvi. 6 should be read for "Syrians") recovered it (2 Kings xiv. 22).

When Israel and Judah declined E. "broke off Israel's yoke," as Isaac had foretold, in Jehoram's reign (2 Kings vii. 20-22), reconquered their lost cities and invaded southern Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 17). E. also joined the Chaldeans against the Jews (Ps. exxxvii. 7). Hence the denunciations against E. in Obad. 1, etc.; Jer. xlix. 7, etc.; Ezek. xxv. 12, etc., xxxv. 3, etc. At the Babylonian captivity they seized on the Amalekite territory, and even Hebron in southern Judaea, so that Idumæa came to mean the region between the Arabah and the Mediterranean. Meanwhile mount Seir, or E. proper, was occupied by the Nabatheans (descended from Nebaioth, Ishmael's eldest son and Esau's brother in law), a powerful people of S. Arabia; they founded the kingdom of Arabia Petraea in ancient E., and their monarchs took the name Aretas. Aretas, the father in law of Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv.), took Damascus at the time of Paul's conversion (Acts ix. 25, 2 Cor. xi. 32). Rome subdued this kingdom of Arabia A.D. 105.

Idumæa S. of Palestine was joined to Judæa under Judas Maccabæus and John Hyrcanus. Antipater, one of the Jewish prefects, an Idumæan by birth, by the Roman senate's decree (37 B.C.) became procurator of all Judæa. His son was Herod the Great. Just before the siege under Titus 20,000 Idumæans were admitted into Jerusalem and filled it with bloodshed and rapine. Mahometan misrule finally destroyed E.'s prosperity in fulfilment of prophecy (Ezek. xxxv. 3-14).

The 44th Psalm was written by the sons of Korah in the midst of E.'s invasion of Israel, taking advantage of David's absence at the Euphrates. David was striving with Aram of the two rivers (Naharaim) and Aram-Zobah when Joab returned and smote of E. in the Valley of Salt (the scene also of Amaziah's victory over E., the plain S. of the Dead Sea, where the Ghor or Jordan valley ends; the mount of rock salt, Khasm Usdum, is in its N.W. corner) 12,000 men (2 Sam. vii. 13, x. 6, 8, 10-19; 1 Chron. xviii. 12; 1 Kings xi. 15, 16). Israel's slain lay unburied till Joab returned from smiting E. along with Abishai. The scattering of Israel among the heathen (ver. 11) was but partial, enough to gratify E.'s desire to falsify the prophecy, "the elder shall serve the younger." E.'s spite is marked (Joel iii. 19; Amos i. 6, 9, 11). Israel pleads faithfulness to the covenant, which suits David's time; also they had no "armies" in Babylon (ver. 9), which precludes the time of the captivity there. David wrote Psalm lx. when victory was in part gained, and he was sending forth the expedition against E. Trans. the title, "when David had beaten down Aram of the two floods," "when Joab returned," which he did not do till he had fully conquered the Syrians; ver. 4, "Thou hast given a banner," etc., alludes to this victory and to that over E. (in 2 Sam. viii. 13 "E." should be read for "the Syrians," Aram) in the Valley of Salt, the token that the expedition (ver. 9-12) for occupying E. in revenge for invading Israel would succeed. "Over (rather to) E. I will cast out my shoe," as one about to wash his feet casts his shoe to his slave (Matt. iii. 11, John xiii. 8, Acts xiii. 25); and the casting of the shoe marked transference of possession (Ruth iv. 7, Josh. x. 24). David as king, Joab as commander in chief, and Abishai under Joab, smote E. Abishai first slew 6000, Joab afterwards 12,000 (as the title of Psalm lx. states); so in all 18,000 (in 2 Sam. viii. 13).

E. was also linked with Ammon and Moab in the desperate effort made to root out Israel from his divinely given inheritance (their main guilt, 2 Chron. xx. 11, Ps. lxxxiii. 12) under Jehoshaphat, as recorded in 2 Chron. xx. They joined craft with force, marching S. round the Dead Sea instead of from the E. No tidings reached Jehoshaphat till the vast multitude was in his territory at Engedi; "they have taken crafty counsel," etc. Ps. lxxxiii. (3-5, 12) probably was written by Jahaziel, of the sons of Asaph, upon whom "came the Spirit of the Lord in the midst of the congregation." The 47th Psalm (comp. ver. 4, 5, 8, 9) was sung on the battle field of Berachah (blessing) after the victory. Psalm xlviii. was sung "in the midst of God's temple" (ver. 9); ver. 7 alludes to Jehoshaphat's chastisement in the breaking of his Tarsish ships for his ungodly alliance. This danger from within and the foreign one alike God's grace averted. Ps. lxxxiii. is the earliest of the series, for it anticipates victory and is a thanksgiving beforehand, which was the very ground of the victory which actually followed (2 Chron. xx. 21, 22). See "Studies in the Cl. Psalms," by Fausset. N. Edom is now called El Jebel (Gebel), with the villages Tufleih, Buserah, and Shobek. Its S. part is Esh Sherah, inhabited by fellahin; of these the Ammarin are so degraded as not to have the Bedoniu virtue of keeping their word. The Liyathoneh are a branch of the Kheibari Jews near wady Musa.

Edrei = strength. 1. One of Bashan's two capitals (Num. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, iii. 10; Josh. xii. 4). Mentioned only in connection with the victory over Og, and the acquisition of the Amorite territory. Allotted to Manasseh (Num. xxxiii. 33). Its ruins, Edra, stand in black masses, stone roofed and doored houses, of massive walls, on a projection of the S.W. angle of the Lejah or Argob. The site is without water, without access except through rocky defiles, strong and secure, one mile and a half wide by two and a half long, about 25 ft. above the fertile plain. It seems to have been the stronghold of the Geshurites subsequently.

2. A town of Naphtali, near Kedesh (Josh. xix. 37). Now Aitherun (Conder).

Education. Chiefly in the law of God (Exod. xii. 26, xiii. 8, 14; Deut. iv. 5, 9, 10, vi. 2, 7, 20, xi. 19, 21; Acts xxii. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 15). The Book of Proverbs inculcates on parents, as to their children, the duty of disciplinary instruction and training in the word of God. This was the ONE book of national education in the reformation undertaken by Jehoshaphat and Josiah (2 Chron. xvii. 7-9, xxxiv. 30). The priests' and Levites' duty especially was to teach the people (xv. 3; Lev. x. 11; Mal. ii. 7; Neh. viii. 2, 8, 9, 13; Jer. xviii. 18). The Mishna says that parents ought to teach their children some trade, and he who did not virtually taught his child to steal. The prophets, or special public authoritative teachers, were trained in schools or colleges (Amos vi. 14).

"Writers," or munsters general, belonging to Zebulun, who enrolled recruits and wrote the names of those who went to war, are mentioned (Jud. v. 14). "Scribes of the host" (Jer. lii. 25) appear in the Assyrian bas-reliefs, writing down the various persons or objects brought to them, so that there is less exaggeration than in the Egyptian representations of battle. Seraiah was David's scribe or secretary, and Jehoshaphat, son of Ahilud, was "recorder" or writer of chronicles, historiographer (2 Sam. viii. 16, 17); Shebna was Hezekiah's scribe (2 Kings xviii. 37).

The learned, according to the rabbins, were called "sons of the noble," and took precedence at table. Boys at five years of age, says the Mishna, were to begin Scripture, at ten the Mishna, and at thirteen were subject to the whole law (Luke ii. 46); at fifteen they entered the Gemara. The prophetic schools included females, as Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14). The position and duties of females among the Jews were much higher than among other orientals (Prov. xxxi. 10-31; Luke vii. 2, 3, x. 38, etc.; Acts xiii. 50; 2 Tim. i. 5).

Eduth. "Testimony," title of Psalms lx., lxxx.

Eglah = heifer. One of David's wives, specially called "his wife" whilst at Hebron; mother of Ithream (2 Sam. iii. 5, 1 Chron. iii. 3).

Eglaim = two ponds. Same as Engaim = fountain of two calves. On the extreme boundary of Moab (Isa. xv. 8), over against Engedi, near where Jordan enters the Dead Sea.

Eglon. 1. King of Moab. With Amalekites and Ammonites crossed the Jordan and took Jericho the city of palm-trees, left unwall'd, and therefore an easy prey to the foe, because of Joshua's curse in destroying it 60 years before. There (according to Josephus) E. built a palace. For 18 years he oppressed Israel. Ehud, a young Israelite of Jericho, gained his favour by a present (or in Keil's view presented the king tribute, as in 2 Sam. viii. 2, 6, "gifts" mean), and after dismissing its bearers turned again from "the graven images," or else stone quarries, whither he had temporarily withdrawn from the king's reception room, and was cordially admitted by the king into his private summer parlour or cooling apartment. On Ehud's announcing "I have a message from God unto thee," the king rose reverentially to receive it, and was instantly stabbed in the belly by Ehud's dagger in the left hand, and E.'s fat closed over it. Ehud retired to Seirath, in mount Ephraim, and summoning by trumpet Israel from the E. and W. descended upon the Moabites and took the fords, not suffering one of 10,000 to escape. So the land had rest for 80 years (Jud. iii. 12-30). The mode of deliverance, assassination, is not approved by the Spirit of God. Scripture simply records the fact, and that Ehud was raised up by Jehovah as Israel's deliverer. His courage, patriotism, and faith are commendable, but not his means of gaining his end.

2. An Amorite town (Josh. xv. 39), in the shephelah or low country of Judah. One of the confederacy of five towns (including Jerusalem), which attacked Gibeon on its making peace with Joshua; was destroyed with Debir, then its king (Josh. x.). Now Ajlun, a "shapeless mass of ruins" (Porter, Handbook), 14 miles from Gaza, on the S. of the great coast plain.

Egypt. The genealogies in Gen. x. concern raes, not mere descent of persons; hence the plural forms, Madai, Kittim, etc. In the case of E. the peculiarity is, the form is dual, Misraim, son of Ham (i.e. E. was colonized by descendants of Ham), meaning "the two Egypts." Upper and Lower, countries physically so different that they have been always recognised as separate. Hence the Egyptian kings on the monuments appear with two crowns on their heads, and the hieroglyph for E. is a double clod of earth, representing the two countries, the long narrow valley and the broad delta. The Speaker's Comm. suggests the derivation Mes-raim, "children of Ra," the sun, which the Egyptians claimed to be. It extended from Migdol (near Pelusium, N. of Suez) to Syene (in the far S.) (Ezek. xxix. 10, xxx. 6 marg.). The name is akin to an Arabic word, "red mud." The hieroglyphic name for E. is Kem, "black," alluding to its black soil, combining also the idea of heat, "the hot dark country." The cognate Arabic word means "black mud." Ham is perhaps the same name, prophetically descriptive of "the land of Ham" (Ps. cv. 23, 27).

The history of states begins with E., where a settled government and monarchy were established earlier than in any other country. A king and princes subordinate are mentioned in the record of Abram's first visit. The official title Pharaoh, Egyptian Praam, means "the great house" (De Rouge). E. was the granary to which neighbouring nations had recourse in times of scarcity. In all these points Scripture accords with the Egyptian monuments and secular history. The crown of Upper E. was white, that of Lower red; the two combined forming the pschent. Pharaoh was Suten, "king," of Upper E.; Shebt, "bee" (comp. Isa. vi. 18), of Lower E.; together the SUTEN-SHEBT. The initial sign of Suten was a bent reed, which gives point to 2 Kings xviii. 21: "thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed . . . E., on which if a man lean it will go into his hand and pierce it." Upper E. always is placed before Lower, and its crown in the pschent above that of the latter. E. was early divided into nomes, each having its distinctive worship.

The fertility of soil was extraordinary, due to the Nile's overflow and irrigation; not, as in Palestine, due to rain, which in the interior is rare (Gen. xiii. 10; Deut. xi. 10, 11; Zech. xiv. 18). The dryness of the climate accounts for the perfect preservation of the sculptures on stone monuments after thousands of years. Limestone is the formation as far as above Thebes, where sandstone begins. The first cataract is the southern boundary of E., and is caused by granite and primitive rocks rising through the sandstone in the river bed and obstructing the water. Rocky sandstrewn deserts mostly bound the Nile-bordering fertile strip of land, somewhat lower, which generally in Upper E. is about 12 miles broad. Low mountains border the valley in Upper E. Anciently there was a fertile valley in Lower E. to the east of the delta, the border land watered by the canal of the Red Sea; viz. Goshen. The delta is a triangle at the Nile's mouth, formed by the Mediterranean and the Pelusiac and Canopic branches of the river. The land at the head of the gulf of Suez in centuries has become geologically raised, and that on the N. side of the isthmus depressed, so that the head of the gulf has receded southwards. So plentiful were the fish, vegetables, and fruits, that the Israelites did "eat freely," though but bondservants. But now political oppression has combined with the drying up of the branches and canals from the Nile and of the artificial lakes (e.g. Moeris) and fishponds, in reversing E.'s ancient prosperity. The reeds and waterplants, haunted by waterfowl and made an article of commerce, are destroyed; and Goshen, once "the best of the land," is now by sand and drought among the worst. The hilly Canaan, in its continued dependence on heaven for rain, was the emblem of the world of grace upon which "the eyes of the Lord are always," as contrasted with E., emblem of the world of nature, which has its supply from below and depends on human ingenuity. The Nile's overflow lasts only about 100 days, but is made available for agriculture throughout the year by tanks, canals, and forcing machines. The "watering with the foot" was by treadwheels working sets of pumps, and by artificial channels connected with reservoirs, and opened, turned, or closed by the feet. The shadoof, or a pole with a weight at one end and a bucket at the other, the weight helping the labourer to raise the full bucket, is the present plan. Agriculture began when the inundating water had sunk into the soil, a month after the autumn equinox, and the harvest was soon after the spring equinox (Exod. ix. 31, 32).

Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo, and the monuments confirm Gen. xvii. 20, 26, as to Joseph's arrangement of the land, that the king and priests alone were possessors and the original proprietors became crown tenants subject to a rent or tribute of a fifth. Joseph had taken up a fifth in the seven plenteous years. Naturally then he fixed on a fifth to be paid to the king, in order that he might by stores laid up be prepared against any future famine. The warriors too were possessors (Diodorus, i. 73, 74; and Egyptian monuments), but probably not till after Joseph's time as they are not mentioned in Genesis, and at all events their tenure was distinct from the priests', for each warrior received (Herodotus, ii. 168) 12 arura (each arura a square of 100 Egyptian eubits); i.e., there were no possessions vested in the soldier caste, but portions assigned to each soldier tenable at the sovereign's will. The priests alone were left in full possession of their lands. Lake Meuzaleh, the most eastern of the existing lakes, has still large fisheries, which support the people on its islands and shore. Herodotus (ii. 77) and Plutarch are wrong in denying the growth of the vine in E. before Psammetichus, for the monuments show it was well known from the time of the pyramids. Wine was drunk by the rich, beer by the poor as less costly. Wheat was the chief produce; barley and spelt (as Exod. ix. 32 ought to be trans. instead of "rice," Triticum spelta, the common food of the ancient Egyptians, now called by the natives doora, the only grain, says Wilkinson, represented on the sculptures, but named on them often with other species) are also mentioned. The flax was "balled," i.e. in blossom, at the time of the hail plague before the exodus. This accurately marks the time just before passover. In northern E. the barley ripens and flax blossoms in the middle of February or early in March, and both are gathered before April, when wheat harvest begins. Linen was especially used by the Egyptian priests, and for the evenness of the threads, without knot or break, was superior to any of modern manufacture.

Papyrus is now no longer found in the Nile below Nubia. Anciently light boats were made of its stalks, and paper of its leaves. It is a strong rush, three cornered, the thickness of the finger, 10 or 15 ft. high, represented on the monuments. The "flags" are a species called tuffi or suffi, 11 in. suph, smaller than that of which the ark was made (Exod. ii. 3), "bulrushes," "flags" (Isa. xviii. 2, xix. 7). The lotus was the favourite flower.

Camels are not found on the monuments, yet they were among Abram's possessions by Pharaoh's gift. But it is certain E. was master of much of the Sinai peninsula long before this, and must have had camels,

EGYPTIAN SHADOOF.

"the ships of the desert," for keeping up communications. They were only used on the frontier, being regarded as unclean, and hence are not found on monuments in the interior. The hippopotamus, the behemoth of Job, was anciently found in the Nile and hunted. The generic term tinnim, "dragon," (i.e. any aquatic reptile, here the crocodile) is made the symbol of the king of E. (Ezek. xxix. 3-5). God made Amasis the hawk which He put in the jaws of Pharaoh Hophra (Apries), who was dethroned and strangled, in spite of his proud boast that "even a god could not wrest from him his kingdom" (Herodotus, ii. 169). Comp. Isa. li. 9, 10.

Rahab, "the insolent," is E.'s poetical name (Ps. lxxvii. 4, lxxxix. 10; Isa. li. 9). Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14: "Thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters, . . . the heads of Leviathan, . . . and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness"; alluding to Pharaoh and his host overthrown in the Red Sea and their bodies cast on shore and affording rich spoil to Israel in the wilderness. Comp. "the people . . . are bread for us" (Num. xiv. 9). The marshes and ponds of E. make it the fit scene for the plague of frogs. Locusts come eating all before them, and are carried away by the wind as suddenly as they come. The dust-sprung "lice" are a sort of tick, as large as a grain of sand, which when filled with blood expands to the size of a hazel nut (Exod. viii. 17, 21, etc.). The "flies" were probably the dog-fly (LXX.) whose bite causes severe inflammation, especially in the eyelids; comp. Isa. vii. 18, "the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of E." Oedmann makes it the beetle, kukerlaque, Blatta orientalis, which inflicts painful bites; peculiarly appropriate, as the beetle was the Egyptian symbol of creative power.

Origin.—The Egyptians were of Nigritian origin; like modern Nigritians, the only orientals respectful to women. There was no harem system of seclusion, the wife was "lady of the house." Their kindness to Israel, even during the latter's bondservice, was probably the reason for their being admitted into the congregation in the third generation (Deut. xxiii. 3-8). An Arab or Semitic element of race and language is added to the Nigritian in forming the Egyptian people and their tongue. The language of the later dynasties appears in the demotic or enchorial writing, the connecting link between the ancient language and the present Coptic or Christian Egyptian.

The great pyramid (the oldest architectural monument in existence according to Lepsius) is distinguished from all other Egyptian monuments in having no idolatrous symbols. Piazzi Smith says, when complete it was so adjusted and exactly fashioned in figure that it sets forth the value of the mathematical term π , or demonstrates the true and practical squaring of a circle. The length of the front foot of the pyramid's casing stone, found by Mr. W. Dixon, or that line or edge from which the angular π slope of the whole stone begins to rise, which therefore may be regarded as a radical length for the theory of the great pyramid, measures exactly 25 pyramid inches, i.e. the ten millionth part of the length of the earth's semiaxis of rotation; 25 pyramid inches were the cubit of Noah, Moses, and Solomon, "the cubit of the Lord their God." It is a monument of divinely ordered number [see WEIGHT AND MEASURE] before the beginning of idolatry.

Religion.—Nature worship is the basis of the Egyptian apostasy from the primitive revelation; it degenerated into the lowest fetishism, the worship of cats, dogs, beetles, etc., trees, rivers, and hills. There were three orders of gods; the eight great gods, 12 lesser, and those connected with Osiris. However, the immortality of the soul and future rewards and punishments at the judgment were taught. The Israelites fell into their idolatries in E. (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7, 8). This explains their readiness to worship the golden calf, resembling the Egyptian ox-idol, Apis (Exod. xxxii.).

The ten plagues.—The plagues were all directed against the Egyptian gods, from whom Israel was thus being weaned, at the same time that Jehovah's majesty was vindicated before E., and His people's deliverance extorted from their oppressors. Thus the turning of the Nile into blood was a stroke upon Hapi, the Nile god. The plague of frogs attacked the female deity with a frog's head, Hehka, worshipped in the district Sah, i.e. Benibassan, as wife of Chnum, god of cataracts or of the inundation; this was a very old form of nature worship in E., the frog being made the symbol of regeneration; Seti, father of Rameses II., is represented on the monuments offering two vases of wine to an enshrined frog, with the legend "the sovereign lady of both worlds"; the species of frog called now dofla is the one meant by the Heb. Egyptian zeparda (Exod. viii. 2), they are small, do not leap much, but croak constantly; the ibis rapidly consumes them at their usual appearance in September, saving the land from the "stench" which otherwise arises (ver. 14). The third plague of dust-sprung lice fell upon the earth, worshipped in the Egyptian pantheism as Seb, father of the gods (ver. 16); the black fertile soil of the Nile basin was especially sacred, called Chemi, from which E. took its ancient name. The fourth plague, of flies (ver. 21), was upon the air, deified as Shu, son of Ra the sun god, or as Isis, queen of heaven. The fifth was the murrain on cattle, aimed at their ox worship (Exod. ix. 1-7). The sixth, the boils from ashes sprinkled toward the heaven, was a challenge to Neit, "the great mother queen of highest heaven," if she could stand before Jehovah, also a reference to the scattering of victims' ashes to the wind in honour of Sutech or Typhon; human sacrifices at Heliopolis, offered under the shepherd kings, had been abolished by Amosis I., but this remnant of the old rite remained; Jehovah now sternly re-proves it by Moses' symbolic act. The seventh, the hail, thunder, and lightning; man, beast, herb, and tree were smitten, so that Pharaoh for the first time recognises Jehovah as God; "Jehovah is righteous, and I and my people are wicked" (ver. 27). The eighth, the locusts eating every tree, attacked what the Egyptians so prized that E. was among other titles called "the land of the sycamore." The destruction at the Red Sea took place probably under Thothmes II., and it is remarkable that his widow imported many trees from Arabia Felix. The ninth, darkness, the S.W. wind from the desert darkening the atmosphere with dense masses of fine sand, would fill with gloom the Egyptians, whose chief idol was Ra, the sun god. The tenth, the smiting of the firstborn of man and beast, realized the threat, "against all the gods of E. I will execute judgment" (xii. 12); for every town and nome had its sacred animal, frog, beetle, ram, cow, cat, etc., representing each a god; Remphan and Chiun were adopted from abroad. [See EXODUS.]

Egyptian religious law depended on future rewards and punishments; the Mosaic law on the contrary mainly depended on temporal rewards and punishments, which only could have place in a system of miraculous and extraordinary Divine interposition. The Mosaic law therefore cannot have been borrowed from the Egyptians. The effect of the Divine plagues on the Egyptians is seen in the fact that a "mixed multitude," numbering many Egyptians who gave up their idols to follow Israel's God, accompanied Israel at the exodus (xii. 38), besides Semites whose fathers had come in with the Hyksos.

Power and conquests of kings.—The kings seem to have been absolute; but the priests exercised a controlling influence so great that the Pharaoh of Joseph's time durst not take their lands even for money. Tablets in the Sinaitic peninsula record the Egyptian conquest of Asiatic nomads there. The kings of the 18th dynasty reduced the countries from Syria to the Tigris under tribute, from 1500 to 1200 B.C. Hittites of the valley of the Orontes were their chief opponents.

Relation to Israel.—Egyptian power abroad declined from 1200 to 990 B.C. the very interval in which David's and Solomon's wide empire fits in; then Shishak reigned and invaded Judah. The struggle with Assyria and Babylonia for the intermediate countries lasted till Pharaoh Necho's defeat at Carchemish ended Egypt's supremacy. Except Zerah and Shishak (of Assyrian or Babylonian extraction), the Egyptian kings were friendly to Israel in Palestine. Solomon married a Pharaoh's daughter; Tirhakah helped Hezekiah; So made a treaty with Hoshea; Pharaoh Necho was unwilling to war with Josiah; and Pharaoh Hophra (Apries) raised the Chaldean siege of Jerusalem as Zedekiah's ally. In Africa they reduced the Rebu or Lubin, W. of Egypt; Ethiopia was ruled by a viceroy "prince of Kesh."

The many papyri and inscriptions, 10-ligious, historical, and one a papyrus tale about two brothers, the earliest extant fiction (in the British Museum), show what a literary people the Egyptians were. Geometry, mechanics, chemistry (judging from Moses' ability, acquired probably from them, to burn and grind to powder the golden calf), astronomy (whereby Moses was able to form a calendar, Acts vii. 22), and architecture massive and durable, were among Egypt's sciences. Magic was practised (Exod. vii. 11, 12, 22; viii. 18, 19; ix. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). Pottery was part of Israel's bondage (Ps. lxxxi. 6, lxxvii. 13). The Israelites' eating, dancing, singing, and stripping themselves at the calf feast, were according to Egyptian usage (xxxii. 5-25).

Antiquity and dynasties.—The antiquity of the colonization of E. by Noah's descendants is shown by the record of the migration of the PHILISTINES from CAPRIOR [see], which must have been before Abram's arrival in Palestine, for the Philistines were then there. The Caphtorim sprang from the Mizraim or Egyptians (Gen. x. 13, 14; Jer. xlviii. 4; Amos ix. 7). The Egyptians considered themselves and the negroes, the red and the black races, as of one stock, children of the god Horus; and the Shemites and Europeans, the yellow and the white, as of another stock, children of the goddess Peshit. No tradition of the flood, though found in almost every other country, is traceable among them, except their reply to Solon (Plato, Tim., 23) that there had been many floods. There are few records of any dynasty before the 18th, except those of the 4th and 12th; but the names of the Pharaohs of the first six dynasties have been found, with notices implying the complete organization of the kingdom (Rougé, Recherches). The Memphite line under the 4th dynasty raised the most famous pyramids. The shepherd kings came from the East as foreigners, and were obnoxious to native Egyptians. Indeed so intense was Egyptian prejudice that foreigners, and especially Easterns, are described as devils; much in the same way as the Chinese regard all outside the Celestial empire. A Theban line of kings reigned in Upper E. whilst the shepherds were in Lower. Hence arose the opinion that a shepherd king, not a native Egyptian, was the foreigner Joseph's patron; Apophis is generally named. Pharaoh's invitation to Joseph's family to settle in Goshen (Gen. xlv. 34, xlvii. 6), not among the Egyptians, may indicate a desire to strengthen himself against the Egyptian party. The absence of mention of the Israelites on the monuments would be accounted for by the troubled character of the times of the shepherd kings. But see below.

The authorities for Egyptian history are (1) the monuments; (2) the papyri (the reading of hieroglyphics having been discovered by Young and Champollion from the trilingual inscription, hieroglyphics, hieratic or common Egyptian letters, and Greek, in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes, on the Rosetta stone); (3) the Egyptian priest Manetho's fragments in Josephus, containing the regal list beginning with gods and continued through 30 dynasties of mortals, from Menes to Nectanebo, 343 B.C., these fragments abound in discrepancies; (4) accounts of Greek visitors to E. after the O. T. period. The two most valuable papyri are the Turin papyrus published by Lepsius; and the list of kings in the temple of Abydos, discovered by Mariette, which represents Seti I. with his son Rameses II. worshipping his 76 ancestors beginning with Menes. The interval between the 6th and 11th dynasties is uncertain, the monuments affording no contemporary notices. The kings of this period in Manetho's list were probably rulers of parts only of E., contemporary with other Pharaohs. The Pharaohs of the 12th dynasty, and the early kings of the 13th, were lords of all E., which the shepherd kings were not; the latter must therefore belong to a subsequent period. Sculpture and architecture were at their height in the 12th dynasty, and the main events of the time are recorded in many inscriptions. From the fourth king of the 13th dynasty to the last of the 17th, the period of the Hyksos or shepherd kings, the monuments afford no data for the order of events. The complete list of the ancestors of Seti I. gives no Pharaoh between Amenemha, the last king of the 12th dynasty, and Aahmes or Amosis, the first of the 18th, who expelled the Hyksos. From the 18th dynasty E.'s monumental history and the succession of kings are somewhat complete, but the chronology uncertain. No general era is based on the ancient inscriptions. Apophis or Apepi was the last of the Hyksos, Ta-saken Rasekenen the last of the contemporary Egyptian line.

Abram's visit (Gen. xii. 10-20) was in a time of E.'s prosperity; nor is Abram's fear lest Sarai should be taken, and he slain for her sake, indicative of a savage state such as would exist under the foreign Hyksos rather than the previous native Egyptian kings; for in the papyrus d'Orbiney in the British Museum, of the age of Rameses II. of a native dynasty, the 19th, the story of the two brothers (the wife of the elder of whom acts towards the younger as Potiphar's wife toward Joseph) represents a similar act of violence (the Pharaoh of the time sending two armies to take a beautiful wife and murder her husband on the advice of the royal councillors), at the time of E.'s highest civilization; and this attributed not to a tyrant, but to one beloved and deified at his decease. So in an ancient papyrus at Berlin a foreigner's wife and children are taken by the king, as an ordinary occurrence. Moreover in the Benihasan monuments, on the provincial governor's tomb is represented a nomad chief's arrival with his retinue to pay homage to the prince. The pastoral nomads N.W. of E. and the Shemites in Palestine, are called Amo;

the chief, called Abshah in this papyrus (father of a multitude numerous as the sand, meaning much the same as Abraham), is the hak, i.e. sheikh, with a coat of many colours. Shasous is another name for wandering nomads; and Hyksos=prince of the Shasous. The story of Saneha (i.e. son of the sycamore) in one of the oldest papyri relates that he, an Amu, under the 12th dynasty, rose to high rank under Pharaoh, and after a long exile abroad was restored and made "counsellor among the chosen ones," to develop the resources of E. (just as Joseph), taking precedence among the courtiers. This proves there is nothing improbable in the account of Abram's kind reception and Joseph's elevation by the Pharaoh of a native dynasty, earlier than the foreign Hyksos, who were harsh and fierce, and more likely to repel than to welcome foreigners.

Asses, regarded as unclean under the middle and later empire, were among Pharaoh's presents to Abram (Gen. xii. 16). Horses are omitted, which accords with the earlier date, for they were unknown (judging from the monuments) to the 12th or any earlier dynasty, and were probably introduced from Arabia by the Hyksos. So that Abram's visit seems to have been under an early Pharaoh, perhaps Amenemha, the first king of the 12th dynasty; Joseph's visit two centuries later, towards the end of the 12th or the beginning of the 13th. Thenceforward horses abounded in the Egyptian plains and were largely bought thence by Solomon (1 Kings iv. 26, x. 25, 29) in defiance of the prohibition, Deut. xvii. 16; comp. 2 Kings vii. 6.

Shepherd kings.—Salatis (=mighty, in Semitic) was first of the shepherd dynasty, which lasted about 250 years and comprised six kings, Apophis last. The long term, 500 years, assigned by Manetho to the shepherd kings, (and by Africanus 800,) is unsupported by the monuments, and is inconsistent with the fact that the Egyptians, at the return to native rulers under the 18th dynasty, after so complete an overthrow of their institutions for five or eight centuries (?), wrote their own language without a trace of foreign infusion, and worshipped the old gods with the old rites. The only era on Egyptian monuments distinct from the regal year of the sovereign is on the tablet of a governor of Tanis under Rameses II., referring back to the Hyksos, viz. the 400th year from the era of Set the Golden under the Hyksos king, Set-a-Pehti, "Set the Mighty." Set was the chief god worshipped by the Hyksos from the first. From Rameses II. (1340 B.C.) 400 years would take us to 1740 or 1750 B.C. 250 years of the Hyksos dynasty would bring us to 1500 B.C. for their expulsion, and 250 before 1750 B.C. would be Abram's date. Thus the period assigned to the dynasties before Rameses by Lepsius is much reduced. Joseph was quite young at his introduction to Pharaoh, and lived 110 years; but if Apophis, the contemporary of Rasekenen, the predecessor of Aahmes I. who took Avaris and drove out the Hyksos, were Joseph's Pharaoh, Joseph would have long outlived Apophis; how then after his patron's expulsion could he have continued prosperous? Moreover, Apophis was not master of all E., as Joseph's Pharaoh was; Rasekenen retained the Thebaid, and after Apophis' defeat erected large buildings in Memphis and Thebes. The papyrus Sallier I. represents Apophis' reign as cruel and oppressive, and ending in an intestine war. He and his predecessors rejected the national worship for that of Sutech = Set = the evil principle Typhon exclusively; his name Apepi means the great serpent, enemy of Ra and Osiris. Sutech answers to the Phœnician Baal, and is represented in inscriptions as the Hittites' chief god, and had human sacrifices at Heliopolis under the Hyksos, which Aahmes I. suppressed.

Joseph's Pharaoh.—There is nothing of Joseph's history which does not accord with the most prosperous period of the native dynasties; their inscriptions illustrate every fact recorded in Genesis concerning Joseph's Pharaoh. Shepherds were, according to Genesis, "an abomination to the Egyptians" in Joseph's time; this is decisive against his living under a shepherd king. The names of the first three of the 48 kings of the 13th dynasty in the papyrus at Turin resemble Joseph's Egyptian title given by Pharaoh, as his grand vizier, Zafnath Paaneah, "the food of life," or "the living" (comp. the apposite title of the Antitype, John vi. 35). Joseph may therefore have lived under an early Pharaoh of the 13th dynasty, prior to the Hyksos, or else of the 12th; comp. the story of Saneha under Osirtasin above. This 12th dynasty was specially connected with On or Heliopolis, where Osirtasin I., the second king of that dynasty, built the temple, and where his name and title stand on the famous obelisk, the oldest and finest in E. On was the sacerdotal city and university of northern E.; its chief priest, judging from the priests' titles, was probably a relative of Pharaoh. As absolute, Pharaoh could command the marriage of Joseph to the daughter of the priest of On, however reluctant the priesthood might be to admit a foreigner. Moreover, Joseph being naturalised would hardly be looked on as such, especially as being the king's prime minister. The "Ritual," 17th chapter, belongs to the 11th dynasty, and is the oldest statement of Egyptian views of the universe. It implies a previous pure monotheism, of which it retains the unity, eternity, self-existence of the unseen God; a powerful confirmation of the primitive Bible revelation to Adam handed down to Noah, and thence age by age becoming more and more corrupted by apostasies from the original truth; the more the old text of the "Ritual" is freed from subsequent glosses, the more it approaches to revealed truth. A sound pure morality in essentials and the fundamentals of primeval religion underlies the forms of worship, in spite of the blending with superstitions. This partly accounts for Joseph's making such a marriage. Chnumhotep, a near relative and favourite of Osirtasin I., is described on the tombs of Benihasan as having precisely such qualities as Pharaoh honoured in Joseph: "he injured no little child, oppressed no widow, detained for his own purpose no fisherman, took from work no shepherd or overseer's men; there was no beggar in his days, no one starved in his time; when years of famine occurred, he ploughed all the lands producing abundant food; he treated the widow as a woman with a husband to protect her." The division of land permanently into 36 nomes (Diodorus, i. 54), the redistribution of property, and the tenure under the crown subject to a rent of the fifth of the increase, are measures which could only emanate from a native Pharaoh. Long afterwards Rameses II. himself, or else popular tradition, appropriated these works to him or to his father Seti I.; also the name Sesostri was appropriated to him. Had it been the work of the Hyksos, it would have been undone on the restoration of the legitimate Pharaohs.

Amenemha III., sixth king of the 12th dynasty, first established a complete system of dykes, coops, and reservoirs, to regulate the Nile's inundations; he caused the lake Mœris to be made to receive the overflow and have it for irrigation in the dry season. Mœris (from the Egyptian mer a "lake") was near a place, Piane, "the house of life," corresponding to Joseph's title, Zafnath Paaneah, "the food of life." Probably he was the Pharaoh to whom Joseph owed his elevation, for Joseph was just such a minister as would carry out this Pharaoh's grand measures. The restoration of this lake would be the greatest boon to modern E. Amenemha III. also formed the Labyrinth as a place of assembly for the representatives of the nomes on national matters of moment. The table of Abydos represents him as the last king of all E. in the old empire, and as such receiving worship from his descendant, Rameses.

The Israelites remained undisturbed under the Hyksos, partly as offering no temptation to their cupidity, partly from the Hyksos' respect to the Israelites' ancestor Joseph's high character in his dealings with the Hyksos' ancestors when visiting E. in the famine. The Hyksos would have less motive for molesting the Israelites than for molesting native Egyptians.

Restoration of the native dynasties; Pharaoh at the exodus. Aahmes I. (Amosis), founder of the 18th dynasty, married Nefertari, an Ethiopian princess, named and portrayed on many monuments. With Ethiopian allies thus obtained, probably, he marched on Avaris in northern E., Apophis' stronghold, and overthrew and expelled the Hyksos. Of him it could best be said "there arose up a new king" (Exod. i. 8), new to most Egyptians and especially those of northern E. He "knew not Joseph," and found Joseph's people Israel in Goshen, settled in the richest land, rather favoured than molested by the preceding Hyksos kings, in numbers (ver. 9) exceeding the native population, and so perhaps likely to join (ver. 10) any future invaders such as the Arab Hyksos had been, and commanding the western approach to the centre of the land. His policy then was to prevent their multiplication, and set them to build depositories of provisions and arms on the eastern frontier: Pithom (either = Pachtumen Zuru, "the fortress of foreigners," in the monuments of Thothmes III., or more probably "the sanctuary of Tum," connected with a fortress), and Rameses, from Ra "the sun god" and mesu "children," the Egyptians' peculiar name to distinguish themselves from foreigners (Miz-ra-im is akin), a name naturally given in a district associated with the sun god's worship. Aahmes I. named his son Rames, and being the restorer of the sun worship would be most likely to name one treasure city Raameses. The city of Rameses II., Melamon, named from himself, in the 19th dynasty, in the midst of a flourishing population, was vastly changed from the earlier Raameses built by Israel in the midst of their oppressed and groaning population. In an inscription of the 22nd year of Aahmes I. Fenchu are described as transporting limestone blocks from the quarries of Rafa to Memphis and other cities; the name means "bearers of the shepherd's staff," an appropriate designation of the nomad tribes of Semitic origin near E., including the Israelites, who are designated by no proper name, though undoubtedly they were in E. in the 18th dynasty.

Lepsius fixes the accession of Aahmes I. at 1706 B.C. Thothmes II. was probably the Pharaoh who perished in the Red Sea, the year of the exodus 1647 B.C. (1652 B.C., Smith's Bible Dict.) The interval between the temple building, 1010 B.C., [see CHRONOLOGY] and the exodus is calculated by advocates of the longer chronology to be 635 years. The 480 years interval between the exodus and Solomon's temple is probably a copyist's error (1 Kings vi. 1). However the later date, 1525 B.C., for Aahmes I., and 1463 for the last year of Thothmes II., would support the shorter interval 480; and if two stones found at the temple built by Thothmes III. at Elephantine refer to the same time (?), one giving his name, the other stating that the 28th of the month Epiphi was the festival of the rising of Sothis, i.e. Sirius, the date would be 1415 B.C.; and as the temple was built in the last seven years of his 48 years' reign, the last year of Thothmes II. would be 1385-1492, in accordance with 1 Kings vi. 1.

Probably nearly 100 years (including the 80 from Moses' birth to his return from Midian) elapsed between the accession of Aahmes I. and the exodus. On his death the dowager queen, an Ethiopian, Nefertari, was regent. Moses' second marriage to an Ethiopian subsequently may have been influenced by his former connection with Pharaoh's daughter, and by the court's connection with Ethiopia. Her son Amenophis (Amenhotep I.) succeeded. He, with his admiral Ahmes, led an expedition into Ethiopia against an insurgent. Moses as adopted child of the king's sister naturally accompanied his master, and proved himself as Stephen says (Acts vii. 22), and Josephus in detail records, "mighty in words and in deeds." His connection with Ethiopia would thus be intimate. During the reign of Thothmes I. Moses was in Midian. Thothmes I., according to a rock inscription opposite the island of Tombos, subjugated the region between Upper Egypt and Nubia proper; and Ethiopia was henceforth governed by princes of the blood royal of E., the first being named Memes, a name akin to that given by Pharaoh's daughter to her adopted son, Moses. A sepulchral inscription records a great victory of Thothmes I. in Mesopotamia. The acquisition of Nubia (= the land of gold) furnished the means of acquiring chariots, for which after this date E. was famous.

Aahmes (Amessis in Josephus), wife and sister of Thothmes I. (an incestuous marriage unknown to the early Pharaohs), succeeded him as regent for 20 years. Then Thothmes II., son of Thothmes I., in the beginning of his short reign warred successfully against the Shasuns or N.E. nomad tribes. He was married to his sister Hatason, who succeeded as queen regnant. At his death the confederate nations N. of Palestine revolted, and no attempt to recover them was made till the 22nd year of Thothmes III. The sudden collapse after a brilliant beginning, his death succeeded by the reigning of a woman for so long after him instead of his son, the absence of the glorious records which marked his predecessors' reigns, and no effort being made to regain E.'s former possessions, all accord with the view that the plagues which visited E., the exodus after the slaying of the firstborn, and the final catastrophe at the Red Sea, occurred in his reign. Of course no monument would commemorate the king's and the nation's disasters. Moses returning from Midian at the close of the reign of Thothmes II. found him at Zoan (i.e. Tanis or Avaris), the city taken by Aahmes I. in Lower Egypt (Ps. lxxviii. 12); the restlessness of the neighbouring Shasuns or Beduins would require his presence there. This Pharaoh was weak, capricious, and obstinate, and such a one as Hatason (a superstitious devotee as the inscriptions prove, and therefore furious at the dishonours done through Moses' God to her favourite gods and priests, and above all at the crowning calamity, the death of her firstborn) would urge on to avenge all her wrongs on the escaped bond-servants. On her beautiful monument at Thebes she is represented with masculine attire and beard, and boasting of the idol Ammon's favour and of her own gracious manners. Each fit of terror which each fresh plague excited in the monarch soon gave way to renewed hardening of his heart under her influence, until the door of repentance was for ever shut against him; comp. 2 Cor. vii. 10, Prov. xxix. 1. Artapanus, a Jewish historian quoted by Alexander Polyhistor (Fragm. Hist. Gr., iii. 223), Sylla's contemporary, wrote: "the Memphites say that Moses led the people across the bed of the sea at the ebb of the tide; but they of Heliopolis that the king was with a vast force pursuing the Jews, because they were carrying away the riches borrowed of the Egyptians. Then God's voice commanded Moses to smite the sea with his rod, so the sea parted asunder, and the host marched through on dry ground."

Israel in Egypt.—The Egyptian monuments illustrate Israel's oppression in many points. Bricks were the common material of building, and for the king's edifices were stamped with his name. Chopped straw was used, as hair by plasterers, to make them more durable. Captives did the work in the royal brickfields; taskmasters with rods and the bastinado punished the idle. The entire stalk was left standing in cutting the wheat, so that stubble was easy to find in the fields. Though field labour is light, yet from the continued succession of crops and intense heat the cultivators' lot is a hard one. The storing of water in vessels of wood and stone (Exod. vii. 19) is peculiarly Egyptian. Reservoirs and cisterns were needless where the Nile and its canals made water so plentiful. But its turbid water at certain seasons needs purification for drinking; so it is kept in stone or wooden vessels until the sediment falls to the bottom. The arts which Israel as a nomad race knew not when they entered E., such as writing, gem setting, working metals, carving, tanning, dyeing, linen weaving, building, they acquired before they left, and probably some Egyptians accompanied them (Exod. xii. 38).

Thothmes III. remained against his will a subject, whilst his sister ruled for 17 years. On ascending the throne he effaced her titles on the monuments, and reckoned his own reign from his predecessor's death. In the 22nd year of his reign, according to the inscriptions in his temple dedicated to Ammon on his return, he marched to encounter the allied kings of all the districts between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. He debated them with great slaughter at Megiddo. The chiefs presented him as tribute gold, silver, bronze, lapis lazuli, precious coffers, gold and silver plated chariots, highly wrought Phœnician vases, a gold inlaid bronze harp, ivory, perfumes, wine; proofs of the high civilization of the then lords of Palestine. The confederacy which gave unity and strength to its Canaanite and other inhabitants was thus, in God's special providence, broken by Thothmes III. just 17 years before Israel's invasion, to prepare an easy conquest for them. He defeated their "392 chariots" (curiously answering to Jabin's 900, Jud. iv.); also the "Cheta" or Hittites, and the "Rutens" or Syrians of Mesopotamia, Assur, Babel, Nineveh, Shinar, and the Remenen or Armenians. He brought home numerous captives, who are represented in Ammon's temple at Abd el Kurna making bricks, as the Israelites had done. His wars ended in the 40th year of his reign, i.e. just at the close of Israel's 40 years in the desert, when about to enter Canaan.

Thus the terror of Midian and Moab at Israel's approach (Num. xxi. 3, 4) is partly accounted for, as they were still smarting under Thothmes' defeat. E. retained only such strongholds as commanded the N. road by the coast into Syria, and left the petty kings (broken-spirited and disunited, and, as Scripture represents, liable to panics before any new foe) to keep their almost impregnable forts. The Israelites in the desert of Thb, out of the way of the coast road, offered no inducement to the conqueror. Had they remained in the peninsula of Sinai, they would have been within his reach; for its western district was subject to E. from the time of Snefru, the last Pharaoh of the 3rd dynasty. The most ancient existing monument records that he defeated the Anu, the old inhabitants, and founded a colony at Wady Mughara. The copper mines there were worked under Chufu (Cheops) of the 4th dynasty and other monarchs long after, though it seems they were not worked and the Sinai peninsula not occupied by Egyptians at the date of the exodus. To the mines of this district attention has of late afresh been drawn.

It may seem strange that the Pharaohs, supreme in western Asia up to Saul's time, yet allowed Israel to invade and permanently occupy Palestine. But E.'s policy was to be content with plunder, tribute of submissive chieftains, and prisoners; and not, like Assyria, to occupy conquered countries permanently. The warrior caste, the Calasians and Hermotybiens, preferred returning to their settled homes to cultivate the fields after the inundation each year. Besides, Israel attacked E.'s enemies, the Hittites and Amorites; and the Israelite kingdom, whilst not so large as to excite the jealousy of E., was large enough to prevent the reunion of the powers overthrown by Thothmes III.

His successor, Amenhotep II., in making war transported his troops to Phoenicia by sea, as the representations on Aahmes' tomb at El-kab, of this period, show. He conquered the Rutens (according to an inscription in Amada in Nubia), advanced as far as Nineveh, and hanged seven princes of the confederates at Tachis, a city in Syria, with head downwards, on the prow of his ship.

Amenhotep III. also conducted naval expeditions to the Soudan, but mainly was occupied in erecting magnificent works. He was married to a remarkable woman, not of royal birth or Egyptian creed, Tei, daughter of Juaa (akin to Judah) and Tanaa. In 1 Chron. iv. 17 Mered, son of Ezra two generations after Caleb, of Judah, founded a family by an Egyptian wife BITTIAH [see], daughter of Pharaoh, a name closely resembling Tei daughter of Juaa. Its settlement was at Eshtemoa in the hills of Judah S.

of Hebron. Amenophis IV., Tei's son (whose features are distinctly Semitic), revolutionized, under her influence, E.'s religion as to its grosser idolatries, such as the phallus worship of Khem, and introduced a more spiritual worship. His name Khun Aten (akin to Adon "THE LORD"), i.e. glory of the sunbeam, refers to the Semitic name for God.

Thus E. remained supreme in Mesopotamia in the earlier part of the judges' period. Then during internal struggles the Egyptian yoke was thrown off, and then scope was left for the invasion of Israel by Chushan Rishathaim of Mesopotamia, about a century after Joshua. He being expelled on one side, by Othniel, (and the Rutens or Assyrians consequently losing the ascendancy, towards the end of the 18th dynasty), and E. being prostrated on the other side, Moab, Ammon, Amalek, under king Eglon, and Midian or Edom, naturally grew into power. The Cheta or Hittites also gradually extended their power from Cilicia to the Euphrates, holding Syria's strongholds, and encroaching on the powers of Palestine during all the time of the 19th dynasty.

Manetho's testimony. — Manetho's account recognises the scriptural fact that (1) the Israelites whom he confounds with the Hyksos had been employed in forced labours, and that they (2) went forth from the region about Avaris (akin to Hebrews, i.e. Goshen) "by permission" (3) of the Theban king whose father (i.e. the first king of the 18th dynasty) had driven out the Hyksos from the rest of E., and that (4) they took with them their "furniture and cattle" and traversed the region between E. and Syria, and settled in Judaea, and that the king in resisting them felt (5) "he was fighting against the gods," and (6) was afraid for the safety of his young son. Elsewhere he calls them "lepers," and confounds Moses with Joseph of Heliopolis (On) whom he makes leader of the exodus (perhaps drawn from the fact that Israel and Moses carried with them Joseph's body, Exod. xiii. 19) under the name Osarsiph (i.e. rich in food, zaf), and notices the historical fact that it was with an Ethiopian army the Theban king ejected [the lepers and their allies] the shepherds. See above. The "leprosy" attributed to them is drawn from the leprosy hand whereby Moses proved his Divine mission (Exod. iv. 6), also from its prevalence among the Hebrews (Lev. xiii., xiv.).

In the two centuries' interval between the early judges and Deborah, the chief strongholds of Palestine were occupied by the Canaanites, Hittites, Jebusites, etc., during E.'s 19th dynasty, and are so represented in the monuments describing the attacks on them by Seti I. and Rameses II. The open country was held by the Amorites, against whose iron chariots Israel could not stand (Jud. i. 19); so the district from the S. border northward is called in the monuments "the land of the Amorites." Comp. Jud. v. 6, "the highways were unoccupied . . . the villages ceased . . . war was in the gates (of the strongholds). Was there a shield or spear seen among 40,000 in Israel?" Thus the Egyptian armies in traversing Syria would encounter no Israelite in the field, and would only encounter Israel's foes.

Seti I., 150 years after the exodus, overwhelmed the anti-Egyptian confederacy of tribes from Cilicia to Mesopotamia, headed by the Assyrians. Under Rameses II. the Assyrians are not even mentioned in his great campaign in his fifth year. The Hittites or Cheta, N. of Palestine (Jud. i. 26), became the great power opposed to E. under Seti I. Sisera is a Chetan name; and his master Jabin ruled the whole country in Merneptah's reign. Seti I. overcame the Shasous, i.e. the warlike nomads who overran Palestine, Moab, Ammon, Amalek, the Hittites, etc., his aim being to conquer Syria and to occupy Kadesh which was its chief city (Edessa, on the Orontes).

Rameses Merammon (Sesostris) was associated in the kingdom with his father from infancy, and succeeded him as sole king, with a family of 27 princes, at his death. Rameses reigned 67 years (according to the monument at Tanis), but it is uncertain how long before his father's death his reign is counted. He venerated his father in his early inscriptions, afterwards effaced "Seti" for his own name. He is made by some the "new king" (Exod. i.). But facts and dates contradict it; and the assumption is false that he reigned 67 years after his father. The fortresses of Zarn and Pa-Rameses which he enlarged existed previously, and therefore afford no argument for his being the Pharaoh who set Israel to work at Pithom and Rameses (which moreover are not certainly identical with Zarn and Pa-Rameses). Rameses set certain Aperu (identified by some with "Hebrews," by others explained "workmen") to work on the frontier in the region where Israel's forefathers had been bondservants in hard service. Four Egyptian documents quoted by Canon Cook (Speaker's Comm.) contain the following particulars bearing on the question. The report of eno Kawisar (a Chetan), a commissariat officer at Pa-Rameson, states to Rameses II. that he has distributed rations to the Aperu who drew stores for the great fortress (Bekken) and to the soldiers. Another report, that of a scribe, Keniamen, to the kazana or high officer of Rameses' household, implies by their being employed to draw stores S. of Memphis, that the Aperu, if Israelites, were prisoners of war under military surveillance, not (as the Israelites before the exodus) residents working in their own district under Egyptian taskmasters. Moreover, 2083 Aperu resided under Rameses III., 800 worked in the Hamamat quarry under Rameses IV. similarly. These could not have been stayers behind after Israel's exodus, for the Egyptians would not then have tolerated them.

Rameses, in his 21st year, made a treaty with Chetasar, king of the Cheta, on equal terms, and married his daughter. Palestine thus remained in quiet between the times of Eglon and Shamgar. Merneptah succeeded, and discomfited confederate Libyans, Asiatics, and Tyrrhenians, Sicilians and Aegeans. Had Moses returned to E. at that time he would surely have mentioned some of these races in Gen. x. In Merneptah's reign southern Palestine was for the first time occupied by the Philistines, and northern Palestine subdued by Jabin the Canaanite king and his captain Sisera, who was chief of the Syrian confederates, with 900 chariots answering to the 892 taken by Thothmes III. on the same battlefield, Megiddo. This was about 1320 B.C., which year all Egyptologists agree occurred in Merneptah's reign. Rameses III. was the last Egyptian who gained great victories in Syria, transporting his forces thither by sea, and conquering the Cheta. This overthrow of the Chetan confederacy, after Jabin's defeat by Deborah, secured peace to Palestine. When E.'s monarchy became weaker some years later, Midian oppressed Israel (Jud. vi.). But E. retained a general ascendancy in Syria and Mesopotamia till the end of the 20th dynasty, answering to the end of the period of the Judges.

Thus God's providence secured Israel from being crushed by the overwhelming rival empires; and meanwhile the nation's character was being moulded and its resources prepared for the high place which it assumed among the great kingdoms under Saul, David, and Solomon. The general scheme and facts above (as also the table on the following pages) are drawn in part from Canon Cook's interesting essay in the Speaker's Comm., also from Professor Rawlinson's, Dr. Birch's, and Hengstenberg's works.

YEAR.	DYNASTIES.	CONTEMPORARY EVENTS RECORDED ON THE MONUMENTS.	SCRIPTURAL PARALLEL EVENTS.
B.C. 2700. . .	First Dynasty: THINITES (named from This , W. of the river, or Abydos). Begins with Menes.	In the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, a tablet records a king of the 2nd dynasty whose existence is known to us by the Tablet of Abydos.
B.C. 2470. . .	Second: also THINITES (contemporaneous with the Fourth).	The last of the 3rd dynasty, with whom real history begins, Snefru, conquers the Ans, plants a colony at Wady Mughara, and occupies the W. of the Sinai peninsula and explores its turquoise and copper mines.
B.C. 2650. . .	Third: MEMPHITES	Erection of the pyramids of Jizeh by Suphis and Sensuphis, the Great one the oldest of the three. The names Suphis, or Shofa (= Cheops), and Nou-shofa (Chephren, Herodotus), were found in "the chambers of construction," but hieroglyphics are not in the Great Pyramid itself. Explained by Piazzzi Smith that they were shepherd kings (comp. Gen. xlix. 24) of an earlier dynasty than those of the 14th and 17th dynasties; from Jerusalem, holding the pure faith of Melchizedek, and therefore hated (Manetho and Herodotus) by the Egyptians, as foreigners and opponents of idolatry; forbidding any sculptures or painted emblems of the gods, in the pyramid, which was designed as the sacred standard of metrology of time, capacity, weight, line, square and cubic measure, heat, latitude, temperature, and indicated the mean density and true figure of the earth, standing in the political centre of the earth. Shofa warred with the Arabs, according to the monuments.
B.C. 2200. . .	Fifth: ELEPHANTINES (contemporaneous with the Fourth). Sixth: MEMPHITES (contemporaneous with the Ninth and Eleventh).	In the Boulak Museum, Cairo, a monumental inscription exists, set up by Una, scribe and crown-bearer to King Teta, and "priest of the place of his pyramid," to Pepi, successor of Teta, of the 6th dynasty.
	Seventh: MEMPHITES. Eighth: MEMPHITES. Ninth: HERACLEOPOLITES (contemporaneous with the Sixth and Eleventh). Tenth: HERACLEOPOLITES. Eleventh: DIOSPOLITES (contemp. with the Sixth and Ninth).
About B.C. 2000	Twelfth: DIOSPOLITES: Seven Pharaohs: Amenemha I., Osirtasin I., Amenemha II., Osirtasin II., Osirtasin III., Amenemha III., Amenemha IV.; and a queen, Ra-Sebek-Nefrou.	Dawn of poetry and philosophy; astronomy added the five Epact days to the old 360. The capital shifted from Memphis to Thebes. Foreigners from western Asia received and promoted by the early Pharaohs. The latter execute great works of irrigation, to guard against famine. This 12th dynasty worshipped Amen (the occult god, hidden in nature), at Thebes. The Labyrinth, and the artificial Lake Meris, their work.	Abram received graciously.
About B.C. 1750	Thirteenth: DIOSPOLITES (contemporary with the Shepherd-). Pharaohs named Sebek-hotep. Fourteenth: KONTES , in Upper Egypt (contemporaneous with the Fifteenth and Sixteenth in Lower). Fifteenth: HYKSOS, or SHEPHERDS (contemp. with the Fourteenth and Sixteenth). Sixteenth: SHEPHERDS (contemporaneous with the Fourteenth and Fifteenth).	The early Pharaohs lords of all Egypt. Then the Hyksos, chief of the Shasous or "Nomads," seize N. Egypt; introduce worship of Sut, Sutech, or Baal-Salatis, the first Hyksos king; Apepi, the last, overcome by Aahmes I.; and Avaris, Tanis, or Zoan, the Hyksos stronghold, taken, and the Shepherds expelled. Rasetnub (the Saïtes of Manetho) was leader of the Hyksos; his name occurs on a tablet of Rameses II., 1300 B.C., who says Rasetnub's era was 400 years before, i.e. 1700 B.C.; also on a lion at Bagdad (Dr. Birch).	Joseph under an early Pharaoh, of the 13th dynasty, or under Amenemha III., the sixth king of the 12th dynasty.
About B.C. 1525; but Lepsius, B.C. 1706	Seventeenth: APEPI, or APOPIUS , last of the Hyksos. Ta-naken Rasekenen, last of the contemporary Egyptian Pharaohs.
B.C. 1525; or B.C. 1706	Eighteenth: DIOSPOLITES: Aahmes I. (Nefertari, a Nubian queen, regent), Amenhotep I., Thothmes I. (Aahmes' regent), Thothmes II., Thothmes III., Amenhotep IV. (Khuu-Aten); three kings, Horemheb, illegitimate.	Expels the Shepherds. Great buildings by forced labour. Theban worship restored. Expedition into Ethiopia under Amenhotep I. Successful expeditions into Nubia and Mesopotamia under Thothmes I. First part of reign of Thothmes II. prosperous. Ends in a blank, followed by a general revolt of the Syrian confederates. Hattusili queen regnant for 17 or 22 years. Thothmes III. recovers the ascendancy in Syria in the 22nd year, and invades Mesopotamia, and reduces Nineveh. His wars end in the 40th year of his reign. Monuments of him exist in El Karnak, the sanctuary of Thebes. Amenhotep II. invades Syria by sea; overthrows the confederates N. of Palestine. Amenhotep III., and his queen Tei, a foreigner, favour a purer worship. Raise the temple at Thebes, where the vocal Mounon and its fellow now stand. Amenhotep IV., Khuu-Aten, completes the religious revolution. A period follows of internal struggles, during which Mesopotamia threw off Egypt's yoke.	Aahmes I., the "new king" who imposed hard service on Israel, building forts in their own land. Moses saved and adopted by an Egyptian princess. Flees into Midian. Return of Moses. Exodus. Pharaoh and his host perish in the Red Sea. Israel in the wilderness forty years. Joshua in the fortieth year enters Canaan. Israel acquires most of Canaan.
B.C. 1403; or B.C. 1445. Lepsius, B.C. 1647			Chushan Rishathaim invades Israel.

YEAR.	DYNASTIES.	CONTEMPORARY EVENTS RECORDED ON THE MONUMENTS.	SCRIPTURAL PARALLEL EVENTS.
B.C. 1320. . .	Nineteenth: Rameses I., Seti I., Rameses II., Merneptah I., Seti II., Am-Emmoseh, Siptah, Tausar.	Wars with the Cheta, now the dominant race in Syria. Seti I. subdues the Shasous or nomads from Egypt to Syria, the Cheta, and Mesopotamians. The great hypostyle hall of El Karnak built. Bas-reliefs of his successes on the N. wall. The empire's highest civilization. Rameses II. co-regent with his father many years. Defeats the Cheta; contracts a treaty with their king, whose daughter he marries. Captives employed in enlarging fortresses, etc. The Aperi employed at Pa-Ramesses and Zarn. Reigns, dating from his co-regency, 67 years in all. The temples he built in Egypt and Nubia outshone all others.	The interval between Chushan Rishathum and Jabin. Palestine still in the hands of the Amorites and Canaanites. Towards the end of this period, subject to the Philistines on the south, and to the Cheta or Hittites on the north. Revolt against Jabin. Overthrow of the Chetan Sisera, in Merneptah's reign.
	Twentieth: Rameses III. Twelve more of the name, with distinguishing surnames.	Successes in Africa and Asia. The Cheta subdued. Aperi employed in the king's domains; also in the quarries. Rameses III. records his successes on his great temple of Medcenet Haboo in western Thebes; among them a naval victory in the Mediterranean over the Tokkaree (Carians) and Shaitetana (Cretans). Other Shaitetana (Cherethim) serve in his forces.	Events in Judges, after Deborah and Barak.

After Rameses III. anarchy succeeded, the highpriests usurping the throne at Thebes, and a Lower E. dynasty, the 21st, arising at Tanis. Solomon's wife was probably of the latter dynasty.

Sheshouk I. (Shishak), head of the 22nd dynasty, reuniting the kingdom 990 B.C. He received Jeroboam, Solomon's enemy, who went forth from him to take the kingdom of the ten tribes. Outside the southern wall of the temple of El Karnak is a list of Sheshouk's conquests, among them "the kingdom of Judah." The overthrow of his successor (Zerah), Osorkon I., by Asi caused the decline of the dynasty (2 Chron. xiv. 9).

The 23th was an Ethiopian line which boldly withstood the progress of Assyria. So (either Shebek II. or Shebek I., Sabacho) was ally to Hoshea, Israel's last king (2 Kings xvii. 4). Tirhakah, the third of this dynasty (xix. 9), made a diversion in favour of Ezekiah when threatened by Sennacherib.

The 26th was a native line, Saïtes. Psammetik I. 664 B.C. Neku (Necho) his son marched against Assyria, and unwillingly encountered and slew Josiah at Megiddo, 608 B.C. (2 Chron. xxxv. 21; "I come not against thee, thou king of Judah, but against the house wherewith I have war; for God commanded me to make haste; forbear thee from meddling with God, who is with me, that He destroy thee not": characteristic of the kindly relations which all along subsisted between Israel and E. after the exodus; the recognition of God is remarkable. Necho was routed at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, 605 B.C. (Jer. xli. 2.) He "came not again any more out of his land, for the king of Babylon had taken from the river of E. unto the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of E." (2 Kings xxiv. 7.)

Pharaoh Hophra, his second successor, after temporarily raising the siege of Jerusalem as Zedekiah's ally (Jer. xxvii. 5, 7, 11), was afterwards attacked by Nebuchadnezzar in his own country. Amasis next reigned prosperously; but his son, after a six months' reign, was conquered by Cambyses, who reduced E. to a province of the Persian empire 525 B.C. He took Pelusium, the key of E., by placing before his army dogs, cats, etc., held sacred in E., so that no Egyptian would use weapon against them. The Ptolemies, successors of the Greek Alexander the Great, ruled for three hundred years, and raised E. to eminence by their patronage of literature; but they were a foreign line.

Thus Ezekiel's prophecies (xxix., xxx., xxxi., xxxii.) were fulfilled. Jeremiah's prediction is fulfilled in the disappearance of Memphis and its temples; xvi. 19, "Noph shall be waste and desolate without an inhabitant"; "I will destroy the idols, and I will cause images to cease out of Noph." Ezek. xxx. 13: "and there shall be no more a prince of the land of E." Cambyses slew Apis, the sacred ox, and burnt the other idols. From the second Persian conquest, upwards of 2000 years ago, no native prince of an Egyptian race has reigned. (See PHARAOH, EXODUS, MOSES, ALEXANDRIA.)

Ehi. Gen. xli. 21. Ahiram is probably the full name (Num. xxvi. 38); 1 Chron. viii. 1. Aharah; ver. 4. Ahoah; ver. 7. Abiah.

Ehud. [See EGLOH.] An hereditary name in Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 10, viii. 6). The second of the judges was son of Gera, also an hereditary name in Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21, 2 Sam. xvi. 5, 1 Chron. viii. 3). Israel's "deliverer," under God, from the Moabite Eglo who had crossed the Jordan westward, and seized Jericho, in E.'s tribe, Benjamin (Jud. iii. 9, 12 30; Neh. ix. 27, "saviours"). He could use his left hand as readily as his right (Jud. xx. 16). "He MADE him" a dagger; for, as under the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii.

19) so now under Moab the making of iron weapons publicly was forbidden. He girt on "his right thigh" where its presence would never be suspected, the left being the sword side and where to his left hand it would be most convenient. He may have been one of the 600 left-handed slingers who escaped to the rock Rimmon just thirteen years before.

Eker. 1 Chron. ii. 27.

Ekrone = the firm rooted. Most northerly of the five Philistine lordship cities, farthest from the sea, to the right of the great road from Egypt northwards to Syria, in the shephelah. A landmark of Judah on the northern boundary which ran thence to the sea at Jabneel (Josh. xv. 45, 46; Jud. i. 18). Afterwards in Dan (Josh. xix. 43); but the Philistines permanently appropriated it (1 Sam. v. 10, xvii. 52; Jer. xxv. 20). Thither the ark was taken last before its return to Israel. A shrine and oracle of Baalzebub was there, to which king Ahaziah applied for consultation in his sickness (2 Kings i. 2, 16). Zech. ix. 5, "E. for her expectation shall be ashamed": she had expected Tyre would withstand Alexander in his progress southward toward Egypt; but her expectation shall bear the shame of disappointment. Zeph. ii. 4 plays on her name, Ekrone tee'akeer, "the firm-rooted one shall be rooted up." Now Akir, 3 miles E. of Yebna, N. of the wady Surar; a village consisting of 50 mud houses, with two well-built walls, is all that remains of the once leading Philistine city, fulfilling the prophecy that she should be rooted up.

Eladah. 1 Chron. vii. 20.

Elah. I. Baasha's son and successor on the Israelite throne (1 Kings xvi. 8-10); reigned little more than a year. A beacon to warn drunkards, killed by the captain of half his chariots, Zimri, whilst "drinking himself drunk" in the house of his steward Arza in Tirzah. Josephus (Ant. viii. 12, § 4) says it occurred while his army and officers were absent at the siege of Gibbethon. As Baasha conspired against his master Nadab, so Zimri against Baasha's son; Zimri in his turn was slain by Omri. Thus retributive justice pays transgressors in kind. 2. Father of Hoshai, last king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 30, xvii. 1). 3. Duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 41); comp. Elath on the Red Sea. 4. Father of Shimci, Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin (1 Kings iv. 18). 5. Son of Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 15). 6. Uzzi's son, a chief of Benjamin (ix. 8).

Elah, Valley of, i.e. "valley of the terebinth," in which Israel encamped when David killed Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19; comp. xxi. 9). Near Shocoh of Judah and Azekah; Ekron was the nearest Philistine town. Shocoh is now Suweikeh, 14 miles S.W. of Jerusalem on the road to Gaza, near where the western hills of Judah slope towards the Philistine plain; on the S. slopes of "the valley of acacias"; valley of Swat, which joining two other valleys below Suweikeh forms an open plain a mile wide, with a torrent bed full of round pebbles, such as David slew Goliath with. This open space is probably the valley of E. or terebinths, of which one of the largest in Palestine stands near. A mile down the valley is Tell Zakariyeh, probably Azekah. Ekron is 17 miles and Bithleem 12 from Shocoh. The Philistines were on the hill on the S. side, Israel on the hill on the N. side of "the ravine" (ha-gai, ver. 3, the deeper cutting made in the broad valley by the winter torrent, distinct from emeqa, "valley," ver. 2). [See EPHES-DAMMIM.]

Elam. 1. Son of Shem (Gen. x. 22). The name is Semitic. The Elamites gave their name to Elymais, the region on the left or E. bank of the Tigris, opposite Babylon, between it on the W. and Persia proper on the E., and S.W. of Media. The region is also named Susiana or Susi from its capital Susa, called Shushan in Dan. viii. 2, where Nehemiah (n. 1) waited on king Artaxerxes, and where Abasuerus (Xerxes) held his court in Esther's (i. 2, ii. 5) time. Daniel mentions the river Ulai near, i.e. the Greek Enlous. From Darius Hystaspes' time to Alexander the Great it was the Persian king's court residence.

CHEDORLOMER (see) who invaded Palestine in Abraham's time (Gen. xiv.) was king of E., and then lord paramount over Amraphel, king of Shinar (Babylonia) on its confines. This Elamitic supremacy was of short duration. The Kissians or Cassians (Cushites?) subsequently to the Elamites subjugated E. and called it Kissia (Herodotus, iii. 91, v. 49). The Greek traditions of Memnon and his Ethiopian hands res' on this subjugation, the Kissians of E. being connected with the Cushite inhabitants of the upper valley of the Nile. The two races remained separate to the time of Strabo (comp. Ezra iv. 9). Discoveries in E. prove Susa one of the oldest cities in the East and its monarchs quasi-independent, whilst acknowledging Assyria's and Babylon's successive supremacy. Occasionally it for a time maintained its complete independence. It was a province of Babylon from Nebuchadnezzar's time (Dan. viii. 2). Its conquest by him is probably foretold in Jer. xlix. 30-31, Ezek. xxxii. 21, 25. It had helped him against Judah; hence God dealt retributively its punishment by him with whom it had transgressed. Its bowmen were famed (Isa. xxiii. 6); so God says, "I will break the bow of E."

After scattering them God saith, "in the latter days I will bring again the captivity of E." viz. in the coming restitution of all things by Messiah; an earnest of which was given in that Elamites were on pentecost among the first who heard and accepted the gospel (Acts ii. 9).

E. took part in destroying Babylon, on Cyrus' advance probably joining him in the assault (Isa. xxi. 2). E. became a satrapy of the Persian empire, furnishing 300 talents as annual tribute (Herodotus, iii. 91). Susa, its capital, became capital of the empire and the court residence. Nevertheless it was the scene of the Magian revolution, and twice revolted under Darius Hystaspes (Behistun Inscription).

2. A Korbite Levite, one of the sons of Asaph in David's time (1 Chron. xxvi. 3). 3. A Benjamite chief, one of Shashak's sons (1 Chron. viii. 24). 4. Children of E., 1251, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 7, Neh. vii. 12). Seventy-one more accompanied Ezra and the second caravan (Ezra viii. 7). Shechaniah, one of them, seconded Ezra's confession of sin, especially as to marriages with aliens, pleaded the people's guilt, and proposed a covenant to put away those wives; six of the sons of E. accordingly did so (x. 2, 26). 5. Another E., of whose sons also the same number returned, is mentioned (iii. 31, Neh. vii. 31). 6. A priest who accompanied Nehemiah in dedicating the wall (xii. 42).

Elasah. 1. Ezra x. 22. 2. Son of Shaphan, one of the two sent by king Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon (by whose permission alone he reigned) after the first deportation. He took charge of Jeremiah's letter to the captives (Jer. xxix. 3).

Elath. In Edom, on the Red Sea, near Ezion Geber (Deut. ii. 8). Now in Arabia Eyleh, at the point of the eastern horn of the Red Sea. Both town and gulf are named Akaba. No doubt included in David's conquest of Edom (2 Sam. viii. 14). Solomon's navy rode at sea near Ezion Geber, beside Elath (1 Kings ix. 26, 2 Chron. viii. 17). From E. the Elanitic gulf, the eastern arm of the Red Sea, takes its name. It means "trees," and a grove of palm trees is still at Akaba. Edom revolted in the Israelite king Joram's days; Azariah (Uzziah) of Judah "built E. and restored it to Judah" (2 Kings viii. 20, xiv. 22). Rezin of Syria recovered it and drove out the Jews (xvi. 6). The Eyleh district was originally occupied by a tribe of the Amalekites (the Samayda). Amalek, according to Arab historians, passed from the Persian gulf through the Arabian peninsula to Arabia Petraea. Herodotus makes the Thracians come from the Red Sea; if they were Cushites, their maritime propensities would accord with the characteristics of that race.

Eldaah, Gen. xxv. 4, 1 Chron. i. 33. Eldad (= loved of God) and Medad.

Two of the 70 elders to whom the Spirit was imparted, in order to share Moses's burden of responsibility. Though "they were of them that were written" in Moses' list (implying that the 70 were permanently appointed) they did not go with the rest to the tabernacle, but prophesied in the camp (Num. xi. 26). Forster however trans. "they were among the inscriptions," i.e. occupied in directing the records of the exode at Sarbut el Khadem at the entrance to Wady Maghara and Mokatteb. The contest favours A. V. When "the (so Heb. for a) young man" reported it at the tabernacle, and Joshua begged Moses to forbid them, he refused saying, "enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets," etc. So Jesus' disciples were jealous for His honour, but were reproved by Moses' Antitype (Mark ix. 38, 39). For "and did not cease," ver. 25, trans. velo gasphu "and did not add," as LXX., i.e. they did not continue prophesying. Not that the Spirit departed from them, but having given this palpable sample to the nation of their Spirit-attested mission, they for the time ceased to give further spiritual demonstrations, their office being executive administration not prophecy. Not foretelling the future is meant, but cestatic impulse by the Spirit, giving them wisdom and utterance; as the disciples on pentecost received the gift of tongues and of prophecy, i.e. the power of inspired speaking. They probably declared God's will in extempore hymns of praise; so Saul, 1 Sam. x. 11. The Jews' tradition was that all prophetic inspiration emanated from Moses originally. In the sense only that Moses' pentateuch is the basis of all subsequent prophecy, the psalms and the prophets, it is true. It was "of the Spirit that was upon Moses" that "God gave unto the 70 elders." The diffusion of the spirit of prophecy, no longer limited to Moses, and its separation from the tabernacle service, led to the establishment of the "schools of the prophets." Moses, like the true "servant" of God (Heb. iii.), not seeking his own but God's glory, and the extension of His kingdom, rejoiced at what provoked the jealousy of his followers. The 70 elders appointed by Jethro's advice at Sinai (Exod. xviii.) to help Moses in judging are distinct from the 70 here endowed with the Spirit to help him as his executive court, to govern the rebellious people, and establish his authority, shaken by the people's murmurings against Jehovah and himself because of the want of flesh. The number 70 symbolically represented the elect nation, the sacred number for perfection, 7, being raised to tens, the world number. It was accordingly our Lord's number for the disciples sent two by two before His face (Luke x. 1).

Elder. Age is the standard of dignity in a patriarchal system. Hence the office of elder was the basis of government; as in our "alderman," the Arab sheikh = old man (Josh. xiv. 31, 1 Kings xii. 6). The institution existed when Moses first opened his Divine commission to Israel. Even in their Egyptian bondage they retained their national organization and government by elders, who represented the people (Exod. iii. 16, iv. 29; Josh. xxiv. 1, 2). After the settlement in Canaan they were named "elders of Israel" or "of the land" (1 Sam. iv. 3, 1 Kings xx. 7) or "of the tribes" (Deut. xxxi. 28) or "of the city," (Deut. xix. 12, comp. xvi. 18; Ruth iv. 9, 11). They retained their position under the judges (ii. 7), the kings (2 Sam. xvii. 4), in the captivity (Jer. xxix. 1), and on the return (Ezra v. 5); and in N. T. times as one of the classes from which the Sanhedrim members were chosen, and are associated with the chief priests and scribes (Matt. xvi. 21, xxi. 23, xxvi. 59; Luke xxii. 69), "the presbytery of the people" (Gr.).

Ecclesiastical elders or presbyters (whence priest is contracted) of the Christian church were a class of church governors borrowed naturally from the SYNAGOGUE [see]; especially as cases occurred of whole synagogues and their officers embracing Christianity. [See BISHOP and DEACON and CHURCH.] Paul ordained them at his first missionary journey (Acts xv. 23).

The four and twenty elders (Rev. iv.) represent the combined heads of the O. and N. T. churches, the twelve patriarchs and twelve apostles; answering to the typical 24 courses of priests, "governors of the sanctuary and governors of God" (1 Chron. xxiv. 5, xxv. 31).

Elead. 1 Chron. vii. 21.

Elealeh. E. of Jordan, in the portion of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 3, 37). Appropriated by Moab, and named as a Moabite town by Isaiah (xv. 4, xvi. 9; Jer. xlviii. 34) along with Heshbon. Now El-A'el, "the high," a mile N. of Heshbon, commanding a wide view of the plain and southern Belka.

Eleasah. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 39. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 37, ix. 43.

Eleazar. 1. Aaron's third son by Elisheba, Amminadab's daughter, descended from Judah through Pharez (Exod. vi. 23, 25, xxviii. 1; Gen. xxxviii. 29, xlii. 12; Ruth iv. 18, 20). On the death of Nadab and Abihu without children (Lev. x. 1, Num. iii. 4) Eleazar had the oversight of the chief Levites, who kept the charge of the sanctuary (Num. iii. 32). With Ithamar his brother he ministered as a priest in his father's lifetime, and was invested in Aaron's high-priestly garments as his successor, on mount Hor, just before his death (xx. 25-28). With Moses he superintended the census (xxvi. 3), inaugurated Joshua whom Moses set before him (for Joshua was in this interior to Moses, who had direct intercourse with God; Joshua must ask Divine counsel through the high-priest), and divided the Midianite spoil (xxvii. 22, xxxi. 21). He took part in dividing Canaan (Josh. xiv. 1). He was buried in "the hill of Phinehas his son, . . . mount Ephraim" (Josh. xxiv. 33). The highpriesthood passed to Ithamar's line in the person of Eli, but for the sin of Eli's sons reverted to Eleazar's line in the person of Zadok (1 Sam. ii. 27; 1 Chron. vi. 8, xxiv. 3; 1 Kings ii. 27).

2. Abinadab's son, of the "hill" of Kirjath Jearim; appointed by its inhabitants to take care of the ark on its return from the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 1).

3. Dodo the Ahohite's son, one of the three chief mighties of David; perhaps descended from Ahoah of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 4, 2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 1 Chron. xi. 12). 4. A Merarite Levite, son of Mahli, having daughters married to their "brethren" (cousins) (1 Chron. xxiii. 21, 22; xxiv. 28). 5. A priest at Nehemiah's feast of dedication (Neh. xii. 42). 6. Son of Parosh, who married and put away an alien wife (Ezra x. 25). 7. Phinehas's son, a Levite (Ezra viii. 33). 8. Eliud's son, three generations above Joseph, husband of the Virgin Mary (Matt. i. 15). The name means "helped by God," and is the same as Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-25).

Elect. [ELECTION: see PREDESTINATION.] (1) Chosen to office (Acts ix. 15, John vi. 70, 1 Sam. x. 24). ELECTION (2) of Israel in the O. T. as a nation, and of the visible Christian church, to spiritual privileges (Isa. xlv. 4, xlv. 1; 2 John 3; 1 Pet. v. 13). (3) Of Israel to temporal blessings in their own land, both formerly (Deut. vii. 6) and hereafter (Isa. lxx. 9-22). (4) Of saints, individually and personally, (Matt. xx. 16, John vi. 44, Acts xxii. 14) before the foundation of the world: to adoption (Eph. i. 5); salvation, not without faith and holiness, but "through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," for He who chose the end chose also the means (2 Thess. ii. 13); conformity to Christ (Rom. viii. 29); good works (Eph. ii. 10); spiritual warfare (2 Tim. ii. 4); eternal glory (Rom. ix. 23). He chooses not merely characters, but individuals to whom He gives the needful characteristics, faith and obedience (Acts v. 31, Eph. ii. 8), and writes them in the book of life (Luke x. 20, Phil. iv. 3, John vi. 37, 40). Believers may know it (1 Thess. i. 4).

Exemplified in Isaac (Gen. xxi. 12); Abraham (Neh. ix. 7, Hag. ii. 23); the apostles (John xiii. 18, xv. 16, 19); Jacob (Rom. ix. 12, 13); Paul (Gal. i. 15). God's "grace was given in Christ Jesus (to the elect) before the world began" (2 Tim. i. 9). Its source is God's grace, independent of any goodness foreseen in the saved (Eph. i. 4, 5; Rom. ix. 11, 18; xi. 5). The analogy of God's providence in this life choosing all our circumstances and final destination, and numbering the very hairs of our heads, illustrates the same method in His moral government (comp. John xvii. 24, Acts xiii. 48, Rom. viii. 28-30, 1 Thess. v. 9, 2 Tim. ii. 10, 1 Pet. i. 2). The election being entirely of grace, not for our foreseen works (Rom. xi. 6), the glory all redounds to God. The elect are given by the Father to Jesus as the fruit of His obedience unto death (Isa. liii. 10), that obedience itself being a grand part of the fore-ordained plan. Such a truth realized fills the heart with love and gratitude to God, humbling self, and "drawing up the mind to high and heavenly things" (Ch. of Eng. Art. xvii.). Yet men are throughout Scripture treated as responsible, capable of will and choice. Christ died efficiently for all, efficiently for the elect (1 Tim. iv. 10, 1 John ii. 2). The lost will lay all the blame of their perdition on themselves because "they would not come to Jesus that they might have life"; the saved will ascribe all the praise of their salvation to God alone (Rev. i. 5, Matt. xxii. 12).

El-elohe-Israel. "The mighty God of Israel," who had just shown His infinite might in saving Jacob (whose name was by God changed to Israel, because by prayer he had might with this mighty God and had prevailed) from Esau his deadly foe. Jacob so called the altar he built on the spot before Shechem, already consecrated by Abram (Gen. xii. 7, xxxiii. 19, 20). By it he implied that Jehovah, who was Abram's God, is also his God, as He had shown by bringing him safe back to Canaan as his inheritance.

Elements (Gal. iv. 9): "weak and beggarly" rudiments; the elementary symbols of the law, powerless to justify, in contrast to the justifying power of faith (iii. 24, Heb. vii. 18); beggarly, in contrast with the riches of the believer's inheritance in Christ (Eph. i. 18). The child (Gal. iv. 1-3) under the law is "weak," not having attained manhood; "beggarly," not having attained the inheritance.

Eleph=ox. A town of Benjamin, whose inhabitants followed pastoral life (Josh. xviii. 28).

Elhanan. 1. Son of JAARE-OREGIM [see], or Jair, the Bethlehemite. Slew Lahmi, brother of Goliath the Gittite (2 Sam. xxi. 19, 1 Chron. xx. 5). The oregim seems to have crept into the first line from the second, where it means "reavers." "The Bethlehemite" is an alteration of eth Lahmi, a confusion being made with (2) E. son of Dodo of Bethlehem; first of "the thirty" of David's guard (2 Sam. xxxiii. 24, 1 Chron. xi. 26).

Eli. Sprang from Ithamar, Aaron's younger surviving son (Lev. x. 1, 2, 12). Comp. ABIATHAR (1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 1 Chron. xxiv. 3; 2 Sam. viii. 17). Comp. Eleazar's genealogy, wherein E. and Abiathar do not appear (1 Chron. vi. 4-15, Ezra vii. 1-5). No highpriest of Ithamar's line is mentioned before E., whose appointment was of God (1 Sam. ii. 30). His grandson Ahitub succeeded (1 Sam. xiv. 3). Abiathar, Ahitub's grandson, was thrust out by Solomon for his share in Adonijah's rebellion, and the highpriesthood reverted to Eleazar's line in Zadok (1 Kings ii. 35). The transfer was foretold to E. by the unnamed man of God first, and by the child Samuel next (1 Sam. ii. iii.); a punishment from God, because though E. reproved his wicked sons Hophni and Phinehas in word he did not in act put forth his authority as a judge to punish, coerce, and depose them, "because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not." Another part of the curse, "I will cut off the arm of thy father's house that there shall not be an old man in thine house," was being fulfilled in David's days, when "there were more chief men found of the sons of Eleazar [16] than of the sons of Ithamar" [8] (1 Chron. xiv. 4). E.'s grace shone in the meekness with which he bowed to the Lord's sentence, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good." His patriotism and piety especially appear in his intense anxiety for the safety of the ark; "his heart trembled for the ark of God." The announcement after the battle, of the slaughter of the people and even of his sons, did not so much overwhelm him as that of the ark of God: instantly "he fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake and he died; for he was old and heavy."

SITTING IN THE GATE.

The Heb. Scriptures make his term of office as judge 40 years; the Gr. LXX. 20 years. Some reconcile the two by making him co-judge with Samson 20, and sole judge 20 more years. He was 38 years of age at his death. His failing and its penalty are a warning to all parents, even religious ones, and all in authority, to guard against laxity in ruling children and subordinates in the fear of the Lord, punishing strictly, though in love, all sin, jealous for God's honour even at the cost of offending man and of paining natural parental feeling. Condoning sin is cruel to children as well as dishonouring to God. Children will respect most the parent who respects God. Perhaps E. clung to office too long, when through age he was no longer able vigorously to fulfil it. He who cannot rule his own house is unfit to rule the house of God (1 Tim. iii. 5).

Eliab. 1. Num. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16. 2. Num. xxvi. 8, 9; xvi. 1, 12; Deut. xi. 6. 3. David's eldest brother (1 Chron. ii. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 6, xvii. 13, 28). Abigail his daughter (granddaughter?) married her second cousin Rehoboam, and bore him three children (2 Chron. xi. 18). E. betrayed anger without a cause towards David, when seeking his brethren's welfare ("Why camest thou down hither, and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?"); also "pride and naughtiness of heart," the very sins he charged David with ("I know thy pride," etc.; he knew himself still less than he did David); uncharitable surmising instead of the love that thinketh no evil ("thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle"). David meekly replied, "Is there not a cause?" (see Matt. v. 22, 1 Cor. xiii. 4-7). 4. A Levite porter and musician on the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5). 5. A Gadite leader who joined David in the wilderness in his flight from Saul (1 Chron. xii. 9). 6. Ancestor of Samuel, a Kohathite Levite, son of Nabhath (1 Chron. vi. 27). Called Elihu 1 Sam. i. 1, also Eliel 1 Chron. vi. 34.

Eliada. Youngest but one of David's sons, born after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16, 1 Chron. iii. 8). Called Beeliada 1 Chron. xiv. 7; Baal being substituted for El (God), why we can only conjecture; possibly he apostatized. 2. 2 Chron. xvii. 17. 3. 1 Kings xi. 23. Eliab. 1. 1 Chron. viii. 27. 2. "Of Israel," i.e. a layman (Ezra x. 26).

Eliabha. 2 Sam. xxiii. 32.

Eliakim. 1. Hilikiah's son, over Hezekiah's household (Isa. xxxvi. 3). As Joseph over Pharaoh's palace, Azrikam "governor of Abaz' house" (2 Chron. xxviii. 7); chamberlain, treasurer, prefect of the palace (Gen. xli. 40), chief minister. Successor of Shebna, whose deposition for his pride was foretold (Isa. xxii. 15-20). Elevated at the time of the Assyrian invasion as the one most adapted to meet such a crisis. Same as Azariah son of Hilikiah (1 Chron. vi. 13); the same man often bearing two names (Kinch). God calls him "My servant"; a pious patriot (comp. 2 Kings xviii. 37, xix. 1-5). A "father to (counselling, befriending, and defending) the inhabitants of Jerusalem and to the inhabitants of Judah." Type of Messiah: "the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder (the key hung from the kerchief on the shoulder as emblem of his office, or figuratively for sustaining the government on his shoulder); so he shall open and none shall shut, and he shall shut and none shall open;" i.e., all access to the royal house shall be through him. Antitypically, "the government shall be upon Messiah's shoulder" (Isa. ix. 6, xlii. 22); He shuts or opens at will the access to the heavenly mansion (Rev. iii. 7). He has the keys also of hell (the grave) and death (i. 18). As E. supplanted Shebna, so Christ the Heir of David's throne shall supplant all the stewards who abuse their trust in God's spiritual house, the church and the world (hereafter to become coextensive with the church): Heb. iii. 2, 6. For the rest of Isaiah's imagery as to E., see NAL. SHEBNA [see], when degraded, was "scribe" (i.e. secretary, remembrancer, keeping the king informed on important facts, historiographer) under E. (2 Kings xviii. 37), who became "treasurer," or as Heb. sokeen (Isa. xxii. 15) from sakan "to dwell" means, intimate friend of the king, dwelling on familiar terms, and "steward of the provisions" (comp. 1 Chron.

xxvii. 33). 2. King JEHOIAKIM's original name. 3. Neh. xii. 41. 4. Luke iii. 26, Matt. i. 13. 5. Luke iii. 30, 31.

Eliam=God is my people (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). Son of ANITHOPHEE and father of BATHSHEBA [see both] (2 Sam. xi. 3). Ammiel (by transposition) in 1 Chron. iii. 5, and Bathsua, non-Israelite names. Uriah was a Hittite (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12; 1 Chron. vi. 3).

Elias=Elijah. Matt. xi. 14, and in N. T. elsewhere. In Rom. xi. 2 marg. "the Scripture saith in E.," i.e. in the Scripture portion that treats of Elijah.

Eliasaph. 1. Num. i. 14; ii. 14; vii. 42, 47; x. 20. 2. Num. iii. 24.

Eliashib. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 12. 2. 1 Chron. iii. 21. 3. Highpriest when Nehemiah rebuilt the walls (iii. 1, 20, 21). Energetic in building the sheepcote, sanctifying and setting up its doors; but relationship to Tobiah the Ammonite outweighed regard for the sanctity of the temple. Nehemiah was wroth with him for preparing a room therein for his heathen connection (xiii. 4-7), in opposition to God's prohibition (Dent. xxiii. 3, 4). His grandson too had married the heathenish Hironite Sanballat's daughter (Neh. xiii. 28). Ungodly alliances are a snare to religious professors (2 Cor. vi. 14-18, Matt. x. 37). "Therefore (says Nehemiah) I chased him from me. Remember them, O my God, because they have defiled the priesthood and the covenant of the priesthood." His genealogy is given (xii. 10, 22), see Ezra x. 6. 4. Ezra x. 21. 5. Ezra x. 27. 6. Ezra x. 36.

Eliathah. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 27.

Eliadad. Son of Chislon; represented Benjamin in dividing Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 21).

Eliel. 1. 1 Chron. v. 24. 2. 1 Chron. vi. 34. [See ELIAB 3, ELIHU 2, probably the same]. 3. 1 Chron. vii. 20, 21. 4. 1 Chron. vii. 22. 5. 1 Chron. xi. 46. 6. 1 Chron. xi. 47. 7. 1 Chron. xii. 8, 11. 8. 1 Chron. x. 9-11. 9. 2 Chron. xxxi. 13.

Elienai. 1 Chron. vii. 20.

Eliezer=my God a help. 1. Gen. xv. 2. "the steward of Abram's house, E. of Damascus," i.e. "the son of the business," or possession (i.e. heir) of my house. Entering Canaan by Damascus, Abram took thence his chief retainer, and adopted him in the absence of a son and heir. He was not "born in Abram's house" as ver. 3 of A. V. represents in contradiction to ver. 2 (unless it was whilst Abram was in Damascus); but, as Heb. expresses, was "son of his house," i.e. adopted as such, according to the paternal relations then subsisting between patriarchs and their servants. Thus he discharged with fidelity, prayerful trust in Providence, and tact, the delicate commission of choosing a wife from his master's connections for his master's son Isaac. Justin (xxxvi. 2) and Josephus (Ant. i. 7, § 2), from Nicholans of Damascus, assert that Abraham reigned in Damascus. E.'s prayer, "O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray Thee send me good speed to-day, and show kindness unto my master;" his looking for a providential token to guide him; God's gracious answer in fact; and his thanksgiving, "Blessed be the Lord God of my master . . . who has not left destitute my master of His mercy and His truth, I being in the way, the Lord led me:" are a sample of God's special care for His people's temporal concerns, and of the way to secure it (Gen. xxiv.). 2. Moses and Zipporah's second son; so called "because, said Moses, the God of my father was my help . . . from the sword of Pharaoh" (Exod. xviii. 4, 1 Chron. xxiii. 15, 17). Remained with Jethro his grandfather when Moses returned to Egypt. Zipporah after going part of the way with him was sent back by Moses (Exod. iv. 18, 24-26; xviii. 2, etc.). Jethro took Zipporah and Gershom and E. to Moses in the wilderness, upon hearing of the exodus. Had one son, Rehabiah, to whom were born very many sons (1 Chron. xxiii. 17, xxvi. 25, 26). SHELOMITH [see] was his descendant. 3. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 4. 1 Chron. xv. 24. 5. 1 Chron. xxvii. 16. 6. Dodavah's son, of Mareshah in Judah (2 Chron. xx. 35-37). Prophesied against Jehoshaphat that "the Lord had broken (at Ezion Geber) his works" (i.e. his ships of Tarshish designed to go to Ophir for gold) for joining himself with Ahaziah king of Israel "who did very wickedly" (1 Kings xxii. 49). On Ahaziah's proposing a second joint expedition, Jehoshaphat taught by bitter experience (2 Cor. vi. 14-18, Rev. xviii. 4) refused. The names suggest that possibly he was sprung from Eleazar son of Dodo (2 Sam. xxiii. 9), one of David's three mighty ones. 7. A "chief" and "man of understanding" whom Ezra sent to Idolo at Casiphia in order to bring the Nethinim, as minister for the house of God (Ezra vii. 16). 8. Ezra x. 18, 23, 31. 9. Luke iii. 29.

Elihoenai. Ezra viii. 4.

Elihoeph. 1 Kings iv. 3.

Elihu=God is Jehovah. 1. Son of Barachel (=God blesses), the names indicating the piety of the family and their separation from idolatry) the Buzite (Buz being a region of Arabia Deserta, Jer. xxv. 23, called from Buz son of Nahor, Abraham's brother), of the kindred of Ram (probably Aram, nephew of Buz): Job xxiii. 2. He is the main human solver of the problem of the book, which ultimately is resolved, by Jehovah's appearance, into a question of His absolute sovereignty that cannot err. E.'s reasoning is not condemned, as is that of the three elder friends and previous speakers, for whom and not for E. Job is directed to sacrifice and intercede [see Job]. 2. Son of Tohu, ancestor of Samuel (1 Sam. i. 1); ELIEL in 1 Chron. vi. 34; ELIAB vi. 27. 3. A captain of the thousands of Manasseh (xii. 20). Followed David to Ziklag after he left the Philistines before the battle of Gilboa, and aided him against the plundering Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx. 1, 9, 10; 1 Chron. xii. 20, 21). 4. A Korhite Levite in David's time, door-keeper of the house of Jehovah, son of Shemaiah, of Obed-Edom's family (xxvi. 6-8), men of strength for service.

Elijah=God-Jehovah (1 Kings xvii. 1, etc.). "The Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead." No town of the name has been discovered; some explain it Converter. His name and designation mark his one grand mission, to bring his apostate people back to Jehovah as THE God; comp. 1 Kings xviii. 39 with Mal. iv. 5, 6. In contrast to the detailed genealogy of Samuel, Elisha, and other prophets, E. abruptly appears, like Melchizedek in the patriarchal dispensation, without father or mother named, his exact locality unknown; in order that attention should be wholly fixed on his errand from heaven to overthrow Baal and Ashterah (the licentious Venus) worship in Israel. This idolatry had been introduced by AHAZ [see] and his idolatrous wife, Ethbaal's daughter Jezebel (in violation of the first commandment), as if the past sin of Israel were not enough, and as if it were "a light thing to walk in the sins of Jeroboam," viz. the worship of Jehovah under the symbol of a calf [see AARON], in violation of the second commandment. Ahab and his party represented Baal and Jehovah as essentially the same God, in order to reconcile the people to this farther and extreme step in idolatry; comp. 1 Kings xviii. 21, Hos. ii. 16.

E.'s work was to confound these sophisms and vindicate Jehovah's claim to be God alone, to the exclusion of all idols. Therefore he suddenly comes forth before Ahab the apostate king, announcing in Jehovah's name, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth (as contrasted with the dead idols which Israel worshipped) before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." The shutting up of heaven at the prophet's word was Jehovah's vindication of His sole Godhead; for Baal (though professedly the god of the sky) and his prophets could not open heaven and give showers (Jer. xiv. 22). The so called god of nature shall be shown to have no power over nature: Jehovah is its sole Lord. E.'s "effectual" prayer, not recorded in 1 Kings but in Jas. v. 17, was what moved God to withhold rain for three years and a half; doubtless E.'s reason for the prayer was jealousy for the Lord God (1 Kings xix. 10, 14), in order that Jehovah's chastening might lead the people to repentance. In "standing before the Lord" he assumed the position of a Levitical priest (Deut. x. 8), for in Israel the Levitical priesthood retained in Judah had been set aside, and the prophets were raised up to minister in their stead, and witness by word and deed before Jehovah against the prevailing apostasy. His departure was as sudden as his appearance. Partaking of the ruggedness of his half civilized native Gilead bordering on the desert, and in uncouth rough attire, "hairy (2 Kings i. 8, Heb. lord of hair) and with a girdle of leather about his loins," he comes and goes with the suddenness of the modern Bedouin of the same region. His "mantle," addereth, of sheepskin, was assumed by Elisha his successor, and gave the pattern for the "hairy" cloak which afterwards became a prophet's conventional garb (Zech. xiii. 4, "rough garment"). His powers of endurance were such as the highlands of Gilead would train, and proved of service to him in his after life of hardship (1 Kings xviii. 46). His burning zeal, bluntness of address, fearlessness of man, were nurtured in lonely communion with God, away from the polluting court, amidst his native wilds.

After delivering his bold message to Ahab, by God's warning he fled to his hiding place at CHERITH [see], a torrent bed E. of Jordan (or else, as many think, the wady Kelt near Jericho), beyond Ahab's reach, where the ravens miraculously fed him with "bread and flesh in the morning . . . bread and flesh in the evening." Carnivorous birds themselves, they lose their ravenous nature to minister to God's servant, for God can make the most unlikely instruments minister to His saints. It was probably at this time that Jezebel, foiled in her deadly purpose against E., "cut off Jehovah's prophets" (xviii. 4, xix. 2). The brook having dried up after a year's stay he retreated next to Zarephath or Sarepta, between Tyre and Sidon, where least of all, in Jezebel's native region, his enemies would have suspected him to be hid. But apostates, as Israel, are more bigoted than original idolaters as the Phœnicians. From Josh. xix. 28 we learn Zarephath belonged to Asher; and in Deut. xxxiii. 24 Moses saith, "let Asher dip his foot in oil." At the end of a three and a half years' dearth, if oil was to be found anywhere, it would be here, an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. At God's command, in the confidence of faith, he repairs for relief to this unpromising quarter. Here he was the first apostle to the Gentiles (Luke iv. 26); a poor widow, the most unlikely to give relief, at his bidding making a cake for him with her last handful of meal and a little oil, her all, and a few gathered sticks for fuel; like the widow in the N. T. giving her two mites, not reserving even one, nor thinking, what shall I have for my next meal? (Luke xxi. 2.) So making God's will her first concern, her own necessary food was "added" to her (Matt. vi. 33, Isa. xxxiii. 16, Ps. xxxvii. 19, Jer. xxxvii. 21); "the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the oil fail until the day that the Lord sent rain upon the earth." Blessed in that she believed, she by her example strengthened E.'s faith in God as able to fulfil His word, where all seemed hopeless to man's eye. Her strong faith, as is God's way, he further tried more severely. Her son fell sick, and "his sickness was so sore that no breath was left in him." Her trial brought her sins up before her, and she regarded herself punished as unworthy of so holy a man's presence with her. But he restored her son by stretching himself upon the child thrice (as though his body were the medium for God's power to enter the dead child), and crying to the Lord; hereby new spiritual life also was imparted to herself, as she said, "by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth."

Towards the close of the three and a half years of famine, when it attacked Samaria the capital, Ahab directed his governor of the palace, the Godfearing Obadiah who had saved and fed a hundred prophets in a cave, to go in one direction and seek some grass to save if possible the horses and mules, whilst he himself went in the opposite direction for the same purpose. Matters must have come to a crisis, when the long in person set out on such an errand. It was at this juncture, after upwards of two years' sojourn at Zaphath, E. by God's command goes to show himself to Ahab. Overcoming the awestruck Obadiah's fear lest, when he should tell the king, Behold E. is here, meanwhile the Spirit should carry him away, E., whom Ahab's servants had been seeking everywhere in vain for three years, now suddenly stands before Ahab with stern dignity. He hurls back on the king himself the charge of being, like another Achan, the troubler of Israel; "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of Jehovah, and thou hast followed Baalim." On CARMEL [see] the issue was tried between Jehorah and Baal, there being on one side Baal's 450 prophets with the 400 of Ashtoreth (ASHTORETH [see], "the groves"), who ate at Jezebel's table under the queen's special patronage; on the other side Jehovah's sole representative, in his startling costume, but with dignified mien. Amidst E.'s ironical jeers they cried, and gashed themselves, in vain repetitions praying from morning till noon for fire from their god Baal, the sun god and god of fire (!), and leaped upon (or up and down at) the altar. Repairing Jehovah's ruined altar (the former sanctity of which was seemingly the reason for his choice of Carmel) with 12 stones to represent the tribes of all Israel, and calling upon the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to let it be known that He is the Lord God, he brought down by prayer fire from heaven consuming the sacrifice, wood, stones, and dust, and licking up the water in the trench. The idolatrous prophets were slain at the brook Kishon, idolatry being visited according to the law with the penalty of high treason against God the king of the national theocracy (Deut. xiii. 9-11, 15; xviii. 20). Then upon the nation's penitent confession of God follows God's removal of the national judgment. The rain, beginning with the small hand-like cloud, and increasing till the whole sky became black (Luke xii. 54, xiii. 19), returned as it had gone, in answer to E.'s effectual prayer, which teaches us to not only pray but also wait (Jas. v. 17, 18; 1 Kings xviii. 41-45). Ahab rides in his chariot across the plain, 16 miles, to Jezreel, in haste lest the rainflood of the Kishon should make the Esdraelon or Jezreel plain impassable with mud; E., with Spirit-imparted strength from "the hand of the Lord upon" him, running before, but no farther than the entrance of the city, for he shrank from the contamination of the court and its luxuries.

Jezebel's fury on hearing of the slaughter of her favourite prophets knew no bounds: "so let the gods do to me and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow" (1 Kings xix. 2). E. fled for his life to Beersheba of Judah, with one attendant, and leaving him there went a day's journey into the wilderness. His not having heretofore repaired to the neighbouring land of godly Jehoshaphat, and his now fleeing to its most southerly town, farthest from Ahab's dominion, and thence into the desert, at first sight seems strange. But on closer search into Scripture it is an undesignated propriety that he avoids the land of the king whose one grand error was his marrying his son Jehoram to Athaliah, Ahab's and Jezebel's daughter, at least as early as the sixth or seventh year of Jehoshaphat and the tenth or eleventh of Ahab (Blunt's Undes. Coinc.); thereby he became so closely allied to the ungodly Ahab that at the Ramoth Gilcal expedition he said to the latter, "I am as thou art, my people as thy people" (xxii. 4). In this flight E.'s spirit of faith temporarily gave way. After the excitement of the victory over the Baal priests, and the nervous tension which under God's mighty hand sustained him in running to Jezreel, there ensued a reaction physically and an overwhelming depression of mind; for the hope which had seemed so bright at Carmel, of a national repentance and return to God, the one ruling desire of his soul, was apparently blighted; his labours seemed lost; the throne of iniquity unshaken; and hope deferred made his heart sick. Sitting under a juniper (retem, rather broom) he cried in deep despondency: "It is enough; now, O Lord, take away my life." God, with tender consideration, first relieved his physical needs, by sending to his exhausted frame "tired nature's kind restorer, balmy sleep," and then, by His angel, food; and only when nature was refreshed proceeds to teach him spiritually the lesson he needed. By God's command, "in the strength of that meat" (the supernatural being based on the natural groundwork) he went, Moses like, 40 days and 40 nights unto a cave at Horeb where he "lodged" for the night (Heb. lin). It was the same wilderness which received Moses fleeing from Pharaoh, and E. now fleeing from Ahab, and lastly Paul escaping from the Judaic bondage of ritualism. The lonely wilderness and awful rocks of Sinai were best fitted to draw the spirit off from the depressing influences of man's world and to raise it up to near communica with God. "He sought the ancient sanctuary connected with the holiest, grandest memories of mankind, that his spiritual longings might be gratified, that he might have the deepest sense of the greatness and nearness of God. He wished to be brought down from the soft luxuriant secondary formations of human religion [the halting between two opinions, between the luxurious Baal worship and the uncompromising holy worship of Jehovah] to the primary stratification of God's religion . . . to the naked, rugged, unyielding granite of the law" (Macmillan, The Garden and City). Jehovah there said, "What doest thou here, E.?" thou whose name implies thy calling to witness for God Jehovah, away from the court and people whom thou wast called to reprove! E. pleads his "jealousy for Jehovah God of hosts," and that with all his zeal he is left the sole worshipper of Jehovah, and that even his life they seek to take away. God directs him to "go forth and stand upon the mountain before the Lord," as Moses did when "the Lord passed by." There by the grand voice of nature, the strong wind rending the rocks, the earthquake, and the fire, (in none of which, though emanating from God, did He reveal Himself to E.,) and lastly by "a still small voice," God taught the impatient and desponding prophet that it is not by astounding miracles such as the fire that consumed the sacrifice, nor by the wind and earthquake wherewith God might have swept away the guilty nation, but by the still small voice of God's Spirit in the conscience, that Jehovah savingly reveals Himself, and a revival of true religion is to be expected. Those astounding phenomena prepared the way for this, God's immediate revelation to the heart. Miracles sound the great bell of nature to call attention; but the Spirit is God's voice to the soul. Sternness hardens, love alone melts. A John the Baptist, E.'s antitype, the last representative of the Sinaitic law, must be followed by the Messiah and His Spirit speaking in the winning tones of Matt. xi. 29. The still small voice constrained E. to wrap his face in his mantle; comp. Moses, Exod. iii. 6, Isa. vi. 2. A second time to the same question he gives the same reply, but in a meek spirit. Jehovah therefore cheers him amidst despondency, by giving him work still to do for His name, a sure token that He is pleased with his past work: "Go, return . . . to the wilderness of Damascus, and anoint Hazael king over Syria, Jehu . . . over Israel, and Elisha . . . prophet in thy room. Yet (adds the Lord to cure his depression by showing him his witness for God was not lost, but had strengthened in faith many a secret worshipper) I have left Me 7000 in Israel who have not bowed unto Baal," etc. Elisha he first sought out and found in Abel Meholah in the valley of the Jordan on his way northward, for spiritual companionship was his first object of yearning. Casting his mantle on him as the sign of a call, he was followed by ELISHA [see], who thenceforth became his minister, and who executed subsequently the former two commands.

Apostasy from God begets injustice towards man. Puffed up with the success of his war with Syria, and forgetting the Lord who had given him victory (1 Kings xx.), Ahab by Jezebel's wicked hardihood, after vainly trying to get from NABOTH [see] the inheritance of his fathers, had him and his sons (2 Kings ix. 26, comp. Josh. vii. 24) slain for falsely alleged blasphemy, and seized on his property as that of a criminal forfeited to the crown; the elders of Jezreel lending themselves to be Jezebel's ready instruments. With Jehu and Bidkar his retinue riding behind, he proceeded to take possession of the coveted vineyard on the following day (comp. "yesterday," emesah, "yesternight," the mock trial and murder of Naboth having taken place the day before); but, like a terrible apparition, the first person he meets there is the enemy of his wickedness, whom his conscience quails before, more than before all other foes. "Hast thou found me (comp. Num. xxxiii. 23) O mine enemy?" "I have found thee, because thou hast sold thyself (as a captive slave bound) to work evil," etc. "The dogs should lick his blood "in the place" where they licked Naboth's (fulfilled on his son Jehoram, Ahab's repentance causing judgment to be deferred); Jezebel and Ahab's posterity should be (what orientals regard with especial horror) the food of dogs and birds (1 Kings xxi. 19-24). Twenty years later Jehu remembered the very words of the curse, so terrible was the impression made by the scene, and fulfilled his part of it (2 Kings ix. 7-10, 25, 26, 33-37).

Three years later, part of the judgment foretold came to pass on Ahab, whose blood, after his fall in the battle of Ramoth Gilead, the dogs licked up whilst his chariot was being washed in the pool of Samaria. His successor Ahaziah after a two years reign, during which Moab rebelled, fell from a lattice and lay sick. Sending to consult concerning his recovery the Philistine oracle of Baalzebub at Ekron, he learnt from his messengers that a man met them saying, "Is it not because there is not a God in Israel that thou sendest to inquire of Baalzebub the god of Ekron? therefore thou shalt not come down, . . . but shalt surely die" (2 Kings i. 6). As usual, E.'s appearance was sudden and startling, and he stands forth as vindicating Jehovah's honour before the elect nation. Ahaziah, with his mother's idol-mad vindictiveness, sent a captain with fifty to arrest this "lord of hair" (Heb. 2 Kings i. 8) whom he at once guessed to be E. Emerging from some recess of Carmel and taking his seat on "the hill" or "mount" (Heb.), he thence met the captain's demand, "Man of God, the king saith, come down," with "If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty." So it came to pass. Again the same occurred. The third, however, escaped by begging him to hold his life precious and to spare him. E. went down, under God's promised protection, and spoke the same message of death to the king in person as he had previously spoken to the king's messenger. This was his last interview with the house of Ahab, and his last witness against Baal worship.

The severity of the judgment by fire is due to the greatness of the guilt of the Israelite king and his minions, who strove against God Himself in the person of His prophet, and hardened themselves in idolatry, which was high treason against God and incurred the penalty of death under the theocracy. It is true the Lord Jesus reproved the fiery zeal of James and John, "the sons of thunder," as ignorant of the true spirit of His disciples, when they wished like Elias to call down fire to consume the Samaritans who would not receive Him. But the cases are distinct. He was not yet revealed to the half heathen Samaritans as clearly as Jehovah had been through E. to Israel, the elect nation. His life was not sought by the Samaritans as E.'s was by Israel's king and his minions. Moreover, the temporal penalties of the theocracy, ordained by God for the time, were in our Lord's days giving place to the antitypes which are abiding.

Shortly afterwards E. wrote a letter (nikhtab) which came subsequently "to Joram," son of the pious Jehoshaphat: "Thus saith the Lord God of David thy father [of whom thou art proving thyself so unworthy a successor], because thou hast not walked in the ways of Jehoshaphat thy father, nor . . . of Asa, king of Judah, but hast walked in the way of the kings of Israel, and hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a whoring like . . . the house of Ahab, and hast slain [E. writes foreseeing the murder, for his translation was before Jehoshaphat's death, 2 Kings iii. 11, after which was the murder] the brethren of thy father's house which were better than thyself, behold with a great plague will the Lord smite thy people, thy children, thy wives, and all thy goods, and thou shalt have great sickness . . . until thy bowels fall out" (2 Chron. xxi.). Already in E.'s lifetime Joram had begun to reign jointly with his father Jehoshaphat (2 Kings viii. 16, 18) and had betrayed his evil spirit which was fostered by Athaliah his wife, Ahab's daughter. Jehoshaphat in his lifetime, with worldly prudence, whilst giving the throne to Joram, gave Joram's brethren "great gifts and fenced cities." But E. discerned in Joram the covetous and murderous spirit which would frustrate all Jehoshaphat's forethought, the fatal result of the latter's carnal policy in forming marriage alliance with wicked Ahab. Therefore, as E. had committed to Elisha the duty laid on himself by God of foretelling to Hazael his elevation to the Syrian throne (Elisha being E. revived in spirit), so E. committed to him the writing which would come after E.'s translation to Joram with all the solemnity of a message from E. in the unseen world to condemn the murder when perpetrated which E. foresaw he would perpetrate. The style is peculiarly E.'s, and distinct from the narrative context. So Isaiah foretold concerning Cyrus' future kingdom (Isa. xlv., xlv.); and Ahijah concerning Josiah (1 Kings xiii. 2). Fairbairn makes it be called "a letter from Elijah" because he was ideal head of the school of prophecy from which it emanated, and his spirit still rested upon Elisha. But the language, 2 Chron. xxi. 12, implies in some stricter sense it was E.'s writing delivered by Elisha, his successor, to Joram. But see Lord A. C. Hervey's view [JEHOIRAM].

E.'s ministry was now drawing to its close. Symptoms appear of his work beginning to act on the nation, in the increased boldness of other prophets to the king's face, besides E. himself; e.g. 1 Kings xx. 35, 36; again, Micah, chap. xxii. Hence we find not less than fifty called "sons of strength" at E.'s translation (2 Kings ii. 3, 7); and these settled at Bethel, one of the two head quarters of idolatry. To these sons of the prophets, as well as to Elisha, it was revealed that their master E. was about to be caught up from them. E. sought that privacy which he felt most suitable to the coming solemn scene; but Elisha would not leave him. To Gilgal (the one on the W. border of the Ephraimite hills), Bethel, and Jericho successively, by the Lord's mission, E. went, giving probably parting counsels to the prophets' schools in those places. Finally, after parting asunder the Jordan with his mantle, he gave Elisha leave to ask what he would, and having promised that he should have a double portion of E.'s spirit, a chariot and horses of fire parted the two, and E. went up by a whirlwind into heaven. The "hardness" of Elisha's request, and its granting being dependent on his seeing E. ascend, imply that it is to be got from God not (Matt. xix. 26) man; that therefore he must look up to Him who was about to translate E., not to E. himself. The "double portion" is not "double" what E. had, for Elisha had not that; but, as the firstborn son and heir received two portions, and the other children but one, of the father's goods (Deut. xxi. 17), so Elisha, as E.'s adopted son, begs a preeminent portion of E.'s spirit, of which all the other "sons of the prophets" should have their share (Grotius); comp. ver. 15. But the comparison in the context is not with other prophets but with E. Double, lit. "a month of two," is probably used generally for the spirit in large or increased measure, the spirit of prophecy and of miracles. Elisha performed double as many miracles, viz. 16 as compared with E.'s eight; and the miracles of a like kind to E.'s; comp. 1 Kings xvii. 17-24 with 2 Kings iv. 29-37, 1 Kings xvii. 16 with 2 Kings iv. 1-7. Elisha, when getting his choice, asked not for gains, honours, or pleasures, but for spiritual gifts, with a view, not to his own glory, but to the glory of God and the edification of the church. Seeing that the national evils were so crying, he sought the only remedy, an increased measure of the Spirit, whose power had already begun somewhat to improve the state of the nation. As E.'s ascension was the forerunner of Elisha's possessing an influence such as E. had not, Elisha becoming the honoured adviser of kings whereas E. had been their terror, Elisha on his deathbed being recognised as "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof" by king Joash just as E. had been by Elisha, so Christ's ascension was the means of obtaining for the church the Holy Spirit in full measure, whereby more souls were gathered in than by Jesus' bodily presence (John xvi. 6-13, Eph. iv. 8-14).

When the O. T. canon was being closed, Malachi, its last prophet, threw a ray over the dark period of 400 years that intervened till the N. T. return of revelation, by announcing, "Behold I will send you E. the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." Our Lord declares that John the Baptist was the Elias to come (Matt. xi. 14, xvii. 12). This is explained in Luke i. 11, 17, which refers to Mal. iv. 5, 6; "he shall go before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers (Jacob, Levi, Moses, E., Mal. i. 2, ii. 4, 6, iii. 3, iv. 4, who had been alienated as it were by their children's apostasy) to the children (made penitent through John's ministry), and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." John was an E., but not the E., whence to the query (John i. 21), "Art thou Elias?" he answered, "I am not." "Art thou that prophet?" "No." E. is called by Malachi "the prophet," not the Tishbite, as he here represents the whole series of prophets culminating in the greatest, John (though he performed no miracles as E.). The Jews always understood a literal E., and said, "Messiah must be anointed by E." As there is a second consummating advent of Messiah, so also of His forerunner (possibly in person as at the transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 3, even after which He said (ver. 11), "Elias shall first come and restore all things," viz. at "the times of restitution of all things"), possibly a prophet clothed with E.'s miraculous power of inflicting judgments, which John had not. The miracles foretold of the two witnesses (Rev. xi. 4, 5, "fire out of their mouth," i.e. at their word; 1 Kings xvii. 1; 2 Kings i. 10; "power to shut heaven that it rain not," Jas. v. 17, Luke iv. 25; and "to turn the waters to blood and smite the earth with all plagues") are the very ones characteristic of Moses and E. The forerunning "the great and dreadful day of Jehovah" can only exhaustively refer to Messiah's second coming, preceded by a faller manifestation of E. than that of John before Messiah's first coming. Moses and E.'s appearance at the transfiguration in glorified bodies is a sample of the coming transfiguration, (Moses, buried by the Lord, of the sleeping saints; and E., translated without death, of living saints) and of their reign with Christ over the earth in glorified bodies, as Peter, James, and John are a sample of the nations in the flesh about to be reigned over. The subject of Moses' and E.'s discourse with Jesus on the mount was His decease, for this is the grand centre to which the law as represented by Moses, and the prophets represented by E., converge. E.'s translation was God's witness for His faithful servant to the apostate postdiluvian world, as Enoch's to the antediluvian, against their unbelief. God's voice, "This is My beloved Son, hear Him," attests that the servants must bow to the Son for whose coming they prepared the way (comp. Rev. xix. 10 end). Rome's barefooted Carmelites have many absurd traditions as to the derivation of their order from E. himself, and as to the "cloud out of the sea" typifying the Virgin Mary, to whom a chapel is dedicated on the imaginary site of E.'s seeing the cloud!

Elika. 2 Sam. xxiii. 25.

Elim = strong trees. Probably the lovely valley of Gharandel. In the rainy season a torrent flows through to the Red Sea. The water is in most seasons good, and even the best on the journey from Cairo to Sinai. Israel found at E. 12 wells (i.e. natural springs) and 70 palm-trees, and encamped by the waters; their stage next after Marah, now Hawara. A few palms still remain, dwarfs and trunkless, gnarled tamarisks and acacias, the sole relics of the grove that once flourished on this oasis of the W. side of the peninsula. Israel stayed here a long time; for they did not reach the wilderness till two and a half months after leaving Snez, finding water and pasture abundant in the intermediate district. Laborde makes wady Useit to be E., the second wady which Israel going from N.W. to S.E. along the coast would reach after Gharandel. Lepsius makes the fourth wady, reached by Israel, viz. wady Shubeikeh, in its lower part Taiyibeh, to be E. (Exod. xv. 27, Num. xxxiii. 9).

Elimelech = my God is king. Of the family of Hezron of Judah, kinsman of Boaz, residing in Bethlehem Ephratah under the judges. In a famine he and his wife Naomi, with their two sons, went to Moab [see Boaz, Ruth], where he and his sons died, and whence NAOMI [see] returned a childless widow with Ruth.

Elioenai = towards Jehovah my eyes are turned. 1. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 2. 1 Chron. iv. 36. 3. 1 Chron. xvi. 3. 4. In the seventh generation from Zerubbabel, contemporary with Alexander the Great, but the Heb. (1 Chron. iii. 23, 24) is probably an error, and Sheumai, grandfather of E. and father of Neariah, E.'s father, is probably Shimai, Zerubbabel's brother. 5. Ezra x. 22; comp. Neh. xii. 41. 6. Ezra x. 27; Neh. vii. 13, x. 14.

Eliphal. 1 Chron. xi. 35, ELIPHELET 2 Sam. xxiii.

Eliphalet. Last of David's thirteen sons after his settlement at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16, 1 Chron. xiv. 5-7, ELIPHELET 1 Chron. iii. 8 = ELPALET, PHALTEL.

Eliphaz = God for strength. 1. Esau's son by Adah; Teman's father (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 1 Chron. i. 35, 36). 2. First of Job's three friends, the "Temanite," sprung from the former E. Teman answers to Edom (Jer. xlix. 20), part of Arabia Petraea. Calmer and less vehement against Job than Bildad and Zophar, but condemned at the end for the same error, in spite of the facts of daily life, that God's retributions here are complete, and that severe trial proved Job's past piety to be but hypocrisy. God's unapproachable majesty and parity are well set forth by him (Job iv., xv. 14-16).

Elipheleh. Porter, rather gate-keeper (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21).

Eliphelet. [See ELIPHALET.] 1. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 39. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 13. 4. 1 Chron. x. 33.

Elisabeth = Heb. ELISHEBA (Aaron's wife) = swearing by God (Exod. vi. 23). Zacharias' wife; John the Baptist's mother. Of the daughters of Aaron; akin ("consin") to the Virgin Mary (Luke i. 3, 36). The first to bless Mary as "the mother of her Lord" (40-45). Thus our Lord, though not of the priestly tribe, was akin to it; He fulfilled it, in His distinct priesthood of the Melchizedek order. Like her husband, E. was "righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless."

Elisha = God for salvation. ELISERS in N. T. Shaphat's son, of Abel Meholah = "meadow of the dance," in the Jordan valley. [See his call: ELIJAH.] He was engaged at field work, 12 yoke before him, i.e. himself with the 12th whilst the other 11 were in other parts of the field; or, as land was measured by "yokes of oxen," he had ploughed land to the extent of nearly 12 yokes, and was finishing the 12th: either view marks his being a man of substance. Hengstenberg regards the twelve as marking him the prophet of the whole covenant nation, not merely of the ten tribes. Whether formally "anointed" with oil or not, he was really anointed with the Spirit, and duly called by his predecessor to the prophetic office by Elijah's crossing over, and hastily throwing upon him the rough mantle, the token of investiture, and then going as quickly as he came. E. was one to act at once on God's first call, at all costs. So bidding farewell to father and mother (contrast Matt. viii. 21, 22: "suffer me first to go and [tend my father till his death, and then] bury my father"; and Luke ix. 61, 62, where the "bidding farewell" involved in that particular case a division of heart between home relations and Christ, xiv. 26, Matt. x. 37, Phil. iii. 13), and slaying a yoke of oxen and boiling the flesh with the wooden instruments (comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 22), a token of giving up all for the Lord's sake, he ministered to Elijah henceforth as Joshua did to Moses. His ministry is once described, "E. who poured water on the hands of Elijah." He was subordinate; so the sons of the prophets represent it: "Jehovah will take away thy master (Elijah) from thy head" (2 Kings ii. 3). Yet his ministry made an advance upon that of his master. The mission of Eli-jah, as his name implied, was to bring Israel to confess that Jehovah alone is God (E); E. further taught them, as his name implies, that Jehovah if so confessed would prove the salvation of His people. Hence E.'s work is that of quiet beneficence; Elijah's that of judicial sternness upon all rebels against Jehovah. Contrast 1 Kings xviii. 40 with 2 Kings v. 18, 19. E., the healer, fitly comes after Elijah, the destroyer. The latter presents himself with the announcement, "as Jehovah God of Israel liveth . . . there shall not be dew nor rain these years"; the first miracle of the former is, "thus saith Jehovah, I have healed these waters (by casting in salt, the symbol of grace and incorruption), there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land." The large spring N.W. of the present town of Jericho is the traditional object of the cure (Jin- es-Sultan). Elijah, like a Bedouin, delighted in the desert, the heights of Carmel, and the caves of Horeb, and avoided cities. E. on the contrary frequented the haunts of civilization, Jericho (2 Kings ii. 18), Samaria (25), and Dothan (vi. 13), where he had a house with "doors" and "windows" (v. 3, 9, 24; vi. 32; xiii. 17). He wore the ordinary Israelite garment, and instead of being shunned by kings for sternness, he possessed considerable influence with the king and the "captain of the host" (iv. 13).

At times he could be as fiery in indignation against the apostate kings of Israel as was his predecessor (iii. 13, 14), but even then he yields himself to the soothing strains of a minstrel for the godly Jehoshaphat's sake, and foretells that the ditches which he directs to be made should be filled with water (the want of which was then being sorely felt), coming by the way of Edom; this took place at the S.E. end of the Dead Sea, the route of the confederates Judah, Israel, and Edom, in order to invade the rebelling Moabite king Mesha from the eastern side, since he was (according to the Moabite stone) carrying all before him in the N.W. Like Elijah, he conquered the idols on their own ground, performing without fee the cures for which Beelzebub of Ekron was sought in vain.

At Bethel, on his way from Jericho to Carmel (ii. 23), where he had been with Elijah (ver. 2), he was met by "young men" (nearim, not "little children"), idolaters or infidels, who, probably at the prompting of Baal's prophets in that stronghold of his worship, sneered at the report of Elijah's ascension: "Go up" like thy master, said they, "thou bald head" (quereach, i.e., with hair short at the back of the head, in contrast with Elijah's shaggy locks flowing over his shoulders; gibbeach is the term for bald in front). Keil understands, however, "small boys" to have mocked his natural baldness at the back of his head (not with old age, for he lived till 50 years later, xiii. 14). The God-hating spirit which prevailed at calf-worshipping Bethel betrayed itself in these boys, who insulted the prophet of Jehovah knowingly. The profanity of the parents, whose guilt the profane children filled the measure of, was punished in the latter, that the death of the sons might constrain the fathers to fear the Lord since they would not love Him, and to feel the fatal effects recoiling on themselves of instigating their children to blasphemy (Exod. xx. 5). E., not in personal revenge but as Jehovah's minister, by God's inspiration, pronounced their doom. Two Syrian she-bears (corresponding to the Arctic bear of northern Europe) "tare forty-two of them" (comp. and contrast Luke ix. 54, 55).

A widow (Obadiah's according to Josephus), when the creditor threatened to take her sons as bondmen, cried to E. for help on the ground of her deceased husband's piety. E. directed her to borrow empty vessels, and from her one remaining pot of oil to fill them all, shutting the door upon herself and her sons who brought her the vessels. Only when there was no vessel left to fill was the miraculous supply of oil stayed. A type of prayer, with "shut doors" (Matt. vi. 6), which brings down supplies of grace so long as we and ours have hearts open to receive it (Ps. lxxxi. 10, Eph. iii. 20). Only when Abraham ceased to ask did God cease to grant (Gen. xviii.).

On his way from Gilgal (not that near Jericho, but N. of Lydda, now Jil-jilieh) to Carmel, E. stayed at Shunem in Issachar, now Sulam, three miles N. of Jezreel, on the southern slopes of Jebel ed Dukhy, the little Hermon. "A great woman" (in every sense; means, largeness of heart, humility, contentment) was his hostess, and with her husband's consent provided for him a little chamber with bed, table, stool, and candlestick, so that he might in passing always "turn in thither." In reward he offered to use his interest for her with the king or the captain of the host; with true magnanimity which seeks not great things for self (Jer. xlv. 5), she replied, "I dwell among mine own people." At Gehazi's suggestion without her solicitation, E. promises from God that she should have what was the greatest joy to an Israelite wife, a son. When he was old enough to go out with his father, a sunstroke in the harvestfield caused his death. The mother, inferring from God's extraordinary and unsought gift of the child to her, that it could not be God's design to snatch him from her for ever, and remembering that Elijah had restored the widow's son at Zarephath, mounted her she-ass (hathom, esteemed swifter than the he-ass), and having left her son on the bed of the man of God, without telling her husband of the death, rode 15 miles, four hours ride, to Carmel. There E. was wont to see her regularly at his services on the "new moon and sabbath." Seeing her now approaching from a distance, E. sent Gehazi to meet her and ask, "Is it well with thee? . . . with thy husband? . . . with the child?" Her faith, hope, and resignation prompted the reply, "It is well." Gehazi, like Jesus' disciples (Matt. xv. 23, xix. 13), would have thrust her away when she clasped E.'s feet (comp. Matt. xxviii. 9, Luke vii. 38), but E. with sympathetic insight said, "Let her alone, for her soul is vexed within her, and Jehovah hath hid it from me." A word from her was enough to reveal the child's death, which with natural absence of mind amidst her grief she did not explicitly mention, "Did I desire a son from my lord?" E. sends on Gehazi with his staff; Gehazi is to salute none on the way, like Jesus' 70 sent before His face, but lays E.'s staff on the child's face without effect. [So the law could not raise the dead in sins (Rom. viii. 3, Gal. iii. 21); Jesus Himself must come to do that.] E., entering the room, shuts to the door (Matt. vi. 6), and there stretching himself twice on the child, mouth to mouth, eyes to eyes, and hands to hands (comp. Acts xx. 10; antitypically the dead sinner must come into contact with the living Jesus, 1 John i.), after Elijah's pattern, and praying to Jehovah, proved the omnipotence of prayer to quicken the dead; then he delivered the resuscitated son to the happy mother.

In a time of dearth (2 Kings iv. 38), perhaps the same as that in viii. 1, 2, one of the sons of the prophets brought in a lap full of gourds or wild cucumbers, off a plant like a wild vine, the only food to be had; the effect in eating was such that one exclaimed, "There is death in the pot." E. counteracted the effect by casting in meal. Next, a man of Baal Shalisha brings firstfruits (paid to the prophets in the absence of the lawful priests: Num. xviii. 8, 12, Deut. xviii. 3, 4), viz. 20 small loaves of new barley, and full green ears of corn roasted, esteemed a delicacy (Lev. ii. 14, xxi. 14), in his garment (marg.)

or lag. In reply to his servitor's unbelieving objection, "What, should I set this before an hundred men?" E. replied, "Give the people . . . for thus saith Jehovah, They shall eat, and leave thereof"; a forerunner of Christ's miracle of feeding more men with fewer loaves, preceded by like want of faith on the disciples' part (Luke ix. 13-17, John vi. 9-13), and followed by a like leaving of abundance, after the multitude were fed.

Naaman's cure follows. His leprosy was of the white kind, the most malignant (2 Kings v. 27). In Syria it did not, as in Israel, exclude from intercourse; and Naaman was "great" in the presence of his master, and honoured as "a mighty man in valour," because of being Jehovah's instrument in giving Syria victory. But withal (as all human greatness has some drawback) he was a leper. A "little maid" of Israel, carried captive to Syria in a foray, and brought to wait on Naaman's wife (so marvellously does God's providence overrule evil to good, and make humble and small agents effect great good) was the honoured instrument of informing Naaman of the prophet of God. A lesson to us that none should plead (Matt. xxv. 24-30) inability to serve God and man in some form or another. Benhadad, with oriental absolutism, wrote as though the Israelite king could at will (comp. Matt. viii. 9) command E.'s services. At the same time he sent much gold, silver, and the rich raiments (lebush, robe of ceremony) of Damascus; as though "God's gift may be purchased with money" (Acts viii. 20). Joram showed no less want of faith than Benhadad showed want of religious knowledge. Had he believed as did the little maid his former subject, he would have felt that, though he was "not God to kill and to make alive," yet there was in the midst of the people one by whom God had both killed and made alive (Deut. xxxii. 39). E. rectifies his error, sending a dignified message of reproof to the king, and desiring him to let Naaman come, and he should know "there is a prophet in Israel." Naaman came with horses and chariots, not yet perceiving that true greatness lies not in earthly pomp and wealth (2 Kings v. 1, 9, 11). E., to teach him humility as the first step to any favour from God, sent a messenger, instead of coming in person to the door: "Go, wash in Jordan seven times." But, like men offended at the simplicity of the gospel message of salvation, Naaman having expected a more ceremonial mode of cure, and despising Jordan in comparison with the magnificent waters of his own Damascus, went off in a rage. His slaves, however, suggested the reasonableness of obeying so easy a command, since had it been a "great" one he would have complied. The mode of cure was wisely designed to teach him to unlearn his false ideas of greatness. He dipped seven times as he was told, "and his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child"; typifying the spiritual new birth through washing in the "fountain opened for uncleanness" (Job xxxii. 25, Zech. xiii. 1, John iii. 5). E. by refusing his presents shows that the minister of God is not influenced by filthy lucre (1 Tim. iii. 3), as Naaman's master had supposed (2 Kings v. 5, comp. Gen. xiv. 23). Naaman desires to take away two mules burden of earth, wherewith to make an altar to Jehovah of the holy land, a sensible memorial to remind him perpetually in his heathen country of Jehovah's past favour bestowed on him in Israel (comp. Josh. iv. 20, 21, and the medieval campo santos). He further asked God's pardon if, when in attendance on the Syrian king, he bowed in Rimmon's temple as a mark of respect to his master's religious feeling, not to the idol. E., without sanctioning this compromise, but tacitly leaving his religious convictions to expand gradually, and in due time to cast off the remains of idolatry still cleaving to him, bade him farewell with the customary "Go in peace." So the Lord Jesus "spoke the word as they were able to hear it" (Mark iv. 33, comp. viii. 23-25; John xvi. 12). Nothing is precipitately forced; principles planted in germ are left to their own silent development in due course.

Gebazi's covetousness stands in sad contrast to E.'s disinterestedness. The man of God's servant is as faithless as the heathen Naaman's servants were faithful; the highly privileged often fall far below the practice of those with scarcely any spiritual privileges whatever. He even makes it a merit not to "spare" a heathen, "this Syrian," and dares to invoke God: "my master hath spared this Syrian . . . but, as Jehovah liveth, I will take somewhat of him." By lying he gains two talents and two changes of raiment from Naaman; but lying is of no avail before E.: "went not my heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee? is it a time to receive money?" etc.; comp. 1 Pet. iv. 3. If Gebazi must have Naaman's money he shall have also Naaman's leprosy, and that for ever. In this miracle too E. foreran the Lord Jesus, the cure of leprosy being exclusively God's work. This must have been at least seven years after raising the Shunammite's son (2 Kings viii. 1-4).

During E.'s residence at Jericho, the numbers of the sons of the prophets increasing, the place became "too strait" for them. So they removed to the Jordan, and there felled the trees densely growing on its banks. The iron axe head, a borrowed one, fell into the water. By a stick cast in, E. raised the iron to swim. God teaches His children to trust Him in small as in greater difficulties. He who numbers our very hairs regards nothing as too small to be brought under His notice; "God can as easily make our hard, heavy hearts, sunk down in the world's mud, to float upon life's stream and see heaven again" (Traupp).

Benhadad, whilst E. resided at Dothan, half way between Samaria and Jezreel, tried to surprise Israel from different points, but was foiled by E. warning the Israelite king, "beware that thou pass not such a place." Benhadad suspecting treachery was informed (probably by one who had witnessed E.'s cure of Naaman), "the prophet in Israel telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber" (2 Kings vi. 12); comp. Christ's ministers, Luke xii. 3. The Syrian king therefore sent horses and chariots to compass Dothan by night. E.'s ministering servant (not Gebazi) rising early was terrified at the sight; "alas, my master! how shall we do?" E. replies, "they that be with us are more than they with him" (2 Chron. xxxii. 7, Ps. lv. 18, Rom. viii. 31), and prays, "Lord, open his eyes"; then he saw "the mountain full of horses and chariots of fire round about E." (Ps. xxxiv. 7, Zech. ix. 8.) Thus the same heavenly retinue attended E. as his master (2 Kings ii. 11). At E.'s prayer the investing host was smitten with blindness (mental, Keil, Gen. xix. 11), and E. went out to meet them as they came down from their encampment on the hill E. of Dothan, and led them into Samaria. There Jehovah opened their eyes; and when the king of Israel would have smitten them, E. on the contrary caused him to "prepare great provision for them, and send them away." Comp. Rom. xii. 20.

Untaught by this lesson, Benhadad, in disregard of gratitude and prudence, tried, instead of the previous marauding forays, a regular siege of Samaria. Israel was reduced to the last extremities of famine, unparalleled till the Roman siege of Jerusalem, a woman eating her own son, fulfilling the curse (Lev. xxvi. 29, Deut. xxviii. 53-57). Joram, in language identical with his mother Jezebel's threat against Elijah (1 Kings xix. 2, 2 Kings vi. 31), makes E. the scapegoat of the national calamity, as though his late act in leading the blinded Syrians to Samaria and glorifying Jehovah above Baal were the cause, or suspecting it was by E.'s word of prayer, as it was by Elijah's formerly (1 Kings xvii.), that the famine came [see another view, JERONAM]: "God do so and more also to me, if the head of E. shall stand on him this day." Seeing the executioner's approach E. said to the elders sitting with him to receive consolation and counsel, "this son of a murderer (i.e. of Ahab and Jezebel, 1 Kings xviii. 4, xxi.) hath sent to take away my head"; "hold the messenger fast at the door," "his master's feet [are] behind him," viz. hastening to revoke his hasty order for E.'s execution. "Behold," said the king, "this evil is of Jehovah; what, should I wait for Jehovah any longer?" (as thou exhortest me, Ps. xxvii. 14.) Comp. Mal. iii. 14, Prov. xix. 3. E. replies that as "this evil (the famine) is of Jehovah," so the suddenness of its removal by this morrow at "the word of Jehovah" would prove it not to be futile, as Joram said, to "wait for Jehovah." The Lord will not allow Joram's perversity to stop the current of Divine mercy. A lord on whose hand the king leaned answered that this could only be "if Jehovah would make windows in heaven." His sentence was according to his unbelief; "thou shalt see it . . . but shalt not eat thereof." Tantalus like, his seeing should only aggravate the bitterness of his exclusion from the blessing. A panic at a fancied sound of Hittite and Egyptian foes, by God's appointment, caused the Syrians to leave their camp and all its contents, and flee for their life. Four lepers discovered the fact, and at first hid their spoil (Matt. xiii. 44, xiv. 25); afterwards fearing mischief from selfishness (Prov. xi. 24), they held their peace no longer, but, feeling it a day of good tidings, told it to the king's household. Comp. spiritually as to the gospel, Isa. lii. 7, lxii. 6, 7; Matt. xxviii. 19; Rom. xiii. 12. The thronging crowd trode down the unbelieving lord who had charge of the gate.

By E.'s advice the Shunammite woman had gone to sojourn in the corn-growing seacoast plain of the Philistines during the seven years famine already alluded to (2 Kings iv. 38). In her absence her house and field had been appropriated, and she on her return appealed with loud cry to the king. He at the very time, by God's providence, had been inquiring from Gehazi (long before his leprosy, 2 Kings v. viii., a proof that the incidents of E.'s life are not recorded in chronological sequence, but in their spiritual connection) concerning E.'s miracles, and was hearing of her son's resurrection when she herself appeared. Her land, and all she had lost, were restored.

E., when Joram and Israel failed to be reformed by God's mercies, proceeded to Damascus to execute Elijah's commission (1 Kings xix. 15, 16). Benhadad respectfully inquired by Hazael, who brought a kingly present, 40 camels laden with every good thing of Damascus, "thy son (regarding E. as a father and lord) saith, Shall I recover of this disease?" "Thou mayest certainly (i.e. in the natural course): howbeit Jehovah showed me he shall surely die." E., intensely gazing at Hazael's countenance, discerned his unscrupulous cruelty, and wept at the thought of the evil he would do to Israel. Hazael in the common view repudiated the possibility of being capable of such atrocities, "is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?" But the Heb. requires "what" to be the predicate, and "the dog" connected with "thy servant" the subject. "What is thy servant (the dog as he is) that he should do this great thing?" Not the atrocity, but the greatness of it, is what startles him as something beyond his ability to accomplish, "dog (i.e. low, not cruel) as he is." "Dog" is the eastern phrase for meanness, not cruelty. Hazael, in the common view, murdered Benhadad with a wet cloth, whether "the bath mattress" (Ewald) or the thick woollen quilt or mosquito net. Others, from "Hazael" being named at the end of 2 Kings viii. 15 as if distinct from the previous "he," think Benhadad placed it wet on himself to cool the fever, and died of the sudden chill.

E. next proceeded to Ramoth Gilead in the hills east of Jordan, which Hazael had tried to occupy (viii. 28). Joram was wounded, but the fortress still resisted Syria. There E. anointed Jehu, by the hand of one of the children of the prophets, to take vengeance on Ahab's guilty seed, having been witness of that monarch's wicked seizure of Naboth's vineyard and of Elijah's awful sentence on him (2 Kings ix. 26).

E.'s last recorded act was when Jehu's grandson, Joash, wept over his death-bed in the words which E. had used of the departing Elijah: "my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," i.e., in losing these Israel loses its main defence. E., putting his hands on the king's (for God's hand must strengthen ours if we are to prosper, Gen. xlii. 24), bade Joash shoot towards the hostile land, saying, "the arrow of Jehovah's deliverance . . . thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek." Joash's half-heartedness deprived him of complete triumph; for when told to smite the ground, he smote but thrice, instead of five or six times. Spiritually, if we fainted not in shooting the arrow of prayer (Ps. v. 3), we should smite down our spiritual foes more completely (Isa. xliii. 22).

Even when dead and buried, E.'s body was made by God the means of revivifying a dead body cast hastily sideways into his sepulchral cell, upon a sudden inroad of the Moabite hands; a type of the vivifying power of Christ's dead body (Isa. xxvi. 19). Other antitypical resemblances are (1) Christ's solemn inauguration at the Jordan. (2) His dividing death's flood for us: Isa. li. 15. (3) By his "covenant of salt" healing the "naught water" and "barren ground" of the condemning law and of afflictive chastisements: xxxv. 1, 6. (4) His making the barren church mother of spiritual children: lv. 1. (5) Multiplying the oil of grace: lxi. 3. (6) Reviving the spiritually and the naturally dead: John v. 25-29. (7) Curing those bodily and those spiritually lepers. (8) Feeding multitudes with bread for the body, and the bread of life for the soul. (9) Being the church's "chariots and horsemen," "always causing us to triumph": 2 Cor. ii. 14. (10) Setting the captives free: Isa. lxi. 1. (11) Inflicting judgments on mockers, Acts xiii. 41; and on lucre-loving Gehazi-like ministers, as Judas; giving up to judicial blindness the wilfully blind, John ix. 39-41; and to seeing without tasting bliss those who disbelieve the gospel promise of the heavenly feast; so the rich man in hell saw Lazarus afar off in Abraham's bosom, an impassable gulf excluding himself (Luke xvi. 23-26). The gentle features of his character attracted the poor and the simple to him in their troubles, whereas sternness characterized Elijah. In Herod and Herodias Ahab and Jezebel are reproduced, as in John the Baptist Elijah is reproduced; as Elijah, the representative of the law, foreruns the gentler Elisha, so John the greatest prophet of the law foreruns Jesus the gracious Saviour.

Elishah. Javau's eldest son (Gen. x. 45). Ezek. xxvii. 7: "purple from the isles of Elishah." As Javau represents the Ionian Greeks; so E. the Æolians, whose favourite resort was to maritime situations, in Greece, Thessaly, and Asia Minor, and Lesbos and Tenedos. Hellas (Greece) and Elis in the Peloponnese are kindred names.

Elishama. 1. Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, x. 22; 1 Chron. vii. 26, 27. 2. 2 Sam. v. 15, 16; 1 Chron. iii. 6, 8, xiv. 7. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 41. According to tradition, father of Nehemiah and grandfather of Ishmael, "of the seed royal" at the captivity (2 Kings xxv. 25, Jer. xlii. 1). 4. Jer. xxxvi. 12, 20, 21. 5. 2 Chron. xvii. 8.

Elishaphat. Son of Ziehi, whom Jehoiada employed to assemble the Levites to Jerusalem to restore Joash to the throne (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

Elisheba. Amminadab's daughter; sister of Nahshon, captain of Judah (Num. ii. 3). By marrying Aaron (Exod. vi. 25) she connected the royal and priestly tribes.

Elishua = ELISHAMA.

Eliud = God of the Jews. Matt. i. 15.

Elizaphan. 1. Num. iii. 30; his descendants took a lead in religion under David and Hezekiah (1 Chron. xv. 8, 2 Chron. xxiv. 13). 2. Prince of Zebulun, appointed by Moses to take part in apportioning Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 25).

Elizur. Num. i. 5, ii. 10.

Elkanah. 1. Son of Korah, son of Izhar, son of Kohath, son of Levi (Exod. vi. 24); comp. 1 Chron. vi. 22, 23, where an Elkanah is mentioned, grandson of Korah. "The children of Korah died not" when he was consumed (Num. xxvi. 11). 2. A descendant of the previous E., in the line of Ahimoth or Mahath (1 Chron. vi. 26, 35). 3. Another Kohathite in Heiman's line, father of Samuel by Hannah (1 Chron. vi. 27, 34; 1 Sam. i. ii.). Lived at Ramathaim Zophim, or Ramah, in mount Ephraim. Piously repaired yearly to Shiloh to sacrifice at the tabernacle. His costly offering of three bullocks at Samuel's dedication, and the "portions" of offerings which he gave to his family, indicate wealth. David first established the Levitical and priestly courses in the temple; hence E. does not appear to have performed any sacred function as a Levite. 4. A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 16). 5. A Korhite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6, comp. xv. 23). 6. King Abaz' officer next to himself, slain by Ziehi, a mighty Ephraimite, at Pekah's invasion (2 Chron. xxviii. 7).

Elkosh. Nahum's birthplace. Elkosi, a village of Galilee, pointed out to Jerome, with traces of ancient buildings. The Elkosh E. of Tigris, and N. of Mosul, believed by Jewish pilgrims to be Nahum's birthplace and burial place, is less probable, as his prophecies show only a general acquaintance with Assyria but a particular knowledge of Palestine (Nab. i. 4, ii. 4, 6, 3).

Ellasar. The invader Arioeh's kingdom (Gen. xiv. 1). The Chaldean Larsa, Gr. Larissa, a town of lower Babylon, half way between Ur (Mugher) and Erech (Warka) on the left bank of the Euphrates. Now Senkereh. The inscriptions prove it a primitive capital, probably older than Babylon.

Elmodam or Almodad. Luke iii. 28; Gen. x. 26.

Elnaam. 1 Chron. xi. 46.

Elmathan: of Jerusalem. Jehoia-kim's maternal grandfather (2 Kings xiv. 8). Son of Achbor. Jehoia-kim's ready tool for evil, in fetching the prophet Urijah out of Egypt to be killed (Jer. xlii. 22, 23); one of the king's council when Jeremiah's roll was burned (xxvi. 12, 25); he interceded with the king not to burn it. Comp. for three others Ezra vii. 16.

Elon. 1. A Hittite, whose daughter Esau married (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 2). [See BASHEMAT.] 2. xli. 14. 3. The judge who judged Israel ten years; buried in Ajalon (= Elon) in Zebulun (Jud. xii. 11, 12).

Elon beth Hanan: oak of the house of grace. A commissariat district of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 9).

Elpaal. A Benjamite. Hushim's son; Ahitub's brother. His descendants lived near Lod or Lydda, on the Benjamite hills bordering on Dan, at Ajalon (Falo). Hushim was the name of a Danite family, so that the two tribes must have intermarried (1 Chron. viii. 11-18).

Eltekeh. A city on Dan's border, allotted to the Kohathites (Josh. xix. 44, xxi. 23).

Eltekon. A town in Judah's mountains (Josh. xv. 59).

Eltolad. A city in S. Judah allotted to Simeon (Josh. xv. 39, xix. 4; 1 Chron. iv. 29 TOLAD).

Eluzai. 1 Chron. xii. 5.

Elymas. Arabic (alim, "wise," akin to "ulema") for Barjesus, the Jew sorcerer associated with Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus at Paul's visit (Acts xiii. 6, etc.). Struck blind for "seeking to turn away the deputy (proconsul) from the faith." As he opposed the gospel light, in significant retribution he lost the natural light. Contrast Paul's simultaneously receiving sight and the Holy Ghost (ix. 17). As belief in religion declined under the Roman empire, belief in eastern magic increased.

Elzabad. 1. 1 Chron. xii. 8. 2. 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

Elzaphan. Exod. vi. 22. Moses' cousin. Assisted Mithael his brother in carrying Nadab and Abihu, in their priestly coats, out of the camp (Lev. x. 1; comp. Acts v. 6, 9).

Embalm. "Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father (Jacob). And 40 days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed; and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days." Joseph himself also at death was embalmed, "and was put in a coffin in Egypt" (Gen. i. 2, 3, 25, 26). The rest of Jacob's twelve sons were probably also embalmed, for their bodies "were carried over into Sychem and had in the sepulchre" there (Acts vi. 16). Herodotus (iii. 1, 129) records that "every distinct distemper in Egypt had its own physician who confined himself to the study of it alone, so that all Egypt was crowded with physicians." This accounts for Joseph having in his retinue a number of physicians. Embalmers were usually a distinct class; but Jacob not being an Egyptian, his body was not embalmed by the ordinary embalmers. Diodorus long subsequently mentions 30 days as the time of embalming, and the mourning for a king 72 days. This nearly agrees with the 40 and 70 of Genesis; but of course the processes would vary between the early age of Genesis and the later ages of Herodotus and Diodorus. Herodotus mentions the custom of "covering the body in natron (salt) 70 days." The dearest process (that used in Jacob's and Joseph's case) cost a silver talent (£250). The brain and the intestines, with a probe and a sharp Ethiopian black flint or agate to make an incision in the side, were extracted, and spices, myrrh, and cassia introduced; the body, washed and wrapped in fine linen which was plastered inside with gum, was then laid in a mummy case shaped as a man, generally of sycamore, as is that of king Mycerinus found in the third pyramid of Memphis. A second process with oil of cedar, costing £60, and a third cheaper process with syrmma, were used for the less wealthy. The dearest process was said by the Egyptian priests to belong to Osiris, the judge of the dead, who however was not to be named. The mummy was placed erect against the sepulchral wall. Chemical analysis has detected three modes. 1. With asphaltum, funeral gum. 2. With asphaltum and liquor from cedar. 3. With this mixture and resinous aromatics. Asa was "laid in the bed filled with sweet odours and divers spices prepared by the apothecaries' art" (2 Chron. xvi. 14). The Lord's body was by Nicodemus wrapped in "a mixture of myrrh and aloes an hundred pounds weight, . . . as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (John xix. 39, 40). But this is quite distinct from embalming. The Egyptian belief in the transmigration of souls tended to perpetuate the practice, the body being embalmed so as to be ready to receive the soul again when the appointed cycle of thousands of years should elapse. Their burying in the sand impregnated with salts and natron, which preserved the body, first suggested the process. Drugs and bitumen were not generally used before the 18th dynasty.

Embroider: shabatz (Exod. xxviii. 39). Rather "weave in diaper work," the tissue of threads of one colour being diapered in checkers (tessellated cavities) or small figures; but "the girdle of needlework" ("work of the embroiderer"). The embroiderer worked with a needle his design in stitches of coloured thread, or in coloured pieces of cloth sewn upon the groundwork. In xxi. 1, "the tabernacle curtains with cherubims of cunning work," rather "of the work of the skilled weaver"; chosheeb, one who thinks and counts. The figures of cherubim were to be worked in the loom as in tapestry work, but the hangings or entrance curtains for the tent were to be embroidered with the needle (ver. 36), "wrought with needlework"; roqueem, "the needlerworker," "the work of the embroiderer" (xxxv. 35, xxxviii. 23). Smith's Bible Dict. makes the rikmah woven texture without gold thread, and therefore without figures; chosheeb that with gold thread, which was employed to delineate figures as the cherubim; chosheeb involving the idea of designing patterns (xxvii. 16, xxxvi. 8, 35, 37, xxxviii. 18, xxxix. 2, 5, 8, 29). He makes needlework embroidery a later invention of Phrygia (so Pliny, viii. 48). But LXX. favour A.V. Pliny's authority weighs nothing against many proofs that embroidery was known in Egypt and there learned by many Israelites (Exod. xxxv. 30-35, 1 Chron. iv. 21). Babylon was early famed for garments of varied colour attracting the eye, such as Achan coveted (Josh. vii. 21). In Egypt the very sails were so ornamented (Wilkinson, iii. 210; Ezek. xxvii. 7, 23, 24). Assyria too was famed for such embroidery.

Emerald. First in the second row on the highpriest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 18). Nopheh, "the glowing stone," the carbuncle according to Kalisch (xxxix. 11). Tyre imported it from Syria (Ezek. xxvii. 16). One of New Jerusalem's foundations (Rev. xxi. 19). Image of the rainbow round the throne (ix. 3).

Emerods=hemorrhoids, or bleeding tumours in the intestinal rectum, frequent in Syria still, owing to want of exercise producing constipation. The images made of them mean images of the part affected (1 Sam. v. 6-12, vi. 4-11; Dent. xxviii. 27).

Emim. A giant warlike race, which occupied the region E. of the Dead Sea, in which the Moabites succeeded them (Gen. xiv. 5, Dent. ii. 10). Perhaps akin to "Amu" the Egyptian word in the hieroglyphics for nomad Semites. The Heb. means "terrible ones." The Rephaim were on the N.E. of Jordan, the Zuzim next, then the Emim, then the Horim on the S.E.; all gigantic.

Emmaus. The village (60 stadia or furlongs, i.e. seven and a half miles, from Jerusalem) to which two disciples were walking on the day of Jesus' resurrection when He joined them unrecognised. The Gr. Church place it at Kuriet el Enab (Abu Ghosh). The old name now reappears in Amwas. But Conder (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1876, p. 173) identifies it with Khamasa (a form of the Heb. Ham-math), a ruin close to the modern village wady Fikín, about eight miles from Jerusalem, near the Roman road from Jerusalem, passing Solomon's pools, to Beit Jibrin.

Enam. A city of the shephelah or lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 34). In Gen. xxxviii. 14, 21, read as marg. "in the gate (phathack) of Enam," instead of "in an open place." It lay on the road from Judah's dwelling place to Timnath. Aben Ezra less probably traus. "at the breaking shall set an apparatus for striking against thy walls"; also Ezek. xxi. 22, iv. 2, karim, trans. "captains" in xxi. 22, where see marg.

Engraver. In Exod. xxxv. 35 rather "artificer" in wood, stone, or metal; so xxxviii. 23, "artificer" in weaving, etc. Bezaleel's workmanship was in gold, silver, brass, stone, wood (xxxi. 4, 5). Aholiab's in embroidery and weaving. Strict engraving of stones is mentioned in Exod. xxviii. 9-21 in the case of the two onyx stones having six each of the 12 tribes' names, on the highpriest's shoulders, and the 12 breastplate stones with the 12 tribes' names engraven. Seal engraving the Israelites learned in Egypt; it existed in Mesopotamia from about 2000 B.C. The "ouches" of gold are the setting wreathed-like filagree round the stones, which were oval like the Egyptian cartouches containing hieroglyphic names. In Zech. iii. 9 "one stone . . . I will engrave the graving (lit. open the opening) thereof," i.e. I (God) will prepare for Him (Messiah) an exquisitely wrought body, a suitable temple for the Godhead (John ii. 21). He is the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" (Dan. ii. 45). Paul (Heb. x. 5) explains Ps. xl. 6, "Mine ears hast Thou opened" (graven) by "a body hast Thou prepared Me."

Enhaddah. A town on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21).

Enhakkoro = fount of him who cried. [See LEHI.] It burst out at Samson's cry, when athirst after slaying a thousand Philistines with an ass's jawbone (Jud. xv. 19, Ps. xxxiv. 6). As the rocky precipice was named Lehi, "the jawbone," so the hollow place in the rock was named Maktesh, "the tooth hollow." Samson cried to Jehovah (God of grace), and Elohim (God of nature) split the hollow place at Lehi, so that water came out of it, as at Horeb and Kadesh (Exod. xvi. 6; Num. xx. 8, 11), and the fountain was called "the fount of him who cried in Lehi."

En-hazor = fount of the village. A fenced city in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 37).

Enmishpat = fount of judgment. [See KADESH.] Gen. xiv. 7.

Enoch = consecrated. 1. Cain's eldest son; and the city (probably a village of rude huts) which he built and named after him (Gen. iv. 17, 18). The similarity of names in Cain's line and Seth's line is no proof of the persons being identical, for many of the seemingly like names are from distinct roots. Moreover the fewness of names at that early time, and the relationship and occasional intercourse between the families, account for the similarity or identity of the other names. Details are given specially as to Lamech and E., marking the utter distinctness of those so named in the two lines.

2. Son of Jared; father of Methuselah. Seventh from Adam (seven indicating Divine completeness, E. typifying perfected humanity). As angels fell to the earth by transgression, so this man was raised to heaven by pleasing God (Irenaeus, iv. 15, § 2). Of Noah and E. alone it is written that they "walked with God" (Gen. v. 24, vi. 9); others "walked before God" (xvii. 1). But walking with God is a relic of the first paradise when man talked and walked with God in holy familiarity, and an anticipation of the second (Rev. xxi. 3, xxii. 3, 4). The secret spring of his walk with God was "faith"; faith was the ground of his "pleasing God" (which answers to "walking with God" in Gen. v., comp. Amos iii. 3); his "pleasing God" was the ground of his being "translated that he should not see death" (Heb. xi. 5, 6). "Translation" implies a sudden removal from mortality to immortality without death, such as shall pass over the living saints at Christ's coming (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52), of whom E. is a type. After the monotonous repetition of the same record of patriarchs, "lived" so many years, "begat sons and daughters, . . . and he died," the account of E.'s walk with God and translation without death stands forth in brighter relief. His years, 365 (the number of days in one year), were fewer than his predecessors'; but in his fewer years there was that to record which was not in their immensely lengthened years. He moreover begat sons and daughters, and yet found family ties no hindrance to his walking with God as a family man. Nay, it was not till "after he begat Methuselah" that it is written "E. walked with God." God's gift of children awakened in him a new love to God and a deeper sense of responsibility. E. in the antediluvian generation, and Elijah in the postdiluvian, witnessed before Christ in their own persons to the truth of the resurrection of the body and its existence in heaven. The fathers mostly made them the two witnesses slain by the beast, but afterwards raised to heaven (Rev. xi.). This view, if true, would be one answer to the objection against their translation, that "it is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. ix. 27), and that "death passed upon all men for that all have sinned" (Rom. v. 12). E.'s translation was an appropriate testimony to the truth he announced, "Behold the Lord cometh . . . to execute judgment" in the face of a mocking, infidel world.

Jude 14 stamps with inspired sanction the current tradition of the Jews as to E.'s prophecies. The language "E. prophesied, saying," favours tradition rather than the Book of E. being the source whence Jude drew. So Paul mentions James and James the Egyptian magicians, names drawn from tradition, not from Scripture (2 Tim. iii. 8). Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and others allude to the Book of E. Bruce the Abyssinian traveller brought home three Ethiopic copies from Alexandria, which Archbishop Lawrence translated in 1821. The Ethiopic was translated from the Greek, the Greek from the Hebrew. The Apostolic Constitutions, Origen (contra Cels.), Jerome, and Augustine deny its canonicity. It vindicates God's government of the world, spiritual and natural, recognises the Trinity, also Messiah "the Son of man" (the name "Jesus" never occurs), "the Elect One" from eternity, before whom "all kings shall fall down, and on whom they shall fix their hopes," the supreme Judge, who shall punish eternally the wicked and reward the just. If the book belong to the period just before our Lord's coming, it gives an interesting view of believing Jews' opinions concerning Messiah at that time. No sure proof establishes its existence before the Christian era.

3. Third son of Midian, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 4). 4. Reuben's eldest son, head of the family of Hanochites (Gen. xlv. 9, Num. xxvi. 5).

See HANOCH for a fourth Enoch, so the A. V. has it.

Enrimmon. Rebuilt by the Jews who returned from Babylon (Neh. xi. 29). Ain and Rimmon (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 32).

Enrogel = fountain of feet. So called because fullers trod their cloth with the feet here. On the border between Benjamin and Judah (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 16). At a lower level than Jerusalem, as "descended" implies. At the southern extremity of the valley of Hinnom near its junction with the valley of Jehoshaphat. Here Jonathan and Ahimaz remained to receive intelligence for David from within the walls (2 Sam. xvii. 17). Here also by the stone Zoheloth Adonijah held his feast preparatory to claiming the throne (1 Kings i. 9). The site is by many thought to be that now called "the well of Nehemiah," and by the natives "the well of Job," Bir-eyub. The spot is one of the most fertile round Jerusalem. The well is 125 ft. deep, and in winter usually full; it is walled up and arched above. But Bonar (Land of Promise) argues for Ain Umm el daraj, "spring of the mother of steps," viz. the steps by which the reservoir is reached; "the

FOUNTAIN OF VIRGIN.

Fountain of the Virgin," the only real spring near Jerusalem (Bir-eyub is a well, not a spring); which if not meant will be (what is not likely) unmentioned in the Bible. This spring suits better, as being nearer Jerusalem than Bir-eyub, which is too far for 2 Sam. xvii. 17, and altogether away from the direct road over Olivet to Jordan, and too much in full view of the city for Jonathan's and Ahimaz' secret purpose. Daraj and hogelaro names akin. The Fount of the Virgin is still the women's place of resort for washing and treating clothes; and it is above the king's gardens and so suitable for irrigation, which Bir-eyub is not. Ganneau found the stone of Zoheloth in the village of Siloam under the name Zehweile. This identifies E. with the Fountain of the Virgin.

Enshemesh = fount of the sun. A spring on the border between Judah and Benjamin, N. of Judah, S. of Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17). Between "the going up to Adummim" (i.e. the road leading up from the Jordan valley) and the spring of Enrogel. E. of Jerusalem and of the mount of Olives. Now Ain Haud or Chot, "the well of the apostles," a mile below Bethany on the way from Jerusalem to Jericho. The sun's rays are on it all day.

Entappuah. "Spring of apple" or "citron." [See TAPPUAH.] (Josh. xvii. 7.)

Epænetus. A Christian at Rome greeted by Paul as "my well beloved, who is the firstfruits of Achaia (Asia in the Alex., Vat., Sin. MSS.) unto Christ" (Rom. xvi. 5). "Asia" is used in the restricted sense, Mysia, Lydia, and Caria.

Epaphras. Paul's "dear fellow servant, who is for you (the Colossian Christians, i. 7) a faithful minister of Christ," perhaps implying E. was the founder of the Colossian church. In Phil. 23, "my fellow prisoner." Apprehended possibly for his zealous labours in Asia Minor; lit. "fellow captive" (sunaichnatos), taken in the Christian warfare (Phil. ii. 25), or else more probably designated so as Paul's faithful companion in imprisonment. He had been sent by the Colossians to inquire after and minister to Paul. Aristarchus is designated Paul's "fellow prisoner" in Col. iv. 10, and his "fellow labourer" in Phil. 24 (both epistles were sent at the same time). But, vice versa, E. in the Epistle to Philemon is "his fellow prisoner," and in the Epistle to the Colossians "his fellow labourer." In Col. iv. 12 Paul thus commends him, "E. who is one of you (a native or resident of Colosse), a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently (agonizomenos), striving as in the agony of a contest" for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God."

Epaphroditus: of which Epaphras is a contraction. But E. of the Philippian church is probably distinct from Epaphras of the Colossian church. Probably a presbyter at Philippi. After Tychicus and Onesimus had departed from Rome carrying the epistles to Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, Paul was cheered by the arrival of E. with the Philippian contribution. But that faithful "brother, companion in labour, and fellow soldier," being probably in delicate health in setting out, had brought on himself a dangerous sickness by the fatigues of the journey to Rome (Phil. ii. 25, 26, 30; iv. 18). On recovery he "longed" to return to his Philippian flock, and in person relieve their anxiety on his behalf. So Paul "supposed it necessary to send E." to them, being "their messenger" (apostle, i.e. one of the "apostles" or "messengers of the churches" as distinct from the twelve and Paul commissioned by Christ: Rom. xvi. 7, 2 Cor. viii. 23). Paul charges them, "Receive him in the Lord with all gladness; and hold such in reputation, because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service toward me" (their lack having been not of the will but of the opportunity, iv. 10). From the marked exhortations to "receive E. with all gladness," etc., Alford conjectures that the "heaviness" of E. was not solely owing to his strong affection, but that there must have been something behind respecting him.

Ephah. [See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.] 1. First of Midian's sons, grandson of Abraham (Gen. xxv. 4, 1 Chron. i. 33, Isa. lx. 6), "the dromedaries of E." E. of the Dead Sea. Midian abounded in camels to carry their merchandise (Jud. vi. 5); the camel is the ship of the desert. 2. A concubine of Caleb of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 46). 3. Son of Jahdai (1 Chron. ii. 17) of Judah.

Ephai=OPHAI in the Ketib or original text (Jer. xl. 8, 13). Ishmael slew these "captains of the forces" left in Judah with Gedaliah, the governor appointed by the Babylonians (xli. 3).

Epher. 1. Gen. xxv. 4, 1 Chron. i. 33. 2. 1 Chron. iv. 17. 3. E. of Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24). Akin to Ophrah, Gideon's native place in Manasseh W. of Jordan.

Ephesdamim=boundary of blood; so called from being the scene of bloody battles between Israel and the Philistines [see ELAH], i.e. the valley of the terebinth; contracted into PAS-DAMMIM (1 Chron. xi. 13). Between Shochoh and Azekah, in Judah, the Philistine encampment when David slew Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 1). The valley of Elah rises close to Hebron, and runs as a rocky ravine northward. Among the towns on its flank was KEILAH, on a steep, terraced, bare hill. Beyond this point the valley widens, and on its W. side is Adullam. A mile farther N. the valley turns W. Here crowning the left bank was Socoh. Farther W. on the valley's S. side is Shaaraim (Tel Zakariyeh). Then the valley opens into the Philistine plain, and here is situated on a white cliff Gath, commanding the valley. Thus the valley of Elah was the highway from the plain up to the hilly country, and terebinths still grow in it as of old. The site of Saul's battle with the Philistines and Goliath was at the bend of the valley, where the Jerusalem road down which probably Saul came crosses the valley, at E., between Socoh (Shuweikeh) and Azekah (El-Azek). Here still a ruin exists, having a similar meaning, Beit Fased, "house of bloodshed." Two Heb. terms occur in the narrative: emek the "broad valley"; gai the narrow deep channel in the middle of the emek, dug out by the winter torrent and separating the two hosts. The steep banks are studded with smooth white pebbles, such as David slung at Goliath.

Ephesians, Epistle to. By St. Paul, as chaps. i. 1, iii. 1 prove. So Irenæus, Har. v. 2, 3, i. 8, 5; Clemens Alex., Strom. iv. 65, Pæd. i. 8; Origen, Cels. iv. 211. Quoted by Valentinus A.D. 120, chap. iii. 14-18, as we know from Hippolytus, Refut. Hæres., p. 193. Polycarp, Epistle to Phil., xii., witnesses to its canonicity. So Tertullian, Adv. Marcion, v. 17, Ignatius, Eph. xii., refers to Paul's affectionate mention of the Christian privileges of the Ephesians in his epistle.

St. Paul, in Col. iv. 16, charges the Colossians to read his epistle to the Laodiceans, and to cause his epistle to the Colossians to be read in the church of Laodicea, whereby he can hardly mean his Epistle to the Ephesians, for the resemblance between the two epistles, Ephesians and Colossians, would render such interchange of reading almost unnecessary. His greetings sent through the Colossians to the Laodiceans are incompatible with the idea that he wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans at the same time and by the same bearer, Tychicus (the bearer of both epistles, Ephesians and Colossians), for the apostle would then have sent the greetings directly in the letter to the party saluted, instead of indirectly in his letter to the Colossians. The epistle to Laodicea was evidently before that to Colosse.

Archbp. Usher supposed that the Epistle to the Ephesians was an encyclical letter, headed as in MSS. Sin. and Vat., "To the saints that are . . . and to the faithful," the name of each church being inserted in the copy sent to it; and that its being sent to Ephesus first occasioned its being entitled the Epistle to the Ephesians. But the words "at Ephesus" (i. 1) occur in the very ancient Alex. MS. and the Vulg. version. The omission was subsequently made when read to other churches in order to generalize its character. Its internal spirit aims at one set of persons, coexisting in one place, as one body, and under the same circumstances. Moreover there is no intimation, as in 2 Cor. and Gal., that it is encyclical and comprising all the churches of that region. After having spent so long time in Ephesus, Paul would hardly fail to write an epistle especially applying to the church there. For personal matters he refers the Ephesians to Tychicus its bearer (vi. 21, 22); his engrossing theme being the interests and privileges and duties of Christ's universal church, with particular reference to the Ephesians. This accounts for the absence of personal greetings; so in Gal., Phil., 1 and 2 Thess., and 1 Tim. The better he knows the parties addressed, and the more general and solemn the subject, the less he gives of individual notices.

His first visit to Ephesus is recorded in Acts xviii. 19-21. Some seeds of Christianity may have been sown in the men of Asia present at the grand pentecost (Acts ii. 9). The work begun formally by Paul's disputations with the Jews during his short visit was carried on by Apollos (xviii. 24-26), Aquila, and Priscilla. At his second visit after his journey to Jerusalem, and thence to the eastern regions of Asia Minor, he encountered John's disciples, and taught them the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and remained at Ephesus three years (Acts xix. 10, xx. 31), so that this church occupied an unusually large portion of his time and care. His self-denying and unwearyed labours here are alluded to in Acts xx. 34. This epistle accordingly shows a warmth of feeling and a union in spiritual privileges and hopes with them (i. 3, etc.), such as are natural from one so long and so intimately associated with those addressed. On his last journey he sailed past Ephesus, and summoned the Ephesian elders to Miletus, where he delivered to them his farewell charge (Acts xx. 18-35).

The Epistle to the Colossians, which contains much the same theme, seems to have been earlier, as the Epistle to the Ephesians expands the same truths. It is an undesigned coincidence and proof of genuineness that the two epistles, written about the same date and under the same circumstances, bear closer resemblance than those written at distant dates and under different circumstances. [See for instances of resemblance, COLOSSIANS.] Tychicus bore both epistles, and Onesimus his companion bore that to his former master Philemon at Colosse. The date was probably before Paul's imprisonment at Rome became so severe as it was when writing the Epistle to the Philippians, about A.D. 62, four years after his charge at Miletus. In vi. 19, 20 he implies he had some freedom for preaching, such as Acts xxvii. 23-31 represents. His imprisonment, beginning February A.D. 61, lasted at least "two whole years."

The epistle addresses a church constituted of Jewish and Gentile converts, and such was that of Ephesus (ii. 14-22, comp. Acts xix. 8-10). Diana's (Artemis) temple there, burned down by Herostratus on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great (355 B.C.), was rebuilt at enormous cost, and was one of the wonders of the world. [See DIANA.] Hence the appropriateness of comparing the church to a temple, containing the true inner beauty, which the idol temple with all its outward splendour was utterly wanting in. In iv. 17, v. 1-13, Paul alludes to the notorious profligacy of the heathen Ephesians. Moreover, an undesigned coincidence, confirming the genuineness of both this epistle and the independent history, is the correspondence of expressions between the epistle and Paul's address to the Ephesian elders (i. 6, 7, ii. 7; comp. Acts xx. 24, 32). Alford designates this "the epistle of the grace of God." As to his bonds, iii. 1, iv. 1, with Acts xx. 22, 23. As to "the counsel of God," i. 11 with Acts xx. 27. As to "the redemption of the purchased possession," i. 14 with Acts xx. 28. As to "building up" and the "inheritance," i. 14, 18, ii. 20, v. 5, with Acts xx. 32.

THE OBJECT is "to set forth the foundation, the course, and the end of the church of the faithful in Christ. He speaks to the Ephesians as a sample of the church universal. In the larger and smaller divisions alike the foundation of the church is in the will of the Father; the course of the church is by the satisfaction of the Son; the end of the church is the life in the Holy Spirit" (Alford). Comp. as to the three, i. 14, ii. 5, iii. 16. Throughout "the church" is spoken of as one whole, in the singular, not the plural. The doctrinal part closes with the sublime doxology (iii. 14-21). Upon the doctrine rest the succeeding practical exhortations; here too the church is represented as founded on the counsel of "God the Father who is above all, through all, and in all," reared by the "one Lord" Jesus Christ, through the "one Spirit" (iv. 4-6, etc.), who give their respective graces to the members. These therefore should exercise all these graces in their several relationships, as husbands, wives, servants, children, etc.; for this end, finally, we must "put on the whole armour of God" (vi. 13).

The STYLE, like the subject, is sublime to a degree exceeding that of Paul's other epistles. The sublimity produces the difficulty and peculiarity of some expressions. The theme was suited to Christians long grounded, as the Ephesians were, in the faith as it is in Jesus.

Ephesus. Chief city of the Ionian confederacy and capital of the Roman province "Asia" (Mysia, Lydia, Caria), on the S. side of the plain of Cayster, and partly on the heights of Prion and Coressus, opposite the island of Samos. A leading scene of Paul's ministry (Acts xviii., xix., xx.); also one of the seven churches addressed in the Apocalypse (i. 11, ii. 1), and the centre from whence John superintended the adjoining churches (Euseb., iii. 23). E., though she was commended for patient labours for Christ's name's sake, is reproved for having "left her first love."

The port was called Panormus. Commodious roads connected this great emporium of Asia with the interior ("the upper coasts," i.e. the Phrygian table lands, Acts xix. 1); also one on the N. to Smyrna, another on the S. to Miletus, whereby the Ephesian elders travelled when summoned by Paul to the latter city. On a N.E. hill stands the church Ayasuluk, corrupted from hagios theologos, "the holy divine," John Timothy, and the Virgin Mary who was committed by the Lord to John (xix. 26), were said to have been buried there. It was the port whither Paul sailed from Corinth, on his way to Syria (Acts xviii. 19-22). Thence too he probably sailed on a short visit to Corinth [see 1 CORINTHIANS]; also thence to Macedonia (xix. 21, 27, xx. 1; comp. 1 Tim. i. 3, 2 Tim. iv. 12, 20).

Originally colonised by the hardy Atticans under Androcles, son of Codrus, it subsequently fell through the enervation of its people under Lydian and Persian domination successively; then under Alexander the Great, and finally under the Romans when these formed their province of Asia (129 B.C.). A proconsul or "deputy" ruled Asia. In Acts xix. 38 the plural is for the singular. He was on circuit, holding the assizes then in E.; as is implied, "the law is open," marg. "the court days are (now being) kept." Besides a senate there was a popular assembly such as met in the theatre, the largest perhaps in the world, traceable still on mount Prion (Acts xix. 29). The "town clerk" had charge of the public records, opened state letters, and took notes of the proceedings in the assembly. His appeal, quieting the people, notices that Paul was "not a blasphemer of the Ephesian goddess," a testimony to Paul's tact and wisdom in preaching Christ. The friendly warning of the ASIARCHS [see] to Paul, not to venture into the theatre, implies how great an influence the apostle had gained at E.

Besides being famed as the birthplace of the two painters Apelles and Parrhasius, and the philosopher Heraclitus, E. was notorious for its magical arts and amulets of parchment with inscribed incantations (Ephesia grammata), valued at enormous prices (50,000 pieces of silver), yet freely given up to the flame when their possessors received a living faith (xix. 19). In undesigned coincidence with Acts, Paul writing to Timothy (2 Tim. iii. 13) says "seducers (goetes, conjurers) shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." The "special miracles" which God wrought by the hands of Paul were exactly suited to conquer the magicians on their own ground: handkerchiefs and aprons from his body brought as a cure to the sick; evil spirits cast out by him; and when exorcists imitated him, the evil spirits turning on them and rending them.

The Diana of E., instead of the graceful

GREEK DIANA.

Grecian goddess of the chase, was a mummy-shaped body with many breasts, ending in a point, and with the head of a female with mural crown, and hands with a bar of metal in each; underneath was a rude block. An aerolite probably gave the idea "the image that fell from heaven." After frequent burnings, the last building of her temple took 220 years. [See DIANA.] Some read Pliny's statement, "the columns were 120, seven of them the gifts of kings"; the diameter of each is six feet, the height 60 feet, according to Ward's measurement. The external pillars according to Wood's arrangement are 88; the whole number, internal and external, 120. The glory of E. was to be a worshipper of the great goddess" (see marg.), lit. a caretaker, warden, or apparitor of the temple (neokoros), and the silversmiths had a flourishing trade in selling portable models of the shrine. Perhaps Alexander the "coppersmith" had a similar business. The "craftsmen" were the designers, the "workmen" ordinary labourers (Acts xix. 24, 25). The imagery of a temple naturally occurs in 1 Cor. iii. 9-17 written here, also in 1 Tim. iii. 15, vi. 19; 2 Tim. ii. 19, 20, written to E.; comp. also Acts xx. 32. Demetrius would be especially sensitive at that time when Diana's sacred month of May was just about to attract the greatest crowds to her, for 1 Cor. xvi. 8 shows Paul was there about that time, and it is probable the uproar took place then; hence we find the Asiarchs present at this time (Acts xix. 31). Existing ancient coins illustrate the terms found in Acts, "deputy," "town clerk," "worshipper of Diana." The address at Miletas shows the Ephesian church had then its bishop presbyters. Paul's companions, Trophimus certainly and Tychicus possibly, were natives of E. (Acts xx. 4, xxi. 29; 2 Tim. iv. 12.) Also Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 16-18, iv. 19), Hymeneus and Alexander, Hermogenes and Phygellus, of E., were among Paul's opponents (1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. i. 15, iv. 14).

Ephlal. 1 Chron. ii. 37.

Ephod. 1. The highpriest's vestment, with the breastplate and Urim and Thummim (some material objects in the bag of the breastplate, used for consulting Jehovah by casting lots: Speaker's Comm.; but see HIGHPRIEST) in it. This Abiathar carried off from the tabernacle at Nob, and David consulted (1 Sam. xxi. 9, xxiii. 6, 9, xxx. 7).

The breastplate, with its twelve precious stones, gave an importance to the ephod which led to its adoption in the idolatries of Gideon and Micah (Jud. viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 14). The large amount of gold used by Gideon on his ephod was not the material of it, but the means whereby he completed it; including the breastplate (choshen), the 12 precious stones, and the two for the shoulders, the gold thread throughout, and gold braid, and gold twist chains fastening the breastplate upon the ephod, and lastly the price of the labour (Exod. xxviii. 6-30). [See GIDEON.] His aim was by wearing it to have a vehicle for inquiring the will of Jehovah, through the Urim and Thummim, the holy lot, and breastplate. The ephod was also used, but without the breastplate, by the ordinary priests, as their characteristic robe (1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3, xxii. 18; Hos. iii. 4). David's ephod, in bringing the ark to Jerusalem, differed from the priests' in being of ordinary linen (bad), whereas theirs was of fine linen (sheesh).

2. Father of Hanneel, head of Manasseh, assisted Joshua and Eleazar in apportioning Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 23).

Ephraim = doubly fruitful. Joseph's second son by Asenath, named so, "for," said Joseph, "God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction." Born during the seven plenteous years; the "doubly fruitful" may refer to both the fruitfulness vouchsafed to Joseph and the plenty of the season. As regards E. himself, he was doubly blessed: (1) in being made, as well as Manasseh, a patriarchal head of a tribe, like Jacob's immediate sons (Gen. xlviii. 5); as Judah received the primary birthright (Reuben losing it by incest, Simeon and Levi by cruelty), and became the royal tribe whence king David and the Divine Son of David sprang, so E. received a secondary birthright and became ancestor of the royal tribe among the ten tribes of Israel (xlix. 3-10, 22-26). (2) E. the younger was preferred to Manasseh the elder, as Jacob himself was preferred before the elder Esau. Jacob wittingly guided his hands so as to lay his right on E. and his left on Manasseh, notwithstanding Joseph's remonstrance; saying, "Manasseh shall be great, but his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." Jacob called to mind God's promise at Luz, "I will make thee fruitful," a Heb. word akin to E. and to Ephrath, the scene of the death of his darling wife, E.'s grandmother (xxxv. 11, 16, xlviii. 4, 7, 13-19). E. was about 21 when Jacob blessed him, for he was born before the seven years' famine, and Jacob came to Egypt towards its closing years, and lived 17 years afterwards (xlvii. 28). Before Joseph's death E.'s family had reached the third generation (l. 23).

The last notice we have of him is his mourning for his sons slain in the foray by the men of Gath, and naming his new-born son BERTAH [see] from the calamity, unconscious that that son would be the progenitor of the most remarkable of all his descendants, Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 20-23). Ps. lxxviii. 9 is referred in Smith's Bible Dict. to this time; but the phrase is rather figurative for spiritual apostasy; "the children of E. . . carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle." E.'s numbers in the wilderness of Sinai census were 40,500, Manasseh's 32,200. But at the eve of entering Canaan E. had decreased to 32,500, whilst Manasseh had increased to 52,700; and at the conquest E. was fewest in numbers after Simeon (22,200). Still in Moses' blessing E. stands pre-eminent over Manasseh; and he and Manasseh are compared to the two horns of the reem (not unicorn but the gigantic wild ox, now extinct, or urus); "with them he (Joseph) shall push the people together to the ends of the earth, and they are the ten thousands of E. and they are the thousands of Manasseh." Moreover, Joseph's land is "blessed of the Lord for the precious things of heaven . . . the dew . . . the deep beneath . . . the precious fruits brought forth by the sun and . . . put forth by the moon . . . the chief things of the ancient mountains and . . . of the lasting hills . . . of the earth and its fulness, and the good will of Him that dwelt in the bush": a glorious issue to the afflictions "of him that was separated from his brethren" (Deut. xxxiii. 17). "His glory (is like) the firstling of his bullock," rather "the firstling of his (Joseph's) bullock (i.e. E. made by Jacob in privileges the firstborn of Joseph's offspring; the singular 'bullock' being used collectively for all Joseph's offspring, and expressing their strength) is his glory." Whereas Jacob dwelt on Joseph's trials, and prophetically the severe wars of his descendants, in which God would strengthen them as He had strengthened Joseph, Moses looks onward to their final triumph and peaceful enjoyment of all precious things in their land.

The tribe E.'s territory.—The two great tribes of Judah and Joseph (E. and Manasseh) took their inheritance first. The boundaries of E. are traced from W. to E. in Josh. xvi. 1-10. Ataroth Adar and upper Bethhoron lay on the centre of the southern border of E. The border on the N. side went out westward, i.e. seaward, to Michmethah, which was in front (W. or N.W.) of Shechem (Nabulus), the latter being in E. From Michmethah the border went round to the E. at the back of mount Ebal, then S.E. towards Janohah (Yanun). It passed Taanath Shiloh (probably Salim). From Janohah it touched Ataroth on the wady Fasail; then passing Naarath or Naaran (1 Chron. vii. 28) on the E. of Bethel, called Neara by Josephus, abounding in water, and so likely to be near Bas el Ain (five miles N. of Jericho), which pours a full stream into the wady Nawaymeih. From Naarath E.'s boundary reached Jericho, and struck into the line that forms the S. base of the tribe, running to the Jordan. From En Tappuah (Ain Abuz, five miles and a half S. of Shechem) E.'s boundary ran S.W. into the brook Kanah, which still retains its ancient name; thence the boundary ran out to the sea. The boundary between E. and his brother Manasseh is not exactly defined; comp. Josh. xvi. 14-18. Generally, E. lay to the S., Manasseh to the N. But Manasseh, instead of crossing the country from E. to W. as it is often represented, occupied only half that space, and lay along the sea to the W., bounded on the E. by mount Carmel. The territory of the twofold "house of Joseph" was 55 miles from E. to W. by 70 from N. to S. The northern half of central Palestine was "mount Ephraim," hills of limestone material, intersected by wide plains with streams of running water, and therefore clothed with vegetation. Travellers attest the increasing beauty of the country in going N. from Jerusalem. The "precious things of the earth," "flowers," "olive valleys," and "vines" are assigned to E. (Isa. xxviii. 1-4; Hos. x. 1). He is compared to a "heifer," whereas Dan, Judah, and Benjamin among their comparatively barren rocks are compared to lions and volves. E. lay near the highways from Egypt and Philistia to Galilee and from Jordan to the sea. E. did not extend to the sea, but had separate cities assigned to it in Manasseh on the coast. In it were Shechem, Jacob's original settlement, "his parcel of ground" and well; Ebal and Gerizim, the mounts of cursing and blessing; and Shiloh, the seat of the sanctuary till the time of Eli. Here too was the great Joshua's tomb, as also his patrimony. Jealous sensitiveness as to any exploit achieved without E.'s sharing in it betrayed at once their tribal self importance and their recognised high standing among the tribes. So towards Gideon, Jephthah and David (Jud. viii. 1, xii. 1; 2 Sam. xix. 41-43). In one instance they nobly interposed to clothe, feed, and restore in freedom their captive brethren of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 9-15). The 78th Psalm was designed to soothe their tribal soreness at the transference of the religious capital from Shi-

Isa to Jerusalem (ver. 60-70). They attached themselves to David after Ishbosheth's fall; 20,800 warriors of them "coming with a perfect heart to Hebron, to make David king over all Israel." Among his state officers there was more than one Ephraimite (1 Chron. xxvii. 10-14); and after Absalom's rebellion they were probably foremost among the men of Israel in expressing jealousy of Judah in respect to the latter's greater share in promoting David's return. From the time of the severance of the ten tribes from Judah, brought about by Rehoboam's infatuation and Jeroboam's ("ruler over all the charge of the house of Joseph") rousing E.'s innate self-elation, E. became the representative and main portion of the northern kingdom; for the surrounding heathen, the luxurious Phœnicians, the marauding Midianites, the Syrians and Assyrians from the N., and the Egyptians from the S., left to Israel little which was permanently, exclusively, and distinctively its own, beyond the secure territory of E. with its hilly fastnesses. The plain of Esdraelon, to the N. beyond E., was the natural battlefield for Egyptian forces advancing along the seacoast plain from the S. and Syrians and Assyrians from the N. to operate in; but E. could only be reached through precipitous ascents and narrow passes, where invaders could be easily repelled. But her continually increasing moral degeneracy and religious apostasy rendered all her natural advantages unavailing. No temporary revival, as in Judah's case, relieves the gloomy picture, until the cup of her iniquity was full; and God, though His amazing love long forbore to judge her, at last swept her away permanently from her home and her abused privileges and opportunities. (Hos. vi., vii., viii., ix., x., xi. 1-8, xii., xiii.; Ezek. xxiii.; 2 Kings xvii.)

Ephraim. Beside which was Absalom's sheep farm, where took place Amnon's murder (2 Sam. xiii.). Our Lord, when the chief priests plotted to kill Him, retired to "a city called E. . . . a country near to the wilderness" (John xi. 54). "The wilderness" means the hill country N.E. of Jerusalem, between the central towns and the Jordan valley. Thus Ephraim of Benjamin probably is identical with E. (1 Sam. xiii. 17). Now El-Taiyibeh, a village on a conical hill commanding the view of the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea.

Ephraim, wood of. The battlefield where Absalom fell, the entanglement of the wood occasioning large slaughter of the Ephraimites, whence perhaps the wood was named. From 2 Sam. xvii. 21, 26, xviii. 3, it is certain that it was E. of Jordan, not W. where the tribe Ephraim was settled. Mahanaim was the "city out of" which David's army looked for "succour" from him. Grotius thinks, less probably, that the name was derived from the slaughter of Ephraim at the Jordan fords by Jephthah (Jud. xii. 1-5); the city Mahanaim and wood of Ephraim were miles off from the Jordan.

Ephraim. A city of Israel which, with its dependent villages, Abijah and the men of Judah took from Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 19). Possibly = Ephraim city above; also = EPHRON, MOUNT, on the northern bound of Judah (Josh. xv. 9).

Ephratah, Ephrath. 1. Second wife of Caleb, Hezron's son; mother of Hur; grandmother of Caleb the spy (1 Chron. ii. 19, [21,] 50; iv. 4).

2. The name of Bethlehem Judah in Jacob's time (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19; xlviii. 7). Whence probably E. the mother of Hur took her name, being a native and owner of the town and district; which accounts for his being called "the father of Bethlehem." In Mic. v. 2 it is called Bethlehem E. As Bethlehem means "house of bread," so E. "fruitful," the region abounding in corn. In Ps. cxxxix. 6 the sense is: "we (being) in E. [i.e. whilst David was still a youth at Bethlehem] heard of it," viz. the ark, as a mere matter of hearsay, so neglected was the ark then whilst in the forest town of Kirjath Jearim.

Ephron. Zohar's son, a Hittite; owner of the field facing Mamre or Hebron, and the cave in the field. Abraham bought it from E. for 400 shekels of silver (Gen. xxiii., xvr., xlix.).

Epicureans. Disciples of Epicurus, the Athenian philosopher, whose "garden" was the resort of numbers. There he taught that the aim of philosophy should be happiness and pleasure, not absolute truth; experience (the perceptions, general notions, and passions or affections), not reason, the test. Physics he studied, to explain phenomena and dispel superstitious fears; ethics he regarded as man's proper study, since they conduce to supreme and lasting pleasure. The Epicureans and Stoics were the two opposite schools of philosophy prevalent in Athens at Paul's visit (Acts xvii. 18). Materialism and sensual selfishness was the ultimate tendency of Epicurus's teaching; but his bold criticism of heathen polytheism, the claims of the body, and individual freedom, were the better elements in it. Stoicism taught an absolute fate and the spiritual nature of the soul, which it made part of the general soul of the world. Paul directs against Epicureanism the declaration of creation (ver. 21), providence (26), inspiration (28), the resurrection and judgment (31). Sadduceism was its Jewish representative. Diogenes Laertius (x.) preserves some of Epicurus's letters, and a list of his writings. See also Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, trans. by Creech.

Epistle. The first mentioned in the O. T. is that of David to Joab, sent by Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14); a usage perhaps borrowed from the Phœnicians, with whose king Hiram he was intimate. The king's seal was usually attached in token of authority, and to guard against any one but the person addressed reading it (1 Kings xxi. 8, 9). The seal was of clay impressed whilst moist (1 Kings xxi. 8, 9; Job xxxviii. 14). "A writing came to Jeroboam from Elijah" (2 Chron. xxi. 12). Originally messages were sent orally (Gen. xxxii. 3; Num. xxii.

5, 7, 16, xxiv. 12; Jud. xi. 12, 13; 1 Sam. xi. 7, 9). Hezekiah had a system of couriers or posts to transmit his letters in various quarters; the plan especially prevalent in Persia (2 Chron. xxx. 6, 10; Esth. viii. 10, 14). We read of his "spreading before the Lord" Sennacherib's letter (2 Kings xix. 14). Sanballat's "open letter" was an infraction of the etiquette of the Persian court (Neh. vi. 5). Jeremiah wrote to the captives in Babylon (Jer. xxix. 1-3).

In the N. T. St. Luke begins both his "Gospel" and "Acts" in the form of a letter to Theophilus; but in substance both books are rather histories than epistles. Our Lord wrote no epistle, as that to Abgarus king of Edessa is most probably not authentic (Euseb. H. E., i. 13). His office was to enact the facts, and to fulfil the personal ministry, upon which the church was to be founded. The epistles are the inspired commentaries unfolding the truths in the histories, the Gospels, and Acts; just as the prophets interpret the spiritual lessons designed by God to be drawn from the O. T. histories. Twenty-one of the 27 N. T. books are epistles strictly. Three more are so in form: Luke, Acts, and Revelation addressed to the seven churches. Matthew, Mark, and John alone are not epistolary either in form or substance. Fourteen, including Hebrews, are by Paul; three by John; two by Peter; one by James; one by Jude. Paul dictated his to an amanuensis, authenticating them with his autograph at the close, wherever he wrote the salutation "grace be with thee," or "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," etc. But, in order to show his regard to the Galatians, whom Judaizers tried to estrange, he wrote all that epistle himself in large characters, for so Gal. vi. 11, 12 ought to be trans., "ye see in how large letters I have written." The largeness of letters was probably owing to his weakness of sight (Gal. iv. 15). The words "I have written" (wrote, egrapsa) distinguished this epistle as written by himself from 2 Thess. iii. 17, "I write," where he only writes the closing salutation. Philem. 19 shows that that epistle also was all written by Paul as a special compliment to Philemon; whereas the accompanying epistle to the Colossians (iv. 18) has only "the salutation" so written, as also 1 Cor. xvi. 21. In Rom. xvi. 22 his amanuensis Tertius salutes in his own name. Peter's closing salutation is "peace be with you"; as Paul's is "grace," etc. John after Paul's death takes up his closing benediction, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all," at the end of Revelation. In the beginning of most of Paul's epistles "grace and peace" are his opening greeting; in the pastoral epistles concerning ministers "mercy" is added, "grace, mercy, and peace" (1 and 2 Tim. and Tit.), for ministers of all men most need mercy (1 Cor. vii. 25, 2 Cor. vi. 1). All the epistles besides Paul's are called "catholic" or "general." This designation holds good in a general and not strict sense; for the 2 and 3 John are addressed to specific persons in form, though in substance they are general. The epistolary form of inspiration gives scope for free expression of personal affection, and conveys Divine truth, progressively unfolded to us, as to Christian faith, worship and polity with a freshness, point, and communion of heart with heart, such as could hardly be attained by formal, didactic treatises.

Er = watchful. 1. Firstborn of Judah, by Bathshua, a Canaanite; the marriage with this daughter of a corrupt race producing sin and sorrow. Tamar was his wife, but bare him no son; for "E. was wicked in the sight of the Lord, and the Lord slew him," his sin being probably some abomination connected with the impure Canaanite idolatry (Gen. xxxviii. 3-7). 2. 1 Chron. iv. 21. 3. Gen. xlii. 16. 4. Luke iii. 28.

Eran, Eranites. Num. xxvi. 36.

Erastus. "Chamberlain," i.e. city steward and treasurer of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23). The conversion of so prominent a man marks the great success of Paul's labours there. He ministered to Paul, accompanying him on his last journey to his second imprisonment at Rome; but "abode at Corinth," going no farther, as Paul notes (2 Tim. iv. 20) to depict his utter desertion by man. E. the missionary is perhaps distinct, as a chamberlain's office would hardly admit of continued missionary journeys (Acts xix. 22).

Erech. "The beginning of Nimrod's kingdom was Babel, E., Accad, and Calneh in the land of Shinar." Erchoe, 82 miles S., 43 E. of Babylon, now Warka; in the land of Shinar. Apparently the necropolis of the Assyrian kings, judging from the brick and coffins and mounds all round. Some bricks bear the monogram "the moon," answering to Heb. yareach, whence perhaps E. is derived. The inhabitants were among those settled in Samaria by Asnapper (Ezra iv. 9, 10). [See BABYLON.]

Esarhaddon. Sennacherib's younger son, Sargon's grandson (2 Kings xix. 37). [See ASSYRIA.] After the murder of his father by his two sons, E. the eldest surviving son succeeded, 680 B.C. The Assyrian inscriptions state that for some months after his accession he warred with his half brothers (Rawlinson, Anc. Monarchies, ii. 186). The Gr. Abydenus states the same. The Scripture is thus confirmed; for naturally E. would seek to avenge his father's murder, and they would seek the throne. The Armenian records state that the two assassins, having escaped from the scene of conflict, took refuge in Armenia, where the king gave them lands which long continued in possession of their posterity (Mos. Choren., Hist. Arm., i. 22). E. is famed for his expedition into Arabia, an undertaking with few parallels in history; for few conquerors have ventured to pass the barrier of Arabian deserts. E. was perhaps the most potent of the Assyrian kings, warring in the far East, according to the monuments, with Median tribes "of which his father had never heard the name"; extending his power W. to Cilicia and Cyprus, ten kings of which submitted to him. Southward he claimed authority over Egypt and Ethiopia; having driven the Ethiopian Tirhakah out of Egypt. Having conquered Merodach Baladan's sons, E. made Babylon directly subject to the Assyrian crown, instead of being governed by viceroys, and as king of each of the two empires resided by turns at Nineveh and Babylon. He is the only Assyrian king who reigned at Babylon; the bricks of the palace he built there still bearing his name. A tablet also bears the date of his reign. Manasseh king of Judah is mentioned among his tributaries. Scripture by a striking minute coincidence with truth represents Manasseh as carried to Babylon, not to the Assyrian capital Nineveh; which would seem inexplicable but for the above fact, revealed by the monuments. E.'s Babylonian reign lasted from 680 to 667 B.C., the very period when Manasseh was brought up by the Assyrian king's captains to Babylon on a charge of rebellion (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11-19). By an unusual clemency on the part of an oriental king, Manasseh was restored to his throne, a marvellous proof of the power of prayer. The monuments tell us of a similar act of E. whereby he gave a territory on the Persian gulf to Merodach Baladan's son, on his submission as a refugee at his court.

E. built three other palaces and 30 temples, "shining with silver and gold," in different parts of his dominions. His S.W. palace at Nimrud, excavated by Layard, corresponds in plan to Solomon's temple but is larger, viz. the hall being 220 by 100 ft. and the ante-chamber 160 by 60. Unfortunately the sculptured stones and alabaster have been materially injured by fire. He boasts of his S.W. palace of Nimrud that it was a building "such as the kings his fathers before him had never made." Ptolemy's canon shows he reigned 13 years in Babylon, and probably reigned in all 20 years, dying about 660 B.C. Assur-bani-pal, or Sardanapalus II., for whom E. built a palace, succeeded, and caused the tablets to be collected which furnish us with such information; comparative vocabularies, lists of deities, records of astronomical observations, histories, scientific works. Sarcus his son was attacked by the Scythians, then by the Medes and Cyaxares, and Nabopolassar his own general. Sarcus burnt himself in his palace, and Nineveh was taken.

[See ASSYRIA.] E. (as G. Smith reads an inscription) about 672 B.C., marching from Asshur (Kileh Sherghat) to Tyre, besieged Bahal its king who was in league with Tirhakah, thence he marched to Aphel at the foot of Lebanon, then to Raphia S.W. of Judah, thence from Lower Egypt which was in his hands to Mirha or Merce. Though distressed on the way by want of water, he at last drove Tirhakah out of Egypt.

Esau = hairy, rough; for at birth he "came out red (whence his name EDOM), all over like an hairy garment" (Gen. xxv. 25). The animal appearance marked his sensual, self-willed, untamed nature, in which the moral, spiritual elements were low. See'ar, "hairy," may have also originated the designation of his territory, mount Seir, i.e. "thickly wooded," as he was in person "hairy." Jacob took hold of his twin brother in the womb when the latter was coming out first, whence he got his name = supplanter (Hos. xii. 3). E. like Nimrod was "a cunning (skilful) hunter," "a man of the field" or "desert," wild, restless, and self-indulgent, instead of following his fathers' peaceful pastoral life, "dwelling in tents."

Isaac, with the caprice of affection whereby the quiet parent loves the opposite to his own character, "loved E. because he did eat of his venison," his selfishness herein bringing its own punishment. "Rebekah loved Jacob" as "a plain man," i.e. upright, steady, and domestic; but her love too was wanting in regard to high principle. Reckless of the lawfulness of the means, provided she gained her end, she brought sorrow on both. From before the birth of both it was foretold her, "the elder shall serve the younger." E.'s recklessness of spiritual and future privileges, and care only for the indulgence of the moment, caused him to sell his birthright for Jacob's red pottage, made of lentils or small beans, still esteemed a delicacy in the East. The colour was what most took his fancy; "feed me with that red, that red." "The lust of the flesh and the lust of the eye" were his snare. He can hardly have been "at the point to die" with hunger; rather his impatience to gratify his appetite made his headstrong will feel as if his life depended on it; I shall die if I don't get it, then "what profit shall this birthright do to me?" Nay, but "what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. xvi. 26.) Jacob took an ungenerous and selfish advantage, which the Scripture does not sanction, and distrusting E.'s levity required of him an oath. Yet his characteristic faith appears in his looking on to the unseen future privileges attached to the birthright (the priesthood of the family [Num. viii. 17-19] and the proprietorship of Messiah, independently of temporal advantages, Gen. xlviii. 22, xlix. 3, 4) as heir of the everlasting promises to Abraham's seed (Rom. ix. 5, 8). "Profane E. for one morsel sold," and so "despised, his birthright." The smallness of the inducement aggravates the guilt of casting away eternity for a morsel. Unbelieving levity must have all its good things now (1 Cor. xv. 32); faith says with Jacob "I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord" (Gen. xlix. 18; comp. Luke xvi. 25). The nickname Edom, "red," was consequently given E. as the reproach of his sensual folly, a name mostly confined to his land and his posterity.

By feigning to be E., Jacob, at his mother's suggestion, stole the father's blessing which God would have secured to him without guile and its retributive punishment, had he waited in simple faith. Isaac too erred through carnal partiality, which he sought to stimulate by eating his favourite's venison, determining to give to E. the blessing in spite of the original Divine intimation, "the elder shall serve the younger," and in spite of E.'s actual sale of the birthright to Jacob, and though E. had shown his unworthiness of it by taking when he was forty years of age two Hittite wives from among the corrupt Canaanites, to his father's and mother's grief. Too late, when "afterward E. would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected, for he found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. xii. 16, 17). There is an "afterward" coming when the unbeliever shall look back on his past joys and the believer on his past griefs, in a very different light from now. Contrast Heb. xii. 11 with 17; so Gen. iii. 6, 8, "the cool of the day"; Matt. xxv. 11, 12, "the foolish virgins." E. found the truth of the homely proverb, "he that will not when he may, when he will shall have nay" (Prov. i. 24-30; Luke xiii. 25, 31, 35, xix. 42, 44). What E. found not was "place for repentance" of the kind which he sought, viz. such as would regain the lost blessing. Had E. sought real repentance he would have found it (Matt. vii. 7). He did not find it because this was not what he sought. His "tears" were no proof of true repentance, for immediately after being foiled in his desire he resolved to murder Jacob! He wept not for his sin, but for its penalty. "Before, he might have had the blessing without tears; afterwards, however many he shed, he was rejected" (Bengel). Tears are shed at times by the most hardened; failing to repent when so softened for the moment, they hardly ever do so afterwards (1 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17, Saul; contrast David, Ps. lvi. 8).

Rebekah, hearing of the vengeful design of E. against her favourite son, by recalling to Isaac's remembrance E.'s ill-judged marriage secured the father's consent to Jacob's departure from the neighbourhood of the daughters of Heth to that of his own kindred, and at the same time the confirmation of the blessing (Gen. xxvii. 46, xxviii. 1). E. then tried by marrying his cousin Mahalath, Ishmael's daughter, to conciliate his parents (xxviii. 8, 9). Thus he became connected with the Ishmaelite tribes beyond the Arabian valley. Soon after he began to drive the Horites out of mount Seir; and by the return of Jacob 20 years after, E. was there with armed retainers and abundant wealth. It was not however till after his father's death that he permanently left Canaan, according to Isaac's blessing, to Jacob, his wives and family then first accompanying him (Gen. xxxv. 29, xxxvi. 6).

E. was moved by God in answer to Jacob's wrestling prayer to lay aside revenge and meet his brother with embraces, kisses, and tears (Prov. xvi. 7). Love, and gifts in token of it, drove after drove, melted the violent but impulsive spirit of E. Jacob however, wisely fearing any collision which might revive the old grudge, declined accompanying E., but expressed a hope one day to visit mount Seir; his words, "I will read on softly . . . until I come unto my lord unto Seir," cannot mean he then intended going there, for he was avowedly going towards Succoth and Shechem (Gen. xxxii, xxxiii.). The death of their father Isaac more than 20 years afterwards was probably the next and last occasion of the brothers meeting. They united in paying him the last sad offices (xxxv. 29). Then E., by this time seeing that Jacob's was the birthright blessing and the promised land, withdrew permanently to his appointed lot, mount Seir (xxxii. 3, Dent. ii. 5-12). He carried away all his substance from Canaan thither, to take full possession of Seir and drive out its original inhabitants. "Living by his sword" too, he felt Edom's rocky fastnesses better suited for his purpose than S. Palestine with its open plains. [See Edom, ABOLIBAMAH, BASHMATH.] The prophecy of Isaac, "Thou shalt serve thy brother, and . . . when thou shalt have the dominion thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck," was fulfilled to the letter. At first E. prospered more, dukes being in Edom before any king reigned in Israel (xxxvi. 31), and whilst Israel was in bondage in Egypt Edom was independent. But Saul and David conquered the Edomites (1 Sam. xiv. 47, 2 Sam. viii. 14), and they were, excepting revolts, subject to Judah till Ahaz' reign; then they threw off the yoke (2 Kings xvi. 6, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7). Judas Maccabeus defeated, and his nephew Hyrcanus conquered, and compelled them to be circumcised and incorporated with the Jews; but an Idumean dynasty, Antipater and the Herodes, ruled down to the final destruction of Jerusalem.

Esdraelon. [See JEZREEL.]

Esek = calumny, wrong. A well dug by Isaac's men, but abandoned when the men of Gerar strove for it (Gen. xxvi. 20).

Esh-baal = Baal's man. Saul's youngest son (1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39); Bosheth (shame) being substituted for Baal through the believing Israelites' contempt of idols, Ishbosheth is its equivalent (Isa. xlv. 9, etc.; Hos. ix. 10).

Eshban. Gen. xxxvi. 26.

Eshcol = cluster. 1. An Amorite chief, Mamre's brother, ally to Abram in his expedition against Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 13, 24). 2. Valley of E. A wady in southern Canaan, somewhere in the vinebearing district (miles of hill sides and valleys covered with small stone heaps for training vines) between Hebron (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13) and Kadesh, but nearer Kadesh (Ain-el-Gadis) on the northern frontier of the peninsula, the Negeb or the "south." From Kadesh the spies went and returned with grapes of E., which cannot be near Hebron, for grapes could not well be brought such a distance as that between Hebron and Kadesh, and the spies would court secrecy and haste (Num. xiii. 24). The Amorite chief's name originated the designation of the valley E., which Israel afterwards interpreted in the suitable sense cluster. Most identify E. with the rich valley N. of Hebron, described by Robinson as producing the largest grapes in

FOUNTAIN AT ESUCOL

Palestine, where a fount is still called Ain Eskaly (Van de Velde).

Eshean. A city of Judah in the hilly country (Josh. xv. 52).

Eshek. 1 Chron. viii. 39, 40.

Eshtaol. A town in the shephelah or low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 33, xix. 41), allotted to Dan. On the Philistine border between Azotus and Askelon. Here Samson spent his boyhood, and hither his remains were finally carried to the burying ground of Manoah his father (Jud. xiii. 25, xvi. 31, xviii. 2, 8, 11, 12). Between the Danite towns Zorah and E. and behind Kirjath Jearim was Mahaneh-Dan, the standing camp of the little host exposed to constant warfare with the Philistines; a neighbourhood well calculated to train Samson for his after encounters with that race. As Kirjath Jearim is now Kuriet-el-Ehab, and Zorah is Sur'ah, seven miles S.W. of it, E. is Kustul, a conical hill an hour's journey S.E. from Kuriet-el-Ehab towards Jerusalem. This fulfils the requisite condition that Kirjath Jearim should lie between E. and Zorah. E. Wilton (Imperial Bible Dict.) identifies E. with Um Eshteyeh, 12 Roman miles from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), agreeing with Eusebius' statement that it is ten miles distant. Jerome says Jarmuth was near, which agrees with the fact that Yarmak is near E.; Zanna (Zanoah) is also near. Black (Pal. Expl.) identifies E. with Eshua.

Eshtemoa, Eshtemoh (Josh. xv. 50). Allotted with its suburbs to the priests (xxi. 14, 1 Chron. vi. 57; comp. iv. 17). Frequented by David during his wanderings. Accordingly to his friends there he sent presents of the Amalekite spoil (1 Sam. xxx. 28, 31). Now Senu'a, seven miles S. of Hebron. E. was son of Ishba; Mered was husband of Jehudiah (the Jewess), by whose descendants, Gedor, Socho, and Zanoah, near E., were founded. The town E. was founded by the descendants of BITHIAH [see], Pharaoh's daughter, the Egyptian wife of Mered. A large stone (Hajr-el-Sakhain) stands on the N. road to the village Senu'a at a distance of 3000 cubits, the Levitical extent of suburbs and the boundary of the village possessions to this day (Pal. Expl.). How the Holy Land confirms the Holy Book!

Eshton. 1 Chron. iv. 11, 12.

Esli. Luke iii. 25.

Esrom. Matt. i. 3, Luke iii. 33.

Essenes. A sect of the Jews who practised a strict ceremonial asceticism, discouraging marriage, having community of goods, temperate, industrious, charitable, opposed to all oaths, slavery, and war, like the modern Society of Friends, and also, unlike the latter, to commerce. Oriental philosophy, which regarded the body as the prison rather than the temple of the soul, tinged their deep veneration for Moses' laws, which in every way favour marriage. Shrinking from communion with other worshippers whose contact they regarded as polluting, they avoided the temple and sacrificed in their own dwellings. Eugeni, the western shores of the Dead Sea, and like solitary places, were their favourite haunts. They arose 110 years B.C. (Judas being the earliest mentioned), but are never noticed in N. T., the reason doubtless being their isolation from general society. The name is akin to coshen, the highpriest's mystic breastplate, and other Heb. words meaning "the silent, the mysterious." The Egyptian ascetic mystics, the Therapeutae, resemble them. In zeal for the law, except where their peculiarities were concerned, sabbatarianism and rigorous exercises, they resembled the Pharisees, with whom they were popularly confounded. See Josephus, B. J. ii. 8, § 7, 11; Ant. xiii. 5, § 9; xv. 10, § 4; xviii. 1, § 2; Pliny, Nat. Hist., v. 15. They were the forerunners of monkish celibacy and anchorite asceticism. The noviciate was for a year, and then a two years probation before membership, which, on oath of an awful kind (the only oath permitted), bound them to piety, justice, obedience, honesty, and secrecy as to the books of the sect and the names of the angels. Purity and Divine communion were their aim. A good aim, but to be best attained in God's way of the daily life's discipline rather than in self imposed austerity and isolation.

We need not bid, for cloistered cell,
Our neighbour and our work farewell,
Nor try to wind ourselves too high
For mortal man beneath the sky.

The trivial round, the common task,
Should furnish all we ought to ask,
Room to deny ourselves, a road
To bring us daily nearer God.—Kemble.

See John xvii. 15, Col. ii. 18-23.

Esther. A Jewess of Benjamin, descendant of the captivity carried to Babylon with Jeconiah, 599 or 597 B.C.; born abroad, of a family which chose to remain instead of returning to Jerusalem. Kish, the ancestor of Mordecai (ii. 5-7, 15), had been carried away with Jeconiah; thus Mordecai was contemporary with Xerxes, which harmonizes with the view that ANAS-

UERUS [see] is Xerxes. Mordecai and his uncle Abihail's daughter (his own adopted ward) lived at Shushan, the Persian royal city. Mordecai probably held some office in "the palace" (ii. 5, 21-23). Her original name Hadassah means "myrtle." Her Persian name Esther means and is akin to "star," implying like Venus good fortune. Vashti the queen having been divorced for refusing to show the people and the princes her beauty, E. was chosen out of the fairest virgins collected out of all the provinces, as her successor. Abasuerus, unaware of her race, granted leave to Haman his favourite, who was offended with Mordecai for not doing him reverence, to destroy the whole people to which Mordecai belonged. E., at the risk of her own life, uninvited entered the king's presence, and obtained a virtual reversal of the decree against the Jews. Haman was hung on the gallows designed by him for Mordecai (Ps. vii. 16). The Jews defended themselves so effectually on the day appointed by Haman for their slaughter that in Shushan the palace alone they slew 500 and Haman's ten sons on one day, and, by E.'s request granted by the king, slew 300 at Shushan; and the Jews in the provinces, "standing for their lives," slew 75,000, "but on the spoil laid they not their hand." So thenceforward the feast Purim (lots) on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (February and March) was kept by the Jews as "a day of gladness and of sending portions to one another, and gifts to the poor." "E. the queen wrote with all authority to confirm this second letter of Purim" (viii. 7-14, ix. 20, 29-32); "her decree confirmed these matters of Purim." The continuance of this feast by the Jews to our day confirms the history. It is also confirmed by the casual way in which 2 Macc. xv. 36 alludes to the feast ("Mardocheus' day") as kept by the Jews in Nicanor's time.

In the 3rd year of Xerxes (Esth. i. 3, 4) the disastrous expedition against Greece (foretold in Dan. xi. 2, "by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia") was determined on in an assembly at Susa (Herod., vii. 8). The book of E. describes in the same year, the 3rd, the lavish feasting during which Vashti was deposed, 488 B.C. In his 7th year the battles of Plataea and Mycale, according to secular history, drove Xerxes in flight from Sardis to Susa. So, in Scripture, it was not until the tenth month of this 7th year that E. was made queen. The long delay between Vashti's deposeal and E.'s accession is satisfactorily accounted for by the Greek expedition which intervened. On returning from it Xerxes tried to bury his disgrace in the pleasures of the seraglio (Herod., vii. 35, 114); as indeed he had begun it and, according to Herodotus, at intervals continued it with feasting.

Possibly Vashti answered to the Amestris of secular history, who was queen consort from the beginning to the end of his reign, and was queen mother under his son and successor Artaxxerxes. E. cannot be Amestris, since the latter was daughter of a Persian noble, Otanes; if Vashti be Amestris, then her disgrace was only temporary. Or else Vashti and E. were both only "secondary wives" with the title "queen." A young "secondary wife" might for a time eclipse the queen consort in the favour of the king; but the latter would ultimately maintain her due position. E.'s influence lasted at least from Abasuerus' 7th to the 12th year and beyond, but how far beyond we know not (Esth. iii. 7, x.). His marriage to a Jewess was in contravention of the law that he must marry a wife belonging to one of the seven great Persian families. But Xerxes herein, as previously in requiring the queen Vashti to appear unveiled before revellers (such an outrage on oriental decorum that she refused to come), set at naught Persian law and prejudice. The massacre of 75,000 by Jews (ix. 16) would be unlikely, if they were Persians; but they were not, they were the Jews' enemies in the provinces, idolaters, naturally hating the spiritual monotheism of the Jews, whereas the Persians sympathised with it. The Persians in the provinces would be only the officials, whose orders from court were not to take part against the Jews. The persons slain were subject races, whose lives as such Xerxes made little account of.

THE BOOK OF E. supplies the gap between Ezra vi. and vii. Xerxes, or the Abasuerus of E., intervenes between Darius and Artaxerxes. The "feast unto all his princes," etc., for "an hundred and fourscore days" (Esth. i. 3, 4) was protracted thus long in order that all the princes in their turn might partake of it; for all could not, consistently with their duties in the provinces, have been present all that time.

The book of Esther describes the state of the exiled people of God in Persia, and thus complements the narratives by Ezra and Nehemiah of what took place in the Holy Land. Possibly Mordecai was the author; for the minute details of the banquet, of the names of the chamberlains and eunuchs, of Haman's wife and sons, and of the usages of the palace, imply such an intimate acquaintance with all that concerned E. as best fits Mordecai himself. Similarly Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, who held official posts in the Persian court, wrote under inspiration the books which bear their names, and which describe the relations of the Jews to the heathen world power. This view accords with ix. 20, 23, 32, x. Ezra and the men of the great synagogue at Jerusalem probably edited and added it to the canon, having previously received it, and the book of Daniel, whilst at the Persian court. The last of the great synagogue was Simon the Just, high-priest 310-291 B.C. The canon contained it at latest by that time, and how long earlier is unknown. "The chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia" (x. 2) were at the time of the writer accessible, and the very order whereby Media is put before Persia implies it cannot have been much later than the time of the events recorded, the former and middle part of Xerxes' reign, before Artabanus became Xerxes' favourite, and Mordecai's (perhaps = Matacas the eunuch) influence waned.

The book of E. was placed by the Jews among the Kethubim (hagiographa), in the portion called the five volumes, Megilloth. Maimonides says that in Messiah's days the prophets and hagiographa shall pass away, except "Esther," which will remain with the pentateuch. It is read through in the synagogues during Purim. The scribes wrote the names of Haman's ten sons in three perpendicular columns of three, three, four, hanging upon three parallel cords, three upon each, one above another, representing the hanging of Haman's sons.

The absence of the name of God is peculiar to this book; the S. of Sol. similarly has no express mention of God. The design apparently was, in the absence of the visible theocracy whilst God's people were under the heathen world power, that the historic facts should speak for themselves with expressive silence (just as the book of nature does: Ps. xix., Rom. i. 20), attesting God's providence even when God hid His name and verbal manifestation. When God is invisible He is not the less active. The very absence of the name sets believers about inquiring why? and then they discover that God works no less by His providence in the world where He is veiled than by His grace in the church wherein He is revealed. The hand of Providence is to be traced palpably in the overruling of the king's reckless feasting and wanton deposing of Vashti because she shrank from violating her own self respect, to laying the train for His appointed instrument, E.'s elevation; in Mordecai's saving the king's life from the two would-be assassins, and the recording of the fact in the royal chronicles, preparing the way for his receiving the royal honours which his enemy designed for himself; in Haman's casting Pur, the lot, for an auspicious day for destroying the Jews, and the result being, by God's providence which counterworked his appeal to chance, that the feast of Purim is perpetually kept to commemorate the Jews' preservation and his destruction; in E.'s patriotic venture before the king after previous fasting three days, and God's interposing to incline the king's heart to hold out to her the golden sceptre, ensuring to her at once life and her request (Prov. xxi. 1); in Haman's pride at being invited to the queen's banquet and his preparing the gallows for Haman, and Providence the very night before it, withdrawing sleep from the king so that the chronicles were read for his pleasure, and Mordecai's service was thus brought to his remembrance, so that when Haman came to solicit that Mordecai should be hanged the king met him with the question, "What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour?" Then, in Haman supposing himself to be the object of honour, and suggesting the highest royal honours (such as Joseph had from the Egyptian king, Gen. xli. 43), and thus unwittingly being constrained with his own voice and hand to glorify him whom he had meant to destroy; then in the denouement at the queen's banquet, and Haman's execution on the very gallows he erected for Haman (Ps. vii. 14-16); and the consequent preservation from extinction of the holy race of whom Messiah must spring according to prophecy, and of whom Isaiah (liv. 17) writes, "no weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper, and every tongue that shall rise against thee thou shalt condemn." Comp. vi. 13, lxx. 8; Jer. xxx. 10, 11; Zech. ii. 8, 9. The LXX., at a much later date, interpolated copiously the name of God and other apocryphal additions. The purity of the Heb. canon stands out in striking contrast with the laxity of the Alex. Gr. version. The style of the Heb. in E. is like that of the contemporary Ezra and Chronicles, with just such a mixture of Persian and Chaldee words as we should expect in a work of the age and country to which E. professes to belong. Jerome (Proleg. Gal.) mentions the book by name. So Augustine, De Civit. Dei; and Origen (in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., vi. 25).

Haman the Agagite (Esth. iii. 1, Num. xxiv. 7, 20), as being of the blood royal of Amalek, was doomed to destruction with that accursed nation (Exod. xvii. 14-16). His wife and all his friends shared his guilt (Esth. v. 14), and therefore by a retributive providence shared his punishment (ix.).

E.'s own character is in the main attractive: dutiful to her adoptive father, and regardful of his counsels though a queen; having faith in the high destiny of her nation, and believing with Mordecai that even "if she held her peace at the crisis deliverance would arise to the Jews from another place," and that providentially she had "come to the kingdom for such a time as this" (iv. 14); brave, yet not foolhardy, but fully conscious of her peril, not having received the king's call for 30 days, with pious preparation seeking aid from above in her patriotic venture; "obtaining favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her" (ii. 15). At the same time Scripture does not hide from us the fact of her not being above the vindictiveness of the age and the country, in her requesting that Haman's ten sons should be hanged, and a second day given the Jews to take vengeance on the enemies who had sought to kill them.

Estam. 1. A village in the S. of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 32). 2. In Judah, garrisoned by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 6); near Bethlehem and Tekoah. E. was one of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. iv. 3). 3. E. THE ROCK. Now Beit 'Atab, a steep, stony, bare knoll, standing amidst the winding, narrow valleys, without a blade of corn on its sides, but olive groves at its feet and three abundant springs. This answers to E., which was large enough for 3000 men of Judah to go up to its top. It is not far from Manoh's patrimony whence Samson "went down" to it. Lower than Esh'u'a (Esh'taol) toward the S., yet conspicuous from more than one side (Conder). Into a cleft of it Samson retired after slaying the Philistines for burning the Timnite woman who was to have been his wife (Jud. xv. 8, 11-19). In Judah, with Lehi or En-hak-kore at its foot. Probably near the city E. (2); distant enough from Timnath to seem a safe retreat for Samson from the Philistines' revenge, yet not too far for them to reach in searching after him. The many springs and rocky eminences round Urta seem the likely site where to find the rock of E. and the En-hak-kore. Conder identifying E. with Beit 'Atab says that E., meaning in Heb. "cleft," answers to the singular rock tunnel, roughly hewn in the stone, and running from the midst of the village eastward to the chief spring. This cavern, which is called "the place of refuge," is 250 ft. long, and from 5 to 8 ft. high, and 18 ft. wide. Here Samson could hide without any one lighting, except by accident, on the entrance of the tunnel. Its lowness compared with the main ridge of the watershed accounts for the "came down." Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 3) mentions an Etham 50 furlongs from Jerusalem, where were the sources from which Solomon's pleasure grounds were watered, and Bethlehem and the temple supplied. Williams (Holy City, ii. 500) says there is a wady E. still on the way from Jerusalem to Hebron. A spring exists a few hundred yards S.E. of El-Burak (Solomon's Pools) called Ain Atan, answering to the Heb. for E. (Tyrwhitt Drake, Pal. Expl.).

Etham. An early stage in Israel's sojourn in the wilderness, not far from the Red Sea (Num. xxxiii. 6-8). E. is probably Pithom, the frontier city toward the wilderness. At this point the Israelites were told to change their direction of march and go southward, to the W. of the Bitter Lakes which separated them from the desert (Speaker's Comm., Exod. xiv. 2). Had E. been half way between Mukfar and Ajrud (Robinson, Chart), Pharaoh could not have overtaken them, whether he was at Zoan or Rameses, which was two days journey from E. The journey from E. to PINAHIKORN [see], generally identified with Ajrud, would occupy two or three days. E-tham, like Pi-thom, means "the house" or "temple of Tam."

Ethan. 1. The Ezrahite, one of Mahol's (but Zerah's, of Judah, in 1 Chron. ii. 6 [see DADA]); these Levites being associated with the house of Zerah of Judah by residence or citizenship, comp. Jud. xviii. 7, 1 Sam. i. 1) four sons, whose wisdom Solomon's surpassed (1 Kings iv. 31); title of Ps. lxxxix. 2. Son of Kishi or Kushaiah; head of the Merarite Levites in David's time; a "singer" (1 Chron. vi. 33, 40); with Heman and Asaph, the heads of the other two Levite families, E. was to sound with cymbals (xv. 17, 19). The three names are given in 1 Chron. xvi. 37-41, xxv. 6, 2 Chron. v. 12, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. "Heman the Ezra-bite" (i.e. of the house of Zerah) also appears in the title of Ps. lxxxviii., of which Ps. lxxxix. is the complement. Thus it is probable that Jeduthun is another form of E., and that "E. the Ezrahite" is the same as "E. the singer," though we can only guess as to why he is differently designated in different places. [See MAHOL.]

Ethbaal=with Baal, viz. for his patron god. Ithobalus (= Baal with him) in Menander (Josephus, Apion i. 18), king of Sidon, JEZEBEL'S [see] father (1 Kings xvi. 31). Priest of Astarte. Murdered Phoebe, 50 years after Hiram's death, and usurped the throne of Tyre for 32 years, 910—908 B.C.

Ether. A city in the shephelah or low country of Judah; allotted to Simeon (Josh. xv. 42, xix. 7). JOCHEN in 1 Chron. iv. 32. In the wilderness country below Hebron, E. of Beersheba. Tel Athar now, according to Van de Velde.

Ethiopia. HEB. CUSH [which see, and BABYLON], Isa. xi. 11. S. of Egypt. Now Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, and N. Abyssinia. In a stricter sense the kingdom of Meroe from the junction of the Blue and the White Nile to the border of Egypt. Syene on the N. marked the boundary from Egypt (Ezek. xxix. 10, xxx. 6). The Red Sea was on the E.,

SYENE ON THE NILE.

the Libyan desert on the W. The native name was Ethiush; the Gr. "E." means the land of the sunburnt. Comp. Jer. xiii. 23, "can the Ethiopian change his skin?" "The rivers of E." (Zeph. iii. 10) are the two branches of the Nile and the Astaboras (Taccazo). The Nile forms a series of cataracts here. The dispersed Israelites shall be brought as an offering by the nations to the Lord (ver. 8, 9; Isa. lxvi. 20, lx. 9), from both the African and the Babylonian Cush, where the ten tribes were scattered in Peter's time (1 Pet. i. 1, v. 13; Isa. xi. 11, "from Cush and from Shinar"). The Fashas of Abyssinia are probably of the ten tribes.

In Isa. xviii. 1, "the land shadowing with wings" is E. shadowing (protecting) with its two wings (Egyptian and Ethiopian forces) the Jews, "a nation scattered and peeled" (loaded with indignity, made bald) though once "terrible" when God put a terror of them into surrounding nations (Exod. xxiii. 27, Josh. ii. 9), "a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the (Assyrian) rivers (i.e. armies, Isa. viii. 7, 8) have spoiled"; the Jews, not the Ethiopians. E. had sent her ambassadors to Jerusalem where they now were (xviii. 2). Tirkakah their king shortly afterwards being the ally whose diversion in that city's favour saved it from Sennacherib (xxxix., xxxvii.). Isaiah announces Sennacherib's coming overthrow to the Ethiopian ambassadors, and desires them to carry the tidings to their own land (comp. xvii. 12, 14); not "wee" but "ho," calling attention (xviii. 1, 2); go, take back the tidings of what God is about to do against Assyria, the common foe of both E. and Judah. Queen Candace reigned in this Nile-formed island region; the name is the official designation of a female dynasty shortly before our SKIN-COVERED BOAT.

Lord's time (Acts viii. 27). The "vessels of bulrushes" or papyrus boats are peculiarly suited to the Upper Nile, as being capable of carriage on the shoulders at the rocks and cataracts. "E." is often used when Upper Egypt and E. are meant. It is the Thebaid or Upper Egypt, not E. by itself, that was peopled and cultivated, when most of Lower Egypt was a marsh. Thus E. and Egypt are said (Nah. iii. 9) to be the "strength" of "populous No" or Thebes. Zerah the Ethiopian who attacked Asa at Mareslah on the S. of Palestine, and Tirkakah the Ethiopian who advanced towards Judah against Sennacherib, were doubtless rulers of Upper Egypt and E. combined. Tirkakah's name is found only on a Theban temple, and his connection with E. is marked by several monuments there being ascribed to him. An Azerch-Amen reigned in E., we know from the monuments; perhaps = Zerah (Rawlinson). Hincks identifies him with Osorkon I., king of Egypt, second of the 22nd dynasty [see ASA] (2 Chron. xiv. 9). Tirkakah was third of the 25th dynasty of Egypt, an Ethiopian dynasty. So or Sevechus or Sabacho was another of this dynasty; the ally of Hoshea king of Israel against Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii. 3, 4).

Osirtasin I. (Sesostris, Herodotus, ii. 110), of the 12th dynasty, was the first Egyptian king who ruled E. Whilst the shepherd kings ruled Lower Egypt the 13th native dynasty retired to the Ethiopian capital Napata. Shishak's army was largely composed of Ethiopians (2 Chron. xii. 3). The monuments confirm Isa. xx. 4, Nah. iii. 5, 8, 9, by representing Sargon as warring with Egypt and making the Pharaoh tributary; they also make E. closely united to Egypt. Probably he was provoked by the help which So had given to his rebel tributary Hoshea. The inscriptions tell us Sargon destroyed No-Amon or Thebes in part, which was the capital of Upper Egypt, with which E. was joined. Esarhaddon, according to the monuments, conquered Egypt and E. Meroe was the emporium where the produce of the distant S. was gathered for transport either by the Nile or by caravans to northern Africa; comp. Isa. xlv. 14.

Ethnan. 1 Chron. iv. 7.

Ethni. 1 Chron. vi. 41.

Eubulus. A Christian at Rome whose greeting Paul sends (2 Tim. iv. 21). Some identify him with Aristobulus, the traditional first evangelist of Britain. Associated with PUDENS and CLAUDIA [see].

Euergetes = "benefactor," a title of honour often voted by Greek states to public men. Ptolemy III. and Ptolemy VII. were called so. Our Lord alludes to the title, Luke xxii. 25, "they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors."

Eunice. Timothy's mother. "In her unfeigned faith made its dwelling" (enokēsen); a believing Jewess, but wedded to Timothy's father a Greek, i.e. a heathen (Acts xvi. 1). It is an undesigned coincidence, and so a mark of truth, that in the history just as in the epistle the faith of the mother alone is mentioned, no notice is taken of the father. Probably converted at Paul's first visit to Lystra (xiv. 6, 7). The one parent's faith sanctified the child (1 Cor. vii. 14). The Scriptures were her chief teaching to Timothy from childhood (2 Tim. iii. 15). Lois, her pious mother and Timothy's grandmother, had doubtless taught herself in them: hereditary piety.

Eunuch = bedkeeper. Generally used of those emasculated in order to satisfy the jealousy of masters who committed to them the charge of wives, concubines, and the female apartments. Sometimes implying the high office of "chamberlain," without such emasculation (1 Chron. xxviii. 1). Even the kings of Israel and Judah had eunuchs, probably foreigners (2 Kings ix. 32, Jer. xxxvii. 7). Ethiopians were then, as Nubians now, often so employed. The chief of Pharaoh's cupbearers, and the chief of his cooks, were eunuchs; Potiphar was an "eunuch" (so Heb. of "officer") of Pharaoh's (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xli.). So the Assyrian Rabsharis, or chief eunuch (2 Kings xviii. 17). So in the Persian court there were eunuchs as "keepers of the women," through whom the king gave commands to the women, and kept men at a distance (Esth. i. 10, 12, 15, 16; ii. 3, 8, 14). Daniel and his companions were, possibly, mutilated so as to become eunuchs to the Babylonian king (2 Kings xx. 17, 18; Dan. i. 3-7). In Matt. xix. 12 our Lord uses the term figuratively for those who are naturally, or who artificially, or by self-restraint, have become divested of sexual passion (1 Cor. vii. 26, 32, 34). Our Lord permits, but does not command or recommend, celibacy as superior in sanctity to wedlock; "he that is able to receive it, let him receive it."

Euodias, rather Euodia. A Christian woman, perhaps a deaconess or one of influence at Philippi (Acts xvii. 12). Transl. Phil. iv. 2, 3, "I beseech Euodia, and beseech Syntyche [he separately beseeches each], that they be of the same mind in the Lord. And ('yea' in Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS.) I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help them (i.e. cooperate with, or as Alford, help toward the reconciliation of Euodia and Syntyche) inasmuch as they laboured with me in the gospel." At Philippi women were the first bearers of the gospel, and Lydia the first convert. The coincidence marks genuineness, that in the Epistle to the Philippians alone instructions are given to women who laboured with Paul in the gospel, not without danger (Acts xvi. 13, 19, 20; Phil. i. 28). Eudra and Syntyche were two of "the women who resorted to the river side, where prayer was wont to be made." Being early converted, they would naturally take a leading part in teaching the gospel to other women, in a private sphere of labour (1 Tim. ii. 11, 12).

Euphrates. Eu, Sanskrit su, denotes "good"; the second syllable denotes "abundant." Heb. Prath, now Frath. See EDEN, wherein it is mentioned as one of the four rivers. The bound to which God promised the land given to Abraham's seed should extend. Called "the river," "the great river," as being the largest with which Israel was acquainted, in contrast to the soon drying up torrents of Palestine (Isa. viii. 7; Gen. xv. 18, Deut. i. 7). The largest and longest of the rivers of western Asia. It has two sources in the Armenian mountains, one at Dialli, 25 miles N.E. of Erzeroum, the other N. of the mountain range Ala Togh, not far from Ararat; the two branches meet at Kebhan Mula, the one having run 400 the other 270 miles. The united river runs S.W. and S. through the Taurus and Anti-taurus ranges towards the Mediterranean; but the ranges N. of Lebanon preventing its reaching that sea, it turns S.E. 1000 miles to the Persian gulf. N. of Samsat (Samosita) the stream runs in a narrow valley between mountains. From Samsat to Hit it runs amidst a more open but hilly country. From Hit downwards it runs through a low, flat, alluvial plain. The whole course is 17-80 miles, 650 more than the Tigris and only 200 short of the Indus; for 1200 it is navigable for boats and small steamers. Its greatest width is 700 or 800 miles from the mouth, viz. 400 yards across, from its junction with the Khabour (Chebar) at Carchemish, to Warrat, a village. Below the Khabour it has no tributaries, and so its depth and width decrease. At Babylon its width has decreased to 200 yards, with a depth of 15 ft. Farther down 120 wide, 12 deep. Moreover its water here and lower down is much employed in irrigation; and it has a tendency to expend itself in vast marshes. But 40 miles below Babylon it increases to 200 yards wide, and when joined by the Tigris it is half a mile wide. The yearly inundation in May is due to the melting of the snows in the Armenian mountains. Nebuchadnezzar (Abyden., Fr. 8) controlled the inundation by turning the water through sluices into channels for distribution over the whole country. Boats of wicker-work, coated with bitumen and time. By this river the East and West carried on mutual commerce during the successive periods of Babylonian and Persian rule.

As Babylon represents mystically the apostate church, so the waters of E., "where the whore sitteth" (in impious parody of Jehovah who "sitteth upon the flood"), represent the "peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues," which were her main support (Rev. xvii. 15, 16). The drying up of Babylon's waters answers to the ten kings' stripping, eating, and burning the whore, which is now being enacted in many European countries (xvi. 12). "The kings of the E." (comp. Rev. i. 6) are the saints of Israel and the Gentiles accompanying the king of Israel in "glory returning from the way of the East" (Ezek. xliii. 2, Matt. xxiv. 27). The obstacles which stood in the way of Israel and her king returning, viz. the apostate church (both Rome and the Greek apostasy) and her multitudinous peoples, shall be dried up, her resources being drained off, just as Cyrus marched into Babylon through the dry channel of the E.

The promise to Abraham that his seed's inheritance should reach the E. (Gen. xv. 18, Deut. i. 7, Josh. i. 4) received a very partial fulfilment in Reuben's pastoral possessions (1 Chron. v. 9, 10) (the Hagarites here encountered them, the inscriptions confirming Scripture as to their appearance upon the middle E. in the later empire); a fuller accomplishment under David and Solomon, when an annual tribute was paid from subject petty kingdoms in that quarter, as Hadadezer king of Zobah, etc. (1 Chron. xviii. 3; 2 Sam. viii. 3-8; 1 Kings iv. 21; 2 Chron. ix. 26). The full accomplishment awaits Messiah's coming again. [See CANAAN.]

The E. was the boundary between Assyria and the Hittite country, after Solomon's times, according to inscriptions. But Assyria at last drove back the Hittites from the right bank. [See CARCHMISH.]

Euroclydon. Acts xxvii. 14. Sin., Vat. Alex. MSS. read Euragylon, i.e. the E.N.E. wind, just the wind best suited to the facts. It came down from the island of Crete, S. of which Paul was sailing. It was "typhoon like" (typhonikos, A.V. "tempestuous"), such gales in the Levant being often accompanied by terrific squalls from the mountains. The "S. wind" (ver. 13) too is the one that often changes suddenly to a violent N. wind. The long continuance of the gale ("the fourteenth night," 27), the beclouding of sun and stars for days (20), and the heavy "rain" after the storm (xxviii. 2), are characteristic of this wind in the Mediterranean in the present day. The vessel being driven from the coast to Claudia isle (xxvii. 16), and the fear lest she should be driven S.W. to the African Syrtis (17), favour this reading.

Eutychus. Acts xx. 9. A youth who sat in a window and, falling asleep during Paul's long and late discourse, fell from the third storey, and was restored to life by the apostle, who fell on the dead body and embraced it, as Elijah of old (1 Kings xvii. 21), and Elisha (2 Kings iv. 34). Evangelist. An order of ministers, "given" among other church officers by Christ, as one of the fruits of His ascension, to His church on and after pentecost. Not only the office, but the men, were a Divine gift: "He gave some to be apostles, and some to be prophets (inspired forthtellers, not foretellers), and some to be evangelists," i.e. itinerant missionary preachers, whereas "pastors and teachers" were stationary (Eph. iv.). The evangelist founded the church; the teacher built it up in the faith. The ministry of gifts preceded the ministry of orders. The irregular "evangelist" prepared the way for the regular "pastor." Apostles (Acts viii. 25, xiv. 7; 1 Cor. i. 17) or vicars apostolic, as Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 2-5), might "preach (herald, kerussein) the word," and so "do the work of an evangelist." Philip had been set apart as one of the seven (Acts vii., viii., xxi.) by the laying on of the apostles' hands. Christ gave him to the church, additionally, in the capacity of an "evangelist" now in one city, now in another. So others scattered by persecution (viii. 4) "went everywhere evangelistically preaching (evangelizomenoi) the word." The "pastors" taught and exhorted; the "evangelists" preached the glad tidings which prepared the way for the pastorate. It was therefore a work rather than an order. The evangelist was not necessarily an apostle, bishop-elder, or deacon, but might be any of these. Evangelist, in the sense "inspired writer of one of the four Gospels," was a later usage. Eusebius (H. E., iii. 37) in the third century says: "men do the work of evangelists, leaving their homes to preach Christ, and deliver the written Gospels to those who were ignorant of the faith." The transition step appears in 2 Cor. viii. 18, 19, "the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches," probably Luke, well known throughout the churches as Paul's companion in evangelistic work, and at that time with Paul (Acts xx. 6). Of all Paul's "companions in travel" (Acts xix. 29), Luke was the most prominent, having been his companion in preaching at his first entrance into Europe (xvi. 10). Paul probably helped Luke in writing his Gospel, as Peter helped Mark. This accounts for the remarkable similarity between Paul's account of the institution of the Lord's supper (1 Cor. xi. 23) and Luke's account, an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. So in 1 Tim. v. 18 Paul says, "the Scripture saith, The labourer is worthy of his reward," quoted from Luke x. 7; but Matt. x. 10 has "his meat;" whereby he recognises the Gospel according to Luke as inspired "Scripture," and naturally quotes that one of the Gospels which was written by his own evangelistic helper. Luke's Gospel had then been about eight or nine years in circulation. Our home and foreign missionaries correspond to the primary "evangelists"; they travelled about freely where their services were needed, either to propagate the gospel or to inspect and strengthen congregations already formed. Timothy was such a missionary bishop or vicar apostolic at Ephesus (1 Tim. i. 3, 2 Tim. iv. 5).

Eve=life. (See ADAM.) Man's "help meet," i.e. a helper suited to and matching him. Formed from "one of Adam's ribs," taken by God from Adam in a deep sleep; type of the church formed from the opened side of her Heavenly Bridegroom (whence flowed blood and water) in the death sleep, so as by faith in His atonement blood, and by the cleansing water of His Holy Spirit, to be "bone of His bone, and flesh of His flesh" (Eph. v. 25-32, 1 John v. 6). Transl. Gen. ii. 21, 22, "the rib builded (the usual Heb. word for founding a family: xvi. 2, xxx. 3 marg.) He up into a woman"; not as Speaker's Comm., "the side He built up," etc. For God "took one of them," therefore "side" (*tzela*h), "sides," must be used for rib, ribs. So the ancient versions. "Woman was not made out of his head to top him, not out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, but out of his side to be equal with him, under his arm to be protected, and near his heart to be beloved. He was first formed, then Eve (1 Tim. ii. 13), of the man and for the man (1 Cor. xi. 7-9); teaching the subjection and reverence which wives owe their husbands. Yet E.'s being made after Adam, and out of him, makes her 'the glory of the man.' If man is the head, she is the crown; a crown to her husband, the crown of the visible creation" (Henry). Her finer susceptibilities and more delicate organization are implied by her being formed, not out of dust as Adam, but of flesh already formed. The oneness of flesh is the foundation of the inseparable marriage union of one man with one woman (Mal. ii. 15, Matt. xix. 5). She was made from Adam's rib, to mark her oneness with him. Their unity is at once corporeal and spiritual of the profoundest kind, of heart as well as of body. "This is now (Heb. this time, as contrasted with the creatures heretofore formed besides Adam) bone of my bones," he exclaims in joyful surprise; and, with the intuitive knowledge wherewith he had named the other creatures according to their natures, he names her "woman" (isha) as being taken out of "man" (ish). She was the complement of man, of one nature, and in free and willing dependence on him. Thus marriage is the holy appointment of God, based on the relations by creation between man and woman. Celibacy is not a higher, holier state (Heb. xiii. 4).

E.'s greater weakness and susceptibility to temptation appears in Gen. iii. and 2 Cor. xi. 3. Her first error was in harbouring mentally for a moment the possibility insinuated by the serpent, of God not having her truest interests at heart ("bath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree?"), and of the "other" professing friend being more concerned for her good than God. In her reply to Satan she attenuates God's gracious permission ("of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat"; "we may eat of every tree"), she exaggerates the one simple prohibition ("thou shalt not eat of it," and "thou shalt surely [she leaves out the surely] die"; "ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die"), and omits the certainty of the penalty. Unbelief toward God, credulity towards Satan. Easily deceived, she easily deceives. Last in being, first in sin. Satan began with "the weaker vessel." She yielded to his deceits; Adam to conjugal love. So the woman is sentenced next after Satan, and Adam last. In Rom. v. 12 Adam is made the transgressor; but there E. is included, he representing the sinning race as its head. "She shall be saved (though) with childbearing," i.e. though suffering her part of the primal curse in childbearing; just as man shall be saved though having to bear his part, the sweat of the brow. Yea, the very curse will be a condition favourable to her salvation, by her faithfully ("if they . . . the women . . . shall continue in faith and charity") performing her part, childbearing and home duties, her sphere, as man's is public teaching and public duties (1 Tim. iii. 11-15). [See ABEL, CAIN, SETH.] Her name Chavvah, life, implies both her being mother of all living and her being mother of the promised "Seed of the woman" who should give LIFE to the human race now subjected to death. Adam as a believer fitly gives her this name directly after God's promise of life through "the Seed of the woman." Otherwise her name ought to have implied death, which she had caused, not life.

Evi. One of the five kings of Midian slain by Israel. His land was allotted to Reuben (Num. xxi., xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

Evil Merodach. Son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. During the latter's exclusion from men among beasts, E. administered the government. On Nebuchadnezzar's resuming it at the end of seven years, he heard of his son's misconduct and that E. had exulted in his father's calamity. He therefore cast E. into prison, where the prince met Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, and became his friend. When E. mounted the throne therefore he brought him out of prison, changed his prison garments, and set his throne above the throne of the kings with him in Babylon, and "Jehoiachin did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life" (Jer. li. 31-34). After a two years reign, 561-559 B.C., he was murdered by Neriglissar (Nergal Sharezer), a Babylonian noble (married to his sister), who seized the crown. E. was guilty of lawless government, according to Berosus, possibly because of his showing greater lenity than his father.

Excommunication. As the church is a society constituted for maintaining certain doctrines and corresponding morals, it plainly has the right to exclude from communion such as flagrantly violate its doctrinal and moral code. The Jews had three forms of excommunication, alluded to in Luke vi. 22 by our Lord, "blessed are ye when men shall separate you from their company (the Jewish midai, for 30 days), and shall reproach you (the second form, cherem, for 90 days [see ANATHHEMA], Jud. v. 23), and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake" (the third form, shammatha, perpetual cutting off): John ix. 34, 35 marg.; comp. Exod. xxx. 33, 38; also John xii. 42, xvi. 2.

Christian excommunication is commanded by Christ (Matt. xviii. 15-18); so 1 Tim. i. 20, 1 Cor. v. 11, Tit. iii. 10; "delivering unto Satan" means casting out of the church, Christ's kingdom of light, into the world that lieth in the wicked one, the kingdom of Satan and darkness (Col. i. 13, Eph. vi. 12, Acts xxvi. 18, 1 John v. 19). The apostles besides, under Divine inspiration, inflicted bodily sicknesses and death on some (e.g. Acts v., Ananias and Sapphira; xiii. 10, Elymas). For other cases of virtual, if not formal, exclusion from communion, though in a brotherly not proud spirit, see 2 Thess. iii. 14, Rom. xvi. 17, Gal. v. 12, 1 Tim. vi. 3, 2 John 10, 3 John 10, Rev. ii. 20, Gal. i. 8, 9. St. Paul's practice proves that excommunication is a spiritual penalty, the temporal penalty inflicted by the apostles in exceptional cases being evidently of extraordinary and Divine appointment and no model to us; it consisted in exclusion from the church: the object was the good of the offender (1 Cor. v. 5) and the safeguard of the sound members (2 Tim. ii. 17); its subjects were those guilty of heresy and great immorality (1 Tim. i. 20); it was inflicted by the church (Matt. xviii. 18) and its representative ministers (Tit. iii. 10; 1 Cor. v. 1, 3, 4). Paul's infallible authority when inspired is no warrant for uninspired ministers claiming the same right to direct the church to excommunicate as they will (2 Cor. ii. 7-9). Penitence is the condition of restoration. Temporary affliction often leads to permanent salvation (Ps. lxxxiii. 16); Satan's temporary triumph is overruled "to destroy the flesh that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (Luke xxii. 31).

Executioner. An officer of high rank in the East; commander of the bodyguard who executed the king's sentence. So Ptolemy (Gen. xxxvii. 36 marg., xl. 3); his official residence was at the public jail. So Nebuzardan (Jer. xxxix. 9) and Arioch (Dan. ii. 14, Mark vi. 27). "The king (Herod) sent an executioner," lit. one of his bodyguard; speculator, a military watch or scout, from the vigilance the office required.

Exodus, the = the departure of Israel from Egypt, 1652 B.C. [See CHRONOLOGY.] A grand epoch in the history of man's redemption. The patriarchal dispensation ends and the law begins here. God by His providential preparations having wonderfully led the Hebrews to sojourn in Egypt, and there to unlearn their nomad habits and to learn agriculture and the arts of a settled life, now by equally wonderful interpositions leads them out of Egypt into the wilderness. Joseph's high position had secured their settlement in the best of the land, apart from the Egyptians, yet in a position favourable to their learning much of that people's advanced civilization, favourable also to their multiplication and to their preserving their nationality. Many causes concurred to prevent their imbibing Egypt's notorious idolatry and corruption. As shepherds they were "an abomination to the Egyptians" from the first; they sacrificed the very animal the Egyptians worshipped (comp. Exod. viii. 26); blood in sacrifices too was an offence to the Egyptians. Jacob and Joseph on their deathbeds had charged that their bodies should be buried in Canaan (Gen. i. 1), thereby impressing on their descendants that Egypt was only a place of sojourn, that they should look forward to Canaan as their inheritance and home. The new Pharaoh that knew not Moses was Aahmes I., 1706 B.C., about the same date as Levi's death, the last of Joseph's generation, mentioned in connection with the rise of the new king. The exodus occurred early in the reign of Thothmes II. (Cook, in Speaker's Comm.) [See EGYPT.] The persecution that followed on their foretold multiplication, shortly before Moses' birth (no such difficulty attended Aaron's preservation just three years previously, Exod. vii. 7), was divinely overruled towards weaning them from Egypt and binding them together as one people. The ready supply of their bodily wants in Egypt (Num. xi. 5) and the rich valley of the Nile rendered this corrective discipline the more needful, in order to rouse them to realize their high destiny and to be willing to depart. Even Moses, who had been so marvellously trained to be their leader, failed at first to awaken them; both he and they needed a further severe discipline of 40 years. At its close he was hailed as their leader. But the Pharaoh of that day rejected with scorn Moses and Aaron's application for leave to depart; "Who is Jehovah, that I should obey His voice to let Israel go? I know not Jehovah, neither will I let Israel go" (Exod. v. 2). Then followed the ten plagues [see EGYPT] on the idols, as well as on the property and persons of Pharaoh and his people, culminating in the slaying of the firstborn and his own (Thothmes II.) [see EGYPT] destruction at the Red Sea.

Moses' first proposal to Pharaoh had been for a journey into the wilderness adjoining Goshen, not beyond the frontier, three days in all going and returning, in order to sacrifice. Pharaoh's refusal of this reasonable request (Exod. iii. 18) ended in Moses' demand for their absolute manumission and departure (xi., xii. 31-33). Israel set forth from RAMESSES [see] (Gen. xlvii. 11; Aahmes I. had a son, RAMESSES, distinct from Ramesstus two centuries later) at early morn of the 15th day of the first month (Num. xxxiii. 3). They reached the Red Sea in three journeys. Here, whilst they passed safely through, Pharaoh perished in the waters (Ps. cxxxv. 15). Natural causes alone will not explain the facts of the case, especially if they are taken in connection with God's prophecy of them through Moses. The fact of the exodus of an unwarlike people in the face of their warlike masters requires to be accounted for. No account can be given so satisfactory as that in the pentateuch, that it was by God's miraculous interposition. The growing severity of the plagues accords with God's judicial character in dealing with a sinner who more and more hardens himself, till he is destroyed without remedy (Ps. vii. 11-13, Prov. xxix. 1). Both Israel and the Egyptians were made experimentally to know Jehovah (Exod. vi. 7, vii. 5). The result was, the latter were so anxious for Israel's departure that these "asked" (not "borrowed," shaal) and the Egyptians freely "complied with the request by giving" (not "lent," hishil) raiment and jewels (xii. 35, 36). An earnest of the church's and Israel's final triumph over the persecuting world, "they shall spoil those that spoiled them, and rob those that robbed them" (Exod. xxxix. 10, Zech. xiv. 14).

Israel's own national conviction of the truthfulness of the narrative, its geographical accuracy and local colouring, the plain evidences that it is the account of an eye-witness, and lastly the record being of what is anything but to the credit of Israel, all these circumstances are consistent only with fact, not fiction. The desert of their wanderings was better supplied with pasture and water then than now, and doubtless they spread themselves widely over it. At the exodus both the Hebrews and Egyptians had a contemporary literature, which is inconsistent with the theory of the story being mythical. Instead of the direct way to Canaan by Philistia on the S., God led Israel through the wilderness of the Red Sea, lest encountering the warlike Philistines they should repent when they saw war (xiii. 17, 18). They "went up marshalled in orderly array," "five in a rank" marg. (but Gesenius "eager for battle," which hardly accords with their past state as serfs), for so the Heb. for "harnessed" means; but not yet inured to hardship or trained sufficiently for war, as subsequently. As Moses' 40 years sojourn in the wilderness trained him for being their leader there, so their 40 years in it trained them for the conflicts in Canaan.

The first two days' march brought Israel from RAMESSES (the general name of the district, and the city built by Israel on the canal from the Nile to lake Timsah) by way of Succoth, to Etham or Pithom, the frontier city of Egypt (Hieroopolis) near the S. end of lake Timsah, on the edge of the wilderness, and the route to Palestine. Thence by God's direction they turned S. on the W. side of the Bitter Lakes to Pihabiroth (Ajrud, a two or three days' march) over against Baalze-phon. The Red Sea at that time extended to the Bitter Lakes, which lay at its northern end. The agency whereby the passage was effected was natural, overruled by God to subserve His purpose of redeeming His people; in this lies its supernatural element; "the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided" (Ps. cxiv. 3). To the N. the water covered the whole district; to the S. was the Red Sea. The Israelites crossed the sea at Suez, four leagues distant from the elevation above Pihabiroth, and made their first station on the E. side of the sea at the oasis of Ayun Musa (eight or nine miles below Suez) where water was abundant. Passing by Marah, they encamped under the palm trees of Elim (wady Gharandil) by the waters. Thence to Ras Selima or Zenimeh, a headland on the Red Sea (Num. xxxiii. 10). Next the wilderness of Sin (Debbet or Ramleh) between Elim and Sinai. There they remained some days, suffering at first from want of food (not of water) but supplied with quails and then manna. Thence they encamped first at Dophkah, then at Alush. Thence to Rephidim, where God gave them water from the rock of Horeb; there Amalek attacked them. Next the wilderness of Sinai. Fifteen days elapsed between the encampment in the wilderness of Sin and their arrival at Sinai mount (Exod. xvi. 1; comp. xix. 1). The Debbet or Ramleh probably is the wilderness of Sin, bare and desolate; debbet and sin alike meaning "sand level, raised, and extended through the surface of the district." Wady Nasb, the first station on this route, affords water abundant, answering to the "wilderness of Sin" encampment, where they made no complaint of want of water; the water supply accounts for their halting some days here. The route passes Sarabit el Khadim, where are ruins and inscriptions proving its occupation by an Egyptian colony before Moses' time, so that the road would be sure to be kept in order and the watersprings kept open. A small colony would neither be disposed, nor able, to attack such a host as Israel. Dophkah was in wady Sih, both names meaning "flowing waters." Alush is probably wady el Esh; wady es Sherikh is a two hours journey from this. The wady es Rahah is the "wilderness of Sinai," where the assembled people heard the law proclaimed from Ras Suf- safeh, a bold granite cliff 2000 ft. high, the N. point of the Sinai range. The surveyors of the wilderness of Sinai, Capts. Wilson and Palmer, accompanied by Rev. F. W. Holland, regard the route S. of the above N.E. route the true one, viz. by El Markha along the shore from Ras Selima, and then E. by wady Feiran, meeting the N.E. route at wady es Sheikh. Their reasons are coincident with Scripture notices of topography, superior facilities for travel, the unlikelihood that Moses would have brought Israel down to the coast and then taken them back to pursue a more difficult road than that lying open before him. But there are no springs by their route, and Israel's march was slow (Canon Cook). They make the battle with Amalek at the ancient city of Feiran, but this would make "the mount of God" to be mount Serbal, which is rather one of the Sinai range; and the palmgroves of Feiran could hardly be called a "wilderness." Rephidim is probably at the pass el Watyeh, shut in by perpendicular rocks, to Amalek a capital point for attack on Israel, commanding the entrance to the wadies surrounding the central Sinai. But the Ordnance Survey of Sinai by Capts. Palmer and Wilson identifies Rephidim with the part of wady Feiran N. of Serbal; then the battle would be at wady Aleyat. On the N. is a large plain without water, where Israel encamped. A bare cliff N. of the pass commanding the battlefield was such a rock as Moses may have struck with his rod. On the S. is a plain with water supply near, where Amalek might encamp.

The absence of any level plain immediately below, or S.E. in the wady Sebnyeh within sight of the summit of jebel Musa (the loftiest and grandest summit of all), the S. point of the Sinai range, excludes it from being the summit from which the law was proclaimed. But on the N. end of the Sinai range Ras Sufsafeh has the wady el Deir to the N.E., meeting the wady es Sheikh (close by Rephidim), and in front the wider plain er Rahah, 400 acres, abundantly large enough for the Israelite host. Every part of these two wadies commands the full view of the granite rocks of Ras Sufsafeh. "No spot in the world combines in a greater degree commanding height and a plain whence the two millions of Israel could see and hear all that is narrated. The awful and lengthened approach as to some natural sanctuary, the plain not shut in but presenting a long retiring sweep against which the people could remove and stand afar off; the cliff rising suddenly and steeply so that it could easily be marked off by 'bounds' like a huge altar in front of the whole congregation, and visible against the sky in lonely grandeur from end to end of the whole plain, the very image of the 'mount that might be touched,' and from which the 'voice' of God might be heard far and wide over the stillness of the plain below, witnessed at that point to the utmost extent by the confluence of all the contiguous valleys; the adytum (shrine) withdrawn as if in the end of the world from all the stir and confusion of earthly things" (Stanley, in Canon Cook's essay, vol. i., Speaker's Comm.). The physical formation favours the acoustic properties of this vast theatre, which are intensified by the stillness and the clearness of the air. Ras Sufsafeh fulfils the conditions of Scripture, a mount easy of approach, with large open space before it for all to hear the law, prominent and rising abruptly so that the people "stood under the mountain which could be touched" (Exod. xix. 12-17, Deut. iv. 2); and water and pasturage in abundance were near. A small height at the entrance of the convent valley is named as the spot whence Aaron witnessed the feast of the golden calf. Joshua, in descending with Moses, hears the shout of the feasters without seeing the cause. The sight breaks on Moses suddenly only when near the camp, and he breaks the tables "beneath the mount." This would be exactly the case with one descending the mountain path by which Ras Sufsafeh is approached through oblique gullies (three quarters of an hour to a mountaineer). He would hear the sounds rising in the still air from the plain, but not see the plain till he emerged from the wady right under the steep rock of Sufsafeh. The brook is probably that flowing through the Seil Leja. The Israelites passed a whole year encamped "before the mount," and the pasturage and water supply at Ras Sufsafeh are much greater than those at Serbal, or in any other part of the peninsula. Within a radius of six miles there is an area of 1200 acres in plains and wadies commanding the view of Ras Sufsafeh, and formerly the rain supply and fertility were greater when there were more trees; the wadies had dams put across to restrain the waters; the mountains were terraced with gardens. On the N.W. of Ras Sufsafeh is a rampart of cliffs 3000 ft. high, 14 miles long, pierced by only two defiles. This peculiar feature afforded Israel the needful security during their long stay at Sinai. At Erweis el Ebeing, not far from the wady el Hadherah (Hazereth), remains are found which are probably Israelite, and mark the site of the camp Kibroth Hattaavah. About 300 yds. from the base of Ras Sufsafeh there runs across the plain a low semicircular mound, forming a natural theatre; farther off, on either side of the plain, the slopes of the enclosing mountains would seat great hosts. Not far off, a recess one mile and a half long, three quarters broad, would form an additional camping ground.

THE BOOK OF EXODUS. The history of Israel (1) enslaved, (2) redeemed, (3) consecrated religiously and politically to God. There are two distinct parts: (1) chaps. i.—xix., the history of Israel's deliverance from the beginning of their Egyptian bondage to their arrival at Sinai; (2) xx.—xl., the giving of the law and Israel's organization as "a kingdom of priests and an holy nation." The two parts, though differing in style as in subject matter, are closely intertwined, the institutions of the law in the second part resting on the historical facts recorded in the former part. The term Exodus, "the going forth," is drawn from the LXX., the Gr. version of the Alexandrian Jews settled in the same country whence Israel had "gone forth." The Palestinian Jews called the book from its first two Heb. words, Elleh Shemoth; "these are the names." Its separation from Genesis is marked by the different circumstances under which it presents Israel at its commencement as compared with the close of Genesis. The first seven verses are the introduction briefly recapitulating previous events and stating the existing condition of affairs. Its close is marked by the completion of the tabernacle. Its several sections were probably written on separate papyri or parchments (according to an inscription of Thebes III. his campaigns were written on parchment and hung up in the temple of Ammon). The breaks in the narrative, and the repetitions, accord with the theory that there were distinct sections, composed separately by Moses as the events transpired, and read publicly at successive times. All would be united in one work towards the close of his life, with but a few additions and explanations.

The feature which is inexplicable if any one else were the author is this, the writer's evident unconsciousness of the personal greatness of the chief actor. The Egyptians recognised his greatness (xi. 3); but the writer, while recognising the greatness of Moses' mission, dwells especially on his want of natural gifts, his deficiencies of character and the hindrances thereby caused to his mission, and the penalties he incurred; his hasty intervention between the Israelite and Egyptian, the manslaughter, and the Israelites' rejection of him as a ruler, and his exile for the prime 40 years of his manhood. Then his unbelieving hesitancy at the Divine call and pertinacious allegation of personal incapacity in spite of the miracles which might have convinced him of God's power to qualify him (iii. 10-13). Then the Lord's visitation on him (probably sudden and dangerous sickness) for neglecting to circumcise his son (iv. 24-26). [See CIRCUMCISION.] Then his passionate reproach of Jehovah for the failure of his first appeal to Pharaoh, which only brought more bitter hardship on Israel (v. 20-23). His courageous boldness before Pharaoh is never praised. Not his wisdom or foresight, but God's guidance, is prominent throughout. The first battle fought is under Joshua's lead. The only step attributed to human sagacity, the organizing of a body of assistant judges (xviii.), is attributed to Jethro not Moses. The same feature appears in subsequent books of the pentateuch, his shrinking from self vindication when assailed by Miriam and Aaron (Num. xii.); his impetuous temper at the water of Meribah

Kadesh, smiting the rock irreverently and hence excluded by God from the promised land. This all is what we might expect if Moses was the author; but no later writer would be so silent as to the sublime greatness of his character. Contrast the three closing verses of Deuteronomy, added by a reviser in order to record his death.

Again, Exodus was evidently written by one minutely acquainted at once with Egypt and the Sinaitic peninsula. The route from Egypt to Horeb is traced with the local colouring and specific accuracy of an eyewitness. No eyewitness of Israel's journeyings possessed such means of observation as Moses. The miracles severally suit the place, the time, and the circumstances under which they are stated to have been wrought; the plagues are essentially Egyptian; the supply of Israel's wants in the wilderness is in harmony with the national characteristics of the country. Canon Cook (Speaker's Comm.) truly says, "we find nature everywhere, but nature in its Master's hand."

The nine plagues stand in three groups, each increasing in severity. Then the tenth is threatened and the failure of the other nine declared. "Jehovah hardened Pharaoh's heart so that he would not let Israel go." The delay answered a double purpose. To Pharaoh it was the long-suffering appeal of God, who is slow to anger, and who tries the milder chastisements to bring the sinner if possible to repentance before resorting to the more severe. To Israel it afforded ample time for preparation for the exodus. Two months elapsed between Moses' first and second interviews with Pharaoh; the former in April, when the Israelites were scattered throughout all Egypt gathering the stubble of the harvest just reaped (the reapers leaving the stalks standing and cut close to the ears), the latter in June at the time of the Nile's yearly overflow when "the king went out into the water" to offer his devotions to Apis, whose embodiment the river was (v. 12, vii. 15). Israel's "scattering" tended to nroot them from their long settlement in Goshen and to train them for their approaching wilderness life. The Nile, the centre of Egypt's national and religious life, was smitten, assuring Israel of Jehovah's interposition. Three months elapsed before the next plague, giving them time to look about them for the means of escape from present wrongs. The plague of frogs attacked the Egyptian worship of nature under that revolting form (Hehka, a female god of the inundation; Seti, father of Rameses II., is represented offering wine to an enshrined frog, with the legend "the sovereign lady of both worlds"); this was in September, when the inundation is at its height and the frogs (dofida) usually appear. Of the third plague no warning was given; so the third is marked in each of the other two groups of plagues. The lice or mosquitoes (kinim) penetrating into the nostrils and ears, or rather the tick (the size of a grain of sand, which when filled with blood swells to the size of a hazel nut), came soon after the frogs, early in October. So closed the first group, none of the three causing great calamity, but enough to warn the Egyptians and to give hope to Israel.

The second group began with the arob, dog flies (whose bite inflames severely, and particularly the eyelid), or else beetles (worshipped by the Egyptians as the symbol of creative and reproductive power; the sun god was represented as a beetle; thus their god was fittingly made the instrument of their punishment, inflicting a painful bite, and consuming various articles). This plague, exceeding the former in severity, came in November at the critical time to Egyptian agriculture when the Nile's inundation has subsided. Then first Goshen was severed from Egypt and spared the plague. Pharaoh shows the first signs of yielding, but when the plague ceased would not let Israel go. Then came the cattle murrain or mortality, striking at the resources of Egypt; a contagious epidemic which broke out in Egypt often after the annual inundation had subsided. The cattle are in the fields from December to April, the change from the stalls to the open air and to fresh pastures predisposing them to it. Israel's separation of their cattle from the contagion would be a step in their preparations for the exodus. The boils (burning carbuncles) were the third and closing plague of the second group, sent without previous notice, and warning the Egyptians during its three months continuance that their bodies would suffer if Pharaoh should still resist God.

The third group began with the hail, which as in the present day prevailed from the middle of February to the beginning of March. Moses for the first time warned Pharaoh to bring all cattle out of the field, on pain of their destruction. Many of the Egyptians feared Jehovah's word and obeyed, whilst the rest suffered for their disregard. In Goshen alone was no hail, so Isa. xxxii. 18, 19. Pharaoh for the first time cried, "I have sinned this time, Jehovah is righteous, I and my people are wicked" (Exod. ix. 27). The flax being "botted," i.e. in blossom, marks the time as the middle of February, when also the "barley" is "in the ear." Wheat and rye (rather spelt or dowra) are not ready till April, and so escaped. Israel received leave to go, and now knew they had sympathisers even among Pharaoh's servants. The locusts followed on Pharaoh's retracting leave. Vegetation was then at its full in the middle of March. The dread of such a scourge made Pharaoh's servants intercede to "let the men go" lest "Egypt should be destroyed." Pharaoh consented, but on hearing Moses' demand that young and old, sons and daughters, flocks and herds, should go, refused peremptorily, saying "evil is before you," i.e., your intentions are evil. The E. wind upon Moses' stretching his rod over Egypt by Jehovah's command brought up the locusts. They often came from the western deserts, but sometimes from the E. and S.E. On Pharaoh's confession of sin and entreaty Moses besought the Lord and they disappeared as quickly as they came, before a wind from the sea (Heb.), i.e. N.W. wind, sweeping transversely all Egypt and casting them into the Red Sea. The third of the third group followed, as in the close of the former two groups, without warning; the three days "darkness which might be felt" (probably owing to the S.W. wind from the desert after the spring equinox filling the air densely with fine sand, so that none during it rise from their place, men and beasts hide, this darkness could literally be "felt"). This preceded by but a few days the slaying of the firstborn, the plague which stands by itself, alone bringing death into every Egyptian family and ensuring Israel's deliverance.

Thus the plagues have a genuine Egyptian colouring, and at the same time the requisite adaptation to Israel's position, awakening their expectations and securing to them time for organization, without which they would have been an undisciplined mob in their march. None but one thoroughly acquainted with Egypt could have written the account. Pharaoh and his people rightly regarded the successive visitations as natural to Egypt, yet so overruled in their intensity, in their coming and going at Moses' call to Jehovah, and in their gradual heightening when the Divine will continued to be resisted, as to be supernatural and palpably sent from above. The Divine aim was to vindicate Jehovah's lordship, not merely over the enslaved Hebrews but over Egypt and its king, the representative of the heathen world powers with whom God's controversy is, "to the end that thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth" (viii. 22). The most appropriate way to effect this was not to send strange terrors but to show, by intensifying and controlling at will the visitations ordinarily felt in Egypt and falsely attributed by them to particular idols, that all these visitations are at Jehovah's absolute disposal to inflict, increase, or wholly withdraw, subserving His purposes of wrath to His adversaries, of mercy to His people, and of the setting forth of His own glory to the whole world (ix. 16); comp. Ps. lxxviii. 43-49, "sending evil angels among them"; the plagues are figuratively His messengers ("angels") in the hands of heavenly angels, of whom the destroying angel was in closest communion with Jehovah (ver. 51); comp. Exod. xii. 13, 23, 29, Heb. xi. 28, for deity with a frog's head, the symbol of regeneration, wife of Chnum, the God sends good angels to punish the bad, and bad angels to chastise the good. The plagues were so mutually connected as not to leave any place for any considerable interpolations. None could be omitted without breaking the moral and natural order which is so clearly indicated though not formally expressed. Nor could they have been so harmoniously, and at the same time so artlessly, woven together from documents of different ages. Canon Cook, whose remarks are here epitomized, gives a list of words found only in E., or in the pentateuch, derived from roots common to Heb. and Egyptian, or found only in Egyptian; and these occur indiscriminately in the so-called Jehovistic and Elohistie passages. No Hebrew born and brought up in Palestine from the exodus down to Solomon would have had the knowledge of the Egyptian tongue apparent in E., and no author would have given the Egyptian words without explanation, had he not known that his readers would be equally familiar with them.

None but one in Moses' circumstances could have described the wanderings in the wilderness of Sinai with such a peculiarly local colouring. At the same time the very objections to some of his details, on the ground of the different state of the peninsula now in some respects, only confirm the antiquity and genuineness of his record. The desert now would be utterly incapable of sustaining such a host, nor is it a sufficient answer to this objection to say that Providence interposed to feed them. For these providential interpositions were restricted to particular occasions. Ordinarily, according to God's usual way of dealing with His children, they depended on natural supplies. Inscriptions both in Egypt and in the peninsula, as early as Susefr of the third dynasty and of the three following dynasties, and of Hatasu, widow of Thothmes II. (drowned in the Red Sea), describe victories over the Mentu, the mountaineers of the peninsula, and other native tribes. These prove the existence then of a population so considerable that they resisted large Egyptian armies. The Egyptians succeeded in working copper mines at Sarbet el Khadim and Mughara, where there are many inscriptions. The springs and wells were then carefully preserved, in order to keep open their communication with these settlements. The inscription as to the gold mines near Dakkeh mentions a well 180 ft. deep, dug by order of Seti I. and Rameses II. The trees were religiously preserved and fresh plantations made. But since Egypt's power has gone the Arabs have for ages cut away the trees on which the rain, and so the fertility of the district, chiefly depend. The following undesigned coincidences between the present state of the peninsula and the accounts in E. confirm the accurate truth and genuineness of the book. E. describes water as wanting where none now is found, abundance where springs still exist and traces of a far greater supply anciently, tracts at the same distances where food would not be found, a natural manna in the rainy season especially, but not adequate in quantity and nutriment without supernatural modification; nomad hordes attack Israel just where and when the attack, judging from present appearances of the locality, might well be expected. The unvarying tradition of the Jews, to whom E. was addressed, confirms the impression of genuineness which the internal innumerable coincidences produce on the mind.

Finally, the form, structure, and materials of the tabernacle belong to the wilderness. The slittim or acacia, its material, was the wood of the desert; cedar took its place in Solomon's temple. The skins, its covering, belong to the same locality [see BADGER]. The bronze ("copper"), silver, and gold Israel brought from Egypt; and probably they had not mine workings till they were long settled in their inheritance. The names of many of the materials, implements, furniture, dress, and ornaments of the priests were Egyptian. The arts necessary in constructing the tabernacle were precisely those which Israelite artisans, as Bezaleel and Aholiab, would have acquired from dwelling in Egypt, the mistresses of those arts; the embroidery of curtains, carving of cherubs, capitals, ornaments in imitation of natural objects. In Palestine, on the contrary, such arts were little practised, as being often associated with idolatry in the surrounding nations; even Solomon had to call in artists from Tyre to do work for the temple which natives apparently could not.

Two distinct accounts are given of the rearing of the tabernacle; in the first Moses recites his instructions, in the second the execution of them. A later history would never have given such a double recital. Moses wrote each at the time and on the occasion to which it refers; first the instructions, that the people might know the materials and the work required of them; secondly, when the work was completed, an account of the details, in order to take away all suspicion of malappropriation of their offerings, and also to show that the Divine instructions had been duly fulfilled. In the two accounts the order is reversed; in the instructions the inner and essential objects stand first, as being those on which the people should fix chief attention, the ark, mercy seat, cherubs, table of shewbread, golden candlesticks; then the accessories of the tabernacle, and lastly the dress of the priests. But in the account of the work executed the tabernacle comes first, being that which would naturally be begun first, then the ark, etc.

Exorcism. [See DEVIL and DIVINATION.] Practised with spells, as the name of Solomon, magic charms, and incantations among the Jews. Acts xix. 13-16: the profane use of Jesus' name as a mere spell was punished by the demon turning on the would be exorcists; these "ragabond Jews" were pretenders. But our Lord implies that some Jews actually cast out demons (Matt. xii. 27), probably by demoniacal help; others in the name of Jesus, without saving faith in Him (Matt. vii. 22, Mark ix. 38). He gave the power to the twelve, the seventy, and to other disciples after His ascension (Matt. x. 8, Luke x. 17-19, Mark xvi. 17, Acts xvi. 18). The term "exorcise" is never applied in Scripture to the Christian casting out of demons. In the end of the 3rd century "exorcists" were made an order in the Christian church, much to the fostering of superstition, especially in connection with baptism.

Eyes, painting of. As Jezebel did (2 Kings ix. 30 marg. Jer. iv. 30), "thou rentest (distendest, triest to make appear large, or laceratest) thy eyes (marg.) with painting." Oriental women puncture and paint the eyelids with antimony or kohl (a black powder made of the smoke black by burning frankincense) to make them look full and sparkling, the blackened margin contrasting with the white of the eye (Ezek. xxiii. 40). EYE PAINTING.

Ezbaï. 1 Chron. xi. 37.

Ezbon. 1. Gen. xli. 16, Num. xxvi. 16 Ozai, a corruption by omitting b. 2. Son of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 7). From his association with Iri, a Gadite name, Lord A. Hervey conjectures that both were Gadite families, incorporated into Benjamin after the slaughter (Jud. xx.). or from Jabesh Gilead (xxi. 12-14).

Ezekiel = God will strengthen, Heb. Yehesqueel. Son of Buzi (i. 3), a priest. Probably exercised the priestly office at Jerusalem before his departure in the captivity or transmigration (galuth) of Jehoiachin, which took place 11 years before the city fell (2 Kings xxiv. 15). His priestly character gave him much weight with his Hebrew fellow exiles. His priestly service was as real in the spiritual temple in Chaldea as it had been in the visible temple at Jerusalem (Ezek. xi.; xl.—xlvi.; iv. 13, 14; xx. 12, 13). The priestly tone appears throughout his book, so that he is the priest among the prophets. Called to prophesy in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity (595 B.C.) "in the 30th year in the fourth month," i.e. the 30th from the era of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father (525 B.C.), an era he naturally uses writing in Babylonian (Farrar). But elsewhere he dates from Jehoiachin's captivity alone. This fact, and his expressly calling himself "the priest" (i. 3), favour the view that his mention of the 30th year of his own age is in order to mark his entering on a priestly ministry to his exiled countrymen (that being the usual age, Num. iv. 23, 30: "the heavens being opened" to him, as they were to his Antitype in beginning His ministry in His 30th year at Jordan, Luke iii. 21-23). Thus he would be 25 when carried away.

The best of the people were apparently the first carried away (Ezek. xi. 16; Jer. xxiv. 2, 7, 8, 10). Believing the prophets they obeyed Nebuchadnezzar's first summons to surrender, as the only path of safety. But the unbelieveing were willing to do anything to remain in their native land; and despised their exiled brethren as having no share in the temple sacrifices. Thus E.'s sphere of ministry was less impeded by his countrymen than Jeremiah's at home. Jeremiah (xxix.) sent a letter to the exiles to warn them against the flattering promises of false prophets that they should soon return, for that the captivity would last 70 years. This was in the fourth year of Zedekiah or of Jehoiachin's captivity; and one of the captives, Shemaiah, so far from believing, wrote back that Jeremiah should be imprisoned. E. began his ministry the next or fifth year, confirming Jeremiah's words. The first scene of his prophecies was near the river Chebar (identified by some with Khabour, but rather the nahr Malcha or royal canal of Nebuchadnezzar) [see BABEL, BABYLON]. Tolabih (Thelaba) was his "house," whither the elders came to inquire of him God's communications (Ezek. iii. 15, viii. 1). They were eager to return to Jerusalem, but E. taught that they must first return to their God. He was married, but lost his wife by a sudden stroke (xxiv. 18). His prophesying continued for 22 years at least, down to the 27th year of the captivity (xxix. 17).

On comparing Ezek. xiii. with Jer. vi. 14, viii. 11, xxiii. 9, 10, 16, 26; and Ezek. xxiv. with Jer. xxiii. 4, 5, xxxiii., we see the inner harmony between the two prophets, though E. did not receive his commission till towards the close of Jeremiah's prophesying; the latter having prophesied 34 years before E., and continuing to prophesy six or seven years after him. E. began prophesying the year after the communication of Jeremiah's predictions to Babylon (Jer. li. 59-64); E.'s prophecies form a sequel to them (i. 2). Yet in natural character they widely differ: Jeremiah plaintive, sensitive to a fault, and tender; E. abrupt, unbending, firmly unflinching, with priestly zeal against gainsayers.

He was contemporary also with Daniel, whose ministry was then in the Babylonian court whereas E. was among the Jews. Daniel's prophecies were later than those of E., but his fame for piety and wisdom was already established (Ezek. xiv. 14, 16; xxviii. 3); and the Jews in their low state naturally prided themselves on one who reflected such glory on their nation at the heathen capital (Dan. i. and ii.).

E. and Daniel have a mutual resemblance in the visions and images in their prophecies. It is an undesigned proof of genuineness that, whilst prophesying against the enemies of the covenant people, he directs none against Babylon, whereas Jeremiah utters against her terrible denunciations. E. gave no needless offence to the government under which he lived, Jeremiah on the other hand was still in Judea.

The improved character of the people towards the close of the captivity, their renunciation of idolatry thenceforth and return to the law under Ezra, were primarily under God due in a great measure to E.'s labours. "His word fell like a hammer upon all the pleasant dreams in which the captives indulged, and ground them to powder, a gigantic nature fitted to struggle against the Babylonish spirit of the age, which revelled in things gigantic and grotesque" (Hengstenberg). Realizing energy is his characteristic, adapting him to confront the "rebellious house," "of stubborn front and hard heart." He zealously upheld the ceremonies of the law (iv. 14, xxii. 8, etc.); keeping them before the national mind, in the absence of the visible framework, against the time of the restoration of the national polity and temple. His self-sacrificing patriotism, ready for any suffering if only he may benefit his countrymen spiritually, appears in his conduct when he who was "the desire of his eyes" was snatched from him at a stroke (Deut. xxxiii. 9). The phrase shows how tenderly he loved her; yet with priestly prostration of every affection before God's will he puts on no mourning, in order to convey a prophetic lesson to his people (Ezek. xxiv. 15-25). His style is coloured by the pentateuch and by Jeremiah. It is simple, the conceptions definite, the details even in the enigmatical symbols minute and vivid, magnificent in imagery, but austere. The fondness for particulars appears in contrasting his prophecy concerning Tyre (xxviii.) with Isaiah's (xxiii.). The obscurity lies in the subject matter, not in the form or manner of his communications. He delights to linger about the temple and to use its symbolical forms, with which his priestly sympathies were so bound up, as the imagery to express his instructions. This was divinely ordered to satisfy the spiritual want and instinctive craving felt by the people in the absence of the national temple and the sacrifices. Thus E. moulded their minds to the conviction that the essence of the law could be maintained where many of its forms could not be observed, a new phase in the kingdom of God; the synagogal worship which he maintained, consisting of prayer and the word, preparing the way for the gospel wherein God who is a spirit is worshipped acceptably by the spiritual wherever they be. His frequent repetitions give weight and force to his pictures; poetical parallelism is found only in chaps. vii., xxi., xxvii., xxviii., xxix., xxx.

His mysterious symbols presented in plain words, like our Lord's parables, were designed to stimulate the people's dormant minds. The superficial, volatile, and wilfully unbelieving were thereby left to judicial blindness (Isa. vi. 10, Matt. xiii. 11-13, etc.), whilst the better disposed were awakened to a deeper search into the things of God by the very obscurity of the symbols. Inobservance of this Divine purpose has led the Jews to place his book among the "treasures" (genazim), which, like the early chapters of Genesis and Song of Solomon, are not to be read till the age of 30 (Jerome's Ep. ad Eustoch.).

Eccles. xlix. 8 refers to E. So Josephus (Ant. x. 5, § 1), Melito's catalogue (Eusebius, H. E., iv. 26), Origen, Jerome, and the Talmud mention it as part of the canon. The oneness of tone throughout, and the recurrence of favourite phrases ("son of man," "they shall know that I am the Lord," "the hand of the Lord was upon me," "set thy face against," etc.), exclude the idea of interpolation of sections. The earlier part, treating mainly of sin and judgment (i.—xxxii.), is a key to the latter part, which holds out a glorious hope in the last days when the judgments shall have had their designed effect. Thus unity and orderly progress characterize the whole. The fall of Jerusalem is the central point. Previously he calls to repentance, and rebukes blind trust in Egypt or in man (xvii. 15-17; comp. Jer. xxxvii. 7). Afterwards he consoles the captives by promising future and final restoration. His prophecies against seven (the number for completeness) foreign nations stand between these two divisions, and were uttered in the interval between the knowledge of Nebuchadnezzar's siege (Ezek. xxiv. 2, etc.) and the news that Jerusalem was taken (xxxiii. 21), yet uttered with the prophetic certainty of its capture, so that it is taken as a past fact (xxvi. 2). One however of this series (xxix. 17) belongs to the 27th year of the captivity, and is therefore later than the temple series (xl. 1), which was in the 25th.

There are nine sections: (1) E.'s call: i.—iii., xv. (2) Symbolical prophecies of Jerusalem's fall: iii. 16—vii. (3) A year and two months later a vision of the temple polluted by Tamuz or Adonis worship; God's consequent scattering of fire over the city, and forsaking the temple to reveal Himself to an inquiring people in exile; purer, happier times follow: viii.—xi. (4) Sins of the several classes, priests, prophets, and princes: xii.—xix. (5) A year later the warning of judgment for national guilt repeated more distinctly as the time drew nearer: xx.—xxiii. (6) Two years and five months later, the very day on which E. speaks, is announced as that of beginning the siege; Jerusalem shall fall: xxiv. (7) Predictions against foreign nations during E.'s silence regarding his own people; since judgment begins at the house of God it will visit the heathen world: xxv.—xxviii.; some of these were uttered later than others, but all began to be given (Havernick) after the fall of Jerusalem. (8) In the 12th year of the captivity, when the fugitives from Jerusalem (xxxiii. 21) had reached Chaldea, he foretells better times, Israel's restoration, God's kingdom triumphant over Seir, the heathen world powers, and Gog: xxxiii.—xxxix. (9) After 13 years, the last vision, the order and beauty of the restored kingdom: xl.—xlviii.

The fulness of details as to the temple and its offerings favours the view of a literal (in the main) interpretation rather than a purely symbolical one. The prophecy has certainly not yet been fulfilled; the fulfilment will make all clear. There are details physically so improbable as to preclude a purely literal explanation. The main truth is clear. As Israel served the nations for their rejection of Messiah, so shall they serve Israel in the person of Messiah when Israel shall acknowledge Messiah (Isa. lx. 12; Zech. xiv. 16-19; Ps. lxxii. 11). The ideal temple exhibits under O. T. forms the essential character of Messiah's worship as it shall be when He shall reign in Jerusalem among His own people the Jews, and thence to the ends of the earth (Jer. iii. 17, 18).

The square of the temple area is three miles and a half, i.e. larger than all the former Jerusalem. The city is three or four thousand square miles, including the holy portion for the prince, priests, and Levites, i.e., nearly as large as all Judaea W. of Jordan. Again, the half of the holy portion extends 30 miles S. of Jerusalem, i.e., covering nearly the whole southern territory. Without great physical changes (and the boundaries are given the same as under Moses) no adequate room is left for the five tribes whose inheritance is beyond the holy portion (xlvii. 19, xlviii. 23-33). The literal sacrifices seem to oppose Heb. ix. 10, x. 14, 18, and to give a handle to Rome's worst error, the sacrifice of the mass. In E.'s temple holiness pervades the whole, and there is no distinction of parts as to relative holiness, as in the O. T. temple.

But all the difficulties may be only apparent. Faith waits God's time and God's way; the ideal of the theocratic temple will then first be realized. Israel will show in the temple rites the essential unity between the law and the gospel, which now seem to be opposed (Rom. x. 4, 8). We do not yet see how to harmonize a return to sacrifices with the Epistle to the Hebrews, but two considerations lessen the difficulty: (1) The Jews as a nation stand to God in a peculiar relation, distinct from that of us Christians of the present elect church gathered out of Jews and Gentiles indiscriminately. That shall be the period of public liturgy, or perfect outward worship of the great congregation on earth, as the present time is one of gathering out the spiritual worshippers one by one, who shall reign in glorified bodies with Christ over Israel and the nations in the flesh. Besides Israel's spiritual relation to Christ as her Saviour, she will perform a perfect outward service of sacrifice, (retrospectively referring to Christ's one propitiatory offering, lest this should be lost sight of in the glory of His kingdom), prayer, and praise as a nation to her then manifested King reigning in the midst of her; and all nations shall join in that service, recognising His Divine kingship over themselves also. Christ's word shall be fulfilled, "till heaven and earth pass one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled" (Matt. v. 18). The antitypical perfection of the old temple service, which seemed a cumbrous yoke unintelligible to the worshippers, shall then be understood fully and become a delightful service of love.

E. was the only prophet, strictly, at Babylon. For Daniel was rather a seer, unveiling the future in the heathen court, but not discharging the prophetic office as E. among the covenant people; therefore his book was not classed with the prophets but with the hagiographa. Striking instances of seeming contradictions, which when understood become strong confirmations of genuineness, are xii. 13, "I will bring him (Zedekiah) to Babylon . . . yet shall he not see it (though he shall die there)"; because he was blinded by Nebuchadnezzar before arriving there (Jer. li. 11). Also Ezek. xviii. 20, "the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father"; not really contradicting Exod. xx. 5, "visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Me"; the children hating God as their fathers did, the sin with cumulative force descends from parent to child; so Deut. xxiv. 16 expressly "the fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither the children for the fathers."

Ezel = the stone. Near Saul's house, the scene of David and Jonathan's parting (1 Sam. xx. 19). At ver. 41 instead of "out of a place toward the S." Smith's Bible Dict. reads, "David arose from close to the stone heap" (argob for negab; so LXX.). But A.V. is better, from the side of the S., in relation to Jonathan's position; accordingly David next flees southward, to Nob.

Ezem. A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 29). In Josh. xix. 3 AZEM.

Ezer. 1. Son of Ephraim, slain by the ancient men of Gath in a foray on their cattle (1 Chron. vii. 21), during Israel's stay in Egypt. 2. Neh. xii. 42. 3. 1 Chron. iv. 4.

Ezion Geber = the giant's backbone. A town on the eastern arm of the Red Sea. The last stage in Israel's march before the wilderness of Zin or Kadesh. The station of Solomon's navy "beside Elath, on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom." The timber was probably brought to E. from Tyre to build the ships (2 Chron. viii. 17, 18). There Jehoshaphat's fleet was broken on the jagged rocks on each side (1 Kings ix. 26, xxii. 48). Now wady Ghaduan (another form of Ezion), a valley running E. into the Arabah, some miles N. of the present head of the Elanitic gulf. A salt marsh marks where the sea anciently reached. A tidal haven was here, at the head of which the city of E. stood. On the haven's eastern side lay Elath (now Akaba), whence the Elanitic gulf took its name, meaning trees; a palm grove is still there; on the W. lay Ebronah (Num. xxxiii. 35, 36).

Eznite. Designation of Admo, one of David's chief captains (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). But in 1 Chron. xi. 11 "JASHOBEAM [see] an Hachmonite," for which 2 Sam. has Josheb-bas-shebeth, "that sat in the seat." Doubtless the words "the same (was) Admo the Eznite" are a corruption for the Heb. "he lifted up his spear" which words appear in the parallel 1 Chron. but not in 2 Sam.; comp. ver. 18.

Ezra = the helper, as Nehemiah = the comforter. 1. A "ready scribe in the law of Moses" (vii. 6, 11, 12); "a scribe of the words of the commandments of the Lord and of His statutes to Israel"; "a scribe of the law of the God of heaven"; "priest"; a worthy descendant of Ilhikiah the priest under Josiah, who "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (2 Chron. xxxiv. 14, 15); son or descendant of Seraiah (not the high-priest Seraiah, Ezra vii. 1). See vii., viii., ix., x.; also Neh. viii. and xii. 26. Resided in Babylon under Artaxerxes Longimanus. His qualification for his work was "he had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments." By the king's leave, in the seventh year of his reign, he took to Jerusalem 1754, including Israelites, priests, Levites, singers, porters, and Nethinim (Ezra vii. 7, viii.). The journey occupied four months. They brought freewill offerings, gold, silver, and vessels, from the king and his counsellors, as well as from the Jews abroad. Artaxerxes empowered him also to draw upon the royal treasurers beyond the river for further supplies if necessary; also the decree added, "thou E., after the wisdom of thy God that is in thine hand, set magistrates and judges which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God; and teach ye them that know them not." He committed for safety the charge of the gold and silver to 12 priests and 12 Levites (viii. 24 transl. "I separated 12 of the chief priests in addition to Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them"; comp. ver. 18, 19). These delivered them up "to the chief of the priests, Levites, and fathers at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the Lord." His Guard was God, sought and found at the river Ahava, by fasting and prayer, that He might give "a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for all our substance" (viii. 21).

So jealous was he for the honour of God that he declares, "I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers . . . to help us against the enemy in the way, because we had spoken unto the king, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek Him, but His power and His wrath is against all them that forsake Him." At the same time he uses all worldly prudence and firmness, whilst faith in God was his main stay.

His great aim, as Malachi, his and Nehemiah's helper, expresses it, was "Remember ye the law of Moses My servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments." In six months after his arrival he effected the purification of the holy nation from foreign admixture by causing 17 priests, 10 Levites, and 86 of other tribes, to put away alien wives. The largeness of the number proves the wide extent of the evil, and the depth of spiritual earnestness which prompted such a severe sacrifice. E.'s book closes abruptly here, as probably the odium connected with this self-denying ordinance made him judge it expedient to withdraw to Babylon for the present. The relapse of the Jews into their former disorders, such as Nehemiah describes, could not have occurred had E. been there continually. In Neh. viii. E. "the priest, the scribe," 13 years later reappears in charge of the spiritual interests of the people, as Nehemiah, the tirshatha or governor, of their political interests, the two acting in harmonious cooperation (Neh. xii. 26). He probably did not return with Nehemiah, but a little later, to Jerusalem; for he is not mentioned till after the completion of the wall. E. read and interpreted Moses' law to the people during the eight days of the feast of tabernacles, prayed, and assisted at the dedication of the wall.

As E. is not mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon in Artaxerxes' 32nd year, and the Jews relapsed into irregularity during Nehemiah's subsence (Neh. xiii.), it is likely E. died or returned to Babylon shortly after Nehemiah's departure. Benjamin of Tudela says that E. died at Nehar-Samorah on the lower Tigris on the Persian frontier, when going from Jerusalem to Artaxerxes, and that his sepulchre was there.

The institution of the great synagogue is attributed to him, and he certainly left the pattern of synagogue worship, with its "pulpit" and reading and expounding the law. He and Malachi probably settled the inspired canon of Scripture, comprising the three, "the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa"; the division of verses, the vowel paintings, and the keri or margin readings, and the Chaldee characters instead of the old Hebrew or Samaritan, are also attributed to him. He probably compiled CHRONICLES [see]. The 119th Psalm, of which the theme throughout is the law or word of God, as the palladium of Israel's national and individual salvation, is in its present form probably the production of E. "the priest, and ready scribe in the law of Moses." The features of the psalm suit the Jews' position on their return from Babylon. Israel is the speaker throughout whom the psalmist represents, and whose calling it was to testify for the word of truth before the heathen world powers (comp. ver. 23, 46).

2. Neh. xii. 2. One of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel. 3. A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

Ezra, Book of. Hilary of Poitiers calls E. a continuation of Chronicles. The first part of E. (i.—vi.) describes the return from the captivity under Joshua and Zerubbabel, and the building of the temple; the enemy's obstructions; its advance through the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (v. 1, 2, vi. 14), and its completion in Darius Hystaspes' sixth year, 516 B.C. (vi. 15). A long interval follows; and the second part of the book (vii.—x.) passes to Ezra's journey from Persia to Jerusalem in Artaxerxes Longimanus' seventh year, 458–457 B.C. (vii. 1, 7); the details are given in chaps. vii., viii. E.'s numerous caravan bringing fresh strength to the weak colony (viii.). And his work in ix., x., restoring the theocratic nationality and removing foreign wives. The book ends with the names of those who had married them.

The second part combined with Nehemiah is a complete historical picture. But the distinct title to Nehemiah shows it is a separate book. ESTHER [see] fills up the interval between vi. and vii. The first part (Ezra i.—vi.) period (536–516 B.C.) is the time of prince Zerubbabel and the high-priest Joshua aided by Haggai and Zechariah. The second (vii.—x.) is that of the priest E. and the governor Nehemiah, aided by the prophet Malachi. In both royal, priestly, and prophetic men lead God's people. The first is the period of building the temple, a religious restoration; the second that of restoring the people and rebuilding the city, a political combined with a religious restoration. The things of God first, then the things of men. Only 50,000 settled with Joshua and Zerubbabel (ii. 64, etc.); and these intermingled with the heathen, and were in "affliction and reproach" (ix. 6–15; Neh. i. 3). Hence the need of restoring the holy nationality, as well as the temple, under E. and Nehemiah. E. the priest took charge of the inner restoration, by purging out heathenism and bringing back the law; Nehemiah the governor did the outer work, restoring the city and its polity. E. is therefore rightly accounted by the Jews a second Moses.

E. received leave to go to Jerusalem in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezra vii. 6–10, 11–26); Nehemiah in the 20th year (Neh. ii. 1). E. is supposed by some to have used the Babylonian era, Nehemiah the Persian. The 70 weeks (490 years) of DANIEL ix. 24, 25 [see] probably date from this seventh year of Artaxerxes, when E. received leave to restore the temple and the people and the holy city (457 B.C.), because the re-establishment of the theocracy then began, though the actual rebuilding was not till 13 years later under Nehemiah. E.'s placing of Daniel in the canon immediately before his own book and Nehemiah's implies that his commission began the fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy; Christ's 30th year in beginning His ministry would be A.D. 26–27 (the A.D. dates three or four years later than Christ's actual birth), and His crucifixion A.D. 30. So that "He was cut off" and "caused the sacrifice to cease in the midst of the week," the last week beginning with His ministry to the Jews, A.D. 26–27, and ending with that exclusive ministry to them for three and a half years after His crucifixion, ceasing through their own rejection of Him when preached by the apostles and evangelists (Acts vii., viii.). Thus the 490 years or 70 weeks consist of (1) seven weeks (49 years) of revelation, from 457 to 407 B.C., the probable date of Malachi's prophecy and Nehemiah's work, which the prophet supported, ending; then (2) 62 weeks (434 years) of no revelation; then seven years of special and brightest revelation to Israel, first by Messiah in person, then by His still more powerful presence by the Holy Spirit, in the middle of which week His one sacrifice supercedes all other sacrifices.

The succession of Persian monarchs in E. is Cyrus, Ahasuerus (the Cambyses of secular history), Artaxerxes (Pseudo-Smerdis, the Magian, an usurper), Darius [the Ahasuerus of Esther or Xerxes of secular history comes in here, in the interval between Ezra vi. and vii.], Artaxerxes. E.'s account of CYRUS [see] accords with his character, celebrated for clemency. A Zoroastrian, a worshipper of Ormuzd, the great God, he hated idolatry and the shameless licentiousness of the Babylonian worship, and so was disposed to patronize the Jews, whose religion so much resembled his own. Hence his edicts for restoring the Jews, though an act unparalleled in history, harmonize with the facts concerning him in the Bible and in secular history (Ezra i. 2–4, vi. 3–5). He identifies "the Lord God of heaven" with the Jehovah of the Jews. His restoring them in his first year immediately (i. 1), and his words "the Lord God of heaven has charged me to build Him a house at Jerusalem," plainly show he had heard of God's words by Isaiah (xliv. 28), "Cyrus is My shepherd, and shall perform all My pleasure, even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built, and to the temple, thy foundation shall be laid." Daniel would necessarily, as just made "third ruler in the kingdom," and having foretold its transfer to "the Medes and Persians" (Dan. v. 28, 29), come under Cyrus' notice immediately on the capture of Babylon; moreover it is stated "he prospered in the reign of Cyrus the Persian" (vi. 28), he would therefore be sure to mention to Cyrus Isaiah's prophecy. Cyrus' pious confession that he received all his dominions from Him accords with the spirit of the old Persian religion. His returning the golden vessels (Ezra i. 7-11, vi. 5), his allowing the whole expense of rebuilding from the royal revenue (vi. 4), his directing all Persians to help with silver, etc. (i. 4), agree with his known munificence.

An undesigned coincidence, and therefore mark of genuineness, is that when E. wrote, a century later than Cyrus, the Persian kings usually lived at Susa or Babylon, where the archives were kept, and there E. would naturally have placed Cyrus' roll had he been forging. But E. says Cyrus' decree was found at Achmetha (Ecbatana), vi. 2. Herodotus (i. 153) and Ctesias (Exc. Pers., 2-4) confirm this by mentioning that Cyrus kept his court permanently at Ecbatana, and so would have his archives there.

ARTAXERXES [see] (iv. 7) or Smerdis, as a Magian, whose worship was antagonistic to Zoroastrianism (comp. Herod., iii. 61, Ctes. Exc. Pers., 10, Justin, i. 9, and Darius' inscription at Behistun, as to Smerdis' peculiar position), would naturally reverse the policy of Cyrus and Ahasuerus (Cambyses, who did not act on the accusation of the Jews' enemies: iv. 6); accordingly his harsh edict expresses no faith in the supreme God, whom Cyrus' edict honoured (iv. 17-22).

Darius, a zealous Zoroastrian, succeeded; his Behistun inscription tells us he "rebuilt the temples the Magian had destroyed, and restored the chants and worship he had abolished." This explains the strange boldness of the Jews (v. 1, 2) in treating Smerdis' edict as void, and without waiting for Darius' warrant resuming the work under Zerubbabel and Jeshua, with Zechariah and Haggai. Their enemies, hoping Smerdis had destroyed Cyrus' edict, wrote to king Darius (v. 6) that they were building again on the plea of Cyrus' edict, and that search should be made at Babylon whether there were any such edict of Cyrus. Their mention of Babylon was either to mislead the king as to the real repository of the decree, or more probably from ignorance of Cyrus' habit of living at Ecbatana, which ignorance Providence overruled to save the roll from their destroying hands under Smerdis. The language of Darius' edict on finding it accords with his character and circumstances. The Jewish temple he calls "the house of God," and Jehovah "the God of heaven"; he approves as a Zoroastrian of sacrifices to the Supreme Being, desires their prayers for himself and "his sons" (Herodotus, i. 132, confirms E. that Darius had "sons" already, though he had but just ascended the throne), mentions the "tribute" (vi. 8) which (Herodotus, iii. 89) he was the first to impose on the provinces, and threatens the refractory with impaling, his usual mode of punishment (ver. 11; Behistun inscription; Herodotus, iii. 159).

The three books E., CHRONICLES [see], probably compiled by E., and Nehemiah have many phrases in common, peculiar to them, and that mixture of Chaldee and Hebrew which we should expect if the three were written at the new epoch in Jewish literature, when its writers were men brought up in Babylon and restored to Judaea. All three abound in genealogies, which were then needed in order to restore the old system as to property, families, and national purity of blood free from alien admixture. Details as to the priests and Levites characterize all three; for these were essential to the restoration of the theocracy, which was the primary object. After E. had carried through the extreme but needful measure of divorcing all alien wives, which probably caused him some loss of popularity, he gave place to a new agent of God, Nehemiah, the nation's political restorer as E. was its religious reformer. E. still cooperated with Nehemiah (viii.) in ministering the word of God. Nehemiah marks his book as distinct from E. by the opening.

Two portions of E. are in Chaldee (iv. 8-vi. 18; vii. 12-26), for in those portions he embodies extracts from state documents in that language; of course he would be as fluent in Chaldee, the language of his captivity, as in Hebrew, the language of his nation. The variation from the third person elsewhere to the first person in vii. 27-ix. 15 is thus to be explained. The first six chapters refer to the time before E. in which he is not mentioned. The 7th chap., continuing the historic style down to Artaxerxes' decree, in naming him for the first time, uses the third person. But after that decree E., in returning from its Chaldee to his own Hebrew, uses the first person in praising "the Lord God of our fathers" for having disposed the king's heart to beautify the Lord's house, and for having "extended mercy unto me before the king," etc. He continues the first person to chap. x., where the third person is resumed, to mark the narrative as a national not merely a personal history. The undoubted writing of E. (vii. 27-ix. 15) would be an unmeaning fragment unless prefaced by vii. 1-11, and followed by x. The transitions of first to third persons, and vice versa, are found in Daniel, E., and Nehemiah; so Moses of old uses the third person of himself in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, but in the recapitulation in Deuteronomy the first.

The lists of those who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem in chap. ii., also in Neh. vii. 5, E. drew from existing documents. So the letters and royal decrees in the first Chaldee portion, iv. 8-vi. 18; and Artaxerxes' edict, the second Chaldee portion, vii. 12-26. In vii. 27 E. recognises the oneness of Artaxerxes' policy in helping "to beautify the Lord's house" with that of Cyrus and Darius long before. So in chap. ix. 9 "to give us a wall . . . in Jerusalem" alludes to that part of Artaxerxes' decree which remained yet to be done, viz. the building of the wall by Nehemiah; this was implied virtually in his commission to E., but expressed in his commission to Nehemiah (ii. 5-8). The anxiety of the earlier returning exiles to keep the priesthood pure from alien blood, in chap. ii., corresponds in spirit to the removal of alien wives in the closing part. The unity of plan lies in its passing over periods of time and history not appropriate to the main aim (these very transitions giving the fragmentary appearance alleged against the unity of the book), and dwelling only on the epochs which bring out features essential to the Israelite church's history (ii. 70, iii. 1 with Neh. vii. 5, 73, viii. 1, xii. 1, 26, 47). The king of Persia is called "king of Assyria" in Ezra vi. 22, just as the king of Babylon is called so in 2 Kings xiii. 29, as having succeeded to the world-dominion formerly held by the king of Assyria.

The order is chronological, though not continuous (the 31 closing years of Darius, the whole 21 of Xerxes, and the seven first of Artaxerxes, about 60 in all, being passed over between chaps. vi. and vii.); the ministry of E. in restoring the theocracy being the main subject, the former work of Zerubbabel and Jeshua being its precursory analogue.

Lord A. Herve conjectures Daniel was author of chap. i., which would supply the omission of Cyrus' decree in Daniel's own book (Dan. i. 21, ix. x.), where we might naturally have expected to find it. Ezra i. 1 refers to Jeremiah's prophecy, just as Dan. ix. 2. The formula "in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia" answers to Dan. i. 1, ii. 1, x. 1. The narrator (i.) evidently wrote in Babylon not in Jerusalem; and E. might think the portion at the close of 2 Chron. and beginning of E. more suitably placed there than in Daniel. But all this is conjecture. A close connection of E. with Daniel is probable, and that E. wrote or compiled the former part of his book in Babylon. Ezra ii. is identical with Neh. vii. 6-73, evidently drawn by both from a common document or list of the captives returning with Zerubbabel. Chap. iii. 2-vi. 22 is drawn from some contemporary of Zerubbabel and eyewitness of his setting up the altar, etc.; possibly Haggai who supported him, for the title "the prophet" (Ezra v. 1, vi. 14) is the one found also Hag. i. 1, 3, 12, ii. 1, 10; so whereas Zechariah names Zerubbabel and Jeshua separately and without addition, the formula in E. iii. 2, 8, v. 2, as in Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 4, 23, is "Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel and Jeshua the son of Jozadak"; comp. also Ezra v. 1, 2, with Hag. i., also the older people's sorrowful regrets for the former temple in seeing the new one (Ezra iii. 12; Hag. ii. 3); both mark dates by the year of "Darius the king" (iv. 24, vi. 15; Hag. i. 1, 15, ii. 10); also the phrase "Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and the remnant of their brethren" (iii. 8; Hag. i. 12, 14); also vi. 16 with Hag. ii. 2; also "the work of the house of the Lord" (iii. 8, 9; Hag. i. 14); "the foundation of the temple was laid" (iii. 6, 10-12; Hag. ii. 18); "the house of the Lord" 25 times to six wherein E. uses "the temple of the Lord"; Haggai "the house" seven times to "the temple" twice.

Ezrahite. Ethan and Heman [see] are called so; i.e., sons of Zerah (1 Kings iv. 31; Ps. lxxxviii., lxxxix.; 1 Chron. ii. 6).

Ezri. 1 Chron. xxvii. 26.

F

Fable. It represents man's relations to his fellow man; but the PARABLE rises higher, it represents the relations between man and God. The parable's framework is drawn from the dealings of men with one another; or if from the natural world, not a grotesque parody of it, but real analogies. The fable rests on what man has in common with the lower creatures; the parable on the fact that man is made in the image of God, and that the natural world reflects outwardly the unseen realities of the spiritual world. The MYTH is distinguished from both in being the spontaneous symbolic expression of some religious notion of the apostate natural mind. In the fable qualities of men are attributed to brutes. In the parable the lower sphere is kept distinct from the higher which it illustrates; the lower beings follow the law of their nature, but herein represent the acts of the higher beings; the relations of brutes to each other are not used, as these would be inappropriate to represent man's relation to God.

Two fables occur in Scripture: (1) Jotham's sarcastic fable to the men of Shechem, the trees choosing their king (Jud. ix. 8-15). (2) Josiah's sarcastic answer to Amaliah's challenge, by a fable, the sarcasm being the sharper for the covert form it assumes, viz. the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle (2 Kings xiv. 9). Ezek. xvii. 1-10 differs from the fable in not attributing human attributes to lower creatures, and in symbolising allegorically prophetic truths concerning the world monarchies; it is called chidah, "a riddle," from chadad to be sharp, as requiring acumen to solve the continued enigmatical allegory. The fable of Jotham (1209 a.c.) is the oldest in existence; the Hebrew mind had a special power of perceiving analogies to man in the lower world; this power is a relic of the primal intuition given to Adam by God who "brought every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air, unto Adam to see what he would call them." Other nations were much later in this style of thought, the earliest prose fables in Greece being those of the legendary Æsop, about 550 a.c.

Many of the proverbs are "condensed fables" (Prov. xxvi. 11, xxv. 25, 28). The analogies in the lower creatures are to man's lower virtues or defects, his worldly prudence, or his pride, intolerance, cunning (comp. Matt. x. 16). "Fables" mean falselands in 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7, "old wives' fables"; Tit. i. 14, "Jewish fables," the transition state to gnosticism; 2 Pet. i. 16, "cunningly devised (Gr. sophistika) fables," devised by man's wisdom, not what the Holy Ghost teacheth (1 Cor. ii. 13); incipient gnostic legends about the genealogies, origin, and propagation of angels (Col. ii. 18-23).

Face. "Many will entreat the face (Heb. the firmament) of the prince" (Prov. xix. 6). "The face of God" means His manifested presence and favour. Jacob saw God's face, and called the place Pnei-el, "God's face" (Gen. xxxii. 30), i.e. veiled in human form, in anticipation of the incarnation. The full radiance of His glory man could not bear to see (Exod. xxxiii. 20).

Fair Havens. A harbour on the S. of Crete; connected with the city Lasea; five miles E. of cape Matala. The ship in Paul's voyage stopped short of doubling this cape, for the coast W. of it suddenly turns to the N., and so the ship would have been still exposed to the prevailing N.W. wind. But afterwards on consultation the centurion and master of the ship determined against Paul's advice to leave Fair Havens as incommode to winter in, and go on to Phoenice, induced by a deceptive S. wind which arose for a time; the result was wreck (Acts xxvii.; comp. Eccles. ix. 15). The place still bears the Greek name for "Fair Havens."

Fairs. Ezek. xxvii. 12, "traded in thy fairs"; Heb. izbonaik, referring to exports; pa'il for thy wares, made thy exchanges; in ver. 33 its true meaning is given, "thy wares." The maarak, "market" (ver. 13, 17, 19), rather merchandise, refers to the imports. Tarshish did not visit Tyre, but Tyre exported her wares to Tarshish, and "Tarshish paid for thy wares with silver," etc.

Faith. Heb. xi. 1, "the substance of things hoped for (i.e., it substantiates God's promises, the fulfilment of which we hope, it makes them present realities), the evidence (eleechos, the 'convincing proof' or 'demonstration') of things not seen." Faith accepts the truths revealed on the testimony of God (not merely on their intrinsic reasonableness), that testimony being to us given in Holy Scripture. Where sight is, there faith ceases (John xx. 29, 1 Pet. i. 8). We are justified (i.e. counted just before God) judicially by God (Rom. viii. 33), meritoriously by Christ (Isa. liii. 11, Rom. v. 19), mediately or instrumentally by faith (v. 1), evidentially by works. Loving trust, Jas. ii. 14-26, "though a man say he hath faith, and have not works, can (such a) faith save him?" the emphasis is on "say," it will be a mere saying, and can no more save the soul than saying to a "naked and destitute brother, be warmed and filled" would warm and fill him. "Yea, a man (holding right views) may say, Thou hast faith and I have works, show (exhibit) to me (if thou canst, but it is impossible) thy (alleged) faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." Abraham believed, and was justified before God on the ground of believing (Gen. xv. 6). Forty years afterwards, when God did "tempt," i.e. put him to the test, his justification was demonstrated before the world by his offering Isaac (xxii.). "As the body apart from (choris) the spirit is dead, so faith without the works (which ought to evidence it) is dead also." We might have expected faith to answer to the spirit, works to the body. As James reverses this, he must mean by "faith" here the FORM of faith, by "works" the working reality. Living faith does not derive its life from works, as the body does from its animating spirit. But faith apart from the spirit of faith, which is LOVE (whose evidence is works), is dead, as the body is dead without the spirit; thus St. James exactly agrees with St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, "though I have all faith . . . and have not charity (love), I am nothing."

In its barest primary form, faith is simply crediting or accepting God's testimony (1 John v. 9-13). Not to credit it is to make God a "liar"! a consequence which unbelievers may well start back from. The necessary consequence of crediting God's testimony (pistewo Theo) is believing in (pistewo tis ton kvion, i.e. trusting in) the Son of God; for life, and salvation in Him alone, form the grand subject of God's testimony. The Holy Spirit alone enables any man to accept God's testimony and accept Jesus Christ as his Divine Saviour, and so to "have the witness in himself" (1 Cor. xii. 3). Faith is receptive of God's gratuitous gift of eternal life in Christ. Faith is also an obedience to God's command to believe (1 John iii. 23); whence it is called the "obedience of faith" (Rom. i. 5, xvi. 26; Acts vi. 7), the highest obedience, without which works seemingly good are disobediences to God (Heb. xi. 6). Faith justifies not by its own merit, but by the merit of Him in whom we believe (Rom. iv. 3, Gal. iii. 6). Faith makes the interchange, whereby our sin is imputed to Him and His righteousness is imputed to us (2 Cor. v. 19, 21; Jer. xxiii. 6; 1 Cor. i. 30). "Such are we in the sight of God the Father, as is the very Son of God Himself" (Hooker) (2 Pet. i. 1; Rom. iii. 22, iv. 6, x. 4; Isa. xlii. 21, xlv. 21, 24, 25).

Fallow deer. LXX., Antelope bubalis. Heb. yachmur, from chamar "red." A clean animal (Deut. xiv. 5). Used at Solomon's table (1 Kings iv. 23). The

BU BALL, FALLOW DEER

Cervus dama, of a reddish colour (as its name yachmur implies), shedding its horns yearly (Oedmann). Gosse makes it the Antelope antelope, a beast of chase represented in the old Egyptian sculptures. Coarse, and approaching to the bovine race, of reddish head and neck, white across the face, the forehead and throat with black hair, the rest of the body of whitish grey. Smith's Bible Diet. Append. (as LXX.), the wild ox (bocker el wash) of N. Africa, the Alcelaphus bubalis, an antelope resembling the calf and the stag, the size of the latter. Sir V. Brooke, however, has decided that a specimen sent him of the Budonin yachmur, from Carmel, is the Cervus capreolus or ordinary roebuck (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., July, 1876).

Famine. Often sent as visitations from God for sin. 2 Kings viii. 1: "the Lord hath called for a famine"

(Ps. cv. 16), as a master calls for a servant ready to do his bidding. Comp. Matt. viii. 8, 9; contrast Ezek. xxxvi. 29. So associated with pestilence and the sword (2 Sam. xxi. 1 Kings xvii.). The famine in Ruth i. 1 was probably owing to the Midianite devastation of the land (Jud. vi.), so severe in the Holy Land that Elimelech had to emigrate to Moab, and Naomi his widow returned not till ten years had elapsed. Isa. li. 19; Jer. xiv. 15, xv. 2; Ezek. v. 12. Defects in agriculture, in means of transit, and in freedom of commerce through despotism, were among the natural causes of frequent famines anciently. Failure of the heavy rains in November and December in Palestine (Gen. xli. 10, xvi. 1, 2), and of the due overflow of the Nile, along with E. and S. winds (the N. wind on the contrary brings rains, and retards the too rapid current) in Egypt, the ancient granary of the world, often brought famines (Gen. xli. 25-36, xlii.). Abraham's faith was tried by the famine which visited the land promised as his inheritance immediately after his entering it; yet though going down to Egypt for food, it was only "to sojourn," not to live there, for his faith in the promise remained unshaken. A record of famine for seven years in the 18th century B.C. has been found in China, which agrees with the time of Joseph's seven years of famine in Egypt.

Fan. A long handled wooden spade, a "winnowing shovel," used in the East to throw up corn in the air so that the chaff may be separated from the wheat (Matt. iii. 12).

Farthing. Representing two Gr. words: kouantes (Latin quadrans, Matt. v. 26, Mark xii. 42), and assacion (Latin as, Matt. x. 24, Luke xii. 6; the "two assaria" constituted probably one coin). The quadrans was originally the fourth of an as, i.e. three ounces. In Christ's time the quadrans equalled two Greek lepta, "mites." Among the Roman copper coins current then in Palestine there was none smaller than the as or assacion; among the Greek imperial coins there was the quadrans (quarter of the as) and lepton, "mite," one-eighth of an as and half of a quadrans. The as was one and three-fourths of a farthing; the quadrans thus less than half a farthing. But either the as, the lowest Roman coin, or the quadrans, the lowest Greek imperial coin, is sufficiently expressed by the term "farthing," as being our lowest coin.

Fasting. The word (tsum) never occurs in the pentateuch. The Mosaic law, though directing minutely the foods to be eaten and to be shunned, never enjoins fasting. The false asceticism so common in the East was carefully avoided. On the yearly day of atonement, the 10th day of the 7th month, Israelites were directed to "afflict the soul" (Lev. xvi. 29-31, xxiii. 27; Num. xxx. 13). This significant term implies that the essence of scriptural "fasting" lies in self humiliation and penitence, and that the precise mode of subduing the flesh to the spirit, and of expressing sorrow for sin, is left to the conscientious discretion of each person. In Acts xxvii. 9 the yearly day of atonement is popularly designated "the fast." But God, whilst not discountenancing outward acts of sorrow expressive of inward penitence, declares, "is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal the bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest thy naked that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?" (Isa. lviii. 4-7.) Comp. similar warnings against mistaking outward fastings as meritorious before God: Mal. iii. 14, Matt. vi. 16.

The only other periodical fasts in the O. T. were those connected with the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar: the fast of the 4th month commemorated its capture (Jer. xxxix. 2, lii. 6, 7); that of the 5th month the burning of the temple and the chief houses (lii. 12-14); that of the 7th the murder of Gedaliah (xli. 1-3); that of the 10th the beginning of the siege (Zech. vii. 3-5, viii. 19). Jer. lii. 4, "did ye at all fast unto Me, even to Me?" Nay, it was to gratify yourselves in hypocritical will worship. If it had been to Me, ye would have separated yourselves not merely from food but from your sins.

Once that the principle is acted on, "he that eateth eateth to the Lord, and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not" (Rom. xiv. 6), and "meat commendeth us not to God, for neither if we eat are we the better, neither if we eat not are we the worse" (1 Cor. viii. 8), fasting and eating are put in their true place, as means, not ends.

There are now 25 yearly fasts in the Jewish calendar. Daniel's (x. 3) mode of fasting was, "I ate no pleasant bread," i.e. "I ate unleavened bread, even the bread of affliction" (Deut. xvi. 3), "neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth." In Matt. ix. 14 "fast" is explained by "mourning" in ver. 15, so that fasting was but an outward expression of mourning (Ps. lxi. 10), not meritorious, nor sanctifying in itself. A mark of the apostasy is "commanding to abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving" (1 Tim. iv. 3). The "neglecting (not sparing) of the body," whilst seeming to deny self, really tends "to the satisfying of (satiating to repletion) the flesh." Ordinances of "will worship" gratify the flesh (self) whilst seeming to mortify it; for "self crowned with thorns in the cloister is as selfish as self crowned with ivy in the revel" (Col. ii. 18-23).

Instances of special fasts of individuals and of the people in the O. T., either in mourning and humiliation or in prayer, occur in Jud. xx. 26; 1 Sam. i. 7, xx. 34, xxxi. 13; 2 Sam. i. 12, xii. 21, iii. 35; 1 Kings xxi. 9-12; Ezra viii. 21-23, x. 6; Esth. iv. 16; Neh. i. 4. National fasts are alluded to in 1 Sam. vii. 6 (wherein the drawing of water and pouring it out before Jehovah expressed their confession of powerlessness and utter prostration: Ps. xxii. 14, lviii. 7; 2 Sam. xiv. 14; 2 Chron. xx. 3; Jer. xxxvi. 6-10; Neh. ix. 1; Joel i. 14, ii. 15. In N. T. times the strict Jews fasted twice a week (Luke xviii. 12), viz. on the second and fifth days. Whilst Christ is with His people either in body or in spirit, fasting is unseasonable, for joy alone can be where He is; but when His presence is withdrawn, sorrow comes to the believer and fasting is one mode of expressing his sorrowing after the Lord. This is Christ's teaching, Matt. ix. 15. As to the texts quoted for fasting as a mean of spiritual power, the Sin. and Vat. MSS. omit Matt. xvii. 21; they omit also "and fasting." Mark ix. 29. They and Alex. MS. omit "fasting and," 1 Cor. vii. 5. Evidently the growing tendency to asceticism in post apostolic times accounts for these interpolations. The apostles "prayed with fasting" in ordaining elders (Acts xiii. 3, xiv. 23). But this continuance of the existing Jewish usage never divinely ordered does not make it obligatory on us, except in so far as we severally, by experience, find it conducive to prayer. Moses', Elijah's, and the great Antitype Christ's 40 days' foodlessness was exceptional and miraculous. Forty is significant of punishment for sin, confession, or affliction. Christ the true Israel denied Himself 40 days, as Israel indulged the flesh 40 years. They tempted God that time; He overcame the tempter all the 40 days (Gen. vii. 4, 12; Num. xiv. 33, xxxii. 13, 14; Ps. xcv. 10; Deut. xxv. 3; 2 Cor. xi. 24; Ezek. xxix. 11, iv. 6; Jonah iii. 4).

Fat. Closely associated with the blood in sacrifices, and as being the richest part, appropriated peculiarly to God (Lev. iii. 16, 17); i.e. the internal fat, the "sweet fat" or suet, chelev; the fat of the kidneys, the sign of the animal's excellence and vigour. As of all produce the firstfruits were offered to Jehovah, so of sacrifices the blood and the fat. Hence the choicest are expressed by "the fat of the earth," "the fat of the wheat," etc., "the fat of the mighty" (Gen. xlv. 18; Deut. xxxii. 14; Num. xviii. 12 marg.; 2 Sam. i. 22). The fat mixed with lean, nishman or sh'aneen (Num. xiii. 20, Ps. lxxviii. 31, Isa. x. 16), was lawful to eat; so also the peder or fat of the burnt offering, burned along with the flesh. The proper development of fat in the animal marked its perfection, it being the source of nutriment of which the animal economy avails itself in emergency; hence its appropriateness as the offering to Jehovah. "The whole fat tail was taken off hard by the backbone" where the pad of fat begins (Lev. iii. 9), for an offering by fire to Jehovah. The broad-tailed sheep of the East has an apron of marrowy fat as wide as the hind quarters, and trailing on the ground unless when artificially supported by a small trick (Herod., iii. 113). The choicest of all that we have and are is to be presented to God (Rom. xii. 1, Phil. iv. 18).

Fat. i.e. vat. Heb. gath is the upper receptacle or "press" in which the grapes were trod. The yeqeb or "vat" was on a lower level, into it the juice flowed from above. The root means to hollow; for the wine-press and vat were dug out of the rocks of the hills whereon were the vineyards. Comp. Mark xii. 1, Isa. v. 2 marg.

Father. Chald. abba. Christ's endearing filial mode of addressing God; so believers (Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15); from abak "to show kindness." God's fatherhood is the ground and pattern for human fatherhood. Abraham was "father of nations," both by natural descent from him and by spiritual fellowship in his faith (Gen. xviii. 18, 19; Rom. iv. 17). The godly father's blessing brought great good, his curse great evil (Gen. ix. 25-27); the unfaithfulness of Ham entailing a curse on his race, the dutifulness of Shem and Japhet a blessing on their races (xxvii. 27-40, xlviii. 15-20, xli.). The fifth commandment, "honour thy father and mother," is the first with special promise (Eph. vi. 2). Love descends rather than ascends; hence this commandment is more needed than one concerning parents' duties to children, but this is added (ver. 4, Col. iii. 21). Dishonouring parents is one of the worst sins (Exod. xxi. 15-17; 1 Tim. i. 9; Mat. i. 6; Isa. xlv. 10). Still the parent was not to inflict death, but to bring the refractory child before the city elders in the gate or place of justice (Deut. xxi. 18-21).

Any ancestor is called "father" or "mother" (Isa. li. 2; Jer. xxxv. 16-18, the sons of Jonadab son of Rechab, a striking instance of the blessing on obedience to parents; 1 Sam. v. 2; 2 Chron. xv. 16 marg.).

"Father" is used also for protector, patron (Job xxix. 16, Ps. lxxviii. 5, Deut. xxxii. 6). "Fathers" mean elders (Acts vii. 2, xxii. 1). The pupils of a spiritual master are called "sons" (2 Kings ii. 3, iv. 1). "Father" expresses one worshipped or revered (Jer. ii. 27; 2 Kings ii. 12, v. 13, vi. 21). The inventor of any art is called "father" if it or of its practisers (Gen. iv. 20, 21; John viii. 44; Job xxxviii. 28, xvii. 14). So the source (2 Cor. i. 3) or instrument of spiritual blessings, as "mercy," regeneration. 1 Cor. iv. 15; "though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel."

The father's great duty was to teach God's laws continually to his children; "speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up . . .

that your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children . . . as the days of heaven upon the earth" (Deut. xi. 18-21).

Feasts. Hag (from a root to dance) is the Heb. applied to the passover, and still more to the feast of tabernacles, as both were celebrated with rejoicings and participation of food (Exod. xii. 14; Lev. xxiii. 39; Num. xxix. 12; Deut. xvi. 39). But mo'ed is the general term for all sacred assemblies convoked on stated anniversaries; God's people by His appointment meeting before Him in brotherly fellowship for worship. Their communion was primarily with God, then with one another. These national feasts tended to join all in one brotherhood. Hence arose Jeroboam's measures to counteract the effect on his people (1 Kings xii. 26, 27). Hezekiah made the revival of the national passover a primary step in his efforts for a reformation (2 Chron. xxx. 1). The Roman government felt the feast a time when especial danger of rebellion existed (Matt. xxvi. 5, Luke xiii. 1). The "congregations," "calling of assemblies," "solemn meetings" (Isa. i. 13, Ps. lxxxii. 3), both on the convocation days of the three great feasts, passover, pentecost, and tabernacles, and also on the sabbaths, imply assemblies for worship, the forerunners of the synagogue (comp. 2 Kings iv. 23). The septenary number prevails in the great feasts. Pentecost was seven weeks (sevens) after passover; passover and the feast of tabernacles lasted seven days each; the days of holy convocation were seven in the year, two at passover, one at pentecost, one at the feast of trumpets, one on the day of atonement (the first day or new moon of the seventh month), and two at the feast of tabernacles. The last two solemn days were in the seventh month, and the cycle of feasts is seven months, from Nisan to Tisri. There was also the sabbatical year, and the year of jubilee. The continued observance of the three feasts commemorative of the great facts of Israelite history make it incredible that the belief of those facts could have been introduced at any period subsequent to the supposed time of their occurrence if they never took place. The day, the month, and every incident of Israel's deliverance out of Egypt are embalmed in the anniversary passover.

On the three great feasts each Israelite was bound to "appear before the Lord," i.e., attend in the court of the tabernacle or temple and make his offering with gladness (Lev. xxiii. 41, xxvii. 7). Pious women often went up to the passover; as Luke ii. 41, Mary; 1 Sam. i. 7, ii. 19, Hannah. Those men who might happen to be unable to attend at the proper time kept the feast the same day in the succeeding month (Num. ix. 10, 11). On the days of holy convocation all ordinary work was suspended (Lev. xxiii. 21-35).

The three great feasts had a threefold bearing. I. They marked the three points of time as to the facts of the earth. II. They marked three epochs in Israel's past history. III. They pointed prophetically to three grand antitypical events of the gospel kingdom. I. (1) At the passover in spring, in the month Abib, the first green ears of barley were cut, and were a favourite food, prepared as parched corn, but first of all a handful of green ears was presented to the Lord. (2) Fifty days (as pentecost means) after passover came the feast of weeks, i.e. a week of weeks after passover. The now ripe wheat, before being cut, was sanctified by its first-fruits, namely two loaves of fine flour, being offered to Jehovah. (3) At the feast of tabernacles, in the end of the common year and the seventh month of the religious year, there was a feast of ingathering when all the fruits of the field had been gathered in. There was no offering of consecration, for the offerings for sanctifying the whole had been presented long before. It was not a consecration of what was begun, but a joyful thanksgiving for what was completed. See for the spiritual lesson Prov. iii. 9, Ps. cxviii. 15.

II. Each of the three marked a step in the HISTORICAL progress of Israel.

(1) The passover commemorated the deliverance out of Egypt when Jehovah passed over Israel, protecting them from the destroying angel and sparing them, and so achieving for them the first step of independent national life as God's covenant people. (2) Pentecost marked the giving of the law on Sinai, the second grand era in the history of the elect nation. God solemnly covenanted, "If ye will obey My voice indeed and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people, and ye shall be a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5).

(3) All the nation now wanted was a home. The feast of tabernacles commemorates the establishment of God's people in the land of promise, their pleasant and peaceful home, after the 40 years of wandering in the wilderness, living in shifting tents. They took boughs of palm and willows of the brook, and made temporary huts of branches and sat under the booths. So in their fixed home and land of rest their enjoyment was enhanced by the thankful and holy remembrance of past wanderings without a fixed dwelling. Joshua specially observed this feast after the settlement in Canaan (as incidentally comes out in Neh. vii. 17). Solomon (appropriately to his name, which means king of peace) also did so, for his reign was pre-eminently the period of peaceful possession when every man dwelt under his own vine and figtree (1 Kings iv. 25); immediately after that the last relic of wilderness life was abolished by the ark being taken from under curtains and deposited in the magnificent temple of stone in the seventh month (2 Chron. v. 3), the feast of tabernacles was celebrated on the 15th day, and on the 23rd Solomon sent the great congregation away glad in heart for the goodness that the Lord had showed unto David, Solomon, and Israel His people. The third celebration specially recorded was after the Babylonish captivity, when the Jews were reestablished in their home under Ezra and Nehemiah, and all gathered themselves together as one man on the first day of the seventh month, the feast of trumpets. Then followed the reading of the law and renewal of the covenant. Then finding in the law directions as to the feast of tabernacles, they brought branches of olive, pine, myrtle, and palm, and thick trees, and made booths on their roofs and in their courts, and in the courts of God's house, and sat under them with "great gladness" (Neh. viii.).

III. Prophetically and typically. (1) The passover points to the Lord Jesus, the true paschal Lamb sacrificed for us, whose sacrifice brings to us a perpetual feast (1 Cor. v. 7). (2) Pentecost points to our Whitsuntide (Acts ii.) when the Holy Spirit descending on Christ's disciples confirms Christ's covenant of grace in the heart more effectually than the law of Sinai written on stone (2 Cor. iii. 3-18). (3) Two great steps have already been taken towards establishing the kingdom of God. Christ has risen from death as "the firstfruits of them that slept" (1 Cor. xv. 20), even as the green ears of barley were offered as firstfruits at passover. Secondly, the Holy Spirit has not merely once descended but still abides in the church as His temple, giving us a perpetual Whitsun feast. One step more is needed; we have received redemption, also the Holy Ghost; we wait still for our inheritance and abiding home. The feast of tabernacles points on to the antitypical Canaan, the everlasting inheritance, of which the Holy Spirit is the "earnest" (Eph. i. 13, 14; Heb. iv. 8, 9). The antitypical feast of tabernacles shall be under the antitypical Joshua, Jesus the Captain of our salvation, the antitypical Solomon, the Prince of peace (Isa. ix. 6, Rev. vii. 9-17). The zest of the heavenly joy of the palmbearing multitude (antitypical to the palm-bearers at the feast of tabernacles), redeemed out of all nations, shall be the remembrance of their tribulations in this wilderness world for ever past; for repose is sweetest after toil, and difficulties surmounted add to the delight of triumph.

Silvation was the prominent topic at the feast. In later times they used to draw water from the pool of Siloam, repeating from Isa. xii. "with joy shall ye draw water from the wells of salvation," referred to by Jesus (John vii. 2, 37, 39). So Christ shall appear the "second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28). The palmbearing multitude accompanying Jesus at His triumphant entry into His royal capital cried

"Hosanna," i.e. Save us we beseech Thee. So the prophetic Ps. cxviii. 25, 26, implies that Israel shall say when in penitent faith she shall turn to her returning Lord (Matt. xxiii. 39). So the thanksgiving song of eternity shall be, "Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb." Meanwhile on earth Israel, long finding no ease or rest for the sole of the foot, but having "trembling of heart, failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind" (Deut. xxviii. 65), shall at length rest in her own land under Messiah reigning at Jerusalem as His holy capital and over the whole earth, and "every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles" (Zech. xiv. 9, 16; Rev. vii.). That feast shall remind Israel of hardships now past, and of salvation and peace now realized on earth, so that "the voice of rejoicing and salvation shall be in the tabernacles of the righteous" (Ps. cxviii. 15). There was in the Three Feasts a clear prefigurement of the Three Persons; the Father, in the work of creation, specially adored in the feast of tabernacles; the Son in the passover sacrifice; the Spirit in the pentecostal feast.

The times of the feasts were those least interfering with the people's industry; the passover just before harvest; pentecost at its conclusion and before the vintage; tabernacles after all fruits were gathered in.

The feast of PURIM [see ESTHER] commemorated the baffling of Haman's plot for the Jews' destruction; the feast of DEDICATION [see] the purification of the temple by the Maccabees, after its defilement by Antiochus Epiphanes.

In the N. T. Jude (12, "feasts of charity"; also 2 Pet. ii. 13, see LORD'S SUPPER) mentions the Christian lovefeasts which often preceded the Lord's supper (1 Cor. xi. end) just as the passover preceded it in Christ's institution. They ate and drank together earthly, then heavenly food, in token of unity for time and eternity. The fervent love and fellowship which characterized the first disciples originated these feasts (Acts ii. 45, 46, iv. 35, vi. 1). Each brought his portion, as to a club feast; and the rich brought extra portions for the poor. From it the bread and wine were taken for the Eucharist. In it the excesses took place which Paul censures, and which made a true and reverent celebration of the Lord's supper during or after it impossible. Hence the lovefeasts were afterwards separated from the Lord's supper, and in the fourth century forbidden by the Council of Laodicea A.D. 320, and that of Carthage A.D. 391, as excesses crept in, the rulers of the church receiving double portions (Tertullian, De Jejun., 17), and the rich courting the praise of liberality. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, says the Christians met and exchanged sacramental pledges against all immorality, then separated, and met again to partake of an entertainment.

Felix. Antonius (Tacitus, Hist. v. 9) Claudius (Suidas), Roman procurator of Judaea, appointed by the emperor Claudius, whose freedman he was, to succeed Ventidius Cumanus, who was banished A.D. 53. Tacitus (Ann., xii. 54) makes F. procurator of Samaria whilst Cumanus had Galilee. Josephus (Ant. xx. 6, § 2, 7, § 1) makes him succed Cumanus. Tacitus writes of F., "he exercised the authority of a king with the disposition of a slave in all cruelty and lust." He and Cumanus were tried before Quadratus for winking at robbery and violence and enriching themselves with bribes, according to Tacitus, and F. was acquitted and reinstated. Having the powerful support of his brother Pallas, Claudius' freedman and favourite, he thought he could do what he liked with impunity. Pallas' influence continuing,

COIN OF NERO.

F. remained procurator under Nero. F. crushed the Jewish zealots under the name of "robbers," and crucified hundreds. He put down false Messiahs and the followers of an Egyptian magician (Josephus, Ant. xx. 8, § 5, 6; Acts xxi. 38) and riots, but he once employed the zealot assassins (Sicarii) to murder the highpriest Jonathan. "By unseasonable remedies he only aggravated" the evils of Judaea (Tacitus, Ann. xii. 54). These were the "very worthy deeds done by F.'s providence," which gave the nation "great quietness" according to the lying flatterer Tertullian's set oration against Paul (Acts xxiv. 2, etc.). Claudius Lysias, the chief captain, sent Paul for judgment to F. at Caesarea. There Paul had two hearings before F. After the first F. deferred the Jews till Lysias the chief captain should come. At the second Paul, before F. and Drusilla, F.'s Jewish wife, who was curious to "hear him concerning the faith of Christ," so reasoned of "righteousness and temperance (both of which F. outraged as a governor and a man, having seduced DRUSILLA [see] from her husband) and judgment to come" that F. "trembled" before his prisoner, but deferred repentance, saying, "when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." Greed of gain supplanted conscience, so that instead of repenting of his shameful life he would not even do common justice to Paul, but left him a prisoner because he got no bribe to set him free. F. could hardly have hoped for money from so poor looking a prisoner as Paul (which is implied in Lysias' surprise, presuming Paul had like himself bought Roman citizenship, Acts xxii. 27, 28), had he not heard Paul stating in the former interview, "after many years I came to bring alms to my nation and offerings." This accounts for F. "letting Paul have liberty and forbidding none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him." He doubtless hoped they would supply the money wherewith to buy his deliverance, an undesigned coincidence and so a mark of the truth of the history. After two years Porcius Festus succeeded, and F. was accused by the Jews of Caesar, at Rome, but escaped through Pallas' influence with the emperor Nero, A.D. 60.

Fenced cities. The distinction between a "city" and a "village" in the Bible is, the former had walls. The village had sometimes a watchman's tower, whither the villagers repaired when in danger. Such towers Uzziah built in the desert for the protection of husbandmen and cattle from marauding tribes (2 Chron. xxvi. 10). David too had "castles" (1 Chron. xxvii. 35). Arcon [see] in Bashan, O's kingdoms E. of Jordan, had "three-score cities fenced with high walls, gates and bars, beside unwalled towns a great many" (Deut. iii. 4, 5); all which Israel took. Villages in the hauran sometimes consist of houses joined together and the entrance closed by a gate for security against Arab marauders. "Build" often means "fortify" (2 Chron. xi. 5-10, xvi. 6; 1 Kings xv. 17). The defences consisted of one or more walls with battlemented parapets and towers at intervals (2 Chron. xxiii. 5, Jer. xxvi. 35), whereon were war engines, also a citadel or tower, the last resource of the defenders (Jud. ix. 45, 51; 2 Kings ix. 17; 2 Chron. xxvi. 9, 15). Ninety towers crowned the oldest of Jerusalem's three walls, fourteen the second, sixty the third (B. J., v. 4, § 2). The tower of Hammed is mentioned Jer. xxxi. 38, Zech. xiv. 19, N. Ch. iii. 1, where also is mentioned "the tower of Meah," "the tower of the furnaces" (ver. 11), "the great tower that lieth out even unto the wall of Ophel" (27). An outwork is meant by the "ditch" or "trench," possibly a wall lining the ditch (1 Kings xxi. 23, 2 Sam. xx. 15). "The castle" of Antonia was the citadel of Jerusalem in our Lord's time; it served also to overawe the town, the Roman soldiers occupying it (Acts xxi. 31). Canaan's "cities fenced up to heaven" were leading causes of the spies' and Israel's unbelieveing panic (Num. xiii. 28; Deut. i. 28, ix. 1, 2). These the Israelites "rebuilt," i.e. refortified (Num. xxvii. 17, 31-42). So fenced was "the stronghold of Zion" that it remained in the Jebusites' hands till David's time (2 Sam. v. 6, 7). Samaria yielded to the mighty hosts of Assyria only after a three years' siege (2 Kings xv. 5, xviii. 10).

Ferret. Heb. anquash, from anqu "to groan." Gese refers it to the house mouse, from its peep. Rather the gecko, which croaks as a frog and has feet so formed as to walk on the ceilings of houses which it enters (Lev. xix. 30, Speaker's Comm.).

ATTACKING A FENCED CITY.

It is enumerated with unclean creeping things, which favours the view that some lizard is meant.

Festus, Porcius. Sent by Nero to succeed Felix as procurator of Judaea, probably in the autumn A.D. 60. To gratiate himself with the Jews he asked Paul would he go up to Jerusalem for judgment there? But Paul, knowing there was little hope of an impartial trial there, as a Roman citizen appealed to Caesar (Acts xxv., xxvi.). A few weeks afterwards he gave Paul's case a hearing before Herod Agrippa II. and Bernice his sister. Paul spoke with such holy zeal that F. exclaimed with a loud voice, "Paul, thou art beside thyself, much learning doth make thee mad" (comp. the same charge against Paul's Master, John x. 20; also 2 Cor. v. 13, 14); Paul replied, "I am not mad, most noble F., but speak forth the words of truth and soberness." Then he appealed to Agrippa, "Believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest." Agrippa replied, "Almost (or as Wordsworth, 'on a short notice,' lit. 'in a short time'; but measure may be understood, which gives the A. V. sense) thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Paul answered, "I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day (including F.) were both almost (in a small measure) and altogether (in a great measure) such as I am, except these bonds" (mark his refined courtesy in the exception). Had Agrippa yielded himself "altogether" to the convictions of conscience then, what an eternal blessing would have ensued to himself, what a reflex blessing probably to F.! Comp. in Caesar's palace at Rome, Phil. i. 12-14. Both certainly were touched; and F., forgetting that it was his own proposal to try Paul at Jerusalem, the place where already Paul's life had been conspired against (xxiii.), and virtually to deliver him up to the Jews (xxv. 11), that drove Paul in self defence to appeal to Rome, said, "This man doeth nothing worthy of death and bonds" (why then had he not released him?); and Agrippa, in compliment to F., laid the blame of his detention on Paul himself instead of on F., "This man might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Caesar." A picture of the world's insincerity.

F. put down forcibly the Sicarii (assassin zealots), robbers, and magicians. F. sided with Agrippa against the Jews as to the high wall they built to prevent Agrippa seeing from his dining room in the palace into the temple court, for it hindered the Roman guard also from seeing the temple from the castle of Antonia during the great feasts. The Roman emperor under the influence of Poppea, a proselyte, decided on appeal in favour of the Jews. F. after a procuratorship of less than two years died in the summer of A.D. 62.

Field. Sadeh in Heb. implies cultivated land (as field is derived from felling trees), but unenclosed; whereas the English "field" implies enclosure. In contrast to the adjoining wilderness (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxxvi. 35).

The sadeh is contrasted with what is enclosed, as a vineyard (Num. xxii. 23, 24) or a city (Deut. xxviii. 3, 16). Unwalled villages were counted by the law as "the fields of the country" (Lev. xxv. 31). "Field" means the open country, apart from habitations, in Gen. xxv. 27, xxxvii. 15. Stones marked off separate plots; to remove these landmarks entailed the curse (Deut. xxvii. 17). The want of fences exposed the fields to straying cattle (Exod. xxii. 5) or fire (2 Sam. xiv. 30). Hence the need of watchers, now named natoor. The rye or spelt was placed "in its (the field's) border" (Isa. xxviii. 25). The wheat was put in the middle, the best and safest place, and the several other grains in their own place. The tallest and strongest grain outside formed a kind of fence. "A town in the country (field)" is a provincial town, as distinguished from the royal city (1 Sam. xxvii. 5). "Fruitful field" is a distinct word. CARMEL [see]. Another term, naareh, "meadows," is a naked treeless region (Jud. xx. 33); "the liars in wait came from the open plains of Gibeon"; not that their ambush was there, but the men of Benjamin had been previously enticed away from the city (ver. 31), so the liars in wait came to the city from the thus exposed plain.

Fig: te'nah, from taan "to stretch out" its branches. The Ficus Carica (Caria being famed for figs) of Linnaeus. Under its appropriate covert Nathanael found that solitude and shade which suited his earnest communion with God (John i. 48). Adam and Eve used its leaves to cover their shame and nakedness, Nathanael to lay bare his soul "without guile" before God. Mount Olivet is still famed for its figtrees as of old. "To sit under one's own vine and figtree" was the proverb for peace and prosperity; so under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 25); type of the true Solomon, Prince of peace, and of His coming millennial reign (Mic. iv. 4, Zech. iii. 10); men will be safe in the open field as in the house. The early ripe fig is "the hasty fruit" (Isa. xxviii. 4), Heb. bikkurah, Spanish bokkore. Figs usually ripened in August: earlier ones in June. Esteemed a delicacy (Jer. xiv. 2, Hos. ix. 10, Mic. vii. 1): "when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand, he eateth it up"; it looks so tempting he instantly swallows it; so the Assyrian conqueror Sardanapalus shall not merely conquer, but with impatient avidity destroy Samaria. The unripe fig (pag) hangs through the winter and ripens in the spring about Easter (S. of Sol. ii. 13). Beth-phage, "house of green figs," is derived from it. Figs were compressed into the form of round cakes for keeping (1 Sam. xxv. 18), debedlim. They were used as a plaster for boils (Isa. xxxviii. 21); God can make the most ordinary means effectual.

The difficulty in Mark xi. 12 is solved thus: the leaves on the "one" fig-tree, when all others were bare, caught Jesus' eye "afar off"; as the fruit precedes the leaves, naturally He might have expected, for satisfying His hunger, figs from a tree with such a precocious show of leaf, even though the season of figs was not yet come. It was the unseasonable display of leaves which led Him to come and see "if haply (if as might naturally be expected) He might find anything thereon." Similarly the Jews (for it was an acted parable) had the show of religion before the general time of religious privileges; but that was all, the fruit of real love which ought to precede the profession was wanting. The "for" expresses the unseasonableness of the leaves. "He found nothing but leaves [i.e. He found no figs]; FOR the time of figs was not yet." St. Mark states why no fruit was found, "for," etc. The reason why it ought to have had fruit is left for us to infer, viz. its abnormal precocious leaves, which Christ had a right to expect would be accompanied with abnormal fruit, for the fig fruit precedes the leaf. Christ cursed it, not because it was fruitless, (for the season of figs was not yet, and if it had been leafless He would not have sought fruit on it,) but because it was false to its high pretensions. Thomson (The Land and the Book) says that in a sheltered spot figs of an early kind may occasionally be found ripe as soon as the beginning of April, the time of Christ's cursing the fig-tree. In Matt. xxi. 19 it is "one fig-tree," standing out an exception to all the rest. The Jews' sin was, they were single out by God from all nations (Amos iii. 2), and had the power to bring forth the leaves of precocious profession but not the will to bring forth the fruit of faith and love. The sheltering hillside of Olivet had protected it, the sunlight had cherished it, and the dews of heaven watered it; but precocious leaves were the only result. Comp. Isa. v. as to God's care of Israel; the only result was not merely unfruitfulness but deceptiveness, "the rustling leaves of a religious profession, barren traditions of the Pharisees, and vain exuberance of words without the good fruit of works" (Wordsworth); ostentatious promise of anteceding the Gentile church in fruit, without performance; pretentious show and hypocrisy. Fig-trees overhanging the road from Jerusalem to Bethany still grow out of the rocks of the mountain which, the Lord said, faith could remove to the distant sea (Matt. xxi. 21). On Olivet too was spoken the parable of the budding fig-tree, the sign of coming summer (Luke xxi. 29, 30). The August figs are the sweetest and best.

Fir. Berosh (from barash, to cut up into planks) and beroth: including the Scotch fir, Pinus silvestris; the larch, the cypress: all found in Lebanon, according to the Imperial Dict. Used for musical instruments, for its softness of grain and sonorous property (2 Sam. vi. 5), doors (1 Kings vi. 34), ceilings (2 Chron. iii. 5), decks of ships (Ezek. xxvii. 5). But Smith's Bible Dict. Append. (from LXX. arkenthos and kedros) identifies beosh with the tall fragrant juniper of Lebanon, and denies that the larch and Scotch fir exist in Syria or Palestine.

Fire. Ever burning on the altar, first kindled, according to Jewish tradition, from heaven (Lev. vi. 9, 13; ix. 24). But Scripture represents the altar fire as lighted naturally before this. Knobel observes the rule Lev. i. 7, "the sons of Aaron shall put fire upon the altar, and lay the wood in order upon the fire," must refer to the first burnt offering; the rule afterwards was to be that in Lev. vi. 13. Exod. xl. 29; Lev. viii. 16, 21, 25, ix. 10, 13, 14, 17, 20. The heavenly fire in ix. 24 did not kindle the fuel but consumed the victim. So God testified His accepting sacrifices (Jud. vi. 21, xii. 19, 20; 1 Kings xviii. 38; 1 Chron. xxi. 26; 2 Chron. vii. 1; probably Gen. iv. 4). Hence the Heb. for "accept" is "turn to ashes" (Ps. xx. 3 marg.). The ever burning fire symbolised Jehovah's ever continuing sacrificial worship; so in the N. T., Heb. xiii. 15, 1 Thess. v. 17. This distinguishes it from the heathen idol Vesta's fire, the Magian fire, that of the Parsees, etc. The fires of Moloch and the sun god were nature worship, into which Sabæanism declined from the one God over all; the Jews often fell into this apostasy (Isa. xxvii. 9, 2 Kings xxiii. 11, 12).

The "strange fire" (Lev. x. 1) is generally explained common fire, not taken from the holy fire of the altar. But no express law forbade burning incense by ordinary fire, except the incense burned by the high priest in entering the holiest place on the day of atonement (xvi. 12), and probably the rule was hence taken as to the daily incense offering. They presented an incense offering not commanded in the law, apart from the morning and evening sacrifice. Being an act of "will worship" it was "strange fire." Nadab and Abihu probably intended to accompany the people's shouts with an incense offering to the praise of God. The time and the manner of their offering were "strange" and self-willed. So the fire of the holy God (Exod. xix. 18), which had just sanctified Aaron's service, consumed his two eldest sons. So the gospel that saves the humble seals death to the presumptuous (2 Cor. ii. 16, Col. ii. 23). [See AARON.]

Fire by its pure, penetrating, all-consuming agency, symbolises the holiness of God which consumes sin as a thing that cannot alide in His presence (Heb. x. 27, xii. 29). The risen Lord's "eyes are like a flame of fire" (Rev. ii. 18, 23) "searching the reins and hearts." He shall come "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel" (2 Thess. i. 8). The flaming fire marked His manifestation in the bush (Exod. iii. 2). Again the same symbol appeared in the pillar of cloud and fire (xiii. 21, 22), in His giving the law on Sinai (xix. 18); so at His second advent (Dan. vii. 9, 10; Mal. iii. 2, iv. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10). John the Baptist, as the last and greatest prophet of the O. T. dispensation, declared of the Messiah, "He shall baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire," referring to His judicial aspect, "burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire" (Matt. iii. 11, 12).

Fire also symbolises the purifying of believers by testing dealings (Mal. iii. 2), also the holy zeal kindled in them as at pentecost (Acts ii., Isa. iv. 4). The same Holy Spirit who sanctifies believers by the fire of affliction dooms unbelievers to the fire of perdition. In 1 Cor. iii. 13-15, "every man's work . . . the (judgment) day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is . . . if any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire." As the "gold," "lav," etc., are figurative, so the fire. Not purgatorial, i.e. purificatory and punitive, but probatory; not restricted, as Rome teaches, to those dying in "venial sin," the supposed intermediate class between those entering heaven at once and those dying in mortal sin and doomed to hell; but universal, testing the godly and ungodly alike (2 Cor. v. 10, Mark ix. 49). This fire is not till the last day, the supposed fire of purgatory is at death. The fire of Paul is to try the works, the fire of purgatory the persons, of men. Paul's fire causes loss to the sufferers, Rome's fire the supposed gain of heaven at last to those purged by fire. A Christian worker, if he builds converts on Christ alone, besides being saved himself, shall have them as his crown and special reward (2 Cor. i. 14, 1 Thess. ii. 19, 2 John 8). But if his work be of unscriptural materials, that the fire will destroy, he shall lose the special "reward" of the work so lost, but himself shall be saved because in Christ, "yet so as by fire," i.e. having a narrow escape (Zech. iii. 2, Amos iv. 11, Jude 23).

Firmament. Raqiah, "the expanse stretched out as a curtain" over the earth (Isa. xl. 22, Ps. civ. 2), resting on the mountains as its pillars (the language is phenomenal, as indeed necessarily is that of even men of science often): Job xvi. 11. It was the reservoir of rain and snow, which poured through its opened "windows" or "doors" (Gen. vii. 11, Isa. xxiv. 18, Ps. lxxviii. 23). It includes the atmosphere immediately round the earth, in which the birds fly, and which bears up the clouds (Gen. i. 6, 7, 20; in ver. 14 it also comprises the region in which the sun, moon, and stars are seen). "Firmament" (from the Vulg. firmamentum, LXX. stercoma) is derived from firmness; but the Heb. expresses no such notion, as if Moses thought the sky a hard firm vault, in which the heavenly bodies were fixed. The sky in Job xxxvii. 18 is termed "strong, as a molten looking glass," viz. a polished copper mirror. But it is not the solidity, but the transparent clearness and the smiling brightness, which is the point of comparison. Otherwise, how could birds fly in a solid? The language is figurative and phenomenal. In Ezek. i. 26 the throne is seen above the "firmament," therefore the firmament must be transparent.

Firstborn. [See BIRTHRIGHT.] Primogeniture gave precedence and priesthood in patriarchal times. So Isaac and Jacob (Gen. xxv. 23-33, Heb. xii. 16), Reuben (Gen. xli. 3, 1 Chron. v. 1). The eldest son in all Israelite families was regarded as sacred to God, because Israel's firstborn were exempted from the stroke which destroyed all the firstborn of Egypt on the first passover night. The firstborn represented the whole people; Jehovah said to Pharaoh, "Israel is My son, My firstborn, and I say unto thee, Let My son go, that he may serve Me; and if thou refuse to let him go, behold I will slay thy son, thy firstborn" (Exod. iv. 22, 23). Israel, as Jehovah's firstborn, was designed to be a "kingdom of priests and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 6). It shall hereafter realize this high calling in a degree that it has not yet realized it, standing as "the firstborn among many brethren" (like the antitypical Israel, Messiah, Rom. viii. 29, Heb. ii. 12), and priest among all nations, which in subordination to Jerusalem, the spiritual metropolis, shall be the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ, then manifested (Isa. lxi. 6, lvi. 21; Rev. xi. 15; Zech. xiv. 16; Jer. xli. 17).

The tribe of Levi was substituted for all Israel's firstborn to minister to the Lord (Num. iii. 12, 45, 50). There being 273 more of the firstborn in Israel than the males in Levi, the 273 were redeemed at five shekels apiece. Still, to mark the consecration of Israel to Jehovah, the redemption money was exacted for every firstborn (Num. xviii. 15). But the firstlings of cattle were to be offered to the Lord. An ass was however redeemed with a lamb, or else killed (Exod. xiii. 13).

Christ is the Firstbegotten. As such, He has the rights of primogeniture; for, as Heb. i. 6 is in the Gr., "when God shall bring in again the Firstbegotten into the world, [He shall be deemed worthy of not less honour, for] He saith (Ps. xlvii. 7), Let all the angels of God worship Him." His being "brought into the world" (nikoyanén, the inhabited world), as the theatre of His power, mainly applies to His second advent.

In Col. i. 16, "the Firstborn of every creature"; implying priority and superlative dignity. Ps. lxxxix. 27, "My Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth," David's antitype, Messiah. Transl. Col. i. 16 (prototokos pásas ktióseis, as John i. 15, 30, xv. 18, protos mou, "long before Me"), "begotten long before every creature"; the reason why He is so designated follows, "for He is before all things." "Firstbegotten" marks at once His eternal priority and His condescending to brotherhood with us (Rom. viii. 29). "Only begotten" marks His relation to the Father by generation from everlasting. Since He is "long before every creature," He cannot be a creature Himself but the Creator. And as He is the first begotten, originating the natural creation, so He is "the firstborn (prototokos, 'first begotten,' Rev. i. 5) from (out of, ek) the dead," and therefore "the Beginning" (Col. i. 18) of "the church of the firstborn" (Heb. xii. 23), the originating Agent of the new creation. He was "begotten" of the Father to a new life at His resurrection (the day when the Father fulfilled Ps. ii. 7 according to Acts xiii. 33, Rom. i. 4) which is His "regeneration"; so He is "the Prince-leader (archegos) of life." "Regeneration," begun in the soul now, will extend to the body at the resurrection of the saints; and to nature, now groaning under the curse (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xx. 36; 1 John iii. 2; Rom. viii. 11, 19, 23). As He is "the firstborn" in relation to the election church, so it is "the church of the firstborn," "a kind of firstfruits of His creatures" (Jas. i. 18), in relation to the millennial church, and to the hereafter to be regenerated natural creation. As Christ is "the firstfruits," earnest and pledge of the coming resurrection, so believers are "a kind of firstfruits," a pledge and earnest of the ultimate regeneration of creation. As He is first begotten by generation from everlasting, so believers by adoption, "begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible," etc. (1 Pet. i. 3.) As Israel, on the ground of being God's "firstborn," was a king-priestly nation, so believers (Rev. i. 6).

The figurative phrase, "the firstborn of death," means the deadliest disease that death (personified) ever gendered (Job xviii. 13). "The firstborn of the poor," the poorest.

Firstfruits. [See FIRSTBORN.] The whole land's produce was consecrated to God by the consecration of the firstfruits (Rom. xi. 16); just as the whole nation by that of the firstborn. At the passover, on the morrow after the sabbath, a sheaf of green barley (which is earlier than wheat), of the first fruits of the crop, was waved before the Lord. At pentecost, 50 days later, two loaves of wheat bread (Lev. xxiii.). The feast of tabernacles, on the 15th day of the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest. Besides these national offerings the law required that the first of all ripe fruits and liquors should be offered by individuals (Exod. xxii. 29). A cake of the first dough baked was to be a heave offering (Num. xv. 19, 21). The firstfruits of the oil, wine, and wheat were to be offered to Jehovah, for the benefit of the priests as His representatives (xviii. 11-13). The Talmud fixed on the 60th as the least to be given of the produce, a 30th or 40th as a liberal offering.

The individual presentation of the firstfruits in a basket took place at the temple or tabernacle. The offerer said: "I profess this day unto the Lord thy God that I am come unto the country which the Lord swears unto our fathers to give us." The priest took the basket and set it down before the altar of the Lord. The offerer added: "A Syrian (Jacob) ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt," etc. (Deut. xxvi.). The Talmud adds that companies of 21 used to assemble at evening in a central station, and pass the night in the open air; the leader in the morning summoned them, "Let us arise and go up to mount Zion, the house of the Lord our God." On the road to Jerusalem they recited Ps. cxlii. and cl. Each party was preceded by a piper and a sacrificial bullock with horns gilt and crowned with olive. The priests met them, and the Levites singing Ps. xxx. Each presented his basket, reciting the formula in Deut. xxvi. King Agrippa, it is stated, once carried his basket as others.

The offerings were either bicurim, raw produce, "firstfruits," or terumoth, "offerings," prepared produce. Times of apostasy brought a neglect of this duty; the restoration of the offering of both kinds was a leading point in the reformation under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 5, 11), and under Nehemiah (Neh. x. 35, 37; xii. 44). The prophets insist on this duty (Ezek. xx. 40, xlv. 30, xlviii. 14; Mal. iii. 8). Fruit trees were to be regarded as uncircumcised, i.e. profane, for three years. The produce of the fourth was devoted to God, and only in the fifth year the produce became the owner's (Lev. xix. 23-25).

Fish: day, implying increase or fecundity. Fish without fins or scales were "unclean" (Lev. xi. 9, 10); aquatic mammalia, amphibia, and reptiles were hereby prohibited. This was the distinction between the good and the bad fish in Matt. xiii. 48. The "great fish" of Jonah (i. 17) was, according to different views, the dogfish, the shark, whose cartilaginous skeleton adapts it for swallowing large animals, or the whale, in the cavity of whose throat there would be room for a man.

The slaying of their fish was a heavy blow from Jehovah on the Egyptians, whose river, canals, and lakes so abounded in fish, and who lived so much on it (Exod. vii. 18-21; Ps. cv. 29; Num. xii. 5; Isa. xix. 8). The fish was worshipped as the emblem of fecundity; Dagon, among the Philistines, half man half fish; also in Assyria. Hence the worship is forbidden (Deut. iv. 18). The "fish-gate" at Jerusalem implies an adjoining fishmarket, supplied chiefly through Tyrian traders who imported it (Neh. xiii. 16, iii. 3, xii. 39; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). The fish of the Lake of Galilee are mainly identical with those especially found in the Nile. The casting net or the larger drag net was the chief instrument used for catching fish (Hab. i. 15); the line and hook, and the "barbed iron" or spear, were also used (Amos iv. 2; Matt. xvii. 27; Job xli. 7).

Fishing is the image for taking souls in the gospel net, not to be destroyed but to be saved alive (Ezek. xlviii. 10, Matt. iv. 19, Luke v. 5-10). Night was thought the best time for net fishing. Fishing symbolises also sudden destruction by invading enemies (Jer. xvi. 16; Amos iv. 2; Hab. i. 16; Eccles. ix. 12; Ezek. xxix. 3-5). In Job xli. 2, "canst thou put an hook (or agmon, rope of rushes) into Leviathan's nose, or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" or hook by which fishes were secured, when thrown into the water, to keep them alive. In John xxi. 11 the 153 fishes taken were all "great fishes," whereas in the corresponding earlier miracle (Luke v. 6) this is not said; the net broke in the earlier, not so in the miracle after the resurrection, the latter typifying the eternal safety of the finally elect, all accounted "great" before God. Christ's sermon and parables (Matt. xiii.) were delivered from a fishing boat; so Luke v. 3. He fed the multitudes with fish as well as bread (Matt. xiv. 19, xv. 36). He paid the tribute with a stater from a fish taken with a hook (Matt. xvii. 27). He ate broiled fish after His resurrection (Luke xxiv. 42, 43; again, John xxi. 9-13).

Fitches. Heb. qetzach, LXX. melanthion, Isa. xxviii. 25, 27; of the order Ranunculaceae, and suborder Helleboreae, in southern Europe and northern Africa; the black poppy. Nigella arvensis, "fennel," with black seed like cummin, easily "beaten out with a staff"; used in sauces as condiment like pepper; aromatic and carminative. In Ezek. iv. 9 kussemeth, A.V. "fitches," is rather "spelt" or dhouira, less suitably rendered "rye." Exod. ix. 32, Isa. xxviii. 25, where the illustration from the husbandman shows that God also adapts His measures to the varying exigencies of the several cases and places, now mercy, now judgment, here punishing sooner there later (an answer to the scoff that His judgments were so slow that they would never come at all, chap. v. 19); His aim not being to destroy His people any more than the husbandman's aim in threshing is to destroy his crop. He will not use the threshing instrument where, as in the case of the "fennel," the "staff" will suffice. From the readiness with which the ripe capsules yield their tiny black seeds (the poor man's pepper, poivrete), nothing could be so absurd as to use a threshing instrument. Even in the case of the "bread corn" which needs to be "bruised" or threshed with the corn drag or trodden out by cattle, "He will not always be threshing it"; for "because" trans. but (comp. xxvii. 7, 8). Spelt has a smooth slender ear (as it were shorn, kussemeth being from kasam "to shear"), the grains of which are so firm in the husk that they need special devices to disengage them.

Flag. Exod. ii. 3. Suph Heb., the Egyptian tift or stiff. An undesigned coincidence that so many Egyptian words should occur in Exodus, just what we should expect if it be, as it professes, Moses' record; but no Hebrew reared in Palestine long after the exodus would have had the knowledge of the Egyptian tongue which the many plainly Hebraized Egyptian words in Exodus indicate that its author possessed; nor would the author have used these words without explanation of their meaning, had he not known that his readers were equally familiar with them. This flag is a species of papyrus, distinct from and less than that commonly used in Egypt to construct light boats, viz. the "BULRUSH" [see] papyrus (whence comes our paper), of which Moses' ark was made. The suph or secondary papyrus is again used in the case of Egypt, Isa. xix. 6. Also "the Red Sea," the sea of suph (Exod. x. 19). Gesenius explains "seaweed" or "rush"; a seaweed like wool is thrown in quantities on its shores. Jonah ii. 5, 6 uses it of "the seaweeds wrapped about his head," for he was not swallowed by the fish at once, but sank to the bottom, where the seaweed was his grave-napkin; thence the fish swallowed him.

Another Heb. word, achy, is translated "flag," Job viii. 11; in Gen. xli. 2 "a meadow." Jerome on Isa. xix. 7 says the Egyptians told him it meant "everything green growing in marshes"; the sedge, rank reed grass by the river's side. An Egyptian word, akh-akh, "green," occurs in a very old papyrus.

Flagon: ashishah. 2 Sam. vi. 19. Rather (from ceah, fire, i.e. dried by heat) "a cake of pressed dried grapes"; so 1 Chron. xvi. 3, 8, of Sol. ii. 5, Hos. iii. 1 marg.; such were offered to idols (Jer. vii. 18).

Nobel is the Heb. in Isa. xxii. 24, "I will hang upon Eliakim (type of Messiah) all the glory of his father's house . . . all vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups, even to all the vessels of flagons." On Christ hang alike the small and the great "vessels unto honour in the Father's house, sanctified and meet for the Master's use" (2 Tim. ii. 20, 21); their capacities varying, but each to be filled to the brim hereafter with heavenly joy according to their several capacities (Luke xix. 16-19, Matt. xxv. 19-23).

Flax. Exod. ix. 31, "the flax was bolled," i.e. in blossom; the boll, akin to bowl and ball, being the pod. Marking the time, the end of February or beginning of March. Linen was exclusively used by the priests. Pliny, xix. 1, notes four kinds in Egypt, and mentions Taxis (Zoa) as famous for flax. In evenness of threads without knot or break Egyptian linen exceeded modern manufacture. (Wilkinson on Herod., ii. 37, p. 54.) Solomon imported it from Egypt (1 Kings

x. 28, Prov. vii. 16, Ezek. xxvii. 7). The processes of manufacture are represented on Egyptian tombs as at Benihasan. The microscope shows the cloth on the mummies to be linen. It was grown in Canaan before Joshua's (ii. 6) conquest; the stalks were dried on the flat roofs by exposure to the sun's heat; later the drying was done in ovens. The combing is noticed in Isa. xix. 9, "they that work in combed (so seriquoth means) flax." The rich alone wore fine linen (Luke xvi. 19). Wilkinson mentions Egyptian linen with 540 (or 270 double) threads in one inch in the warp; most modern cambric has but 160 (Barnes). The corset of Amasis king of Egypt was of linen threads, each having 360 strands or filaments (Herodotus). Its cultivation in northern Israel is alluded to, Hos. ii. 5, 9. "Fine linen, clean and white," is the emblem of "the righteousnesses (distributively) of saints," the bride's attire for "the marriage of the Lamb," Rev. xix. 7, 8 (each saint having for himself Christ's righteousness imputed for justification, and imparted by the Spirit for sanctification). The tearing up of the flax from its native soil, its exposure to the scorching sun, its being torn by the comb's long teeth, and sunk in the water with stones attached, so as ultimately to be transformed into raiment white as snow, illustrate how the Christian is prepared for grace and glory through long and varied afflictions now. In Isa. xlii. 3, "the smoking flax He shall not quench," i.e. the flax wick of the lamp. The believer is the lamp (Gr. Matt. v. 15, John v. 35), his conscience enlightened by the Holy Ghost is the wick; "smoking" means dimly burning, smouldering, the flame not extinct; "bruised" in himself, but having some spark lighted from above, Christ will supply such a one with grace as with oil, and will not stifle the little flame. So the faint light of nature in the Gentiles, smouldering amidst the smoke of error, He not only does not quench, but clears away its mists, and spreads the light of revelation.

Flea. 1 Sam. xxiv. 14, xxvi. 20. Transl. "(thou pursuest) after one flea," David implying his extreme insignificance, fleas in Palestine abounding in a degree not known with us.

Flesh. In an ethical sense opposed to "the spirit." Gen. vi. 3, "for that he also (even the race of godly Seth) [is become] flesh (carnal)." When the salt of the church has lost its savour, the whole mass is corrupt and ripe for judgment. 1 Cor. i. 26, "wise after the flesh," i.e. with wisdom acquired by mere human study without the Spirit. Contrast Matt. xvi. 17, xxvi. 41. Not the body, which is not in itself sinful; it was through thinking it so that gnostic ascetics mortified it by austerities, whilst all the while their seeming neglecting of the body was pampering "the flesh" (Col. ii. 21-23). "The flesh" is the natural man, including the unrenewed will and mind, moving in the world of self and sense only. Self imposed ordinances gratify the flesh (i.e. self) whilst seemingly mortifying it.

"Trouble in the flesh" is in their outward state, viz. through the present distress (1 Cor. vii. 28). So John vi. 63, "it is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and are life." Not the outward flesh, but the word of Christ, is what gives life. So Peter understood Christ, as his reply shows: "Thou hast the words of eternal life."

"To know Christ after the flesh" (2

The prohibition "thou shalt not see a kid in his mother's milk" (Exod. xiii. 19) is thought by Abarbanel to forbid a heathenish harvest superstition designed to propitiate the gods; to which a Karate Jew, quoted by Cudworth (Speaker's Comm.), adds, it was usual when the crops were gathered in to sprinkle the fruit trees, fields, and gardens as a charm. In Exodus the previous context referring to passover and pentecost favours this reference to a usage at the feast of tabernacles or ingathering of fruits. In Deut. xiv. 21 the context suggests an additional reason for the prohibition, viz. that Israel as being "holy unto the Lord" should not eat any food inconsistent with that consecration, for instance what "dieth of itself," or a kid cooked in its mother's milk, as indicating contempt of the natural relation which God sanctified between parent and offspring. Comp. the same principle Lev. xxii. 28, Deut. xxii. 6. Arabs still cook lamb in sour milk to improve the flavour. Kid was a favourite food (Gen. xxvii. 9, 14; Jud. vi. 19, xiii. 15; 1 Sam. xvi. 20). Fish was the usual food in our Lord's time about the sea of Galilee (Matt. vii. 10; John vi. 9, xxi. 9, etc.).

Foot. Sandals covered only the soles, so that the feet needed washing when coming from a journey. In John xiii. 10 a distinct Greek word expresses bathing the whole person and washing the feet; "he that is bathed (leloumenos) needeth not save to wash (nipsasthai) his feet, but is clean every whit." When one has been, as Peter, once for all wholly forgiven in regeneration, and so received the bathing of the whole man, i.e. justification through faith in Jesus, he needs no repetition of this as Peter requested; all he needs is cleansing from the soils that his feet contract in his daily life walk. Hence we daily pray, "give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as," etc. (1 John i. 9). So the priests in entering the house of God (Exod. xxx. 19). It was an act of humble deference to guests to wash the feet (Luke vii. 33-44, 1 Tim. v. 10). Disciples, after Christ's example, were to wash one another's feet, "by love serving one another" (Gal. v. 13).

The sandals were taken off in entering a house, hence the command to Moses (Exod. iii. 5) and to Joshua (v. 15); comp. Eccles. v. 1. To put them on was to prepare for active duty (Ezek. xxiv. 17); whereas mourners went barefoot (2 Sam. xv. 30). To "cover the foot" was the delicate expression for easing oneself, preparatory to which the loose garment was let fall to cover the person (1 Sam. xxiv. 3; comp. marg. 2 Kings xiii. 27).

Putting the feet on captives' necks, as Joshua did (x. 24), symbolises complete mastery (Ps. cx. 1, 1 Cor. xv. 25, Isa. lx. 14).

Footman. (1) Distinguished from the soldier on horseback or in a chariot. (2) The swift runners who attended the king; foretold by Samuel 1 Sam. viii. 11 (1 Kings xiv. 27 marg.). Swift running was much valued in a warrior (Ps. xix. 5, Joel ii. 7, Job xvi. 14). A characteristic of David, for which he praises God (1 Sam. xvii. 22, 48, 51, xx. 6; 2 Sam. xxii. 30; Ps. xviii. 29; comp. 1 Chron. xii. 8 end).

Forehead. As the women veiled their faces, not to do so was a mark of shamelessness; "thou hadst a whore's forehead" (Jer. iii. 3). The forehead is made the seat of boldness of speech and act (Ezek. iii. 7-9): "the house of Israel are stiff of forehead . . . against their foreheads as an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead." Votaries of idols branded themselves with the idol's symbol. So Antiochus Epiphanes branded the Jews with the ivy leaf, Bacchus' symbol (2 Macc. vi. 7, 3 Macc. ii. 29). God's seal and name are in the foreheads of His servants, the conspicuous, noblest part of man's body, the seat of the understanding, whereon the helmet, "the hope of salvation," is worn (Ezek. ix. 4). At the exodus the mark was on the houses, for then it was families; here it is on the foreheads, for it is individuals whose safety is guaranteed by the Lord's mark.

The mark on "the right hand and forehead" of the worshippers of the beast (Rev. xiii. 16) implies prostration of body and intellect to him. "In the forehead for possession, in the hand for work and service." God's name shall be "in the saints' foreheads." Their sonship shall no longer be a personal secret between them and God (Rev. iii. 17), but shall be openly (xxii. 4) visible to all citizens of New Jerusalem, so that the free flow of mutual love among Christ's family will not be checked by suspicion as here. Upon the harlot's (the apostate church) forehead was written "MYSTERY, BABELON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH." What a contrast to the inscription on the mitre on the highpriest's forehead, "HOLINESS TO THE LORD" (Rev. xvii. 5, Exod. xxviii. 36).

In Ezek. xvi. 12, "a jewel on thy forehead," rather "a ring in thy nose"

(Isa. iii. 21). However, Persian and Egyptian women often wear jewels and strings of coins across the forehead.
